The hindquarters of a stone lion before what had once been the Public Library; before it, on the steps, the corpse of an elderly lady whose shopping-bag had spewed its contents over the street—two murder-mysteries, a rental copy of Peyton Place, and the latest issue of the Reader's Digest——

A small boy wearing a cowboy hat, who levelled a toy pistol at his little sister and shouted, "Bang! You're dead!"

(She was.)

He walked slowly now, his pace impeded by obstacles both physical and of the spirit. He approached the building on the hillside by a circuitous route; avoiding repugnance, overcoming morbid curiosity, shunning pity, recoiling from horror, surmounting shock.

He knew there were others about him here in the city's core, some bent on acts of mercy, some on heroic rescue. But he ignored them all, for they were dead. Mercy had no meaning in this mist, and there was no rescue from radiation. Some of those who passed called out to him, but he went his way unheeding, knowing their words were mere death-rattles.

But suddenly, as he climbed the hillside, he was crying. The salty warmth ran down his cheeks and blurred the inner surface of his helmet so that he no longer saw anything clearly. And it was thus he emerged from the inner circle; the inner circle of the city, the inner circle of Dante's hell.

His tears ceased to flow and his vision cleared. Ahead of him was the proud outline of the Federal Building, shining and intact—or almost so.

AS HE neared the imposing steps and gazed up at the facade, he noted that there were a few hints of crumbling and corrosion on the surface of the structure. The freakish blast had done outright damage only to the sculptured figures surmounting the great arched doorway; the symbolic statuary had been partially shattered so that the frontal surface had fallen away. He blinked at the empty outlines of the three figures; somehow he never had realized that Faith, Hope and Charity were hollow.

Then he walked inside the building. There were tired soldiers guarding the doorway, but they made no move to stop him, probably because he wore a protective garment even more intricate and impressive than their own.

Inside the structure a small army of low clerks and high brass moved antlike in the corridors; marching grimfaced up and down the stairs. There were no elevators, of course—they'd ceased functioning when the electricity gave out. But he could climb.

He wanted to climb now, for that was why he had come here. He wanted to gaze out over the city. In his gray insulation he resembled an automaton, and like an automaton he plodded stiffly up the stairways until he reached the topmost floor.

But there were no windows here, only walled-in offices. He walked down a long corridor until he came to the very end. Here, a single large cubicle glowed with gray light from the glass wall beyond.

A man sat at a desk, jiggling the receiver of a field telephone and cursing softly. He glanced curiously at the intruder, noted the insulating uniform, and returned to his abuse of the instrument in his hand.

So it was possible to walk over to the big window and look down.

It was possible to see the city, or the crater where the city had been.

Night was mingling with the haze on the horizon, but there was no darkness. The little incendiary blazes had been spreading, apparently, as the wind moved in, and now he gazed down upon a growing sea of flame. The crumbling spires and gutted structures were drowning in red waves. As he watched, the tears came again, but he knew there would not be enough tears to put the fires out.

So he turned back to the man at the desk, noting for the first time that he wore one of the very special uniforms reserved for generals.

This must be the commander, then. Yes, he was certain of it now, because the floor around the desk was littered with scraps of paper. Maybe they were obsolete maps, maybe they were obsolete plans, maybe they were obsolete treaties. It didn’t matter now.

There was another map on the wall behind the desk, and this one mattered very much. It was studded with black and red pins, and it took but a moment to decipher their meaning. The red pins signified destruction, for there was one affixed to the name of this city. And there was one for New York, one for Chicago, Detroit, Los Angeles—every important center had been pierced.

He looked at the general, and finally the words came.

“It must be awful,” he said.

“Yes, awful,” the general echoed.

“Millions upon millions dead.”

“Dead.”

“The cities destroyed, the air polluted, and no escape. No escape anywhere in the world.”

“No escape.”

He turned away and stared out the window once more, stared down at Inferno. Thinking, this is what it has come to, this is the way the world ends.

He glanced at the general again, and then sighed. “To think of our being beaten,” he whispered.

The red glare mounted, and in its light he saw the general’s face, gleeful and exultant.

“What do you mean, man?” the general said proudly, the flames rising. “We won!”

Edifice Complex

Wayne looked at Nora and laughed.

"You're a good kid," he said.

Nora's smile was bleary. Even though the ship was in grav, she had difficulty standing because she was bashed to the gills.

"You keep saying that, but you never do nothing. I thought this was a pleasure trip," she giggled.

"Wait until we land," Wayne reassured her. "I told you last night when I brought you aboard, we can't do anything in free-fall. Besides, you've got your pay."

Nora staggered over and put her plump hand on his shoulder as he bent over the scanner. Her voice was soft. "I was hoping you wouldn't say that," she murmured. "I know what you think, picking me up in a stinking dive like that, but when I said yes, it wasn't just the money. I kind of went for you, hon, you know? And when you sweet-talked me into this I was thinking it would be, well, romantic like. Running off on your ship to a secret hideaway—"

She paused, blinking down into the scanner. They were cruising just a few thousand feet above the cloudless surface at a slow speed, circling over gentle, rolling sandy slopes with broad flat areas between. There was no water, no vegetation, no sign of life.

"Where are we, anyhow?" she asked.

"Vergis IV," Wayne told her.

"Don't look like much of a place for a weekend," Nora said. "Lonely."

Wayne grinned and pulled her close. “That’s just why I picked it out,” he muttered. “There’ll be nobody around to bother you—except me.”

The plump, voluptuous brunette ran her hand along his spine. “When you plan to start bothering, hon?” she whispered.

“Soon. Let me put us down first. I’m looking for a spot.”

Nora put her head close to his and stared into the scanner. “Who told you about this place?” she asked.

“Friend of mine—a space-rat. Luke, they call him.”

The full-figured brunette giggled. “Old Luke? The guy who hit Port City last week for a big bash-out? The one with all them diamonds?”

“He sure was tossing ‘em around. Dorine, she’s my girlfriend, she was with him night before last. He was real bashed, and Dorine tried to find out where he got the loot. But he wasn’t talking.”

“He told me,” Wayne said. “The diamonds came from here.”

Nora dug her nails into his arm.

“Is that why you picked this place, on account of the diamonds?” Her breath quickened, and Wayne could smell the sickly-sweet odor of bash. “You gonna get me some diamonds, hon?”

Wayne smiled down on her. “I said you were a good kid, didn’t I? If there are any diamonds here, you’ll get them.”

“Oh, hon—”

“Hold it,” Wayne told her, disengaging her arms. “We land first, remember? Meanwhile, how are you fixed for bash? I’ve got some prime stuff here in the pouch.”

“Sure, hon. Give me a pop. The more I bash, the better I am—you’ll see—”

Wayne pulled the pouch from his pocket and poured a minute mound of the grayish seeds into her palm. She raised it to her nostrils and sniffed, inhaling with a deep sigh that ended in a sneeze.

“Now I’m cruising,” she said. The whites of her eyes turned yellow as the pupils contracted. “Come on, hon—”

"Let me set us down," Wayne urged. He squinted through the scanner. "Right over there," he told her.

"What's that big brown thing?" Nora asked, trying to focus her gaze. "Looks like a snake."

Wayne studied the brown, irregular oblong. "It does at that, from this height," he agreed. "But it's really a hut. Luke told me to find a hut if I wanted to get hold of the natives. Besides, we'll need a place to stay."

"How about right here on the ship?" Nora suggested. "Right here on the ship, and right now—" She was beginning to breathe heavily.

"Don't forget the diamonds," Wayne reminded.

"Diamonds." Nora's voice trailed off as the bash took hold. She fell back upon the bunk. "Hon, I'm dizzy. Don't leave me, hon."

"I wouldn't think of it," Wayne assured her. "You're a good kid, remember?"

He grinned and bent over the controls. Slowly, the ship glided in for a landing on a sandy plain only a few hundred yards from the brown oblong. As Nora murmured incoherently, Wayne put out the landing platform and packed a small kit-bag which he slung over his shoulder. Then he stepped over to Nora and shook her.

"Wake up," he said. "We're going out."

Eyes closed, Nora tried to pull him down on the bunk. "Wait, hon," she whispered. "Let's not go now."

"We've got to," he told her. "The way I figure it, there's less than an hour of daylight left. I want to look around."

"You promised—"

"First let's see about the diamonds. If there's anybody in that hut they'll spot us."

He raised the girl to her feet. She had to hang on to him as they walked down the ramp, and her legs went rubbery as she waded through the sand.

"Take your shoes off," he suggested.

She kicked them aside. "Hot," Nora murmured, eyes closed against the sun's glare. "Too hot."

"Cooler in the hut," he replied. "Come on."

They trudged over to the oblong. It was perhaps thirty feet in length, seven or eight feet high, and nine feet wide. Seen at close range it no longer resembled a serpent, except to Nora's bash-distorted vision.

"Looks creepy," she whispered. "What's it made of, anyway?"

"Some kind of hide, I guess. See how it's stretched? Wonder how they pieced it together—"

Wayne broke off as Nora stumbled against him. The girl was bashed, all right. Maybe he shouldn't have given her that last pop. But she was a good kid, he had to remember that.

And now, where were the natives?

He approached the dark doorway of the hut and tried to peer into the dimness beyond. There didn't seem to be any door at all, and no windows. The interior flooring slanted down away from the opening and he couldn't see very far within.

"Place must be deserted, all right," he said. "Let's take a peek inside."

Nora tugged at his arm. "I don't want to go in there. It's too dark."

"Here's a light." Wayne produced a small tube from his pack. "Got a stunner attachment, too, following the beam. We're ready for anything." He pulled her toward the doorway.

"It smells so," the girl whimpered. "Like snakes. And I think someone's looking at us."

Wayne glanced behind him, scanning the desert horizon, then shook his head. "You're just bash-happy."

"I'm scared, that's all."

He shrugged and moved forward. She had no choice but to follow. They walked down the slanting floor into the hut.

It did smell in here, Wayne realized. The odor was atrocious. No wonder the place was deserted. He swept the beam up and over the rough, unfinished walls. There was no furnishing, no sign of occupancy.

They stood in the outer chamber and gazed forward, noting that the interior of the hut was divided into several sections. Ahead of them was a narrow passageway leading to a second chamber. As Wayne moved forward the odor grew stronger and the girl held back.

“Let’s go outside,” she urged. “I’m choking, hon.” Wayne shook his head and advanced to the head of the passageway. He stood there and played his beam on the empty chamber beyond. The stench was almost intolerable, and it seemed to be coming from the floor, which was inches deep in stagnant muck. Maybe the natives used this hut as a cesspool. Maybe this is where they disposed of the—

“Look!” Nora had crept close behind him, and now she was cowering against him and pointing. “See, in that slime in the corner? There’s bones, and a skull!”

Wayne swept the beam around, away from the opening. “You’re imagining things,” he told her.

But he’d seen them too, and now he knew everything was all right.

“Want to go back outside?” he asked.

“Yes. Oh, please, hurry—I think I’m going to be sick.”

He half-supported Nora as she staggered back up the slanting slope leading to the doorway. The sky had darkened over the desert beyond, and the air was suddenly chill.

“Take a deep breath,” he commanded. “You’ll feel better.”

“Not until we get back to the ship,” the girl whispered. “I can’t stand being near this place. There’s something awful about it. It isn’t just a house, it’s—” Abruptly she paused and stared back at the oblong bulk of the hut. “We’re being watched,” she said. “I know it.”

“Nonsense. You can see for yourself there’s nobody around.”

“Then where are the natives?”

“Hunting, perhaps.”

“Are there animals around, too?”

“No.”

“Then what do they hunt?”

“Each other.”

“You mean they’re—”

“Cannibals.” Wayne nodded. “It’s a dying world. No real civilization. No wonder they give diamonds as gifts. They’re so grateful when anyone brings them a present.”

“Is that how Luke got his loot?” Nora asked. “What kind of present did he give them?”

Wayne grinned at her. “His partner, Brady.”

Nora’s mouth twitched. “You’re joking. Or—he was lying to you—”

“Dying men don’t lie,” Wayne said, softly. “I picked old Luke up in an alley, two nights ago, bashed to the lungs and coughing his guts out. Dragged him into my place, and ten minutes later he was dead. But he talked, first. I thought he was delirious, until I saw the diamonds. Then I knew he was telling the truth.

“It had all been an accident, really. He and Brady were scavengers, operating a little wildcat freighter. They were on their way back from Cybele when Luke got sick. Brady must have figured it was better to find a place to stop, and he put down here. Luke was unconscious at the time.

“When he came to, he was alone on the freighter. Apparently Brady had decided to step out and take a look around. It was night, but the moon was up and Luke could see out—he was in desert country, like this. And there was nobody around. Off in the distance was one of these huts, and Luke wondered if Brady had gone to investigate. He felt pretty weak, but he just about made up his mind to follow his partner when the natives came.

“Luke didn’t let them get aboard, of course. But he stood in the airlock and gestured at them. I guess they caught on to his sign language in a hurry. Anyway, they nodded at him and pantomimed. The way it looked, they’d found Brady wandering outside and jumped him.

“Luke said there were a dozen or more of them, all carrying long spears. He couldn’t possibly handle them all, so he did the next best thing—smiled, looked friendly, and tried to find out what they’d done with Brady.

“So he made stabbing gestures and cutting gestures, but they just shook their heads and kept gesturing over at the hut in the distance. Then some of them bowed down facing it, and the rest bowed down facing the ship. And the biggest one, whom Luke took to be the chief, pulled out the sack of diamonds. He set it down and bowed again. Then he pointed at the hut once more and started to rub his belly. That's when Luke guessed the rest. You see, he thought Luke was some kind of god who had brought them Brady as an offering. And they were repaying him in diamonds."

The moon was rising redly over the black bulk of the hut, and Wayne could see Nora's face flaming in the light. Her eyes were glazed.

"The natives left, then, and after a while Luke opened the lock and picked up the diamonds. He wanted to go to the hut and find Brady, but he was afraid. Instead, he took off. That's why he went on the bash when he hit port. He knew he'd been a coward."

"I don't believe it," Nora murmured. "He was out of his head."

"I saw the diamonds," Wayne reminded her.

"But it doesn't make sense. Maybe he and Brady found diamonds here and they quarreled. So he killed his partner and took the loot for himself. That crazy yarn about the natives eating each other—"

"You saw the bones in the hut," Wayne muttered. "And in a little while, you'll see the natives, too."

Nora stepped back. "I don't want to see them," she wailed. "I want to go back to the ship. Why did you bring me here in the first place? Why—"

"Because you're a good kid," Wayne said, and hit her across the face with his flash.

She fell forward heavily and he put his knee in her back, pressing her down as he got the rope out of his pack. The bash had weakened her and she couldn't put up much of a struggle. He tied her wrists expertly and then dragged her along the sand by her ankles. She moaned a little, but didn't come around until he'd propped her up on a small rise a few hundred feet from the entrance to the hut.

"There we are," he told her. "All wrapped and ready. Like I said, you're a good kid. But I suppose you don't know what I mean, do you?"

"Hon, let me go—"

"A kid is a baby goat. Once upon a time, back on Terra, in a place called India, there were other animals called tigers. Some of them were man-eaters. When the natives wanted to attract a man-eater, they staked a kid out.

"So when I heard Luke's story, I knew what to do. I started looking for bait for a man-eater, and I found you."

"You can't—"

"I can." Wayne stared down at her soberly. "Nobody saw us together last night. Nobody knows you sneaked off with me on an unauthorized flight. The Port is filled with tramps like you—they come and go. Even if somebody notices your disappearance, I'll never be involved."

"But why me?" She was sobbing now, wheezing in panic.

Wayne reached forward and started ripping away her garments, slowly and deliberately.

"This is why," he murmured. "Because you're white and soft. Because you're plump and rounded and tender. Because you're a good kid."

"Stop! Let me go!"

Wayne stood up, nodding. "That's right," he said. "Go ahead and scream. If they don't see that body of yours in the moonlight, at least they'll hear your voice. When the kid bleats, the man-eater comes."

"No—don't leave me—come back—I'll do anything you want, anything!"

"You'll get me the diamonds," Wayne told her. "I'll be waiting, never fear."

He walked over to the dark shadow of the oblong hut and crouched just inside the doorway. The charnel stench was strong on the night air, but he wanted to keep out of sight. After they came, that was the psychological moment. With the weapon in his hand, he had nothing to fear. They'd treated old Luke like a god, and he'd get the same consideration.

Nora was crying softly in the distance. Her nude body was radiant in the moonlight. If there were any natives around, they'd be here soon.

For a moment he wondered if Nora had been right. Could the old scavenger have made up the whole yarn just as she said? Maybe there were no natives after all. The whole idea of cannibals with spears seemed a bit naive and ridiculous. Brady could have wandered off, found some diamonds, then brought them back with him. Maybe he'd tried to hide them from his partner, only to have Luke discover them and kill him in a quarrel over the loot. That made a lot more sense.

Yes, the old space-rat had probably been lying. And who could blame him under the circumstances? Wayne hadn't told Nora the whole story—what he'd gotten out of Luke at the end wasn't a voluntary confession. Sure, he'd picked the old man up in the alley and dragged him inside, but only after he'd gone through the dying man's pockets and found the diamonds. That's why he put him on his bed, and started choking him; choking him until the story came out in bits and pieces, like the bits and pieces of lung he coughed up in the final dying spasm.

Wayne frowned at himself. He'd been a little too rough; otherwise he'd have gotten more of the details. He'd have found out how to separate fact from fancy. As it was, all he really knew was that Luke had found the diamonds here on Vergis IV.

If there was nothing to the yarn about the cannibal natives, then Wayne was wasting his time. He'd have to dispose of the girl himself and then go diamond-hunting.

On the other hand, he reminded himself, there were the huts, just like Luke described them. Someone must have built them. And now he remembered the bones. The bones and the stench. There had to be man-eaters around. There had to be—

A whiff of carrion odor caused him to wrinkle his nose in revulsion. He wished there was another place of concealment available. Nora had been right; something about this hut made him feel uneasy. What kind of creatures could have built it? Where did they get the hides? Maybe they used their own skins—that is, the skins of their victims. Wayne tried to imagine a completely cannibalistic civilization. Had there ever been any on Terra?

Wayne tried to think about that for a moment, but there was something else that disturbed him, something he couldn't quite account for.

Maybe it was the red moon. It gave him the feeling Nora had complained about in the hut, the feeling of being watched. It was too much like an accusing eye.

Maybe it was remembering how he'd choked the story out of that bash-crazed old man; maybe it was seeing that naked, moaning girl up there on the rise.

He stared at her silhouette as it writhed on the horizon and wondered when something was going to happen. He hoped it would be soon, because he had to get out of here, the smell was getting worse—

Suddenly Wayne stiffened and crouched back in the doorway.

Something was coming over the rim of the hill.

The bait was luring the man-eater.

Wayne squinted into the wastes, trying to distinguish individual forms in the black blur that moved across the hilltop. Why, there must be an army of them, moving packed together in a solid mass!

Nora saw the movement too, because she was screaming, now. And there was another sound—a soft, slow rumbling. The black bulk was flowing forward. It wasn't black, really; more of a reddish-brown. The same color as the hut.

Then Wayne realized why he couldn't make out individual figures. There were no figures—just the solid mass. The thing crawling sluggishly over the hillside was a single great form. A brown oblong form, moving slowly but surely.

As Wayne recognized the object, another realization came to him. Now he knew what had eluded his mind. It was something about this hut. With no wind to disturb the sand, why hadn't he noticed the footprints of the natives leading to and from the doorway?

He had the answer, now. There were no natives—at least, no humanoid cannibals. Nora's guess had been correct. Brady found the diamonds and Luke killed him, then made up the story about natives dragging him into their hut. Brady hadn't been dragged to a hut—the hut had come to him.

And it was coming to Nora, now, out there on the hillside, its brown bulk inching toward her, towering over her, the black doorway gaping to engulf her like a ravenous mouth.

But it is a mouth, Wayne told himself, and suddenly there was a shock of final recognition as he remembered the hide-like covering that was hide, and the second inner compartment with the stagnant stench bubbling over the bones.

The huts were man-eaters, and he had to get out of here! He moved up the slanting slope leading to the doorway, eyes intent on the spectacle before him. Nora was screaming, the maw was closing over her—and then the vision was blotted out.

The maw was closing over him.

The doorway ahead of him disappeared, and the slanting slope moved beneath his feet. It contracted in a series of ripples, convulsing like a throat in the act of swallowing. Wayne gasped, the stench suddenly stronger in his nostrils. He clawed out at the walls, dropping his weapon as the slope tilted, pushing him back. And now a wave of nauseous liquid gushed out from the floor, and Wayne felt himself forced back, thinking idiotically, salivation, that's what it is, and wondering why there were no teeth in the house.

The odor was overpowering, and he felt the slimy waves wash over him as he retreated, forcing his way along the narrow passage toward the second chamber.

It squeezed him clammily, and all too late he realized that this must be the esophagus.

Snakes. Nora had said. The thing smelled like a snake, it looked like a snake, it was a snake. A snake that devours its victims whole and alive. And then digests them in its stomach.

Wayne clawed the constricting walls of the narrow passage, trying to hold himself back. But the creature was moving and shuddering all around him, and then it gave a great gulp and swallowed. Wayne fell into the second compartment, and the bubbling liquid surged and seared . . .

When daylight came, the hut was sluggish and quiescent. The dark doorway opened once more, but there was no other sign of movement.

The hut belched once, then settled back to wait . . .

The Sleeping Redheads

“New Orleans,” said Morgan. “The land of dreams.”

“I remember Connee Boswell singing it when I was just a kid,” Morgan told him. “Made up my mind to hit this town someday and see for myself. But what I want to know is, where is it?”

“It?”

“The land of dreams,” Morgan murmured. “Where’d it all disappear to?” He leaned forward and the bartender refilled his glass. “Take Basin Street, for instance. It’s just a lousy railroad track. And the streetcar named Desire is a bus.”

“Used to be a streetcar, all right,” the bartender assured him. “Then they took ‘em out of the Quarter and made all the streets one way. That’s progress, Mac.”

“Progress!” Morgan swallowed his drink. “When I got down here today I did the Quarter.

Museum, Jackson Square, Pirate’s Alley, Antoine’s, Morning Call, the works. It’s nothing but a tourist trap.”

“Now wait a minute,” the bartender said. “What about all the old buildings with the balco-nies and grillwork, stuff like that?”

The bartender shrugged. "There's always Bourbon Street."

Morgan made a face. "I hit Bourbon tonight, before I came here. A big neon nothing. Cli-pjoints and stripjoints. Imitation Dixieland played for visiting Swedes from Minnesota."

"Careful, Mac," said the bartender. "I'm from Duluth myself."

"You would be." Morgan tackled a fresh drink. "There isn't a genuine native or a genuine spot in the whole place. What's the song say about Creole babies with flashing eyes? All I saw was a bunch of B-girls out of exotic, mysterious old Cincinnati."

The bartender tipped the bottle again without being asked, "Now I get the drift, Mac," he muttered. "Maybe you're looking for a little action, huh? Well, I know a place—"

Morgan shook his head. "I'll bet you do. Everybody knows a place. Walking north, before I crossed Rampart, I was stopped three times. Cab drivers. They wanted to haul me to a place.

And what was their big sales pitch? Air-conditioning, that's what! Man waits half his life, saves his dough for a trip down here, and the land of dreams turns out to be air-conditioned!"

He stood up, knocking against the bar-stool.

"Tell you a secret," Morgan said. "If Jean Lafitte was around today, he'd be a cab driver."

He lurched out of the tavern and stood on the sidewalk outside, inhaling the damp air. It had turned quite foggy. Fog in the streets. Fog in his brain.

He knew where he was, though-north of Rampart, east of Canal and the Jung Hotel. In spite of the fog, he wasn't lost.

All at once Morgan wished he was lost. Lost on this crazy, winding little side street where the grass pushed up between the brick paving-stones and all the houses were shuttered against the night. There were no cars, no passersby, and if it wasn't for the street-lamps he could easily imagine himself to be in the old New Orleans. The real New Orleans of the songs and stories, the city of Bolden and Oliver and a kid named Satch.

It had been that way once, he knew. Then World War I came along and they closed down Storeyville. And World War II came along and they turned Bourbon Street into a midway for servicemen and conventioneers. The tourists liked it fine; they came to the Mardi Gras parades and they ate at Arnaud's and then sampled a Sazerac at the Old Absinthe House and went home happy.

But Morgan wasn't a tourist. He was a romantic, looking for the land of dreams.

Forget it, he told himself.

So he started to walk and he tried to forget it, but he couldn't. The fog grew thicker-both fogs. Out of the internal fog came phrases of the old songs and visions of the old legends. Out of the external fog loomed the crumbling walls of the St. Louis Cemetery. St. Louis Number One, the guidebooks called it.

Well, to hell with the guidebooks. This was what Morgan had been looking for. The real New Orleans was inside these walls. Dead and buried, crumbling away in decayed glory.

Morgan found the grilled gate. It was locked. He peered through the bars, squinting at foggy figures. There were ghosts inside, real ghosts. He could see them standing silently within-white, looming figures pointing and beckoning to him. They wanted Morgan to join them there, and that's where he belonged. Inside, with the other dead romantics—

"Mister, what you doing?"

Morgan turned, stumbling back against the gateway. A small man peered up at him, a small white-haired man whose open mouth exuded a curious-sweet odor.

One of the ghosts, Morgan told himself. The odor of corruption—

But it was only alcohol. And the old man was real, even though his face and his eyes seemed filled with fog.

“Can’t get in there, Mister,” he was saying. “Place is closed for the night.”

Morgan nodded. “You the watchman?” he asked.

“No. Just happened I was wandering around.”

“So was I.” Morgan gestured at the vista beyond the gateway. “First damned thing I’ve hit in this town that looked real.”

The old man smiled, and again Morgan caught the sickish-sweet odor. “You’re right,” he said. “All the real things are dead. Notice the angels?”

“I thought they were ghosts,” Morgan admitted.

“Maybe so. Lots of things inside there besides statues. See the tombs? Everybody’s buried above ground, on account of the swamps. Them as couldn’t afford a tomb, why they just rented a crypt in the cemetery wall. You could rent by the month if you liked. But if you didn’t pay up-out came Grandpa! That is, if the snatchers didn’t get him first.”

The old man chuckled. “See the bars and chains on the doors?” he asked. “Rich folk put them up. Had to protect their dead from the bodysnatchers. Some say the grave-robbers were after jewels and such. Others claim the darkies needed the bones for voodoo. I could tell you stories—”

Morgan took a deep breath. “I’d like to hear some of those stories,” he said. “How about going somewhere for a drink?”

“A pleasure.” The old man bowed.

Under ordinary circumstances, Morgan would have found the spectacle slightly ridiculous.

Now it seemed appropriate. And it was appropriate that the little man led him down twisting streets into ever-thickening fog. It was appropriate that he steered him at last into a small, dingy bar with a single light burning in its curtained window. It was appropriate that the stranger ordered for both of them without inquiring what Morgan would have.

The bartender was a fat man with a pockmarked face which bore no expression at all as he set glasses down before them. Morgan stared at the cloudy greenish liquor. It looked like a condensation of the fog, but it gave off the odd, sickish-sweet smell he had come to recognize.

“Absinthe,” the old man murmured. “Not supposed to serve it, but they know me here.” He raised his glass. “To the old days,” he said.

The drink tasted of licorice and fire.

“Everybody used to know me then,” the stranger told him. “Came to Storeyville in nineteen-and-two. Never did pick up the accent, but I’ve been a professional Southerner ever since.

A real professional, you might say.” He started a chuckle that ended up as a wheeze. “Throat’s dry,” he explained.

Morgan beckoned to the bartender. The green liquor climbed in the glasses, then descended. It rose and fell several times during the next hour. And the old man’s voice rose and fell, and Morgan felt himself rising and falling, too.

It wasn’t a panicky feeling, though. Somehow it seemed quite natural for him to be sitting here in this lonely little bar with a shabbily-dressed old lush who gazed at him with eyes of milky marble.

And it was natural for Morgan to talk about how disappointed he was in New Orleans, about wishing he’d been here to see the Mahogany Hall and the Ivory Palace—

“Storeyville,” the old man said. “I can tell you all you want to know about that. Said I was a professional Southerner.” He wheezed again, then recovered himself. “Had six chickens on the block,” he said. “Wouldn’t think it to look at me now, but I was a mighty handsome lad.

And I made out. Had my own rig, nigger coachman and all. When autos came along, I got me a chauf*feur*. Wore spats every day of the week.” He lifted his glass. “Six chickens, a high-class house. Professor in the parlor, mirrors all over the walls in every room upstairs. Bartender on duty twenty-four hours a day, and the biggest call was for champagne. Customers ca-me from far away as Memphis, just to see the oil paintings.”

“No air-conditioning?” Morgan mumbled.

“Never mind. Go on.”

“Called it the Palace,” the old man murmured. “And it was. When the girls came down in their evening-dresses, with their hair done up and their eyes kind of sparkling behind their fans, they looked like queens. And we treated our customers like kings. Things were a lot different in the trade, then. Us fancy operators, we knew how to show a man a good time. We didn’t hustle ‘em for a quick trick and push ‘em out again. Gave a sociable evening, a little re-finement, a little refreshment, a little romance.”

He sighed. “But the army closed Storeyville. Jazz bands went north, Professors got jobs in shoe-shine parlors, and I sold the oil-paintings. Still, I was luckier than most. I’d made my pi-le. Even hung on to the Palace, but closed everything up except for my own room downstairs.

Nobody around today except me and the Red Queen.”

“The Red Queen?”

“Told you I was a professional. Just because the lid clamped down, that didn’t mean all us old-timers got squashed. I’ve kept going, on the q.t., understand? Sort of a sentimental gesture, if you follow me. Never more than one chicken now, but that’s enough. Enough for the few who still appreciate it, who still want a taste of the old days, the old ways—”

Morgan burned his throat on the drink. “You mean to tell me you’re still-in business?” he asked. “You’ve got a girl, the same kind who used to work in Storeyville in the old days?”

His companion nodded solemnly. “Trained her myself,” he murmured. “Wears the old dresses, old-fashioned stuff, not like the chippies over in the big houses. Got her room fixed up like it was forty-five, fifty years ago. Like stepping into the past, and she treats you right, you know? I’m pretty careful who I let in these days, but there was something about you, I sa-id to myself when I saw you—”

Morgan stood up. “Come on,” he said. He produced his wallet, flung a bill on the table.

“I’ve got dough. Been saving it up just for this trip. How much is this going to cost me?”

"She'll set the price," the old man told him. "For me this is only-well, you might call it a hobby."

Then they were out in the night again, and it seemed to Morgan that the fog was thicker, the streets darker and narrower than before. And the absinthe burned, and he alternately stumbled forward and hung back; eager for the past recaptured and wondering why he was seeking a nameless destination with a drunken old pimp.

Then they came to the house, and it looked like any other ancient house in the fog, in the absinthe haze. The old man unlocked the door, and he stood in the dark, high-ceilinged, mahogany-panelled hallway while the gas-jet sputtered on. The old man's room was off to the right; the big double-doors of what used to be the parlor were tightly closed. But the huge staircase loomed ahead, and Morgan blinked as his companion reeled over to it and cupped his hands, shouting, "Company!"

His voice echoed and re-echoed down the long hall, reverberating off the walls and the doorways, and Morgan got the feeling they were all alone in the dim circle of light from the gas-jet, that the old man was crazy, that this was indeed the land of dreams.

But, "Company!" the old man shouted again, his face contorted, his voice angry and insistent. "Damned woman," he shrilled. "Sleeps her life away. I've had trouble with her before about this. Thought I'd taught her a lesson, but maybe I'll have to teach her again"-and once more he shouted up the stairway.

"Company!"

"Send him up."

The voice was soft, musical, and thrilling. The moment Morgan heard it, he knew he hadn't made a mistake. Crazy old man, crazy old house, crazy errand-but there was the voice, the warm and wanton invitation.

"Go ahead," the little man urged. "Right at the head of the stairs, her room is. You won't need a light."

Then he went into his room and Morgan climbed the stairs, feet moving over frayed carpeting, eyes intent on the doorway looming above the landing. When Morgan reached the door he fumbled for the knob in the darkness, standing there for a long moment as he tried to enter.

Quite suddenly the door opened inward, and there he was in the big bedroom, with twenty crystal chandeliers tinkling their welcome, twenty velvet carpets offering cushioned caresses to his feet, twenty ornate vanities spreading a pungent powder-and-patchouli perfume from their littered tops.

Twenty great canopied beds straddled the center of the room, and twenty occupants waved him forward. The light blazed down on the redness; the rich, reflected radiance of twenty Red Queens. They had red hair and red lips and red garters and red nipples. Twice twenty white arms opened to enfold him in an embrace that was all illusion.

Morgan reeled forward through a thousand rippling reflections from the mirrored walls and ceiling, trying to find the real bed and the real Red Queen. She laughed at him then, because he was drunk, and she held out her hand to guide him, draw him down beside her. And her touch was fire, and her mouth was a furnace, and her body was a volcano gushing lava, and the mirrors whirled wildly in a long red dream of laughter and delight.

He must have put on his clothes again and tiptoed downstairs around dawn; he couldn't remember. He didn't recall saying goodbye or paying the girl or seeing the old man again, either, nor could he recollect walking back into the Quarter. The absinthe had left him with a splitting headache and a bitter aftertaste in his mouth, and now he moved like an automaton, turning into the first place he saw.

It was a small Oyster Bar, but he didn't want the traditional dozen raws-he needed coffee.

The fog was gone from the morning streets, but it lingered inside his skull, and Morgan wondered vaguely how he'd managed to find his way back to familiar surroundings. He stepped up to the counter and reached for his wallet.

His pocket was empty.

His hand began a search, up and down, forward and back. But his wallet was gone. His wallet, his identification, his license, his three hundred dollars in cash.

Morgan couldn't remember what had happened, but one thing was obvious. He'd been rolled. Rolled in the good old-fashioned way by a bad old-fashioned girl.

In a way it was almost funny, and in a way it served him right. He knew that, but somehow he failed to see either the humor or the justice of it all. And when it came to justice-Morgan gave up all thoughts of coffee and went to the police. He started to tell his story to a desk sergeant, told a little more of it to a polite lieutenant, and ended up telling the whole thing over again to a plain-clothes detective as he walked with him down Rampart Street, heading east.

The detective, whose name was Belden, didn't seem to be polite at all.

Morgan freely admitted he'd been drinking last night, and even found the first little bar he had patronized. The bartender Morgan had talked to was off-duty, but the day man gave the detective his home phone, and Belden called him from the tavern and talked to him. The bartender remembered seeing Morgan, all right.

"He said you were drunk as a skunk," the impolite Belden reported. "Now, where did you go from there?"

"St. Louis Cemetery," Morgan said. But to his chagrin, he couldn't find his way. In the end, Belden led him there.

"Then what?" Belden demanded.

"Then I met this old man—" Morgan began.

But when Belden asked for an exact description, Morgan couldn't give it to him. And Belden wanted to know the old man's name, and where they'd gone together, and why. Morgan tried to explain how he'd felt, why he had agreed to drink with a stranger; the detective wasn't interested.

"Take me to the tavern," he said.

They prowled the side streets, but Morgan couldn't find the tavern. Finally he had to admit as much. "But I was there," he insisted. "And then we went to this house—"

"All right," Belden shrugged. "Take me to the house."

Morgan tried. For almost an hour he trudged up and down the winding streets, but all the houses looked alike, and their sameness in the sunlight was different than their distinctiveness in the darkness. There was nothing romantic about these shabby old buildings, nothing that savored of a midnight dream.

Morgan could see that the detective didn't believe him. And then, when he told him the whole story once again-about the old man training his girl in the Storeyville tradition, about the mirrored room upstairs and the red garters and all the rest of it-he knew the detective would never believe. Standing here in the bright street, with the sun sending splinters into his reddened eyes, Morgan found it hard to believe himself. Maybe it had been the liquor; maybe he'd made up the part about the old man and all the rest. He could have passed out in front of the cemetery, someone might have come along and lifted his wallet. That made sense. More sense than a journey to the land of dreams.

Apparently Belden thought so too, because he advanced just that theory as they started walking back.

Morgan found himself nodding in agreement, and then he turned his head suddenly and sa-id, "There it is-that's the tavern we went into, I'm sure of it!"

And it was the tavern. He recognized the pockmarked man who had served them, and the pockmarked man recognized him. And, "Yes," he told Belden. "He came with the old one, with Louie."

The detective had his notebook out. "Louie who? What's his last name?"

"This I cannot tell you," the bartender said. "He is just old man, he has been a long time in the neighborhood. Harmless but—" The bartender made a twirling gesture close to his forehead.

"Do you know where he lives?" Belden asked.

Surprisingly enough, the bartender nodded. "Yes." He muttered an address and Belden wrote it down.

"Come on," he said to Morgan. "Looks as if you were giving me a straight story after all."

He uttered a dry chuckle. “Thought we knew what was going on down here, but I guess the old boy fooled us. Imagine, running a panel house undercover in this day and age! That’s one for the books.”

A surprisingly short walk led them to the building, on a street scarcely two blocks away.

The house was old, and looked untenanted; some of the front windows were caved in and the drawn green shades flapped listlessly in the hot morning breeze. Morgan didn’t recognize the place even when he saw it, and he stood on the doorstep while Belden rang the bell.

For a long while there was no answer, and then the door opened just a crack. Morgan saw the old man’s face, saw his rheumy red eyes blink out at them.

“What you want?” the old man wheezed. “Who are you?”

Belden told him who he was and what he wanted. The old man opened the door a bit wider and stared at Morgan.

“Hello,” Morgan said. “I’m back again. Looks like I mislaid my wallet.” He’d already made up his mind not to enter charges-the old boy was in enough hot water already.

“Back?” the little white-haired man snapped. “What do you mean, you’re back? Never set eyes on you before in my life.”

“Last night,” Morgan said. “I think I left my wallet here.”

“Nonsense. Nobody here last night. Nobody ever comes here anymore. Not for over forty years. I’m all alone. All alone—”

Belden stepped forward. “Suppose we have a look around?” he asked.

Morgan wondered if the old man would try to stop him, ask for a search warrant. Instead, he merely laughed and opened the door wide.

“Sure,” he said. “Come on in. Welcome to the Palace.” He chuckled again, then wheezed.

“Throat is dry,” he explained.

“It wasn’t so dry last night,” Morgan told him. “When we drank together.”

The old man shook his head. “Don’t listen to him, Mister,” he told Belden. “Never saw him before.”

They stepped into the hall and Morgan recognized it. The dark panelling looked dingy in the daylight, and he could see the dust on the floor. There was dust everywhere, a thick coating on the wood of the double-doors and lighter deposit on the small door leading to the old man’s room.

They went in there, and Belden began his search. It didn’t take long, because there weren’t many places to look. The old man’s furniture consisted of a single chair, a small brass bed, and a battered bureau. There wasn’t even a closet. Belden went over the bed and mattress, then examined the contents of the bureau drawers. Finally, he frisked old Louie.

“One dollar and fourteen cents,” he announced.

The old man snatched the coins from the detective’s hand. “See, what’d I tell you?” he muttered. “I got no wallet. And I don’t know anything about the mark, either. I’m clean, I am. Ask down at the station house. Ask Captain Leroux.”

“I don’t know any Captain Leroux,” Belden said. “What’s his detail?”

“Why, Storeyville, of course. Where do you think you are?”

“Storeyville’s been closed for almost forty-five years,” Belden answered. “Where do you think you are?”

“Right here. Where I always been. In the Palace. I’m a professional man, I am. Used to ha-ve six chickens on the block. Then the heat came on strong, and all I had left was the Red Queen. She sleeps too much, but I can fix that. I fixed it once and I can fix it again—”

Belden turned to Morgan and repeated the twirling gesture the pockmarked bartender had made.

But Morgan shook his head. “Of course,” he said. “The wallet’s upstairs. She has it. Come on!”

The old man put his hand on Morgan’s shoulder. His mouth worked convulsively. “Mister, don’t go up there. I was only fooling-she’s gone, she beat it out on me this morning, I swear it! Sure, she copped your leather all right. Up to her old tricks. But she did a Dutch on me, you won't find her —"

"We'll see for ourselves." Belden was already pounding up the stairs, and Morgan followed him. The dust rising from the stair-treads, and Morgan started to choke. His ears began to hurt, because Belden hammered on the door at the head of the stairs.

"You sure this was the one?" he panted.

Morgan nodded.

"But it couldn't be-this door isn't locked, it's sealed. Sealed tight."

Morgan didn't answer him. His head throbbed, and his stomach was beginning to churn, but he knew what he must do. Shouldering the detective aside, he thrust the full weight of his body against the door.

The ancient wood groaned, then splintered around the rotten doorframe. With a rasp of hinges, the door tottered and fell inward.

A cloud of dust billowed out, filling Morgan's lungs, blinding him. He coughed, he choked, but he groped forward and stepped into the room.

The twenty chandeliers were gone, and the twenty carpets and the twenty vanities and the twenty beds. That's because the mirrors hung cracked and broken in their frames. Now there was only one of everything-one cobwebbed chandelier, one ragged and mouldering patch of carpet, one vanity whose littered top gave off a scent of dead perfume and musty decay, and one canopy bed with its yellowed hangings mildewed and shredded.

And the bed had only one occupant. She was sleeping, just as the old man whined now while he peered over Morgan's shoulder. Always sleeping, and maybe he'd have to fix her again like he did once years ago. Morgan saw that she was still wearing the red garters, but aside from that he wouldn't have recognized her. One skeleton looks just like another.

"What the hell kind of joke is this?" Belden wanted to know.

The old man couldn't tell him, because he was alternately whining and complaining, and then he was weeping in a high, shrill voice-something about the Red Queen and the old days and how he hadn't meant to do it, and he only could awaken her on the nights when Company came calling.

Morgan couldn’t tell him, either. He couldn’t tell him about the land of dreams, or the land of nightmares either.

All he could do was walk over to the bed, lift the rotting skull from the rotting pillow, reach his hand underneath and pull out his brand-new, shiny leather wallet.

Is Betsy Blake Still Alive?

By Hollywood standards, Betsey Blake—the Blonde Baby, the madcap Miss Mystery—died at exactly the wrong time. But it had happened before—Valentino, Harlow, James Dean. So Hollywood knew exactly what to do.

IN APRIL, STEVE RENTED A LITTLE cottage down at the beach. Strictly speaking, it wasn't "down" at all; it stood right on the edge of a steep cliff, and you had to walk almost a quarter of a mile until you got to the nearest steps. But Steve didn't care. He hadn't come to the beach to go swimming.

He'd holed up here for a dual purpose. He wanted to lick his wounds and he wanted to write. Things hadn't gone too well for Steve during the past year—six weeks as a junior writer at one of the major studios, but no contract, and two originals picked up by small independent producers on option, only both options had lapsed without anybody getting excited. So Steve had broken with his agent after one of those standard "To hell with Hollywood!" routines and retreated to the beach. Sometimes he thought he was going to write the Great American Novel. At other times, when the fog rolled in, he'd stand at the window and gaze down at the water, thinking how easy it would be to jump.

Then he met Jimmy Powers, and things got worse.

Jimmy Powers had a cottage right down the line from the one Steve had rented. He came rolling up four or five nights a week in a big new Buick convertible, He had a nice collection of Italian silk suits, but when he was at the beach he preferred to lounge around in matching shorts-and-shirts outfits, all of which had his initials monogrammed on the pockets. Often he came for the weekend, hauling a case of champagne in the trunk of the car. On such occasions Jimmy was usually accompanied by a stock-contract girl from the studio where he was employed as a public relations man.

The thing that got Steve down was the fact that Jimmy Powers (Buick, silk suits, monogrammed shirts, champagne and starlets) was only twenty-three.

"How does he do it?" Steve asked himself over and over. "The guy's got nothing on the ball. He can't write for sour apples. He's not even a good front man. It isn't charm, or personality, or good looks, or anything like that. What's his secret?"

But Jimmy Powers never talked about his work at the studio; and whenever Steve brought up the subject, he'd switch to another topic. But one evening, when both of them had half a load on, Steve tried again.

"How long you had this job, Jimmy?"

This time it worked.

"Almost three years."

"You mean you started when you were twenty? Just walked into one of the biggest outfits in the business and snagged a public relations job?"

"That's right."

"No previous experience? And right away they let you do promotion puffs on their top stars?"

"That's the way the ball bounced."

"I don't get it." Steve stared at him. "How does a guy fall into something like that?"

"Oh, it isn't so much, really," Jimmy told him. "Only three bills a week."

"Only three bills." Steve grunted. "For a kid like you? I've never come close to a steady three hundred a week, and I've knocked around the Industry for years. What gives, Jimmy? Level with me. Do you know where the body is buried?"

"Something like that," Jimmy answered. He gave Steve a kind of funny look and changed the subject, fast.

After that evening, Jimmy Powers wasn't very friendly any more. There were no further invitations to the handsomely furnished cottage. Then for about three weeks Jimmy stopped coming down to the beach altogether. By this time Steve was actually in production, grinding away at a book.

He was hard at it that evening in June when Jimmy Powers knocked on his door.

"Hi, sweetheart," he said. "Mind if I barge in?"

At first Steve thought Jimmy was drunk, but a double-take convinced him that the guy was just terribly excited. Powers paced up and down, snapping his fingers like a cornball juvenile in an expectant-father routine.

"Still writing the Great American Novel, huh?" Jimmy said. "Come off it, chum. Maybe I can steer you onto some real moola."

"Like three bills a week?" Steve asked.

"Peanuts. I'm talking about big money. The minute I hit this angle I thought of you."

"Very kind, I'm sure. What do I have to do—help you stick up the Bank of America?"

Jimmy ignored the gag. "You know where I just come from? M.P.'s office. That's right—for the last five hours, solid, I've been sitting in Mr. Big's office preaching the Word. Ended up with cart blank to handle the whole deal. Any way I want."

"What deal?"

Jimmy sat down then, and when he spoke again his voice was softer.

"You know what happened to Betsey Blake?" he asked.

Steve nodded. He knew what had happened to Betsey Blake, all right. Every man, woman, and child in the United States had been bombarded for the past two weeks with news reports about the Betsey Blake tragedy.

It had been one of those freak accidents. Betsey Blake, the Screen's Blonde Baby, the one and only Miss Mystery, was piloting her speedboat just outside Catalina Channel around twilight on the evening of June 2nd.

According to the reports, she was preparing to enter the annual racing event the following Sunday, to try for her fourth straight win. Nobody knew just what had happened because there were no witnesses, but apparently her speedboat rammed into another boat head-on, killing a Mr. Louis Fryer of Pasadena, And herself.

Both boats had gone down immediately, and divers were still making half-hearted efforts to recover them from the deep water outside the choppy channel when, two days later, Fryer's body was washed up on a lonely beach. The next day Betsey Blake's corpse made a farewell appearance in the same place.

Betsey's identification took another few days to be established definitely enough to satisfy authorities, but there was no doubt about it. The Blonde Baby was no more.

It was a big story, because The Blonde Baby had been up there for a long time. The "Miss Mystery" tag had been pinned on her when she first rose to prominence in pictures, and she'd always lived up to it, taking unusual care to conceal her private life, which rumor had it was just one lurid escapade after another.

So the papers had had a field day digging up her past. They managed to ring in the name of virtually every important male star of the past twenty years. Some of the scandal sheets hinted that they could also mention the names of most of the studio set-dressers, gaffers, and truck-drivers over the same period.

"What happened?" Steve asked Powers. "Did your boss have a heart attack?"

Jimmy nodded. "Just about. Her death puts us on a real spot. The Friday before, she'd just finished her part in Splendor. Studio wrapped the picture up, four million bucks' worth of Technicolor, Super-Cinemascope, three top stars—the works. It's all finished, no more retakes, the sets are struck, the film is in the can. And then Betsey kicks off."

"So?"

“So? M.P. is sitting there with a very cold turkey. Sure, if he could push Splendor out to the exhibitors right away, maybe he could capitalize on the headlines a little. But this is our biggest picture for the year. We already set it up for late Fall release, around November, to catch the holiday trade and make a bid for the Awards. You begin to see the grief? Comes November, and Betsey Blake will be dead six months. By that time all the excitement is over. Who’s going to plunk down a dollar-twenty to see somebody who’s putting out free lunch to the worms? M.P. has to gross at least five million to break even. How’s he going to do it? So for the past two weeks he’s been nursing a real headache. Takes a lot of aspirin to cure a headache like that.”

“But where do you come in?”

“With the U.S. Marines,” Jimmy said. “Here M.P, and all the big wheels have been batting their brains out trying to come up with an angle—naturally, they had to junk the whole publicity campaign—and all they’ve got for their pains is sweat. Well, I got busy, and today I walked into M.P.’s office and laid five million potatoes right in his lap—maybe seven or eight.”

“You found a solution?” Steve asked.

“Picture on the wall?” Steve said. “Whose picture?”

Jimmy made with the dramatic pause.

“Valentino.”

“Come again?”

“Rudolph Valentino, You’ve heard of him?”

“Sure I’ve heard of him.”

“Yeah. Well, chances are you wouldn’t have if some bright boy hadn’t pulled the same stunt back in ’26.”

“What stunt?”

“Valentino went up like a skyrocket, but he was coming down fast. Then, just when he’d finished The Son of the Sheik—bingo! he gets appendicitis or something and croaks. So there the studio sits—with a dead star and a dead flicker. That's when some genius pulled a rabbit out of the hat."

Jimmy Powers snapped his fingers again. "They staged the most sensational funeral you ever saw. Poured out the puffs about the passing of the screen's Greatest Lover. Filled the newspapers, jammed the magazines, flooded the country with Valentino. Made out that all the dames who used to flip over him on the screen were soaking their handkerchiefs now that he was gone. By the time his picture was released they had everybody so hot to see it there was no holding them. The picture and the re-releases made so much dough that even the Valentino estate paid its debts and showed a profit. How did they do it? Women weeping at the grave, rumors cropping up that Rudy was still alive—publicity. Publicity—with a capital P."

Jimmy Powers grinned. "Well, I guess you get my angle. M.P. sure latched onto it! And I pointed out to him that we had an even better deal going for us. Because we had this Miss Mystery gimmick to play with, and a real mysterious death. We can even start a story that Betsey Blake is still alive—stuff like that."

"But she was positively identified—"

"I know, I know! So was Booth, and Mata Hari, and this Anasthesia dame, or whatever her name was, over in Russia. But the suckers go for that angle. Is Betsey Blake Still Alive? We plant articles in all the rags. Maybe even pony up some loot to get out special one-shots. The Betsey Blake Magazine. You know, like they did on this kid Presley, and a lot of others. Hire some kids to start Betsey Blake fan clubs. Get some of the high-priced talent to write sob stuff for the women's magazines. Like how Betsey Blake was a symbol of American girlhood."

"But she wasn't a symbol," Steve objected. "And she wasn't exactly a girl, either."

"Sure, sure, she was past forty. And I happen to know M.P. was going to axe her the minute her contract ran out. But she was well-preserved, you got to admit that, and. a lot of the kids still went for her. We can build it up—yes sir, man, we can build it up!"

No doubt about it, Jimmy Powers was very excited. “And think of what we can do with her past! Nobody has dope on her real name, or just how she got started in show biz back in the Thirties. Wait’ll we get to work on The Real Betsey Blake and T*he Betsey Blake Nobody Knows.”*

The excitement was contagious. In spite of himself Steve found himself saying, “Say, that’s a possibility, isn’t it? You might be able to uncover all sorts of things. Didn’t I once hear a rumor that she’d had an illegitimate child by some producer? And that she was once married to—”

Jimmy Powers shook his head.

“No, that isn’t the kind of stuff we want at all! You hear that stuff about everybody in the Industry. I’m giving strict orders to lay off any investigation, get me? We’ll cook up our own stories. Make any kind of a past we want. Maybe get her mixed up with some of these mystic cults, you know what I mean. Hint foul play, too. Oh, we’ll have a ball!”

“We? I thought this was just your baby.”

“It is—M.P. gave me the green light all the way. But it’s a big job, Steve. That’s why I thought of you, sweetheart. You’d be a natural on this kind of promotion—doing some of the high-class stuff—like, say, for those women’s rags I mentioned. So how’s about it, Stevie-burger? How’d you like to be a great big legend-maker?”

Steve sat there for a moment without opening his mouth. And when finally he did open it, he had no idea what was going to come out.

“You know Betsey Blake when she was alive?” he asked.

“Of course I did. Handled most of her promotion—Stalzbuck was in charge, really, but I did a lot of the work. I thought you knew that.”

“I wasn’t sure.” Steve hesitated. “What kind of person was she, really?”

Jimmy Powers shrugged. “An oddball. What difference does it make?”

“Was she friendly? Would you say she was a kind person?”

“In a way. Yes, she was. So why the District Attorney bit?”

“Because she’s dead, Jimmy. Dead and gone, in a tragic accident. And the dead should be allowed to rest in peace. You can’t just go and pitch a sideshow over her grave.”

“Who says I can’t?”

It was Steve’s turn to shrug. “All right. I suppose you can. And nothing I say is going to stop you, is it?”

“Damned right it won’t!”

Steve nodded. “Then go ahead. But, in the classic phrase, include me out. And thanks all the same. I can’t be a ghoul.”

Jimmy stared at him. “So I’m a ghoul, huh?” he muttered. “Well, I’ve got news for you. I’m a ghoul and you’re a fool. A damned fool.”

“Knock it off, please.”

“Okay.” Jimmy paused at the door. “You were always asking me what it takes to get along in this racket. Well, Stevie, it takes guts, that’s what it takes. Guts to see your big opportunity when it comes along, and guts to follow through. Guts that you haven’t got, Stevie-boy.”

“Maybe I was brought up differently.”

Jimmy laughed harshly. “You can say that again! Brother, if you only knew how differently! I got the perfect training for this particular job, believe me. And just you watch how I make good on it.”

Then he was gone, and Steve tried to go back to work.

Jimmy stayed away from the beach for a long time—right through the height of the summer season. Steve figured he was working on his promotion, but there was no word from him.

Then the news started trickling in. The trickle became a stream, the stream became a flood.

The Betsey Blake legend burst open the American public during the latter part of August. By September the first magazines hit the stands, carrying their planted stories. By October the specials were out, the fan clubs were formed, and the television people were combing their files for old kinescopes of Betsey Blake’s few live shows.

The whole thing was just as Jimmy Powers had outlined it, only more so. I Was Betsey Blade’s Last Date vied for attention with The Loves of Betsey.

And there was The Truth About—, and The Real—, and What They Don't Dare Print About—, and a hundred others. The studio, meanwhile, was doing an indefatigable job tying in Splendor. Betsey Blake in her last and greatest performance! The greatest actress of the American screen!

On a different level there was the Betsey Blake—The Woman Nobody Knew approach. In this series it was possible to learn that Betsey Blake had herself been the daughter of a reigning celebrity of the silent screen, or of royal European blood, or merely a youngster out of Hollywood High School who deliberately set out to fashion a career for herself.

There were as many, and as conflicting, details as to her love life. And there was much speculation about why she had maintained such an air of secrecy concerning her personal affairs. She was a devout churchgoer, she was a freethinker, she was a secret Satanist, she dabbled in astrology, she attended Voodoo ceremonies in Haiti, she was really an old woman who had discovered the secret of eternal youth. She was secretly an intellectual and her lovers included most of the celebrated literary figures of our generation; she was actually a shy, sensitive person who couldn't face her own image on the screen; she was a devoted student of the drama who had planned to retire from the screen and establish her own repertory theater. She loved children and wanted to adopt half a dozen, she had been jilted as a girl and still cherished the memory of her one real love, she was on the verge of a nervous breakdown and spent all her money on psychiatrists.

All this, and much more, could be learned by any reader during early fall.

But Jimmy Powers had prophesied correctly when he said that the mystery angle would prove to be the most attractive part of the legend. There was the Betsey Blake Did Not Die! theory, which played up the "strange circumstances" surrounding the case, the "unexplained disappearance" of the two boats, the "reluctance" of the studio to exhibit the body in a public funeral. This angle fastened on every conceivable circumstance, real or rumored, which could be offered as "proof."

As November approached, the volume and tempo of the articles neared a crescendo. For now the Betsey Blake legend was public property, and the fake fan clubs had given way to real fan clubs. Some of the scandal rags were printing the "inside story" and the "real lowdown"—Betsey Blake had been a tramp, she had been an alcoholic, she had started out posing for "art studies" and worse—but none of these allegations affected the legend. Rather, they served to strengthen it. To her growing army of devotees came the teenagers, and that was the final victory. Everyone from eight to eighty was breathlessly awaiting the advent of Splendor on their local screens.

It was early one night in November. as Steve sat typing the second draft of his novel, that Jimmy Powers reappeared.

Once again he hailed Steve from the doorway, and once again Steve thought he might be drunk.

This time, however, he had more grounds for his suspicion, because as Jimmy entered the room he brought an alcoholic aura with him.

"How ya doing, boy?" he shouted.

Steve started to tell him, but Powers wasn't really listening.

"Guess I don't have to tell you how I'm doing," he exclaimed. "We open nation-wide next week. Nation-wide, get me? No previews, no test spots, no New York first run—just solid bookings straight across the board. Every key city, and the highest percentage of the gross we ever sold a picture for! And who did it, Stevie-burger? Me, that's who."

Steve lit a cigarette to avoid having to make any comment.

"And don't think the Industry doesn't know it! Man, are the offers pouring in. Of course, M.P.'s a smart old buzzard—he's not going to let me get away from him. Two grand a week, five years non-cancellable, and that's not all. When the pic opens I get a bonus. Fifty Gs under the table. You imagine that? Fifty Gs, cash, that nobody will ever know about. No taxes, nothing. Let me tell you, M.P. knows how to make a gesture. Of course, it’s worth it to him. I been sweating blood on this thing, Stevie. Nobody will ever know the throats I had to cut—”

“Don’t tell me,” Steve said.

“Still playing it simon-pure, huh? Well, that’s okay by me, no hard feelings. I just wanted you to know what you missed out on, sweetheart. This was the biggest coup of the century.”

“You can say that again.”

Both Jimmy Powers and Steve stared at the woman in the doorway. She was short, brown-haired, and plump enough to fill out the rather bedraggled slacks-and-sweater combination she was wearing. Her feet were bare, and she had some difficulty balancing on them, because she was obviously tight as a tick.

“What the hell—?” Jimmy began as she weaved toward him with a smirk.

“Saw you leave your shack just as I came along,” she said. “So I just sneaked in there by myself and had a little drinkie. I could hear you talking over here, so I thought why not come over and join the party?”

“Mind telling me who you are?” Steve asked, a premonition growing in him.

The woman grinned and pointed at Jimmy Powers. “Ask him,” she said.

Jimmy Powers just stood there, his face going from red to white.

“No,” he said. “No, it isn’t—it can’t be—”

“The hell it isn’t,” said the woman. “You know better than to try and get away with that.”

“But what happened? Where have you been?”

“Took myself a little trip.” The woman giggled. “It’s kind of a long sh-story.” She turned to Steve. “Got anything to drink?”

Before Steve could answer, Jimmy stepped forward. “You’ve had enough,” he said. “Tell your story and make it fast.”

“All right, all right, hold your horses.” The woman flopped into an armchair and for a moment stared at the floor.

“I saw the papers, of course,” she said. “They got it all wrong.”

“Then why didn’t you do something?” Jimmy growled.

“Because I was on a trip, remember? I mean I saw them all right, but they were a couple of months old.” She paused. “You going to let me tell this my way?”

“Go ahead.”

“Sure, I cracked into this other boat, like they said. Damn thing running without a light, motor throttled down so’s I never heard a thing. This Louis Fryer was on board, like they said—I knew old Louie from ’way back. What the papers didn’t know, of course, is that he wasn’t alone. He must have picked up some tramp off the beach, some blonde floozy hanging around the Yacht Club. Anyway, when we hit she got it, too. At least that’s the way it figures. She got it and when her body came up they identified her as me.”

“And what happened to—?”

“I’m coming to that part. I passed out, I guess. But I had sense enough to hang onto the boat.”

“The boat went down. They never found it.”

“The boat didn’t go down. And the reason they never found it was that it got picked up that night. With me with it. Little Mexican freighter spotted us just outside the channel and hauled us on board. Me and the boat. I was out cold—guess I had a concussion. When I came to, I was on my way to Chile.”

“Chile?”

The woman nodded. “Sure, Chile. That’s in South America, you know? Valparaiso, Santiago—we went everywhere. Those little wildcat freighters, they take their own good-natured time when they make a trip. Besides, I sold the boat down there for a good price. Made enough to pay my way and plenty left over for tequila. Captain was a good friend of mine. Whole crew, for that matter. You see, they didn’t ever catch on to who I was. All they could see was a blonde. At least, after I got another bottle of rinse and touched it up a bit.” The woman gestured toward her tousled hair. “You know how they flip for a blonde.” She giggled again.

Jimmy Powers stood up. “You mean to tell me you’ve spent the last five months helling around on a freighter with a bunch of Mex grease-monkeys?” he shouted.

“And why not? First real vacation I’ve had in years. And believe me, it was one long party. When I found out in Santiago what the score was, I thought the hell with it, let ’em suffer. This was my big chance to get off the hook for a while and live a little. So I lived. But we ran out of cash, the Captain and I, so when we docked at Long Beach today I came ashore, I knew M.P. would blow his stack if I walked in on him cold. I figured I’d see you first. Maybe we can cook up a publicity angle together, so when we hit M.P. he won’t go through the roof.”

The woman turned to Steve. “You sure you haven’t got a drinkie?” she asked. “Jeez, look at my hair. Got to get to a beauty parlor right away. Nobody’d recognize me. Isn’t that right, pal? Go ahead, admit it—you didn’t recognize me either at first, did you? Gained fifteen pounds, hair grown out. And next week the picture opens—”

“That’s right,” Jimmy Powers said. “Next week the picture opens.”

The woman stood up, swaying. “One thing I got to hand you,” she said. “You did a wonderful promotion job. Even in Chile they knew all about it. And when I hit town today, first thing I did was hike over to the magazine racks. There I am, all over the place. A wonnerful job.”

“Yeah,” said Jimmy.

“Well, don’t just stand there. Now you gotta do even a more wonnerful job. Because I’m back. That’s the real topper, isn’t it? Wait until this one hits the good old public!”

“Yeah,” said Jimmy.

“Of course, this time I’ll be around to help you. I got a line all cooked up. The Captain, he won’t do any talking—he’s shoving off again for Mexico tomorrow morning. We can handle it any way we like. Hah, I can just see the look on the face of old Louie Fryer’s wife when she finds out he had a blonde on board! But it’s a wonnerful story. It’ll be a big needle for the picture.”

“Yeah,” said Jimmy.

She turned away and faced Steve again. “How about that drinkie, loverboy?”

“I’ll give you a drink,” Jimmy Powers said. “Over at my place. Come along now.”

“Betcha.”

He placed his arm around the woman and guided her toward the door. Then he paused and looked at Steve. “Stick around, will you?” he said. “I want to talk to you later.”

Steve nodded.

He saw them disappear into Jimmy’s cabin. It was the only other cottage with lights on all along the beach—November is offseason.

He could even have listened and caught some of their conversation. But Steve couldn’t concentrate. He was too busy calling himself names.

Was this the woman he’d been too noble to help turn into a legend? Was her reputation worth protecting at the sacrifice of his own future? Jimmy had been right—the trouble with him was he had no guts. His chance had come and he’d muffed it. For what?

Steve was too wrapped up in name calling to notice what time it was Jimmy and the woman left. When he finally glanced across the way he saw that the lights of the cottage had gone out.

Jimmy Powers had said he was coming back. Where was he? Steve started for the door. He was quite sure Jimmy hadn’t driven away, because he would have heard the sound of the car.

Just then Jimmy came stumbling up the walk. He seemed to have taken on quite a bit more to drink.

Steve said, “What’s the matter? Where’s Betsey Blake?”

“Who?” Jimmy staggered in the doorway, then steadied himself against the side of the screen. “You mean the old bat who barged in here? I hope you didn’t go for that line of malarkey she tried to hand out.”

“But it figures, Jimmy. You can check up on it—”

"I don't have to. When I got her over to my place I started asking a few questions and she broke down. She was just running a bluff—made the whole thing up. She's no more Betsey Blake than you are."

"What!"

Jimmy Powers wiped his forehead. "I think she was figuring on a shakedown. You know—come out with the story just before the picture's set to break, and threaten to queer the works unless the studio pays off." He shook his head. "Anyway, it doesn't matter, now."

"You scared her off?"

"No." Jimmy gulped. "Don't get me wrong, pal. Nobody scared her. She just left of her own free will, and under her own steam. You got to get that straight, seep Because I—I think there's been sort of an accident."

"Accident?"

Steve stiffened, and Jimmy went limp.

"I'm not sure yet. That's why I came over. I wanted you to come with me and look—"

"Look at what? Where is she?"

"Well, you must have noticed, she was crocked, wasn't she? I happened to be at the back window after she left, and I saw her stumbling along the edge of the cliff, like. I was all set to holler at her—listen to what I'm telling you, Stevie-boy, you got to get this—I was all set to holler at her when she sort of fell. Bingo, like that, she's gone."

"You mean she . . . But that's a sixty-foot drop!"

Jimmy gulped again. "I know. I haven't looked. I'm afraid to, alone."

"We'd better call the cops," Steve said.

"Yeah, sure. But I wanted to talk to you first. Alone, see? I mean, we call them, right away they'll ask a lot of questions. Who was she, where did she come from, what did she want around here? You know cops."

"Tell them the truth."

"And queer the picture?"

"But you say she wasn't Betsey Blake."

"She wasn't, but the minute they find out she claimed to be, the whole campaign is in the soup. Don't you understand, Steve? People will start wondering—was she or wasn't she? I worked my tail off building up a legend, and now it can all tumble down just because some dizzy old bag takes a header off a cliff."

Steve tried to get Jimmy Powers to meet his stare, but the bloodshot eyes kept rolling. "What I mean to say," he was muttering, "is why not just forget the whole thing?"

"But we've got to notify the authorities. Who knows? She may still be alive down there." Steve started for the phone.

"I know, I know. You got to tell them. But she isn't alive, she couldn't be. And all I want is that you don't say anything about her coming here tonight. Or that she said anything. Make believe it never happened. I just looked out the window before I went to bed and I noticed this beach bum stagger over the edge. That's the way it was. No harm done, is there, Steve? I mean, look at all that's at stake."

"I'm looking," Steve said. "And I'll think about it." He went to the phone and dialed. "Hello, get me police headquarters. I want to report an accident . . ."

He didn't waste words. No details—a woman had apparently fallen over the cliff, such-and-such an address; yes, he'd be waiting for them.

When Steve hung up, the publicity man expelled his breath in a deep sigh.

"That's the way to do it," he said. "You handled it just right. I won't forget you, Stevie-boy."

"I'm still thinking," Steve said. "When they get here I'll make up my mind what to say."

"Now, listen—"

"You listen to me. What makes you so sure that woman wasn't who she claimed to be? No, don't give me that blackmail argument again. Nobody gets drunk when they're out to pull a shakedown." He walked over to Jimmy Powers. "Let me ask you another question. Suppose she really was Betsey Blake. Then what? Why couldn't you have made the announcement tomorrow, the way she said? Think of the sensation it would have made, what it would have done for the picture."

Jimmy drew back against the door. "To hell with the picture," he said. "It's me I'm thinking about. Don't you understand that, meat-head? This is my promotion, mine all the way. I cooked it up. I nursed it. It's my baby, and everybody in this town knows it. The picture's gonna be a smash, and who gets the credit? Me, that's who.

"Figure it your way and see what happens. So she breaks the story, and there's a sensation all right. Maybe even a bigger sensation, a real sockeroo. But it's not going to do the picture any more good—we've got it made already, just the way it is. And so Betsey Blake turns up alive, then what? She's still an old bag—she can't play leads any more, not even if they photograph her through a scrim to take the wrinkles out. Alive, she's just a middle-aged tramp who hits the sauce. Dead, she's a legend. She's right up there with Valentino and Harlow and James Dean. Her old pictures are worth a fortune in re-run rights. I tell you, it adds up!

"Besides, if she breaks the story, what happens to me? I'm the fairhaired boy right now. But if she tops me, then she gets the credit.

You heard her say it yourself, how 'we' were gonna figure out an angle together. I know that 'together' line from way back! She'd take all the bows, steal all the scenes. Believe me, Steve, I know! She was always like that, couldn't stand to have anyone else share the spot with her. It was Betsey Blake, first, last, and always. The things she pulled with me personally! I would have rotted in the publicity department the rest of my life if this break hadn't come along. You don't get this kind of a chance often out here, Steve. I took it, and I worked on it, and nobody's gonna grab it away from me at the last minute. I wouldn't let her—"

Steve put his hand on the man's shoulder. "You told me what I wanted to know," he said. "She was Betsey Blake, wasn't she?"

"I ain't saying. And you don't have to say anything either, when the cops come. I mean, Steve, have a heart—what good can it do now? You don't know anything about it, that’s all you tell ’em. I’ve got five grand I can bring over here tomorrow morning. Five grand in cash that says you don’t know anything. Hell, ten grand. And a job at the studio—”

“So she was Betsey Blake,” Steve murmured. “And she just walked out of your place and fell off the cliff.”

“Those things happen, you know how it is, a drunk dame and her foot slips. It was an accident, I swear it was! All right, if you must know, I was with her—I didn’t want to tell you that part. I was with her, I was going to drive her home, and then she let go of my arm and stumbled off.”

“There’ll be footprints in the sand,” Steve said. “And they’ll check anyway, they always do. They’ll find out who she really is, and they’ll investigate from start to finish. They’ll go all the way back—”

Jimmy Powers wilted. Steve had to hold him up.

“I never figured,” he said. “Sure, they’ll go all the way back.”

“You shouldn’t have killed her.”

“Don’t say that, Stevie!”

“It’s true, isn’t it? You did kill her. You knew she was Betsey Blake, but you killed her anyway, because you thought she’d queer your big deal.”

Jimmy didn’t answer. Instead he hit out at Steve, and Steve twisted and brought up his arm. Jimmy sagged. Steve held him there, listening for the sound of a siren in the distance.

“Fifty grand,” Jimmy whispered. “I told you I had it coming. Fifty grand, all in cash. Nobody’d ever know.”

Steve sighed. “When I heard about the money I was ready to kick myself,” he said. “I thought I was a sucker because I didn’t have your kind of guts. But now I know what it means to have them. It means you don’t stop at anything, not even killing.”

“You don’t understand,” Jimmy whimpered. “I wanted to live it up, I wanted my chance to be a big shot. She never gave it to me while she was alive, and when she disappeared I thought my big break had finally come. But what’s the use now? Like you say, they’ll find out sooner or later. I ought to have doped it out. I couldn’t get away with it. And now it’ll kill the legend, too.”

“Never mind the legend,” Steve said. “You killed a woman.” The sirens were close now; he could hear the tires squealing to a halt. “I guess I don’t understand at that,” Steve said. “I don’t understand your breed of rat at all. Call yourself a big-shot publicity man, do you? Why, you’d murder your own mother for a story.”

Jimmy Powers gave him a funny look as the cops came in. “That’s right,” he whispered. “How’d you guess?”

A Killing in the Market

I mat not have much time to set this down.

To make things worse, the pen leaks, and there isn't very much paper. You'd think that for forty dollars a day, the hotel would furnish a decent pen. At least they could replace the supply of stationery once in awhile. Of course, I suppose I could call room service and ask for more, but I don't dare to have anyone nosing around.

It's just that I want to write this out while I still have the chance. Maybe it will help explain a few things. At least it might be of interest to a few eager beavers—the kind of people who've always dreamed of a chance to make a big killing in the stock market.

That was my idea. I wanted to make a killing. And now I have, only—

I suppose I ought to begin at the beginning. And say that my name is Albert Kessler, and up until a little over three months ago I worked in Wall Street. I was a clerk in a brokerage house. Maybe I'd better not mention the name of the firm. It isn't important, anyway.

Up until then, nothing was important. Including myself. I was just another guy, holding down just another job. My idea of a big deal was to get out fifteen minutes early and catch a seat in the subway, instead of having to stand up all the way home. That's another laugh—home. One furnished room, in the Bronx. A small order of nothing. But that's all I had. That, and the big dream.

I guess everybody who ever worked in the Street has had the same dream. It's one of those things you think about when you bounce around in the subway, or on the mattress in your crummy room. You can't help but think about it, and hope that tomorrow it's going to come true.

Tomorrow, that's always when you're going to get the break—when you'll just happen to run into this character with the golden touch. He's a plunger, and every time he plunges he comes up smelling like a rose. Somehow you manage to make friends with him, and pretty soon he's giving you the word on a good thing, and before you know it you're a character yourself. A real big operator.

Sure, I know what it sounds like. But after you spend a little time working in the Street, you can't help but think that way. Because you occasionally see the dream come true. Bernard Baruch isn't the only one who ever made a killing. You hear stories about guys who started out as runners and ended up buying their own seats on the Exchange. Sometimes they made all their money on the Big Board, and sometimes they branched off into investing in their own firms. The oil men, those Greek shipping magnates, people like that; they prove it happens.

But it doesn't happen to everyone; not to guys who just moon around and wish. You've got to do more than dream. You've got to keep your eyes open and figure the angles. And you've got to wait.

That's what I did. For over two years I waited. And I planned. I saved my dough, too. Not much—a pitiful three thousand. But at least I held onto it. A lot of the other dreamers aren't willing to save and wait. They're suckers for every crazy rumor on the Street, and they use the Dow-Jones like a scratch-sheet. It's five bucks on Steel to win, or ten bucks on Industrials to place or Utilities to show. The Journal is their racing form, and they make graphs and charts and follow stock performance records back for years. They play systems or they play hunches—but all of them go for broke.

That two-dollar window stuff wasn't for me. I didn't believe in tips or theories. Sure, the Market is a gamble, but gamblers aren't always winners. The winner, in the long run, is the man who has a sure thing from the start.

I kept my eyes open trying to spot that winner. Instead of studying the Market, I studied the customers.

And that's how I found Lon Mariner.

There's no sense going into all the details of how I made up my mind. Half a dozen times beforehand, I thought I'd located my man—a big investor, who consistently moved in at the right time, then moved out again after a quick profit. But each time, sooner or later, the customer I had my eye on pulled a goof, or started hedging with gilt-edge stuff at a small profit. Over the years I kept track of several investors; in New York, or in our branch offices.

But it wasn't until three months ago that I made my discovery. Lon Mariner, who always pulled a sure thing out of the hat. He put fifteen thousand into a small aircraft company three days before they landed a big Navy contract. He pulled out with fifty thousand and bought into some electronics outfit I never heard of—until they declared a split, then a dividend, and bounced up eighteen points. He took his profits and went into oil, dumping his stock the morning before a nose-dive. Next there was a flier in a Texas railroad that was gobbled up by a bigger combine within a week. By this time I was really following his orders, which came in through our Frisco office. And I was surprised to find that after a month or so he was operating out of Cleveland. But the pattern continued. What he bought didn't make sense; the important thing was that everything he touched turned to gold. Copper, radar, TV in Cleveland; then a big utilities deal out of Boston. He never missed on timing. In eleven weeks he was in on every spectacular rise, every major split across the Board. I figured he'd run his fifteen thousand up to several million. Then he placed his next whopping order out of our Chicago office.

That's when I quit my job and went to Chicago.

All I had was three thousand dollars and this wild idea of mine. At least I thought it was a wild idea, after I actually got on the plane. Here I was, chasing halfway across the country to locate a perfect stranger—or maybe a stranger who wasn't so perfect—in hopes that I'd get him to cut me in on his big deal. I did some sweating on that flight when I really took stock of the situation. After all, what did I know about this Lon Mariner, anyway?

He wasn't in Who's Who. And he didn't have a D&B rating, either. I hadn't dared to make any direct inquiries through any of our branch offices. All I really knew about him was that he was the guy I was looking for—the guy with the golden touch. From now on, I'd have to play it by ear.

The minute I got off the airport limousine at the Palmer House, I took a cab over to our Chicago office on LaSalle Street. I still had my company ID card—so I forgot to turn it in, is that a crime?—and I flashed it. I said I'd been sent out here to contact one of our clients, and had Mr. Mariner been in today?

Well, it turned out Mr. Mariner hadn't been in—today or any day. His orders came by phone and his bank drafts by mail. I went clear up to the Vice-President in Charge Of, but nobody could tell me anything more about the man.

But I did find out he was staying at a hotel on the Gold Coast. This hotel.

I hotfooted it over yesterday afternoon, and plunked down my forty bucks for this room—complete with air conditioning, television, and a lousy pen.

Forty bucks was only the start of my investment. Ten bucks more made sure that the Room Clerk put me on the same floor—he even showed me Mariner's name on the register, and his suite number. It was 701, right down the corridor from my room. He didn't remember much about Mariner's appearance, because he hadn't seen him since. Said he'd come in alone, without very much luggage, and that he was "average-looking." Medium height, brown hair, middle-aged.

I spent another ten bucks on the bellboy. All he could tell me was that Mariner ordered all his meals sent up to him, and that he didn't go out much except in the mornings when the maid-service cleaned up.

By this time it was almost seven o'clock, and the maids were off duty. I had to settle for a talk with the waiter who served him his meals, a guy named Joe Franscetti.

For the usual ten, Franscetti said yes, he'd just come down from Mr. Mariner's room after clearing away the supper dishes. Apparently, Mariner hadn’t made any impression on him at all; I got the same vague description of an “average-looking” guy. The waiter couldn’t remember anything he’d ever said to him, or even how he usually dressed.

“But I can tell you what he had for dinner,” he said. “Shrimp cocktail, the prime ribs—medium rare, I think it was—baked potato, Waldorf salad, coffee, apple pie. And you know what he tipped? A lousy half a buck!”

I thanked him and went away. It was a little discouraging. I hadn’t come all this way to find out that Lon Mariner liked his meat medium rare. And even the fact that a guy on a five-million-dollar winning streak is a poor tipper didn’t mean very much to me.

There didn’t seem to be anything I could do at the moment. No sense going to the house dick. It had been risky enough asking the questions I’d asked, because the last thing I wanted was to call attention to myself. I suppose everyone figured I was a private eye, and that was bad enough, but at least it was some kind of an excuse.

Anyway, I’d learned nothing useful, and from now on I was on my own. So about seven-thirty I ended up back in my room, with the door open. If I sat in a chair at a certain angle I could keep my eye on 701. Just in case Mariner did go out.

Of course, there was nothing to prevent me from just marching down the hall and knocking on his door. Except that I wasn’t ready for that yet. Before talking to Mariner, I had to make up my mind about him. When I did speak to him, my conversation was going to be mighty important. I couldn’t afford to muff the deal, and I had to decide what I intended to say. And that would depend on sizing up my man, first.

There was just one thing running through my mind right now. Mariner must be some kind of a nut.

On the face of it, there wasn’t anything particularly screwy about what I’d heard concerning him; lots of quiet, middle-aged guys are a little on the timid side, and prefer to keep to themselves if they live alone. But under the circumstances, the pattern didn’t make sense. If I’d cleaned up millions in the market in three months, I wouldn't be hiding out by myself in a hotel room, and that's for darn sure.

So he was probably a psycho, like all those eccentric recluses you hear about who end up dying in a basement with a fortune in cash stuck under the mattress.

I sat there for a long time, thinking about it. And the more I thought, the worse I felt. Because it's pretty hard to get close to that kind of a nut. They're the suspicious type, delusions of persecution and everything. They don't trust strangers, and nobody's their friend.

On the other hand, there was something wrong with the picture. I was paying forty bucks a day. And Mariner, even if he was a stingy tipper, must be shelling out close to a hundred for his suite. Besides, during the last few months, he'd moved from Frisco to Cleveland to Boston to Chicago—and trips like that cost dough. Even if he was making millions, he wouldn't be inclined to spend an extra dime if he was just another eccentric. Those guys hole up in the slums and stay put, and they eat stale crackers instead of shrimp cocktails.

So there must be some other reason why Mariner was keeping himself under wraps. I got a sudden hunch.

Could it be that he was the stooge or front-man for some syndicate?

That made a little better sense to me. Sure, it could explain a lot of things. Including why he stuck to his room. Probably he got his information or his orders by phone. It was a cinch one or the other came from someplace, unless he just got tips on the market out of dreams.

I was beginning to get a terrible yen to visit his room and see if I could spy on him while he was under the influence of H, or operating his ouija board, or whatever he did. Maybe he kept a collection of shrunken heads, and they talked to him.

On the other hand, it might be a lot smarter to check the switchboard girl tomorrow and see if she'd just keep track of any phone calls coming in or going out of his suite, and slip me the word.

I looked at my watch. Almost ten o’clock, and nothing had happened. I was tired. Better turn in and sleep on it. In the morning I’d decide what to do.

So I got up and went over to the door to close it.

Just as his door opened, and he came out.

I knew it was Mariner the minute I saw him. Middle-aged, middle-sized, brown-haired; he wore a plain blue suit and a white shirt, and the face above the collar was the kind you could forget even while you were looking at it.

I guess I’ve seen ten thousand such faces in my time—crowded into elevators, jammed into subways, bobbing along the street. Looking at them had never made me sweat, but I was sweating now. Because this face was worth five million bucks. Lon Mariner, the man with the golden touch.

Now I got a look at his back. He was trying his door, making sure it was locked. Maybe he kept a lot of cash inside. Maybe I could stick around and pick the lock. No, that was too dangerous. What I had to do was follow him and pick his brains.

I put on my coat while he walked over to the elevator. I figured I could dash out and make it just in time, but I figured wrong. Because the car stopped before I reached my door, and he got in.

Then I was swearing, and running down the stairs. I hit the lobby in one minute flat, but he wasn’t there and the elevator was already going up again. I could see the lights flickering on the numerals—two, then three, then four.

I shook my head. Should I wait for the car to come down again and talk to the elevator boy, hoping he’d remember which way the man in the blue suit had gone? Or should I dash outside and try to find him?

I decided to get going. I started across the lobby, trying not to break into a run, and scooted past the entrance to the cocktail lounge. Something caught my eye as I went by. The back of a blue suit.

I stopped.

Mariner was sitting at the bar, all alone, way down at the end.

The sweat rolled down my sides as I walked into the place. I chose a stool about twenty feet away from him; there wasn't anybody between us. In fact, outside of a couple off over in a booth, we had the whole joint to ourselves.

The bartender, a fat guy with a mustache, was pouring Mariner a drink. Cognac, from the looks of the glass. He saw me and came down to my end of the bar.

I ordered a beer and swivelled around on the stool so that I could get a good look at my man.

The waiter had certainly been right; Lon Mariner was "average-looking." I didn't get a clue from his ready-made clothes, and there wasn't a hint of anything unusual in his ready-made face, either. He was just another guy.

The more I studied him, the worse I felt. I'd been sure that after I had a chance to get a close look at him, I could size him up and figure out the best way to approach him. But he just sat there, a bump in a blue suit on an overstuffed log. He didn't seem to be enjoying his drink, he wasn't listening to the radio, and he never looked around at the bartender or at me. He had about as much life as a window dummy, and he wasn't nearly as handsome.

All at once he signaled for another drink. And when the bartender brought the bottle and poured, he slugged down the shot and told him to refill. Then, after he paid, he mumbled something and the bartender left the bottle standing there on the bar.

That told me something, at last. That, and the way he sat there, all stiff and frozen.

He was frozen, all right, because he was afraid. I recognized the symptoms, now. He was scared to death about something and even more scared that he'd show it So he sat and drank.

I had my cue, now. I waited until he'd poured and downed his fourth drink. Then I glanced around, checking to see that the place was still almost empty, and slid off my stool. I walked down along the bar and stood next to him. He could see me in the bar mirror, and I noticed the way his fingers tightened around his empty glass.

"Mr. Mariner," I said. "I've been looking for you." If he'd turned around and thrown the glass at me, that would have been one thing. If he'd turned pale, gasped, or slumped to the floor in a dead faint, that would have been another. But what he didn't do was still more effective. He didn't move. He'd been frozen before; now he was dead. He tightened up, all over, as if rigor mortis was setting in. I had the feeling he'd stopped breathing, just stopped completely.

"I want to talk to you, Mr. Mariner," I murmured.

He didn't turn his head and his lips never moved. But a sound came out of him, and then faint words.

"You must be mistaken. My name's not Mariner."

I shrugged. "Of course it isn't. But that's the name you signed on the hotel register. That's the name you've been using on all your business deals. I know."

He reached out and spilled himself another drink. Not poured—spilled. I watched him do it, waited while he wavered the glass up to his lips and gulped. Then he whispered again.

"How did you find me?"

"That isn't important," I answered. "I've been keeping an eye on you for quite awhile."

"Then I was wrong all along, wasn't I? I thought I could get away with it. But they knew all the time, didn't they?"

"I'm all alone, Mr. Mariner."

"Yes. But they sent you."

I hesitated, then decided how to play it. "Nobody sent me. This was my own idea. I've been studying your stock market operations for months. You see, I work for the firm you've been doing business with. And I wanted to talk to you about your methods."

"My—methods?"

For the first time there was a recognizable expression on his face. You could almost call it a smile. He turned his head just a trifle and stared at me. "Then I was wrong. You're just an—an ordinary citizen?"

"Very ordinary, I assure you. But I have an extraordinary curiosity about you. Or about any man who can do what you've been doing in the investment field. I thought we might discuss your methods."

He was really smiling, now. He poured another drink, and his hand was perfectly steady. "Well, I don't know—"

He was confident once more, ready to brush me off. I knew how to handle that.

"Listen, Mr. Mariner. I'm not the nosey type, but you've already told me enough so that I know you're in some kind of trouble. You don't exactly welcome publicity, do you? I mean, you wouldn't want any stories in the papers about mysterious millionaires, or men traveling under assumed names who have secret methods of beating the stock market. I could go to the phone right now and call the reporters—"

"You wouldn't!"

"Of course I wouldn't. Because you're going to talk to me, instead. Just me. And if you can tell me what I think you can, I'll have every reason to keep my own mouth shut in the future, just the way you do. There it is, Mr. Mariner—my cards are on the table. I want in."

"All right. We'll talk."

"Good."

"But not here. Not like this. In my room."

"Fine. Let's go up." I waited for a moment, then repeated it louder. "Let's go up."

But he wasn't listening to me.

He wasn't looking at me, either. He was staring into the bar mirror. I followed his glance.

Behind us, in the doorway of the cocktail lounge, stood a tall blonde. She had, among other things, the biggest pair of eyes I'd ever seen. She was worth looking at for a number of reasons, but her eyes were what held me.

The eyes held Mariner, too. He looked at her and his mouth opened and closed, and he froze up again. Really froze.

She didn’t smile, and she didn’t say anything, and she didn’t even come closer. She just gave him that long look and then she beckoned.

Mariner stood up. “Excuse me,” he muttered. “I must go now. I have an engagement.”

“What about our talk?” I said.

“Oh, yes. Suppose we say ten o’clock tomorrow morning, in my room?”

I grabbed his arm. “You wouldn’t try to pull a sneak, now would you? Remember what I said about the reporters.”

“I remember.”

“All right, see you at ten, then. But no funny business. I mean it, Mr. Mariner.”

“I promise.”

And then he was walking over to her, following her out of the place. I watched them go, saw them head across the lobby in the direction of the elevators. He couldn’t find an exit that way, and I was pretty sure he wasn’t looking for one—not with that tall blonde on his arm. In a way I didn’t blame him for cancelling his appointment and putting me off until tomorrow. If a blonde like that ever beckoned to me, I’d cancel my appointments, too. I doubt if I’d be ready to see anyone even at ten the next morning.

But I’m still the suspicious type. I waited a few minutes, then got up and went out to the desk. The Room Clerk on duty was my ten buck boy.

I leaned across the counter and flipped a bill his way, very quietly.

He palmed it, just as quietly. “Yes, sir?”

“About Mr. Mariner,” I said. “He didn’t check out, did he?”

“No party by that name checked out, no sir.”

“Well, in case he does, any time between now and tomorrow morning, I want you to call me. And right away, before he gets past the desk here.”

“Certainly, but—”

“But what?”

The clerk was frowning. “I don’t believe we have a party by that name here at the hotel.”

I knew how to frown, too. “What do you mean, you don’t have such a party? Lon Mariner, in Suite 701. You’re the guy who tipped me off about him in the first place.”

“I am? You must be mistaken, sir.”

“Now, look—”

“You look, sir.” The clerk flipped through the registration list. “Here’s our guest-entries for the past week. No Mariner, is there? Are you sure you have the right name?”

“Am I sure? You showed me, yesterday. Give me that!” I grabbed and squinted. I saw my own name, and ran my eyes along the signatures above it. Paige, Stein, Tenn, Klass, Phillips, Graham—no Mariner.

“What kind of a business is this?” I was getting a funny feeling in my stomach. “Who’s in Suite 701?”

“Let’s look at the card-file. Over here, sir.” He stepped to the next cage, where the billing entries were kept. He pulled out a yellow card. “Suite 701 has been vacant all week,” he told me. “Just rented it tonight. Party named Fairborn. Here, see for yourself.”

The funny feeling spread from my stomach upwards. My heart was pounding.

“But that’s Mariner’s suite,” I said. “Little middle-aged guy, with a blue suit. You must have seen him going through the lobby just now, with a big blonde—”

The clerk shook his head. “No, sir, I didn’t.”

“But he was just in the bar; I talked to him.”

“I’m sorry, sir—”

I turned my back and ran for the elevator. By the time I got to the seventh floor, my heart was in my mouth; and it wasn’t from the fast ride, either.

I went down the corridor, right to 701, and banged on the door. My heart was in my mouth, but I could still talk. And when the door opened, I did.

“Mr. Mariner,” I said. Then my voice trailed off. I was looking at the blonde with the big eyes. And she was looking at me.

“You have the wrong room, I believe.”

"I don't. Where's Mariner?"

"Who?"

"The guy in the blue suit. You came up here with him less than half an hour ago. This is his room."

She shook her head. "Sorry, but you're mistaken. This is my room. I'm Miss Fairborn."

"But I saw you two together—"

The big eyes narrowed. "Now, wait a minute. I've been in this room ever since I arrived this evening. I don't know what you're talking about. If you doubt my word, you can check with the desk downstairs."

"I already did. But I know you and Mariner were together, I saw him leaving the bar with you."

"Ah. The bar. You were drinking there."

"Never mind that stuff. I'm not drunk! What'd you do with Mariner?"

The door opened a trifle more. A man put his head out behind Miss Fairborn. He was a big man, with steel-gray hair, and he didn't look like Mariner at all. He looked like trouble.

"What goes on here?" he demanded.

Miss Fairborn shrugged. "I don't know. Some drunk looking for a friend. You'd better handle hun, Harry."

"Glad to."

But I wasn't being handled. I backed away. "All right," I said. "So I made a mistake. I'm sorry."

Harry started to say something, and then stepped aside. I recognized the waiter, Joe Franscetti. He was coming out, wheeling a service table.

I waved at the three of them. "Excuse it please," I muttered. "I'll go quietly."

And I went, around the corner, hearing the door close behind me. I stood there, waiting until Joe Franscetti caught up with me. He wheeled his table along, head down. I stepped out and grabbed his elbow.

"What gives?" I asked. "Where's Mariner?"

"Who? What's that again, mister?"

"I asked where's Mariner? The guy in 701?"

"But I just come from there. You saw me. There's this dame and her boyfriend, they just had dinner."

"I know. Only that's Mr. Mariner's room. You served him all last week, you said so. Remember?"

"Mister, are you all right?"

"Of course I am. But everybody else has gone crazy. Now look here, you told me about Mariner yourself. The brown-haired guy in the blue suit, the one who only tipped fifty cents. Prime ribs rare, Waldorf salad."

"Mister, that room's been vacant all week. I never saw anyone like you say, and I never saw you before, either. You better lie down, you don't look so good."

I knew how I looked, but there was no sense wasting time. There was still the bell-captain; he'd know if a certain bellboy was on duty.

Downstairs I went. I found the bell-captain. My boy was on, tonight, and I caught him over in a corner of the lobby. This time I decided to make another investment.

"Here," I said, waving the bill under his nose. "This is a hundred bucks, see it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Now I've no idea what they might have paid you to clam up, but I've got a hunch they didn't go higher than twenty. So you might as well sell out to the highest bidder."

"I don't follow you, sir."

"It's very simple. Yesterday you and I had a little talk together. I was asking you questions about a man named Lon Mariner. In Suite 701. You described him to me, said he never went out except while the maids were cleaning up. Right?"

His eyes watched the hundred-dollar bill as it waved under his nose. Then he shook his head.

"Sorry, sir. I don't remember anything like that. I mean, I couldn't have told you such a thing, because 701 was vacant until this evening. I know for a fact—I took the party up myself just a few hours ago. A big blonde.”

The hundred went back into my pocket and I headed back into the bar. It was still deserted, and the fat bartender came right over.

“Yes?”

“Remember me?” I asked. “I was in here earlier this evening.”

“That’s right.”

Well, at least he admitted I had been here. Now I was ready to try for double or nothing.

“Remember the guy I was talking to?”

Silence.

“He left before I did, with a blonde.”

“A big blonde?” The bartender brightened. “Sure, she was in here just a couple minutes ago. I served her a—I forget just what.”

“She was in here before then, looking for this guy in the blue suit. He sat down at the end of the bar, drinking cognac. I spoke to him. Then she came along and they left together. Now do you recall him?”

The bartender shook his head. “I didn’t see them. I didn’t see you talking to anyone, either. You were all alone.” He wiped the bar. “What’s the matter, sir? You don’t look so good.”

“I don’t feel so good,” I told him. “Go away.”

He went away and I sat there. No use talking any more. He wouldn’t remember. None of them remembered. But I did.

I remembered an old English movie they keep reviving on television. The Lady Vanishes. This dame sees another dame and talks to her, and later everybody swears she doesn’t exist. Of course she does; she’s been kidnapped by spies.

Then there’s the yam that pops up every now and then about the woman in the hotel room; she disappears, too. I guess it started way back in the 1890s—it was supposed to have happened in Paris, during some kind of International Exposition. Turned out the woman had cholera and they hushed everything up in order to avoid a panic when she died. They even repapered her room overnight.

Come to think of it, I'd read a lot of detective novels with the same idea. And usually there was a dame involved, and a spy or murder plot.

Somehow I couldn't swallow it in connection with Mariner. Spies don't play the market. And I didn't think he had cholera, either, or even Asiatic flu.

But he was scared.

That I remembered. He'd been scared when I talked to him, wondering if they had sent me. So who were they? The Syndicate, maybe? He'd recognized the blonde, and gone along quietly. Gone along up to the suite, where the gray-haired man named Harry was waiting. He'd gone along, even though he was scared to death.

Scared to death. Was that it? Had they killed him?

It didn't seem logical, from any angle. You don't kill the goose that lays five million golden eggs. You can't get away with it, even in Chicago, in a swank hotel.

But they had gotten away with something. And that was the screwiest part of it. They'd made everybody forget Lon Mariner had even existed, including people who'd seen him just a little while before he vanished. They'd removed his name from the registry, and even from the billing cards.

Was it just bribery? I doubted it, somehow. You can't take such chances. Sooner or later somebody would come looking for Mariner and put on the pressure. Clerks, waiters, bellboys couldn't be trusted to keep their mouths shut when the heat was on. Somebody would come, and someone would sing. Bribery wasn't good enough.

How about threats? That might work. But the people I'd just talked to didn't seem frightened. They were just puzzled. It was as if they actually believed that Lon Mariner had never existed.

That was the point I kept coming back to.

Why was it so important to make sure nobody believed there had ever been such a man?

And how had they managed the trick? If the deal involved murder, then certainly the killers would be more interested in concealing their presence than the presence of the victim. Yet the blonde had registered openly, showed herself around. She'd even come back here to the bar, probably while I was out in the lobby, and talked to the bartender. He said she ordered a drink from him, he couldn't remember what.

He couldn't remember—

I got a flash. A flash of those enormous eyes, and the two of them in here, all alone. The blonde leaning over the bar and telling him he couldn't remember. Not bribing him, not threatening him, but telling him. Hypnotizing him into forgetting.

Wild?

Perhaps, but I was wild now, too. When plain facts don't make sense, you've got to look for something fancy. And hypnotism works. It works fast, under the right conditions, with the right operators. That blonde would be the right operator. She could get close to the clerk or the bellboy; they'd look—being men—and they'd listen. And the waiter, Joe Franscetti, had been right up there in the room with her, serving a meal. That left the bartender to deal with. So she slipped down here and slipped him a mental Mickey.

I felt a little better, but not much. Because Mariner was still missing, and I didn't know why. And they knew that I knew.

What I needed now was an ace in the hole. But I didn't have one. The best I could do was a gun in the suitcase. At the time, I'd worried a lot about packing one along. It seemed risky, and I really didn't expect to use threats on Mariner. Now I was glad I had it.

Because there was only one thing left for me to do. I'd have to go up to my room, get the gun, and knock on the door of Suite 701 again.

I got up and went out into the lobby. I took the elevator. I got off at the seventh floor. I tiptoed down the hall, past 701, to my own room. I took out the key and opened my door very quietly. I stepped in.

And then I stumbled, reaching for the light. I started to swear, under my breath, but I should have prayed instead. Because my having stumbled is what must have saved me.

The blow came out of the darkness behind the door, and if it had landed on my head, I'd have been a goner. As it was, my shoulder almost broke. But I ducked, and turned, and was just coming up with a right when two things happened simultaneously.

The light clicked on, and the man named Harry stuck a gun in my ribs.

"Now, march," he suggested.

We marched. There was nobody in the corridor to watch the parade go by. Nobody cheered when we halted before the door to 701.

He knocked. The door opened and Miss Fairborn looked out at Harry. "Did you get him?" she whispered.

"Yes," Harry murmured. "I got him." He pushed me into the room and closed the door.

"Then why didn't you knock him out?" she asked.

"Changed my mind," Harry said. "I think we might have other plans." He winked. "Understand?"

Miss Fairborn nodded, then turned. Those great big beautiful eyes stared at me.

"Cut it out," I said. "I don't hypnotize easy."

She sighed. "I know. That's why I didn't try. It wouldn't work on you because you wouldn't cooperate. You were too suspicious."

"Sorry. That's my nature."

"I'm sorry, too. If only you hadn't come, if only you'd go away now—but of course it's too late."

I looked across the room at the bed. "Where's the money?" I asked. "I thought it might be piled up here, ready for shipping."

Harry rubbed his chin with his free hand. I knew where the other one was, of course—it was holding the gun. And I knew where the gun was, too—still in my ribs.

"You had to guess, didn't you?" he said.

"Yes. I guessed. So where is it, might I ask?"

"You're in no position to ask anything, but I'll tell you. The money has already been shipped."

"And Mr. Mariner?"

"He's been shipped, too. Or will be, soon."

"Then it's like I thought. Murder."

"You did a lot of thinking, didn't you?"

"Why not?" I shrugged. "I knew Mariner was afraid for his life. That's why he kept running from city to city; that's why he holed up here. He practically turned blue when I spoke to him and he admitted they were after him. I didn't know what he was talking about until Miss Fairborn showed up. He was twice as frightened then, but he went along with her. So it all adds up, doesn't it? We were after the same thing—the secret of how he managed to make all that dough in such a hurry.

"The only difference is, I was working alone, and I intended to go about it in a nice way. You teamed up and put on the pressure. You were ready to threaten him, ready to kill him. And you did. I still can't understand how you figured you'd get away with it, but you did."

I paused as another thought struck me. "How did you manage to erase his name from our company records? Was it hypnosis again—the way you operated here in the hotel?"

Miss Fairborn nodded. "We have teams operating in every major city."

"That must cost dough. Of course, with five million involved—"

"Multiply it by ten," Harry said. "Mariner just made a little extra on the side, after he thought he'd sneaked away from us."

"From you?"

"You got your story a bit twisted. You see, we all work for the same outfit?"

"Syndicate?"

"Not the one you mean. It's a group of investment people. Their names don't matter. Let's just say they are wealthy and influential people who want to become still more wealthy and influential. They are in a position to get advance tips on a lot of inside deals—but there are laws governing the right to speculate independently in the affairs of your own company. So they conceived this idea of pooling their resources, setting up a private organization to make investments. As long as secrecy is maintained, they can make many millions in profits each year. All they needed was a front man."

"Mariner?"

"Exactly. A nobody from nowhere. Someone who followed orders; and a few trained people like us to keep an eye on him, check up to make sure he didn't get out of line. And it worked well, for the past few years. He must have brought in well over fifty million in stocks and bonds alone."

"But no one man could make that much money without making headlines as well. And I never heard of him until I stumbled across his trail three months ago, as a small investor."

"Exactly. Up until three months ago, his name wasn't Mariner. He used half a dozen other names over the years. That was part of the plan, to keep switching identities. And that was part of our job—to go around, when he changed his name, and erase memories of his previous existence. As I told you, we have similar operatives all over the country.

"Then, about three months ago, he decided to change his name on his own. He'd been armed with advance information, told what to invest and where to invest it. So he decided to skip out on us and work for himself. He took the Mariner name, started to dodge around the country. In ninety days he managed to pile up close to five million in cash profits. Then we caught up with him." Harry rubbed his chin again.

"Why are you telling me all this?" I asked.

He grinned. "Because I like your face."

"You're not going to try to kill me, too," I said. "You couldn't get away with that."

"Certainly not." He took the gun out of my ribs. "Here, you might as well have this, too." And he held the weapon out to me.

"But—"

"Go ahead, take it. It isn't loaded, anyway. Besides, it's your gun. I found it in your suitcase."

I blinked. "Why—"

Miss Fairborn smiled at me. "I think I know what Harry has in mind," she said. "He's asking you to join us. Aren't you, dear?"

"That's right," Harry said.

"You see," she said, "now we need someone to take Mr. Mariner's place. And since you seem to be alone in the world—"

"Exactly." Harry nodded pleasantly. "An ideal candidate."

"What if I don't like the idea?" I asked.

"Nonsense! That's why you followed Mr. Mariner, wasn't it?" Miss Fairborn said. "Because you wanted to make millions. That's been your big dream for a long time, hasn't it? Well, this is an opportunity to make your dream come true. From now on you'll be doing just that. You'll go from city to city—under a variety of names, of course—and you'll invest a fortune in securities. By the time the first year is ended you'll probably take in more cash than anyone else in the market today. What more could you ask from life?"

"But I won't be allowed to keep it. And I'll have to live under cover, in hotels, with people like you spying on me night and day, watching every move I make."

"The penalty of wealth," Miss Fairborn said.

"I won't have anything, not even a name. Nobody will know me, or even remember me after you've erased their memories."

"But think of the romance of being a man of mystery."

"I am thinking of it," I said. "And I don't like it. I don't like your proposition, and I don't like you. What's there to prevent me from just walking out of here, going to the police, and telling them your whole story? For that matter, I can probably get them to find Mariner's body."

"Probably," said Harry. "Suit yourself. But if you change your mind within the next hour, come on back. We'll be waiting right here for you."

"I won't be back," I told him, opening the door.

"Yes you will," Miss Fairborn called after me. "This is what you've always wanted. I'm sure you'll see it our way."

But, as I walked down the hall to my room, I didn't see it their way. I didn't understand it at all. They admitted murdering Mariner and they could have murdered me, too, just to be on the safe side. If their story was true, it would be worth the extra risk. Instead, they offered me this fantastic proposition—this living death. Why?

I didn't see it. Not until I was actually back in my room, not until I walked into the bathroom and saw him lying there in the tub, with a bullet in his forehead. The pillow through which it had been fired lay on the floor next to the tub. They'd thought of everything. The pillow had muffled the sound of the shot. And that's why Harry had come to my room. He'd murdered Mariner with my gun. No wonder he'd given it back to me!

Yes, I saw it now. The corpse was in my room, the fingerprints were on my gun. I'd been looking for Mariner, told everyone about him. Running away wouldn't help. If I wanted to get out of this, I'd have to rely on them. And that meant taking Mariner's place.

Only knowing what I did about the Syndicate, I'd never be able to try what Mariner had tried. I'd never get up enough nerve to run away and attempt to make money on my own. I'd just go on stooging forever—or until they decided they'd had enough.

I thought about it for the full hour. But long before the hour was up, I'd made my decision.

Finally, I walked back to their room and knocked on the door.

Miss Fairborn opened it. Her big eyes wide and luminous in welcome.

"All right," I said. "You win. But get me out of here, fast. I can't stand that body in there—"

She smiled. "Certainly. We've contacted our superiors and all arrangements have been made for you. Just check out of your room and stop worrying. Now, here're your orders . . ."

That was three weeks ago. Since then I've been to Detroit and Dallas and now I'm on my way to Kansas City. They gave me a new name—Lloyd

Jones—and credentials to match. Everywhere I go, I am met by contacts who give me instructions. I make the investments and I sit in my hotel room. I can see where it's going to be an endless, monotonous grind.

But I can stand that part of it. It's just that lately, something else had started to worry me.

You see, I remember how I got on the trail of Mr. Mariner. I was ambitious; I wanted to find a man who had the secret of playing the market. So I looked around, and finally I found him. As a result, I was responsible for his death. At the very least, precipitated it.

No, it isn't my conscience that's bothering me.

It's this.

Somewhere, someplace, there must be others like myself—little guys with big ideas. And somewhere, sooner or later, another man is going to start looking for a fabulous character who seems to have the golden touch. He's going to run across my name, and he's going to make up his mind, like I did.

And then he'll come looking for me.

If he finds me—well, I remember only too well what happened to Mariner.

There's no sense trying to run; I'm trapped in my new identity. I can only wait until the man catches up with me. And, meanwhile, I'll keep on making millions. Doing what I always wanted to do—make a killing in the market.

But the next victim might very well be me.

Spawn of the Dark One

Our juvenile delinquency problems have, been attributed to everything from slums to momentary expectation of an all-out atomic war. Any one of these reasons is no doubt potent. But here's a new one out of the fertile mind of our Robert Bloch. Thank heaven it's fiction—or is it?

EVERYTHING was peaceful the night before the trouble came.

Ben Kerry perched on the porch rail outside his cottage, blinking like an owl in the twilight. He peered across the wide rolling expanse of the Kettle Moraine country and flapped his arms as if he were about to take off.

"There's gold in them thar hills," he muttered. "I never knew it, but I could have gotten in on the ground floor, too."

Ted Hibbard grinned at him. "You mean, when the glacier swept down and made them? You're not that old." Kerry chuckled and lit his pipe. "That's right, son. And I wasn't here when the glacier rolled back and the Indians came, either. They used the hills for signalling posts or for their ceremonial rituals. No money in that, I grant you."

"I know," Hibbard said. "I read your book about it."

Kerry chuckled again. "No money in that, either. If it wasn't for the university presses, we anthropologists would starve to death waiting for a publisher. Because we never see what's right under our noses." He stared out at the hills again, far into deepening dusk.

“Of course the farmers didn’t see, either, when they arrived here. They preferred to settle on level land. And their sons and grandsons sought still better soil, down around the waterways. So all these rock-strewn hills with their boulder outcroppings, stood deserted until maybe thirty years ago. Then the automobile brought the first hunters and fishermen from the cities. They put up cheap cabins on cheap land. And they didn’t see the gold any more than I did, when I came here just before the War. All I wanted was a summer place where I could get away from people.”

Ted Hibbard chuckled, now. “Strikes me as funny,” he said. “An anthropologist who hates people.”

“Don’t hate ’em,” Kerry insisted. “At least, not most of ’em. Even today, you know, the majority of the inhabitants of the Earth are still savages. I’ve always gotten along with them very well. It’s the civilized who frighten me.”

“Such as your students and former students?” Hibbard smiled up at him. “I thought I was welcome here.”

“You are, believe me. But you’re an exception. You aren’t like the others. You don’t move out here for a fast buck.”

“Oh,” Hibbard said. “So that’s what you mean by the gold, is it?”

“Of course. What you see out there isn’t hill country any more. It’s real estate. Development property. Right after the War the city people came. Not the hunters and the fishermen now, but the exurbanites. The super de-luxe exurbanites, who could afford to move forty miles out of town instead of just fifteen. They’ve been pouring in ever since, putting up their ranchhouses and their double garages for the station wagons.”

The Indians were afraid of the hills at night,” Kerry told him. “They used to huddle inside their tepees around the fire. Just like today’s citizens huddle inside their ranchhouses around the TV set, safe and protected.

“I suppose you have a right to be resentful,” Hibbard said. “All these property-values going up. If you’d anticipated the boom you might have picked up choice locations years ago and made a fortune.”

Kerry shrugged. “Wouldn’t need a fortune. Just enough to move on. By now I could have a little cabana down along the barren stretches of the Florida Keys. I’d call it the Key Pout.”

A white face popped around the comer of the porch.

“Okay,” Hibbard answered. “Tell her I’ll be along soon.” The face disappeared. “Nice boy you have there,” Kerry said.

“Hank? We think so. Crazy about math, all that sort of thing. Can’t wait to start school in the fall. I guess he’s a lot more serious about things than I was at his age. A lot more than most kids are, nowadays.”

“That’s why I like him.” Kerry tapped his pipe against the porch-rail. “You know, I’m not really such a misanthrope. This hermit pose of mine is mostly pretense. But some of it is defense, too. Defense against the mobs taking over our cities, our culture. I saw it coming, fifteen years ago. That’s why I got out. It’s bad enough having to stay in town during the school year, to teach. Once that’s over, I come back to the cottage here. Now even this little bit of privacy is being invaded. The hot-dog stands are taking over Walden Pond, I guess.” Hibbard stood up. “I hope you don’t resent my hanging around this way,” he said.

“Good heavens, no! When you bought your place last month I was mighty pleased to see you. I’m still a member of the human race, remember, even though I find the average rural resident as much of an alien as I do the city troglodyte or his suburbanite cousin. You’re more than welcome here, at any time. I like your wife, and I like that boy of yours. They’re real people.”

“Meaning that the rest are not?”

“Don’t bait me,” Kerry said. “You understand very well what I’m talking about. That’s why you moved out here yourself, isn’t it?”

Hibbard moved to the edge of the porch. “Well, I guess so. Actually, we came out here because of Hank, mostly. Didn’t like the city schools. Didn’t like the kind of kids he ran around with back in town. They’re—I don’t know—different. All these juvenile delinquents. You know.”

Kerry nodded. “Indeed I do. As a matter of fact, I’ve been spending most of the summer taking notes for a little monograph. Nothing pretentious, understand—sociology’s out of my line—but it’s an interesting study. And this happens to be an ideal spot for anthropological field-trips.”

“You mean there’s a lot of rural delinquents around here?” Hibbard looked distressed. “We were hoping to get away from that.”

“Don’t worry,” Kerry reassured him. “From what I’ve seen, the farm areas are still pretty well untouched. Of course, we have the usual percentage of barnyard sadists, truants, maladjusted types. But Hank won’t run into too many; at his age most of them have either gone off to the armed services or the Industrial Home For Boys. It’s the city youngsters I’ve been investigating.”

“You’re talking about exurbanite kids like mine? Or is there some kind of boys’ camp around here?”

“Neither. I’m speaking about our week end visitors. Don’t tell me you haven’t seen them in town during the summer.”

“No, I haven’t. Actually, I’ve been so busy getting our place straightened out that I don’t get into town very often. About once a week I stock up on supplies, usually on a Wednesday. I heard it’s pretty crowded, week ends.”

“You heard correctly,” Kerry told him. “But perhaps you might be interested in seeing just what I’m talking about. I plan to take a run in, tomorrow morning, about nine or so. And you’re welcome to ride along.”

“Will do.” Hibbard waved his hand in salute.

Kerry stood on the porch and watched his guest walk down the hillside path, his shoulders silhouetted against the sunset.

From the far horizon came a low, rumbling sound. It might have been the mutter of distant thunder—at least, that is what both men mistook it for at the time.

Neither of them knew that it heralded the arrival of the trouble.

They must have been coming in all through the night, and they were still gathering around ten the following morning when Ben Kerry drove Hibbard into town in his old Ford.

Their first encounter occurred on the highway just outside the town limits, between the Welcome To Hilltop sign and the notice which read Speed Limit 25 m.p.h.

It came in the form of a rumbling again, but this time there was no mistaking it for thunder. The motorcycle roared along the road behind them, then swerved past without slackening speed. As it zoomed by, Hibbard caught a glimpse of a squat figure in a black leather jacket, with a monkey on his back. At least, it looked like a monkey in the dusty passing blur; not until a moment later did he realize that what he had seen was a girl with cropped hair who was clinging with arms entwined about the cyclist.

As they speeded ahead, Hibbard saw the girl raise her right hand as though in a gesture of greeting. Automatically he started to return her wave, then froze as Kerry gripped his shoulder.

"Look out!" he shouted, and ducked his head.

At that instant something struck the windshield of the car and bounced off with a clatter. It fell in a silvery arc to the side of the road, and Hibbard understood. The girl had not been waving. She had hurled an empty beer-can at them.

"Why, she could have broken the windshield!" he exclaimed.

Kerry nodded. "Happens all the time. By tonight you'll find the roadside paved with empties."

"But they aren't even supposed to buy beer, are they? Isn't there a state law?"

Kerry jerked his finger over his shoulder. "Sign says you cut down to twenty-five miles an hour when you enter town, too," he muttered. "But they're doing close to fifty."

"You talk as if you expected such things."

"I do. It's like this every week end, all summer long. Everyone knows what to expect around here."

"And nobody tries to do anything about it?"

"Wait and see," Kerry told him.

They were entering town now, passing a row of motels. Although it was still midmorning, a surprising number of cars were parked before the various units. Hibbard gazed at them curiously, noting a strange incongruity. Virtually none of the vehicles were recognizable as standard units. Painted junkers, restyled hot-rods, ancient sports cars predominated. And there were dozens of motorcycles everywhere they looked.

"I see you notice our week end visitors' choice of transportation," Kerry said. "I'm afraid it's apt to strike you as a bit unconventional. As a group they seem to dislike what I believe is called 'Detroit iron'—you might gather from that that they utilize the motor car as a symbol of protest. As I remark in my notes, there seems to be an automotive in their madness."

He slowed to a snail's pace as they proceeded up the short thoroughfare known, inevitably, as Main Street. The sidewalks were jammed with the usual Saturday throng of farm-folk, but intermingling with them was the unusual throng of teenage visitants.

There was no difficulty in separating them from the local youngsters; not these swaggering, guffawing figures in their metal-studded jackets and skintight jeans. Their booted feet thudded along the pavement, their visored caps bobbed. Some of them were bareheaded, choosing to display shaven skulls, crewcuts, and the more outlandish coiffures known as "Mohawks" or —for polite abbreviation—the "d.a." An occasional older lad in the crowd was more apt to affect the other extreme; long, greasy locks and exaggerated sideburns. Several of the latter youths wore spade beards, which gave them an oddly goatish appearance. The resemblance to satyrs was perhaps increased by the presence, and the attitudes, of their female companions. Virtually all of them were indistinguishable from the girl on the motorcycle; the cropped hair, overpainted face, and tight sweater and jodhpurs seemed to be standard equipment.

Their boisterous babble rose and echoed from the artificial ampitheatre created by the store-fronts lining either side of the narrow street; from the end of the block came the sound of a juke-box blaring away at full volume inside the root-beer stand and drive-in.

A large crowd of juveniles congregated before it, and several couples were dancing on the sidewalk, oblivious of those who had to step out into the street in order to pass by. The sun's rays reflected from a score of beer-cans held in a score of hands. An orgiastic aura prevailed.

Hibbard turned to his companion. "I think I get it now," he said. "I remember reading something about this a couple of years back. Wasn't there a motorcycle convention in some small town in California? A gang took over, almost started a riot?"

"There was," the older man confirmed. "And it happened again, last year, in another state. Then I read of another instance, this summer. If you wanted to check on such things, I imagine you'd find the phenomenon has become commonplace all over."

"Is this what you wanted to show me?" Hibbard asked. "That cyclist gangs are coming in here and terrorizing the citizens?"

Kerry shook his head.

"Don't, be melodramatic," he murmured. "In the first place, this isn't a 'cyclist gang,' any more than it's a 'hot-rod crowd' or a 'sports car mob' or a congregation of Elvis Presley fans. These youngsters come from all over; the big city, the outlying suburbs, the smaller industrial communities nearby. There's no outward indication that they belong to any formal group, club, or organization. They just congregate, apparently. And if you look closely, you'll see they're not terrorizing the citizens, as you put it. In fact most of the local merchants are delighted to have them here." He waved his arm in the direction of the beer-drinkers. “They’re good customers. They leave a lot of money in town over a week end. The sky’s the limit.”

“But you said yourself that they break the laws. They must stir up trouble, get into fights, do damage.”

“They pay for it, I guess.”

“What about the local authorities? What do they think?”

Kerry smiled. “You mean the mayor? He’s a plumber here in town, gets a hundred dollars a year to hold the title as a part-time job. He doesn’t worry much.”

“But the police—”

“We have a local sheriff, that’s all. The place isn’t even big enough to have its own jail. That’s over at the county seat.”

“Don’t the citizens who aren’t merchants do any complaining? Are they willing to sit back and just let a bunch of strange young hoodlums run wild?”

“I guess they complain. But so far there hasn’t been any action taken. For my selfish purposes, it’s just as well. You’d be surprised what I’ve managed to observe during this summer alone. What I want to do now is get over and see one of their race meetings.”

“Race meetings?”

“That’s right. You don’t think they come here just to walk up and down Main Street, do you? Saturday or Sunday afternoons you’ll generally find them off in the hills, on one of those little side roads back behind the county trunk highways. They rent a spot from a local farmer and hold drag races, hillclimbing contests, that sort of thing. This week there’ll be a gathering in our neighborhood, I think. They were always west of town before this, but I guess something happened and they got run off from their usual spot. Now old Lautenshlager is going to let them use the big hill behind his property. We ought to be able to see the bonfire tonight.”

“Bonfire?”

Kerry nodded. “They usually have them.”

“What do they think they are, Indians?” Hibbard stared at a trio on the nearby corner; a skinny boy epileptically contorted over a guitar and a writhing couple who seemed to be executing an impromptu war-dance. He had to grin at the sight. “Maybe they are, at that,” he admitted. “They sure sound like savages.”

“Rock-and-roll,” Kerry shrugged.

Suddenly Hibbard’s grin faded. “Look at that,” he snapped, pointing up the street ahead.

A beat-up convertible was screeching down the avenue towards them, loaded with youngsters whose voices competed more than successfully with the mechanical din. As the car moved forward, a cat moved quickly out of its path. But not quickly enough, for the car swerved purposefully to the side. There was a jarring thump and a louder screech, followed by howls of laughter.

“Did you see what they did-?” Hibbard demanded. “They deliberately went out of their way to run it down! Let me out of here! I’m going to—”

“Oh, no you’re not.” Kerry put his foot down on the accelerator and the Ford moved on. “The poor thing’s dead. You can’t help it now. No sense starting trouble.”

“What’s the matter with you?” Hibbard’s voice was shrill. “You aren’t going to let them get away with this, are you?” He stared as the convertible skidded to a halt and its inmates poured out across the sidewalk. “It’s bad enough when small boys torture an animal out of childish curiosity, but these aren’t children. They’re old enough to know what they’re doing.”

“That’s right,” Kerry agreed. “Like you say, they’re savages. Remember the riots. You can’t win.” Kerry drove in silence, turning off at the end of the street and cutting back along a side-road which circled the edge of town and joined the highway once again. Even at a distance it was possible to hear the blare of music, the cough of exhaust pipes, the yammer of horns and the snarl of the cycles.

"They must have noise wherever they go," Kerry said, at last. "I suppose it's what the psychiatrists call oral aggression."

Hibbard didn't reply.

"Rock-and-roll is another manifestation. But then again, there was swing in your salad days and jazz in mine. In fact you can see a lot of parallels if you look for them. Eccentric dress and hair styles, the drinking—the whole pattern of rebellion against authority."

Hibbard stirred restlessly. "But not the senseless cruelty," he said. "Sure, I remember frat initiations and how wild we got after football games. But there was nothing like this. There were a few bullies or maladjusted kids with mean streaks—now they all behave like a pack of psychos."

"Your boy isn't like that," Kerry answered. "Lots of them are normal."

"Yes. But there seem to be so many of the other sort.

More and more each year. Don't tell me you haven't noticed. You told me you've been studying these kids. And just now, back in town, you were afraid."

Kerry sighed. "Yes, I've studied them. And I am afraid." He paused. "How about coming home for lunch with me? I think I ought to show you a few things."

Hibbard nodded. The noonday countryside was silent, or almost silent. It was only by listening very closely that they could hear the faint rumbling, moving along the roads in the direction of the distant hills.

Kerry spread the scrapbooks on the table after lunch. "Started these myself some time ago," he said. "But recently I've signed up with a clipping service."

He riffled the pages of the topmost book. "Here's your motorcycle riots, and a section on gang fights. Rumbles, they call them. A report from the Police Commissioner of New York on the rise of delinquency. A list of weapons taken from a group of high school freshmen in Detroit—switchblade knives, straight razors, brass knuckles, two pistols, a hatchet. All of them used in a street battle. A section on narcotics, one on armed robbery, quite a few stories of arson. I've tried to eliminate what seem to be run-of-the-mill occurrences, so the clippings involving sex-crimes mostly concern forcible rape, gang assaults, and sadistic perversion. Even so, you can see there's a frightening assortment. This second book is devoted exclusively to newsstories of torture and murder. I warn you, it's not pleasant reading."

It wasn't. Hibbard found his gorge rising. He'd noticed such items, of course, while skimming through his daily paper, but had never paid too much attention to their frequency. Here, for the first time, he encountered a mass accumulation, and it was an anthology of horror.

He read about the teenage kidnappers in Chicago who mutilated and then killed an infant; the youngster down South who butchered his sister; the boy who blew off the head of his mother with a shotgun. Case after case of parricide, fratricide, infanticide; instance after instance of apparently senseless slaughter.

Kerry glanced over his shoulder and sighed.

"Truth is stranger than fiction, isn't it?" he muttered. "You'll look a long time before discovering any Penrods or Willie Baxters in those newsclippings. This isn't a Booth Tarkington world any more. For that matter, you'll search in vain for an Andy Hardy."

"I believe it," said Hibbard. "But I can't understand it. Of course, there were always juvenile delinquents, Dead End Kids, that sort of thing. Only they seemed to be the exceptions, the victims of the Depression. And the zoot-suiters during the War were supposed to be the result of lack of parental supervision. The youngsters in these cases seem to be the products of normal upbringing; I notice the stories make quite a point out of the fact that most of them come from nice homes, prosperous backgrounds. So what's happened to our kids?"

"You'll still find nice children around. Hank isn't that way, remember."

"But what's influencing the majority? Why has there been such a terrible change in the last few years?"

Kerry puffed on his pipe. "Lots of explanations, if you want them. Dr. Wertham, for example, blames a lot of it on the comic books. Some psychotherapists say television is the villain. Others think the War left its mark; kids live in the shadow of military service, so they rebel. They've taken new heroes in their own image—James Dean, Marlon Brando, the torn-shirt totem rules their clan. Oh, there's already a most impressive literature on the subject."

"Well, it doesn't impress me," Hibbard declared. "Maybe it sounds good, but how does one of those fancy theories explain a thing like this? Listen." He jabbed his finger at one of the clippings pasted on the page opened before them. "Here's a case from just last month. A fourteen-year-old boy, down South. He got up out of bed in the middle of the night and killed his parents in cold blood, while they slept. No rhyme or reason for it, he admits he had no reason to hate them, and the psychiatrists' reports seem to show he's perfectly normal, had an ordinary home-life. His story is that he just woke up out of a sound sleep and felt a sudden 'urge to kill somebody.' So he did." Hibbard thumbed through the book. "Come to think of it, that's what a lot of them say. They just get an 'impulse,' or 'something comes over them,' or they 'want to see what it's like.' And the next day the cops are beating the bushes for the bodies of missing babies, or digging up fragments of dismembered corpses in gravel-pits. I tell you, it doesn't make sense!"

He closed the scrap-book and stared at Kerry. "You've gone to a lot of trouble to collect these clippings," he said. "And you say you've been studying this juvenile delinquent problem all summer. You must have come to some conclusions."

Kerry shrugged. "Perhaps. But I'm not quite ready to commit myself. I need further data before presenting a hypothesis." He gave Hibbard a long look. "You were a pretty fair student, as I recall. Let's see what you make of it all."

"Well, there's a couple of things that occur to me. First, this insistence, in case after case, over and over again, that a youngster suddenly experiences ah irresistible impulse to commit murder. Generally, in such examples, the child is alone and not part of any gang. Come to think of it, he's often an only child, isn't he, or lives an isolated life?"

Kerry's eyes narrowed. "Go on."

"That seems to take care of one group. But there's another—the gangs. The ones that go in for the uniforms, and the regalia. I notice there's quite a bit of reference to initiations and secret society mumbo-jumbo. They've got a jive-talk language of their own, and fancy names, that sort of thing. And they seem to be premeditated in their crimes." He hesitated. "On the face of it, we're dealing with two totally different types. "No, wait a minute—there's one thing all these kids seem to have in common."

Kerry leaned forward. "What's that?"

"They don't feel anything—no shame, no guilt, no remorse. There's no empathy towards their victims, none at all. Time after time the stories bring that point out. They kill for kicks, but it doesn't really touch them at all. In other words, they're psychopaths."

"Now we're getting somewhere," Kerry said. "You call them psychopaths. And just what is a psychopath?"

"Why, like I said—somebody who doesn't have normal feeling, who lacks responsibility. You've studied up on psychology, you ought to know."

Kerry gestured towards the row of bookshelves lining the sides of his fireplace. "That's right. I've got quite a collection of psychotherapy texts up there. But you can search through them in vain for a satisfactory definition of the so-called psychopathic personality. He isn't considered a psychotic.

He doesn’t respond to any form of treatment. No psychiatric theory presently offers a demonstrable explanation of how a psychopath evolves, and for lack of contrary evidence it’s often assumed that he’s born that way.”

“Do you believe that?”

“Yes. But unlike orthodox therapists, I have a reason. I think I know what a psychopath is. And—”

“Dad!”

Both of them turned at the cry.

Hibbard’s son stood in the doorway, the rays of the late afternoon sun reflecting redly from the bright blood streaming down the side of his face.

“Hank! What happened? Did you have an accident?” He moved towards the boy.

“No, I’m all right. Honest I am. I just didn’t want to go home and scare Mom.”

“Sit down.” Kerry led him to a chair. “Let me get some hot water, clean you off.” He went over to the sink and returned with a cloth and a basin. Skilfully he sponged the blood away, revealing the lacerations on the scalp.

“Not too deep,” he told Hibbard. “A little peroxide and a bandage, now.”

The boy winced, then subsided as Kerry finished his ministrations.

“Better?”

“I’m all right,” Hank insisted. “It’s just that they hit me with the tire-chain—”

“Who hit you?”

“I don’t know. Some guys. I went for a walk this afternoon, and I heard all this racket up on the hill behind old Lautenshlager’s place, you know. And I saw all these guys, and some dames, too. They were riding motorcycles up and down, making a lot of noise. I wanted to see what was going on, that's all, I just wanted to see what was going on—"

His lower lip trembled and Hibbard patted his shoulder. "Sure, I understand. So you went up there, eh? And then what happened?"

"Well, I started to go up. But before I could get very close, these big guys jumped me. There must have been five or six of them, they just came out from around some bushes and grabbed me. And one of them had a stick and another one had this tire-chain, and he swung it at me and hit me alongside of the head, here. The others let go of me to get out of the way, and that's how I got loose. I started to run, and they were chasing me, only I got across the fence and then I ducked down behind Lautenshlager's barn so they couldn't see me."

"Did you get a good look at the fellows?"

"Well, one of them had a beard. And they were all wearing these black leather jackets and some kind of boots."

"It's the gang, all right. Our friends, the psychopaths." Hibbard stood up. "You can walk, can't you? Then come on."

"Where are we going?"

"Home, of course. I'm going to see to it that you get to bed. You got quite a knock, there. And then I think I'll hop in the car and take a little run over to the county seat. Seems to me this is a matter for the state police."

Kerry put down his pipe. "Are you sure it's wise to stir up trouble?" he asked, quietly. "No telling what might happen."

"Something has happened already," Hibbard answered. "When a bunch of hoodlums knock my son over the head with a tire-chain, that's trouble enough for me. Come on, Hank."

He led the boy out of the door and down the path, without a backward look.

Kerry grimaced, then shook his head. For a moment he opened his mouth to call after them, then closed it. After that he just stood there, his eyes intent on the far hills. No smoke rose from them in the waning horizon-light, but the sound of racing exhausts was plainly audible. Kerry stood there listening for a long time. Then, slowly, wearily, he walked into the front room. He kindled a fire in the fireplace and sat down before it, balancing a notebook on his lap. From time to time he scribbled a few words, sitting stiffly, head poised as though listening for an unexpected sound. His face bore the tight, strained look of a man who had been waiting for trouble—and found it. He concentrated deeply.

It must have been almost an hour before the sound came. Even though he'd been tensed and alert, Kerry jumped when he heard the footsteps. He rushed to the door, reaching it just as Hibbard burst in.

"Oh, it's you!" His voice rose in relief. "So dark I didn't recognize who it was at first."

Hibbard didn't respond for a moment. He stood there, panting, waiting to regain his breath.

"Ran all the way," he wheezed.

"What's the matter? Is it Hank?"

"No. The kid's all right, I guess. We put him to bed when I got him home, and my wife doesn't think there's any concussion. She used to be a nurse, you know. So I decided to grab a sandwich before I drove in for the police. We had the door shut, so I guess that's why I didn't hear anything. They must have sneaked in and out of the yard again very quietly. My wife didn't hear them either."

"Who?"

"Our young friends. Guess they figured out where Hank lived and decided I might be going after them. Anyway, they weren't taking any chances. They slashed all my tires."

Hibbard's voice rose. "They could see there are no telephone wires around our place, and I suppose they thought if they fixed the car I couldn't do anything. But I'll show them!"

"Take it easy, now."

"I am taking it easy. I'm just here to borrow your car, that's all."

"You still intend to get the police?"

"What do you mean, still? After what just happened, nothing could stop me. I made sure everything was locked good and tight when I left, but even that's no guarantee. For all I know, they'll be around to burn the house down before the night is over."

Kerry shook his head. "I don't think so. I think if you just go back home and stay there quietly there won't be any more trouble. All they want now is to be left alone."

"Well what they want and what they're going to get are two different things. I'm going to round up every police officer, every trooper in this part of the state. We're going to put an end to this sort of thing—"

"No. You won't end it. Not that way."

"Look, I'm not here to argue with you. Give me your car-keys."

"Not until you listen to me, first."

"I listened to you long enough. I should have got tough the minute I saw those kids run over the cat." Hibbard wiped his forehead. "All right, what is it you wanted to say?"

Kerry walked over and stood next to the bookshelves.

"We were talking about psychopaths this afternoon. I told you that psychiatrists didn't understand them, but that I did. Sometimes it takes an anthropologist to know these things. In my time I've studied a great deal concerning the so-called 'gang-spirit' and the secret societies of many cultures. You find them in all regions, and there are certain similarities. For example, did you know that in some places, even the young women have their own groups? Lips says—"

"I'm not interested in a lecture."

"You will be. Lips says there are hundreds of such societies in Africa alone. The Bundu group, in Nigeria, wears special masks and costumes for their secret rituals. The male adventurer who dares to spy on them is disciplined, or even killed."

“Listen, a gang of crazy kids around a bonfire isn’t any secret lodge!”

“You noted the similarity yourself, this afternoon.”

“I said some kids ran in gangs, yes. But others don’t. What about the ‘loners,’ the ones who just get the urge to kill?”

“They don’t know what they are, that’s all. They haven’t recognized themselves. For that matter, I don’t think the gangs do, not consciously. They think they are just out for thrills. And I only pray that they go on that way, that they don’t realize what brings them together.”

“We know what brings them together. They’re all psycho.”

“And what is a psychopath?” Kerry’s voice was soft. “A psychotherapist couldn’t tell you, but an anthropologist can. A psychopath is a fiend.”

“What?”

“A fiend. A devil. A creature known in all religions, at all times, to all men. The spawn of a union between a demon and a mortal woman.” Kerry forced a smile. “Yes, I know how it sounds. But think a moment. Think of when all this started—this wave of sudden, unnatural juvenile crime, of psychopathic cruelty. Only a few years ago, wasn’t it? Just about the time when the babies born in the early years of the War started to enter their teens. Because that’s when it happened, during the War, when the men were away. And the women had nightmares—the kind of nightmares some women have had throughout the ages. The nightmare of the incubus, the carnal demon who visits them in sleep. It happened before in the history of our culture, during the Crusades. And then followed the rise of the witch-cults all over Europe—the witch-cults presided over and attended by the spawn of the night-fiends; the half-human offspring of a blasphemous union. Don’t you see how it all fits into the pattern? The unholy love of cruelty for its own sake, the strange, sudden maniacal urge to torture and destroy which comes in sleep, the hideous inability to respond to normal sentiment and normal feelings, the seemingly irrational way in which certain youngsters are irresistibly drawn together into groups who thrive on violence? As I said, I don’t think that even the gangs realize the truth about themselves yet—but if they ever do, you’ll see a wave of Satanism and Black Magic which will put the Middle Ages to shame. Even now, they gather about fires in the summer night, seeking the hilltop haunts—”

“You’re batty!” Hibbard grabbed Kerry by the shoulder and shook him roughly. “They’re just kids, that’s all. What they need is a damned good beating, the whole lot of them, and maybe a couple of years in reform school.”

Kerry shook him off. “Now you’re talking like the authorities—the truant officers and the police and the get-tough school of welfare workers. Don’t you see, that’s just the way they’ve tried to handle the problem, and it never works? Any more than psychotherapy can work? Because you’re dealing with something you’re no longer conditioned to believe in. You’re dealing with fiends. What we need is exorcism. I can’t let you go up there, tonight. The police will just start a riot, it will be murder—”

Hibbard hit him, then, and he went down. His head struck the edge of the fireplace and he lay silent, an ugly bruise rising along the side of his right temple. Hibbard stooped, felt his pulse, then gasped in relief. Quickly he explored the contents of Kerry’s jacket-pockets. His hands closed over the car-keys.

Then he rose, turned, and ran from the cottage.

Kerry came to with a start. There was a throbbing in his head. He grasped the mantel, pulled himself erect. The throbbing intensified. But it wasn’t all in his head; part of it pounded in rhythm from a distance. He recognized the sound, the roaring that came from the hills.

He rubbed his forehead, then walked slowly in the direction of the porch. The distant darkness was dissolved in a reddish glow, and he could see the flames rising now from the far hilltop.

Kerry felt in his pockets, then swore and started for the door. He hesitated in the doorway, then returned to the living room and stooped over his desk. His hand scrabbled in the right top drawer; closed over a small revolver. He slipped it into his jacket-pocket and headed for the door once again.

It was dark on the path, but the faint flicker of flames guided his descent. When he reached the bottom of the hill and made sure that his car was gone, he swore again, then squatted until he discerned the fresh tire-tracks and the direction in which they led. Hibbard had chosen to take the back road, the nearest approach to the highway which led to the county seat. The road was rough and it skirted directly behind the big hill on the Lautenshlager property, but it would be the fastest route. Kerry wondered if he'd reach the highway in time to head off the police. He hadn't been able to convince Hibbard, but he was willing to try again. The police weren't going to solve the situation. There'd just be more violence. If he only had time to work on the problem his way, to talk to those who still retained faith in the age-old remedy of exorcism, the casting-out of demons—

Kerry lengthened his stride, smiling wryly to himself. He couldn't blame Hibbard for his reaction. Most men were of the same mind today. Most civilized men—that is to say, the small minority of our western culture who go their way blindly, ignoring the other billion and a half who still know, as they have always known, that the forces of darkness exist and are potent. Potent, and able to spawn.

Perhaps it was just as well they didn't believe. He'd told Hibbard the truth—the only immediate hope lay in the fact that the changelings themselves weren't entirely aware of their own nature. The fiends didn't know they were fiends. Once they came to learn, and united—

He put the thought away as he worked around behind the hill where the fire flared. Kerry sought the shadows at the side of the road for concealment; the noise of racing motors and the sound of shouts muffled his passing.

Then he rounded a sharp turn and saw the car looming drunkenly in the ditch. Through narrowing eyes he recognized the vehicle as his own. Had there been an accident? He started forward, calling softly. “Hibbard—where are you?”

The figure emerged from the edge of darkness. “Kind of thought you’d be along.” Kerry had just time enough to wonder about the oddly altered voice; time enough for that and no more. Because then they were all around him, some of them holding and some of them striking, and he went down.

When he came to he was already on top of the hill; yes, he must be, because the big brush-fire was leaping and roaring right before him, and the figures were leaping and roaring around it.

Why it was like the old woodcuts, the ones showing the Sabbat and the Adoration of the Master. Only there was no Master in the center of the fire—just this burned and blackening figure, a charred dummy of some sort, thrust upright against a post. And the youngsters were dancing and capering, somebody was plucking the guts of a guitar, it was rock-and-roll, just a gang of kids having a good time. Some of them were drinking beer and a few had even started up their motorcycles to race in a circle about the flames.

Sure, they’d panicked and hit him, but they were only teenagers, he told himself, it had to be that way. And he’d explain, he’d tell them. He had to thrust the other thought from his mind, had to. Now they were pulling him into the circle and the big kid, the one with the beaver-tails dangling from his cap, was grinning at him.

“Man, he’s all shook up.”

“Must be hip. He was on his way to town.”

“If he got there, we’d really have a gasser.”

“Ungood.”

“What’ll it be?”

Kerry whirled, seeking the source of the voices. He stared at the circle of goatish, grinning faces in the firelight. A girl danced past, bop-fashion, her eyes wild.

"How about the sacrifice bit?"

And then they were all shouting. "The sacrifice bit, that's it! Yeah, Man!"

Sacrifice. Man. The Black Man of the Sabbat.

Kerry fought the association, he had to fight it, he couldn't believe that. And then they were pushing him closer to the fire, and he could see the blackened dummy.

When he recognized what was burning there he couldn't fight the knowledge any more, and it was too late to fight the hands which gripped him, held him, then thrust him forward into the flames.

A mighty shout went up and lie made one last effort to retain his faculties. If only he could hear what they were screaming—at least then he'd learn the final truth. Did they or did they not know what they really were?

But he fell forward, fainting, as the motorcycles began to race around the fire.

Their roaring drowned out every other sound, so even at the end, Kerry never heard the chanting. THE END

Two By Two

Lambert offered two people the priceless gift of salvation. But who needed it?

WHEN a man is as wealthy and important as Preston Lambert, you just don't walk right off the street into his private office.

But Mary and I did.

The moment we gave our names to the receptionist and said we had come in answer to the ad, she buzzed Lambert and sent us in.

"So you're the couple the agency selected," he said, standing up behind his big desk and holding out his hand. "Well, well, good to see you. Yes, indeed."

Since he was frankly looking us over, I decided to do a little inspecting myself.

Preston Lambert was about six feet tall and perhaps fifty-five years old. On the other hand, he might have been closer to sixty-five or even seventy; it's hard to tell, because the rich don't seem to age the way we do. Good food, plenty of rest, regular massage, and the best of medical treatment keeps them young—that is, if they're not slave-drivers or the dissipating type. Lambert did not appear to be either; he was relaxed, amiable, and clear-eyed.

And I wondered what his game was.

"Sit down," he urged, ushering Mary over to a big armchair. "And you, sir—make yourself comfortable. I want you both to feel right at home here. Right at home."

The nicer he was, the uneasier I felt. Mary and I have applied for jobs together before, and to people of means. Usually, the more money they have, the more they push you around; it's a regular Inquisition bit. Of course, we'd gone through that routine before we came to the office here—

Preston Lambert seemed aware of it, because he sat down again and began to shuffle through some papers very officially.

"Before we begin," he said, "I wonder if you realize just how many applicants there were for this particular opening?"

Mary and I looked at one another and then shrugged simultaneously.

"Well, no point in playing games. My staff in New York received over five hundred letters. And of those five hundred, more than two hundred couples went through preliminary examinations."

Mary couldn't conceal her surprise. "You mean to say that you gave the same tests we took to all those others? Why, that must have cost a fortune—"

"It did, I assure you. I had to take over the entire clinic at the hospital you visited. IQs and physical checkups took weeks to process. And of course, I had another group checking on the background and antecedents of all applicants."

"You put a private eye on us?" I was the surprised one, now.

"Er—well, as a matter of fact, yes. I find it best to be thorough."

"Those tests you gave were thorough enough," I told him. "In fact, some of them were downright embarrassing."

Preston Lambert chuckled. "Well, it's all over now. The reports have been reviewed, and I concur with the findings of my staff. The job is yours."

“Wait a minute,” I said. “Not so fast. Don’t we get a chance to do any investigating?”

He chuckled again. “Of course, Mr. Dexter.” He glanced at Mary. “I admire your husband’s attitude. He’s a realist. That’s what I was hoping, to find—a realist.”

Mary smiled, but did not answer. She was going to let me do the talking. That’s the way we usually operated. I did the talking and she made the final decisions. At least I’m enough of a realist to admit it.

“About this position,” I continued. “Your ad in the newspaper mentioned a handsome salary. And the employment agency gave us the same information—but no figure. Would you mind telling me just how much you propose to pay for our services?”

Lambert unwrapped an Upmann. He didn’t offer one to me; I assume he’d studied the reports and discovered I don’t smoke.

“Ah, yes,” he murmured. “The salary, eh? How about a thousand a month?” He lit the cigar. “Each?”

A thousand a month for each of us. Twenty-four thousand dollars a year. Plus, I assumed, room and board. It was fantastic—and I’m a realist.

“Just what are we expected to do for that kind of money?” I asked.

“Why, what my advertisement mentioned, I’m looking for a young couple to act as personal attendants on an extended pleasure-cruise. The woman must be able to cook and perform all the ordinary domestic duties the man should have some mechanical ability, a knowledge of farming and animal husbandry, and a reasonable educational background. Added to this, I insist on perfect physical health, plus intellectual and emotional stability. The actual duties of employment will be light, and—”

“You don’t have to quote the ad to me,” I told him. “I read the come-on. But there’s nothing about your requirements that justify a combined salary of twenty-four thousand a year.”

"I disagree." Lambert sifted the ash from his cigar. "And so would you, if you'd examined the reports as I have during the past weeks. Inevitably, there's a defect in one or both parties—out of all the couples examined, you alone seem to fill all the requirements. So—"

I stood up. "About this pleasure-cruise, now," I said. "I'm beginning to get an idea. You wouldn't by any chance be looking for a couple of guinea-pigs now, would you?"

"Guinea-pigs?"

I stared down at him. "You are a wealthy man, Mr. Lambert. A very wealthy man. Sometimes very wealthy men have very odd hobbies—and even odder ambitions. And it just occurs to me that possibly you have an idea of building some kind of space-rocket. Are we being selected as passengers for a trip to Mars?"

Lambert laughed and put down the cigar. "I thought you were a realist, Mr. Dexter! No, I assure you on my solemn oath, I've no intention of employing you as participants in any sort of space-flight. I'm a shipbuilder, sir, and when I plan a cruise it will be by water, right here on earth."

"Yachting party?" Mary asked.

"Not at all. An ocean liner is more to my fancy. Would you care to see it? We can drive down to the yard if you like—the vessel is already on the way. We can be there when it arrives."

"This is a boat your firm built?"

"That is correct."

"Who owns it?"

"I do." Lambert smiled. "It's my retirement project."

Mary looked at me, her eyebrows raised slightly.

"Come on," I said. "Let's take a look."

She nodded, so that was settled.

Lambert drove us out himself, waving the chauffeur back to his seat in the outer office. Trailing smoke from a fresh Upmann, he led us through the busy dockside tangle of the huge boatyard which had built so many vessels—and so much of his fortune.

"Here she is," he said. "What do you think of her?"

"Why I had no idea—this must have cost a couple of million—"

"Eleven, to be exact," Lambert answered, casually. "I bet the wad."

"But it's immense," Mary exclaimed, eyeing the outlines of the ship. It was indeed an ocean-going liner, and undoubtedly completed, yet certain modifications in the smokestacks seemed unusual, even to my landlubber's eye.

"Looks a bit odd, eh?" Lambert asked, noting my stare. "Well, it is, in a way. You see, we'll be using atomic power. And virtually everything on board is controlled by automation. One computer and a switchboard supervises the works, including navigation. That's why we'll be able to dispense with the usual crew."

"No crew? But who's going to serve the passengers, just Jim and myself?" Mary looked stricken.

"Passengers? I said nothing about passengers, did I? I will be your only concern."

"You're going on a pleasure-cruise in an atomic-powered ocean liner, all by yourself? Where are you heading for, anyway?"

Lambert shrugged. "Oh, no destination in particular. I thought we might float around for a bit."

"Mister, you're crazy!"

"Perhaps. Then again, maybe it's the world that's crazy. Did you ever stop to think about that for a moment, Dexter?" He inhaled slowly. "I managed to wangle atomic power for this vessel. Believe me, it wasn't easy. Not in an age where the miracle of nuclear fission is dedicated almost exclusively to weapons of wholesale destruction. Not in an age trembling on the brink of war and shuddering past the brink of hysteria—an age where the air is literally filled with death, tiny radioactive particles of death, and the very soil is polluted with poison.

"Yes, the world is crazy, Dexter. Crazy to do what it's doing, crazy not to flee from the consequences of its actions. And that's what I intend to do. I intend to flee, before it's too late. Flee, and survive."

I nodded. It was out in the open, now. Preston Lambert was one of the screwballs; one of the calamity-howlers, the escapists. The only difference was that he happened to have eleven million dollars and he could escape. He'd stock the powered ship with provisions and take off for the subtropics.

Mary sighed. She didn't bother to look at me, this time.

"Sorry, Mr. Lambert," she said. "It's no deal. We can't take a job and go on a trip like that."

"What's the matter, don't you believe me?" His voice took on a querulous quality. "Haven't you read the reports? The amount of fallout in the atmosphere is dangerous even now. Think of what the future will bring, even if war does not come. Why, even the rainfall is deadly—yes, the gentle rain from heaven. What safety is there in such a world for your children? And you do intend to have children some day, I'm sure. How can you face the prospect of bringing them into being in these lethal surroundings? There isn't much time left before the final reckoning—I have it on the highest authority—"

Mary shook her head. "Please, Mr. Lambert, it's no use. We can't go with you."

"But it may be your only chance, your salvation!" He turned to me and put his hand on my shoulder. "Look, you can understand, can't you? This is not merely an eccentric whim on my part. I know what I'm doing, believe me. And I chose you. I'm offering you an opportunity to escape. Do you really like the world the way it is, a world where even the rain is a rain of death? Do you—" I sighed. "Thank you, Mr. Lambert. But if you don't mind, Mary and I will just take a rain-check on this trip of yours."

And that was that.

I was pretty satisfied with myself when Mary and I said good-bye to Mr. Lambert. He may have been a multi-millionaire and an elder in his church, but he was obviously a fanatic and probably paranoid as well. We want no part of him and his little pleasure-cruise in an ocean liner. Funny, how the human mind functions when it strips a gear. He'd been very logical about his methods of selecting a couple to accompany him on the voyage, but completely illogical when it came to planning the size of his vessel. No rhyme or reason whatsoever, even though he'd apparently managed to conceal his project from the press and public.

Of course, he couldn't conceal matters forever. Less than a week later we read an account of the launching of the vessel. There was even an interview with Preston Lambert, in which he declared his intention of sailing as soon as he got the animals assembled and aboard.

"The animals!" Mary gasped, as she read the news-story. "Of course, why didn't we see it right away? Lambert wasn't just building a ship—he was building an ark!"

"They'll lock him up," I said.

"Perhaps. They would if he were building a boat in his back yard. On the other hand, when a man spends eleven million dollars, they generally don't touch him—at least, not as long as he has any money left."

Sometimes Mary is even more of a realist than I am.

Anyway, in the following weeks we read further accounts. Lambert was willing to talk freely about his unique arrangements for housing his specimens—he needed all the space, it seems, for stalls and for food storage, and there were cunningly-devised automatic-feeding systems. He was going to load the vessel and cast off as soon as possible.

"They'll stop him," I said. "Wait and see."

"Poor old man," Mary sighed. "In a way I'm sorry for him." Then she shuddered. "Then again, I'm not. Just think, he wanted us to be specimens, too."

"And I told him I'd take a rain-check," I muttered. "That is a hot one."

Yes, it was a hot one, all right.

And I kept watching the papers, waiting for news of just how and when the authorities would step in to stop him. Only the way it turned out, the authorities had other problems. Because there were a few sudden and unexpected explosions during the next couple of days—turned out somebody was testing a new cobalt bomb—and they were a lot more "hot" than any news about a religious fanatic.

All of us had other things to think about after the bombs went off.

And now I can't help but wonder about Preston Lambert, who loaded his ship and sailed—apparently with another young couple—during all the excitement.

I can't help but wonder about his little statement there at the end. "There isn't much time left before the final reckoning—I have it on the highest authority—"

The highest authority.

Was he told?

The way Noah was told?

Should I have taken that "rain-check" ?

I don't know the answers to those questions.

All I know is that it has been raining for a week, now. It has been raining for a week, steady, all over the world.

And it doesn't look as if the rain is ever going to stop. . . .

THE END

Terror In Cut-Throat Cove

When Bob Bloch pats on his fright-wig and goes to work on a terror-tale, his readers are seldom disappointed. We think this is one of his best. If you read it just before bed-time, we promise you won't sleep very well.

YOU won't find Cutthroat Cove on any map, because that is not its real name. And you can search a chart of the West Indies thoroughly without locating the island of Santa Rita.

I have changed the names for obvious reasons. If those reasons are not obvious at the moment, they will be by the time you finish this account.

My own name is Howard Lane, and I lived on Santa Rita for almost a year without ever hearing of Cutthroat Cove. That isn't too surprising, for it wasn't the lure of buccaneers and bullion that brought me here—in fact, you might say I left the United States just to get away from the atmosphere of piracy and plunder which dominates the modem commercial scene.

You might say it, but I did say it, night after night, in Rico's Bar. Eventually, of course, I'd stop talking and fall down. Nobody ever paid much attention to me—before, or after.

Except on the night when I met Don and Dena. The teddy-bear and the Christmas-tree angel.

I had a little bit too much of Rico's rum that evening, and I admit it. But even after I got to know them I still thought my first impression was right.

Teddy-bear. That was Don, standing at the bar beside me; blonde, burly, his short arms thick and bare and covered with that soft golden fuzz; his nose splayed and pink, and his eyes like big brown buttons. I watched him order a drink. American beer. American beer, in cans, at a dollar a throw! And he was tossing American money on the bar—a twenty. That was enough to make me look twice. We seldom get strangers or tourists in Santa Rita, and the infrequent visitors never have any money. So I watched the teddy-bear as he carried the two cans of beer over to a table in the corner. And that's when I saw her sitting across from him.

The Christmas-tree angel. Her dress was white and wispy, her hair was spun gold, her eyes china-blue. The complexion was peaches-and-cream, the peaches being slightly ripened by the sun. She laughed up at the teddy-bear as he approached, and I felt an unreasoning resentment.

Why is it always that way? Why does that kind of a girl always pick that kind of a man?

I'd asked myself that question a thousand times. I'd asked it ever since I'd come to Santa Rita a year ago. In fact, that's the real reason I had come; because once I'd picked just such a girl—only to find she picked that sort of man.

And I knew what he was, the moment I looked at him. He was the Muscle Beach Boy, the bushy-eyebrows type, the kind who shows up in all the cigarette ads with a tattoo on his hand. I made a little bet with myself about what would happen after he had poured out the beer. Sure enough, I won. He took hold of the empty beer-can in one ham-like hand and squeezed, crushing it flat.

That made her laugh again, and I knew why. Because she wasn't a Christmas-tree angel, after all. She was just the kind of a girl who fooled my kind of man into thinking that's what she was. So that we treated her that way; like a fragile, precious, enchanting ornament at the unattainable top of the tree of illusion. Until one of these crude animals came along to grab her with his furry paws, drink his fill, slake his lust, then squeeze her and toss her aside. But she liked that. Beer-cans are made to be crushed. Laughing beer-cans and tattooed teddy-bears.

Yes, I was drunk enough, I suppose, with my stupid similes and maudlin metaphors and the whole sickening mixture of cheap cynicism, sentimental self-pity, and raw rum.

Drunk enough so that when the teddy-bear returned to the bar and ordered another round, I pretended complete indifference. Even after he tapped me on the shoulder, I took my own ill-natured time before turning around.

"Care for a drink?" he asked.

I shrugged. "No, thank you."

"Come on, have a beer! Thought maybe you'd like to join us—we're strangers here, and we'd like to get acquainted."

That intrigued me. I knew the teddy-bear type, or thought I did. And while they're often full of false geniality at the bar, they never invite you to join them when they have a Christmas-tree angel in tow. Unless, of course, there's some ulterior motive involved.

Well, I had ulterior motives, too. American beer was a dollar a can—and I hadn't been able to lay a dollar bill down on the bar for a single drink in over eight months now.

I nodded. He held out a golden paw.

"My name's Don Hanson."

"Howard Lane."

"Pleased to meet you. Come on over, I'd like you to meet Dena, here. Dena, this is Howard Lane." He turned to me. "Dena Drake, my secretary."

I stared at her.

"It's really Dinah," she told me. "Like in the song. But Danny Kaye made a recording once, years ago, and he pronounced it Dena, and that's what my kid sister called me. So I guess I'm stuck with it. Everybody does a double-take when they hear it."

I nodded, but not in agreement. It wasn't her name that caused me to stare. It was Don Hanson's description of her as his secretary. Their relationship was so obvious I couldn't imagine anyone except a child coming up with such an uninspired lie. Besides, it wasn't necessary here. Santa Rita isn't Santa Monica—only a newcomer would feel it necessary to apologize for the obvious. Still, this Don Hanson was a newcomer. In fact, that's what he was talking about, now.

"Just got in before sundown," he was saying. "Little surprised to see how small this place is—not even a hotel, is there? Doesn't matter, really, because I can sleep right on the boat."

"You came in your own boat?"

"It's a yacht," Dena said. "We sailed all the way from Barbados."

Don chuckled. "Pay no attention to her. It isn't much of a yacht, and besides, the crew did all the sailing. We couldn't be bothered, could we, honey?"

I would have liked it if Dena had blushed. But she didn't blush; she squealed as Don did his crushing act with the beer-cans again.

Then he turned to me and grinned. "Lucky I ran into you this way," he said. "I was intending to look you up very soon."

"That's right," Dena chimed in. "We don't speak Spanish, either of us, but Roberto—that's the first mate of our crew—he does, and he talked to somebody here in town after we landed. That's how we found out you're the only white man on the whole island."

"Is that true?" Don asked. "Are you living down here all alone with these Negroes?"

"No," I said.

"But they told Roberto—"

"No," I repeated. "It is not true. There are very few pure-blooded Negroes on Santa Rita. The bulk of the population is of mixed blood; Mestizo and marino and even more complicated combinations of Negro, Carib, Spanish, Portuguese and French racial stocks. These people are for the most part simple and uneducated, but they have pride."

"Sure, I understand. I thank you for the tip. But you are the only white man."

"According to your interpretation of anthropology, yes."

"Dig him." Dena giggled. She gave me a melting sideways glance from beneath the long eyelashes—the kind of a glance such girls practice while sitting before a mirror and curling those eyelashes. "You'll pardon my curiosity, but just what are you doing way off here in this god-forsaken place?"

"I am drinking your employer's beer," I said, in a flat voice. "And for the past year I have been drinking rum. And this is not a godforsaken place. It is an exotic tropical paradise, complete with cockroaches, beetles, bedbugs, mosquitoes, flies, and Black Widow spiders. Only one form of vermin is unknown here—the tax-collector. His absence more than makes up for the presence of the other insect pests, and also explains my own."

"You a tax-dodger, is that it?" Dena's voice held genuine interest. "A gambler on the lam, maybe?"

I shrugged. "I'm afraid it's not quite that romantic. I happen to be a free-lance writer with an unpredictable income. Having no family ties, I decided to look around for a place where the cost of living is low. Here in Santa Rita I have rented a roomy old furnished house built in the days of Spanish occupation, acquired a devoted couple as servants, and supplied myself with ample food—for less than I'd spend in such mainland paradises as Downhill, Oklahoma or Flyspeck, Utah."

"But don't you ever get lonely?"

"I was lonely long before I came to Santa Rita," I told her. "You can be lonely in New York."

"Brother, don't I know it!" Her smile seemed a little more genuine, but I didn't have an opportunity to analyze it.

Don put his hand on my arm. “Free-lance writer, eh? How’s it going?”

“So-so. Some months good, some months not so good. It varies.”

“Well. Maybe you’d like to earn a few bucks. I could use a little help.”

“What doing?”

“Oh, sort of straightening things out with the local natives. You know these people, maybe you could smooth the way for me. I’d like to get a couple of permits, for one thing.”

“Fishing? You don’t need anything for that.”

“Not fishing, exactly. Diving.”

“He’s a marvelous skin-diver,” Dena said. “Absolutely fabulous.”

I nodded. “That won’t require any official permission, either.”

“Even if it’s a salvage job?”

“Salvage?”

“Treasure,” Dena said. “Why don’t you level with him, darling?”

“Why don’t you shut up?” Don scowled. He turned it into a grin for me. “All right, you might as well know. I’ve got a lead on something pretty big down here.”

“Wait a minute,” I said. “Did somebody sell you a map?”

I nodded. “And it describes how one of the galleons laden with bullion from the Inca mines was wrecked and sunk right here off the shoals of Santa Rita, in clear water. Is that it?” I gave him back his grin, with interest. “Why, that’s one of the stalest yarns in the Indies! Somebody’s always waiting to make a sucker out of the tourists with that gag. As far as I know, nobody has salvaged a Spanish treasure-ship anywhere in Caribbean waters for years.” Don shook his head. “Perhaps we’d better get a few things straight,” he said. “First of all, I know about the treasure-ship dodge. I’ve knocked around these parts for a couple of years, mostly diving, and doing some fishing for kicks. A man can really live down here.”

“The Hemingway bit,” I said.

"Do you know Papa?"

"I spit in his milk. I'm a Beatrix Potter fan, myself."

"You don't say," Don muttered. "Well, anyway, I'm not a sucker fresh out of Miami. And I've gotten together a pretty good crew of boys. Five of them, including this mate of mine, Roberto. It was his father who had the manuscript."

"Don went after him when the sharks got him," Dena said. "He told me about it. He pulled him out, but his legs were gone and—"

"Knock it off. Maybe I should have left you on the boat. Or back in Barbados." He gave us each our portion of that frown-and-grin routine again, then continued. "Well, the father died, and Roberto came to me with this manuscript. He'd found it in with the old man's effects.

Didn't know what it was—neither he nor the father could read English."

"You keep talking about a manuscript," I said. "Just what is it, really?"

"Actually, it's a sort of a journal."

"Written by an old Spanish prisoner on old Spanish parchment, and watermarked 1924, in Yonkers?"

"Nothing like that. And it isn't your treasure-ship yarn, either." He leaned across the table. "Look here. I'm no brain, but I wouldn't sail a crew of five all the way down here to this crummy little island unless I was pretty sure there was something in it for me. So you needn't do the needling bit. You want to take a look at it for yourself, come aboard tomorrow morning. Then you can decide if you want in or not."

I hesitated, thinking of the teddy-bear and the Christmas-tree angel, and how I'd come all this way just to avoid playing with toys again. I had resolved that.

On the other hand, I could use some extra money—for eating, and for drinking, too. Drinking helped me to forget about teddy-bears and angels.

So I stood up and I bowed politely, and I said, "Yes, it's a date," to the teddy-bear.

And all the while I couldn't take my eyes off the angel . . .

At ten o’clock the next morning I sat on the forward deck of The Rover, reading Isaih Horner, Hys Journal: Thyse Beeing A True Acct. Of The Voyage of The Black Star; 1711 Anno Domino.

Don had told the truth. It wasn’t a Spanish manuscript at all; it was written in the quaint and barbarous English of a semi-literate seaman in the first years of the eighteenth century. The crabbed handwriting was atrocious, the spelling and grammar worse, and no forger would have been inspired to disguise his bait with a long, rambling preliminary account of a sea-voyage.

I’ll make no attempt to reproduce the contents of the journal, but it was obviously genuine. Isaih Horner had been second mate of the Black Star during what he smugly described as a “trading voyage” to the Isthmus and the northern coast of Venezuela—but it took no great perception to realize that the principal business of the vessel was armed piracy. Indeed, Captain Barnaby Jakes, his commander, bears a name well-known to anyone who has ever followed the history of the Brotherhood of the Coast; and there were a number of references to meetings with other gentlemen familiar to students of buccaneer lore. Moreover, the Black Star did no “trading”; instead, it “confiscated” the property of several Spanish and Portuguese ships which it intercepted en route from the Isthmus.

But the big prize was the Santa Maria—not Columbus’ vessel, but a namesake, built well over a hundred years later in Spanish shipyards to convey the wealth of the New World to the coffers of His Most Christian Majesty.

The captain had learned that the Santa Maria was departing for Spain on its annual voyage, laden with a most unusual cargo of booty—the fruit of no less than three forays during which the conquistadores had penetrated far more deeply than ever before into the jungles south of Venezuela, in what is now known as the Amazon backwaters. A civilization had been ravished; not the Inca, but a valley people, worshipping a deity of their own and offering it sacrifice on an altar of beaten gold. The altar and the trappings of the temples constituted the sole "treasure"—but from rumored accounts, this was enough. There was, for example, a huge golden "chest" or "ark" which had been transported on the long march to the coast by no less than forty captured native slaves. Just why the gold had not been melted down into portable ingots on the spot was not made clear, except that the accounts mentioned a certain padre accompanying the expedition who insisted that the artifacts of pagan religion be kept intact. Indeed, there was some confusion as to whether or not he approved of removing the temple's contents at all; apparently there had been actual conflict with the commander of the expedition, and a number of men had died during the return journey to Spain.

But that was not important. What mattered was that the booty had been placed aboard the Santa Maria, in the deep hold designed for the conveyance of such cargoes, and the ship was sailing for Spanish waters, accompanied by a convoy of two lighter escort vessels, fully-armed for protection against piratical marauders.

All this had Isaih Homer's commander learned; and so, apparently, had a number of other freebooters whose spies were active in the ports.

Normally, Captain Barnaby Jakes would not have acted upon this knowledge. The Black Star, with its twelve small guns and its mongrel crew of forty, preyed on smaller game; there were few members of the Brotherhood, even those equipped with a fleet of larger vessels, who ever dared attack a full-sized galleon, let alone one accompanied by an armed and alert escort. For pirates, despite the romantic lore and legend accumulating about their exploits through the centuries, were not lions in courage. They could more aptly be compared to jackals, or at best, hyenas. They sought out the defenseless, the crippled ships, the wrecks, and by the eighteenth century the days of the great early commanders—Henry Morgan, L'Olonnais and their like—were past. The true "buccaneers" of the Indies had vanished; those who remained would seldom board an armed brigantine, let alone sack a city.

So Captain Barnaby Jakes had no intention of attempting to intercept the Santa Maria and her sister ships. Not until he heard of the storm.

A small sloop drifted up out of southern waters, and he rescued—and later slew—its two surviving crew-members. But not before he had their eye-witness accounts of the great tempest in which they saw the Santa Maria riding the waves alone, after one of her escort ships foundered and the other was sent careening off its course.

The Santa Maria, crippled and alone, would have to put in at the nearest port now. And that would be the island of Santa Rita. If she could be caught in open waters—

The Black Star bore south for Santa Rita.

Isaih Horner, writing in his Journal, spoke piously enough of "the duties of a subject of Hys Mafestie" to harass the Papish Enemy and take legitimate spoils. But it was an expedition of piracy, impure and simple, and it might have succeeded, for they bore down on the Santa Maria just outside Santa Rita harbor.

The only trouble was, another "subject of Hys Mafestie" had found her first.

Closing in on her, cutting across her bows as she wallowed towards the safety of the shore, was a vessel which both Captain Jakes and mate Isaih Horner recognized immediately as the pride of one Ned Thatch, alias Edward Teach, alias Blackbeard. Because of a strict punctilio observed among the Brotherhood—and because Blackbeard's ship was easily twice the size and carried three times the guns of the little Black Star, there was nothing to do but stand by and watch the battle.

The Santa Maria had lost a mast in the storm, and its rudder did not function properly. Apparently most of its guns were out of commission, too, for while it fired defensive salvos as it lumbered along, there was not enough threat in its volleys to prevent Blackbeard from heading her off from the harbor entrance. The big galleon was forced to hug the shore and make for another opening along the coast of the island. Blackbeard followed, closing in without firing. That was ever his way—to hold his fire until almost alongside, and then let a direct volley rake the hull and then the decks.

Not until the Santa Maria had almost gained the shelter of the cove at the far side of the island did this opportunity occur. Blackbeard closed in quickly, then stood about for a direct broadside. It came, with a roar. The great galleon rocked and shuddered.

The gunners reloaded for a second salvo, even more shattering than the first. The Santa Maria, riding low in the water, attempted to turn. A foremast toppled in a shroud of smoke. Now was the time to close in for the kill—grappling irons were ready, the boarding-pikes mustered. If enough shots had penetrated the vitals of the ship, it would sink within five or six hours; but a boarding-party could secure surrender and transfer the treasure long before then. Blackbeard, presumably, was ready to lead the attack; as was his usual custom, he'd be lighting the candles he'd twisted into his beard, and carrying the pots of brimstone he hurled before boarding the enemy's deck. One more broadside, now—

It came. And the Santa Maria rolled with the blast, then careened tipsily to one side.

According to eyewitness Isaih Horner, watching from the deck of the Black Star at a distance of less than a mile away, the shots were directed at the top-deck of the galleon. But it was as though the entire discharge of thirty ship's cannons had simultaneously penetrated the vessel below the waterline, as if something had ripped the keel out of the Spanish ship.

For with a roaring and a roiling, with a great tidal tremor, the Santa Maria sank like a plummet before his very eyes. The water shot up from the opened hatchways, "lyke a verritable fountin" and Blackbeard, instead of boarding, hastily sheered off to avoid being caught in the almost instantaneous vortex of a whirlpool set up by the downward plunge of the great galleon. Within the space of two minutes the Santa Maria was gone. It had sunk into the waters of Cutthroat Cove.

The Journal did not end here. It told of how Blackbeard and Captain Barnaby Jakes made common ground in a salvage attempt, but were unable to send men down into the deep water to reach the vessel. There were several survivors whose accounts were reported and paraphrased—none of them could explain why the ship had so suddenly and inexplicably perished, except in terms of sailors’ superstitions. It had been a “black voyage” and there was a “curse” upon the ship; they should not have carried the treasures of a “heathen temple.” Isaih Horner had small patience with these notions—neither did Blackbeard or Captain Jakes. Being somewhat short of rations, and even more short of temper after the loss of such a prize, they merely slit the throats of the Spanish seamen and sent them down to follow their fellows.

It was impossible to land at Santa Rita—the Spanish garrison would undoubtedly be sending out vessels of its own against the intruders—so Blackbeard and the Black Star went their separate ways.

Isaih Homer’s Journal ended abruptly, a few pages later. He’d put in at Kingston, Jamaica, and was thinking of giving up “the life of a mariner.”

“And that’s just what he did,” Don told me, as I laid the manuscript down on top of the oiled pouch in which it had been preserved. “I guess he turned to robbery on land. Anyway, when I tried to trace down what had become of him, I found out that an Isaih Horner was hanged for purse-snatching in the Government Docks in 1712.”

“Then you checked on all this?” I asked.

“Of course I did. I told you I hadn’t come down here on a wild goose chase. Found out everything I could. About the Santa Maria, the storm, the sinking. It’s in the records.”

“What about the treasure?”

“There isn’t much. But it stands to reason that it existed. They never sent a galleon back to Spain with an escort unless it was loaded. Besides, this story of Horner’s impressed me a lot more because it spoke about an altar and temple trappings instead of the usual guff—you know, gold bullion, chests of jewels, stuff like that. There wasn't any such thing anyway, except during the early days when the Spaniards went after the Aztecs and the Inca tribes."

"But if it's in the records, then why didn't others try salvaging the ship?"

"They did. Trouble is, it's in fairly deep water—I'd say somewhere between two hundred and three hundred feet. And up until a dozen years ago, it was impossible to dive that far safety, or to do any work at such a depth. Now we have the technique and the equipment. And we have the details we need. Five hundred yards offshore, just east of the Cove entrance."

"How would you lift up an altar, or a heavy chest?"

"We'd have to go back for a big rig. What I want to do now is locate the wreck. That's a job in itself—have you any idea what happens to a boat that has been under water for almost two hundred and fifty years? Just finding its topmasts above the silt is hard enough to do." Don shrugged. "But that's no concern of yours. What I want is a little help from you in handling the local authorities. Explain what we're here for, that we're a research expedition, interested in salvaging historical relics. You don't need to mention the gold."

"I see."

Don eyed me. "Well, why should you? It isn't their property, is it? The laws of salvage—"

"According to the laws of salvage, you'd need a government permit to start work; not from here but from the mainland."

"All right, so I didn't make arrangements. Why can't you go to the mayor or whatever the head man calls himself and just get his okay? You can handle him. And I'm willing to spend a few bucks."

"How much?"

"How much do you think it will take?"

“Well, a hundred dollars is a fortune down here.”

“That’s pretty reasonable.”

He nodded. “I’ll go another couple of hundred for you, if you can sew it up. What we want is permission to dive over at the Cove, without any interference from the natives. Nobody should be allowed to hang around. Get it?”

Got it!”

“How long do you think it’ll take to line up the deal?”

“I can probably see Jose Robales this morning. He’s the mayor of Santa Rita; the inland villages have jefes of their own, but they don’t count. I should have word for you before the day is over.”

“Make it in writing.”

“Will do.” I held out my hand. “He’ll expect payment in advance.”

“Right.” Don reached into his jacket, pulled out his wallet. He extracted three one-hundred-dollar bills quite casually.

I was equally casual, an hour later, when I flipped one of the bills to Jose Robales in his little office near the waterfront. He signed the permit with a flourish.

“Remember,” he told me, “I take your word for it that these people will not create problems here. You are to observe them as my representative and see that the crew keeps away from the village at the Cove.”

“I understand. I’ll keep an eye on them, I promise.”

“That is good. Then there will be no trouble, no?”

“There will be no trouble, no,” I echoed.

But I was wrong . . .

The trouble came almost ten days later, when Don finally located the ship.

He’d moved to the area outside the Cove immediately, of course, and anchored in fifty fathoms, five hundred yards out. Roberto and Juan Perez—another crew-member—assisted him in the actual diving operations, while the other three attended to arrangements topside. They put down a heavy shot-line, with handholds, and it hit bottom at two hundred and sixty feet. Nobody got down that far until the third day; it takes time to get accustomed to such depths. And even when they managed to reach the ocean floor, that didn't locate the vessel for them. As Don explained, the ship itself would be covered with silt and almost undetectable. The shifting of the sands, the alteration of the shoreline itself through the long years; these factors added to the problem. It would take time and patience.

I came out every day; I beached a rowboat on the shore of the Cove and it wasn't a long pull. I sat there and watched the operations. After they hit bottom, Don did most of the diving himself. Every second dive, he'd haul anchor and try a new location. By the time a week had passed they'd explored an area several hundred yards in circumference without finding a thing. But Don wasn't discouraged yet—just tired.

Dena was bored.

I'd sit with her on the deck of the yacht while Don was diving, and listen to her complain. She didn't care if Roberto and the others overheard her; actually, they were much too busy up forward to pay any attention to us.

"Pleasure trip!" she murmured. "He hauls me way off here to the middle of nowhere, and for what? To sit on my fanny out in the hot sun all day long while he's down there playing footsie with the fishes. Then at night he's tired, wants to turn in right away—not that there's anything else to do for excitement over on that crummy island of yours. A big nothing, that's all it is."

"Then why did you come along in the first place?"

Dena shrugged.

"Did he promise you a share of the treasure?"

"In a way." She scowled at me. "Not that it's any of your business."

"You in love with him?"

"That isn't any of your business, either."

“All right. I’m sorry.”

“You don’t have to be. I can take care of myself.”

“So I notice.”

“You notice a lot, don’t you?”

“It’s my business. I’m a writer, remember?”

“I’ll bet you are.” She lit a cigarette. “What would a writer want in a nowhere like this place?”

“Now you’re getting personal,” I told her. “But I am a writer. I’ve got books and stuff up at the house to prove it. Want to see them?”

“I’ve seen books already, thanks. Also etchings.”

“That isn’t what I had in mind.”

“Don’t kid me. I haven’t met a man since I was fifteen who had anything else in mind. They always want to show me something. When I came aboard Don’s boat back in Barbados, he was going to show me the portable bar.”

“Then why did you accept his invitation, if you knew the way it would turn out?”

“Maybe I wanted it to turn out that way.”

“Then you are in love with him.”

“Shut up!” She turned away, tossing her cigarette over the side. It arced down and hissed into the waves. “All right, what’s the sense of putting on an act? When I was eighteen I was singing with a band. I had a contract with MCA and a chance to do a TV show, just a summer replacement deal on sustaining, but they told me it could build into something big if I got a few breaks. That was seven years ago, and I’m still waiting for the breaks. I haven’t been with MCA for a long time, and I haven’t done any television, either. Six months ago I got a chance to play a night-spot in Havana. It wasn’t a very good one, but the one in Port-au-Prince was worse, and the one in Trinidad was just plain lousy. I ended up in Barbados without a job, and without a dime. Then Don Hanson came along with his boat. I didn’t care what kind of a guy he was or what kind of a boat he had. I wanted out.

So, as the sun sinks in the west, we say farewell to beautiful Barbados. End of story."

"You don't really like him, do you?"

"I hate his guts. He's the kind of a guy who's always had plenty of money and is still greedy for more. He's the kind of a guy who always had plenty of muscles, but still has to use them to show off—and to push other people around. As far as he's concerned, I'm not even a person; just another convenience he wanted to take along on the trip, like his portable bar."

"Then why don't you—"

"What? Ditch him and come with you to your island paradise? Don't give me that, chum. You've got nothing to offer. But nothing." The blue eyes were level. "I didn't ask you for your sad story, but I'll bet I already know it. There was a girl in it, wasn't there? And another guy, who took her away, while you sat mooning around. I've met your kind before—the sensitive intellectual type, isn't it? Which is just another way of saying you don't have any guts. I told you I hated Don's guts, but at least he has some. Enough to go out after what he wants. He'd never ask me to pull a sneak on another man; he'd fight him for me. Would you fight Don? Not in a million years!"

I sighed. "You're right," I said. "And very honest."

"I shouldn't have said that," she told me. "If I was really honest, I'd admit I'm not worth fighting for. Not any more."

"Suppose I think differently. Suppose I'm willing to fight?"

"You couldn't win." She sighed again, and lighted another cigarette. "Guys like you can never win. This is a money-and-muscle world. Them as has, gits. Even if the prize is only a beat-up bleached blonde with a bad case of the whim-whams. Oh, let's forget it, shall we?"

I was going to tell her that I wouldn't forget it, that I preferred an angel who admitted truthfully to a little tarnish, and that maybe both of us were a bit too cynical and defeatist for our own good.

But I never got the opportunity.

Because suddenly there was a commotion up forward, and a babble of excited Spanish. Don was coming up—he was clinging to the shot-line twenty feet down, spending five minutes in stage decompression before being hauled aboard. His body was perfectly visible in the clear water; the weird fins, the goggles, the cylinder-assembly and regulator on his back all part of an eerie ensemble.

We waited patiently until he tugged three times, giving the signal for hauling up the line. Roberto and Juan hoisted him to the deck. He stood there, shivering slightly, while they unstrapped his equipment. Then he took off his goggles and grinned.

"I've found it," he said.

"No—are you sure?"

"Positive." He nodded, reaching for a towel. "And it's better than we could have hoped for. Went down on its side, right into a big rock crevice that protected the top-deck from silting. Part of the deck itself is still clear, and I could see what's left of the masts and forward cabin. We ought to be able to clear a path inside almost immediately—just chop a hole in the hull." He turned to Roberto. "But don't take my word for it! Here, I want you to go down and take a look for yourself, right now. And then Juan. The sooner all three of us have had a look at her and compared notes, the better. Got your stuff?"

Roberto nodded, then hurried below. By the time Don had towelled himself back to warmth, taken a shot of brandy and accepted a cigarette, Roberto was already lowering himself over the side.

We watched him disappear along the shot-line, going down into the water.

Dena was excited. "What's it look like?" she asked. "Can you really see anything down there?"

Don lifted his head impatiently. "Of course you can," he told her. "It gets quite dark about halfway, but once you actually hit the bottom there's a lot of reflected sunlight; it seems to penetrate the dark, transparent area above.

The light is bluish, but you can make out objects quite easily. I recognized the boat at once, even though it doesn't look much like a galleon any more."

"Everything's covered with slime, eh?" I asked.

"Slime? Whatever gave you that idea?" Don stared at me. "Trouble with you writers—you get everything out of books. Make a few dives yourself and you'd find out differently. There's no slime. The wood is just about eaten away and the metal structure is just a skeleton. Lots of little marine animals covering it. And fish everywhere—millions of 'em. You know, I may even have guessed wrong about the hull; maybe there's only the iron hasps and what I thought was wood was just a solid mass of fish. They like to swarm where there's some protection. Roberto should be able to tell us more when he comes back."

"It takes a long time to make a dive, doesn't it?"

"Going down is easy, if you're carrying a shot like he is. But coming back is slow work. You have to make at least three stops for decompression, to avoid the bends." There was a waterproof watch strapped to Don's wrist. He parted the golden fuzz and glanced at it. "I'd say he's due up again in about fifteen minutes. Should just be at the first stage of decompression now, about fifty feet under." He went over to the rail where the rest of the crew was gathered. "See anything yet?" he asked.

"No," Juan told him.

"Well, he ought to give the first signal soon."

We watched the rope, but it remained taut.

"Fifteen minutes," Don muttered to himself.

But it wasn't fifteen minutes. It was less than one minute later that Juan shouted, "Here he come!" and he wasn't pointing along the shot-line either, but far offside, beyond the rail.

"You're crazy!" Don grunted. "That's some damn fish, surfacing."

"No—is Roberto!" Juan said.

I stared. What broke water certainly wasn't a fish, for fish lack arms and legs, and they do not wear apparatus on their backs.

"Madre de Dios!" Juan cried. "Is Roberto!"

It was Roberto, all right, but I'd never have recognized him floating there in the water, his body swollen and distorted grotesquely by the change in pressure. Nor was that the worst of it.

Roberto's body had come up from the wreck below. But it no longer had a head . . .

"Of course it wasn't a shark," Don said. "No shark could bite like that. Besides, the way it was sheared off—"

He kept his voice low, even though Dena had gone below to her bunk.

"How about a squid?" I asked. "I've read about the way the big ones hole up in wrecks down there."

"You've read!" He gave me a pitying look. "Maybe you'd better read a little more. A squid isn't the answer, either. There isn't any kind of marine creature that could take a man's head off clean at the shoulders. And that includes whales, in case you also happen to have read Moby Dick." Don glanced at the body lying on the deck, covered with a tarpaulin. "No, the answer's not a fish or an animal, either. Roberto must have left the line and gone off to explore the wreck. And my guess about the fish is probably right. There is no solid hull left, only a framework. When Roberto reached the wreck, the fish swam off. My guess is that he tried to enter what's left of the ship, swimming between the ribs. And then—"

He drew a finger across his throat. It wasn't a pleasant gesture, but it was extremely graphic.

"But how could that do it?" I persisted. "I don't pretend to know the way those old boats were put together, but if they used iron, surely it was in big pieces. There wouldn't be any razor edges to worry about."

Don shrugged. "Do you know what happens to metal after it's been under water for a few hundred years? It wears down, eventually just crumbles away. Gold wouldn’t, but old iron—”

“Then how could it be so sharp, and how would it hold up to slice a man’s head from his shoulders just because he swam against it?”

“I don’t know. But we’ll find out tomorrow. Juan and I will go down.”

He was only partially correct.

They buried Roberto at sunset, and I didn’t stick around after the simple ceremony. That’s just as well, because I heard about it the next morning.

If the sharks hadn’t taken Roberto’s head, they got their consolation-prize. Even though the body had been carefully wrapped and weighted down with shot, they must have found him, because they had been swimming around the yacht all night, their long cold bodies gleaming as they surfaced and snapped their teeth in the moonlight. It hadn’t been a pleasant evening.

I could tell that when I looked at Dena’s face the next day, and the crew’s reaction was even more apparent.

As for Don, he was agitated only by anger.

“They’re grumbling,” he murmured, as he led me down into the cabin, out of earshot of those on deck. “Want me to turn back, chuck the whole thing. I don’t know who started it, but then all these Negroes are like children. Giving me a lot of jazz about curses and hoodoos.” He sighed. “But that’s not the worst of it. Juan won’t dive any more. He absolutely refuses to go down.”

“So what are you going to do?”

“Do? I can turn back, the way they want me to, and come here again with a fresh crew. But that’s a waste of time and money. Dammit, I found the wreck! A few more trips down and I’ll have all the data I need on what it’ll take to bring up the treasure.”

“If it’s really there.”

“That’s just the point—I intend to find out. This is no time to stop.”

“You can still dive, yourself.”

“Yes, but it isn’t a good idea to do it alone, at that depth, unless there’s someone else standing by in case of emergencies. Not that there’ll be any; now that I know what to expect, I won’t get caught the way Roberto was. Still, I need someone to rely on.”

“Have you tried offering Juan more money?”

“Certainly! I told him I’d pay him Roberto’s wages in addition to his own. But he’s scared spitless.”

Dena clambered down the ladder. “So what’s the story?” she asked, listlessly. “We leaving Nature’s wonderland?”

“Looks as though we’ll have to,” Don told her. “Unless—” He paused, eyeing me. “Unless you could help out.”

“Me?”

“Why not? You could learn to dive. I could teach you in three days. Nothing to it, with a regulator, and we’ve got all of Roberto’s equipment. I’d make it worth your while—”

“No thanks,” I said. “Don’t mention money. I’ve got a poor head for figures, but at least it’s still on my shoulders. Which is more than you can say for Roberto’s.”

“I’d cut you in on the salvage,” Don said. “We’d split on the gold. Think of it, a solid gold altar, and a golden chest so big it took half a dozen men to carry it.”

Dena smiled. “Never mind the sales-talk,” she said. “Can’t you see he just isn’t the outdoor type?”

I don’t know if it was that that did it, or the realization that unless I agreed she’d be sailing away. But all at once I heard myself saying, “Why not? At least I can give it a try.”

That shut her up in a hurry, and it made Don start talking. Within a matter of minutes it was all arranged. He’d abandon his project for the next few days and devote all his time to instructing me. We’d start inland, near the beach at the Cove, and then I’d get into deeper water. First with the shot-line and then alone, gradually learning how to handle myself in the depths.

And that's just the way it worked out.

There's no need to give a detailed account of what it's like to learn skin-diving. The sea holds a lot of surprises, but your own body holds still more. I'd never have believed I could undergo the amount of pressure I experienced in the increasing scope of my descents, or endure the cold. I learned how to accomplish the necessary decompression, how to walk and swim and handle my limbs under weird gravitational alterations. And I learned, still more importantly, that I was not afraid. For the first time I really understood the fascination of skin-diving as a hobby, or as the avocation or vocation of men like Clarke and Costeau.

Don was a good, if impatient instructor. And more than his grudging praise, I relished the reluctant admiration of Dena. Thus stimulated, I underwent a rapid apprenticeship.

By the morning of the fifth day, I was ready to stand by and handle the line while Don dived. The crew seemed to have settled down into a state of morose resignation once more, and there were no difficulties.

I watched Don adjust his helmet and fins and clamber over the side. Dena leaned over the rail at my elbow and we traced the trail of bubbles rising through the translucent water. Then we waited.

Almost an hour passed before Don reappeared on the line at the twenty-foot decompression stage. He stayed so long that I went down myself, gesturing to him in the water. He signalled for me to leave, with a wave of his hand. I came up again.

"Is he all right?" Dena asked.

"I guess so. But he's certainly in no hurry to come up."

Finally, though, he emerged. The fins, the tanks, the helmet came off. He took a towel, sank into a deck-chair, and his usually ruddy face was unnaturally pale in the mid-day sun.

"What's the matter?" I muttered.

"Nothing. Nitrogen narcosis."

I nodded. He'd explained it to me—the nitrogen intoxication which sometimes affects the central nervous system after one relies on the air-supply from the tanks during long dives to great depths. It brings on anaesthesia, hallucinations, and all sorts of odd reactions, but disappears when the diver decompresses.

"Took a long time to wear off," Don continued. "Hit me so suddenly I wasn't really aware of it. At first I thought the men were right about their squid, or whatever they think is down there in the wreck."

"You reached it?"

"Yes. And there is no hull, as I suspected; just masses of fish clustering almost solidly around the crevice where the ship settled. Inside there's bits of wood and metal still leaving a partial skeleton, but all the heavy stuff—the guns and the spars—is sunken into the sand. Over at one side there's a big bulge. I'd swear it's the altar and the chest we're looking for, but I never got to examine them.

"Because that's when I began to feel funny. The water seemed to be turning black. The first idea I had was about the squid, so I scuttled out of there. And when I turned around to take a look, the whole area seemed to be not only black, but boiling. Clouds of bubbles. Fish, of course, returning to the spot. And they'd churned up the silt. But at the time I would have sworn there was some big animal coming up from under the wreckage. Then, when I saw Roberto's head bobbing around in the center of the black stuff, I realized what was wrong with me. I was drunk as a coot. So I came back up on the rope. I was so woozy I almost forgot to let go of the weights."

"Did you find the place where Roberto had his accident?"

"No, I didn't. Maybe you can when you go down."

"You mean—?"

"Why not? No reason why you shouldn't get used to it. I won't tackle it again today, so it's your turn. Maybe you can get closer than I did. Just remember to watch out for the nitrogen when it hits you. Chances are it won't, though."

Dena shook her head. "He shouldn't risk it," she said. "After all, he's just learning, and it's over two hundred feet. You told me yourself it calls for an experienced diver—"

"Only one way to get experience, isn't there?" I said. "I'm ready."

And I was, the moment I heard the veiled concern in Dena's voice.

I lowered my mask over the side, dipping it in the water so that no mist would cloud the inner surface of the goggles. Juan strapped the cylinder blocks of the regulator to my back and looped the hose over my head as I fitted the rubber mask until it moulded tightly to my face. I gripped the mouthpiece between my lips as Juan hung ten pounds in weights to my belt. I adjusted my fins, picked up a spear, then went over the side, grasping the rope with my left hand as I lowered myself into the water.

It was cold. Gradually I felt my body adjusting to the temperature and the pressure, just as my eyes adjusted to the deeper gloom. Bubbles burst around me and fish swam past. My lungs ached. I straightened to a horizontal position so that intake and exhaust were equalized at the same pressure-level and the regulator would function properly. It was hard not to panic; to remember, in effect, that the demand regulator was doing my breathing for me, or at least supplying the air which my constricted lungs needed as I flailed my way down. The pressure grew stronger, my movements correspondingly slower. Here in the deeper darkness I began to feel drunk—nitrogen narcosis was not the cause, merely the gravitational change. My ears and sinuses ached, and I swallowed until the pain eased. A school of small fish glided by. I was tempted to abandon the shot-line and follow them. But no, the line was my guide to the treasure below. I went down, deeper into the darkness.

Not enough nitrogen had entered my bloodstream to produce any side-effects. All I had to worry about was the pressure. How far down was I? Close to two hundred feet, probably. It was hard to move, now; hard to hold the spear. I wanted to rest for a while, to float.

The water here was dark. Only the bubbles from the regulator retained any color—they were round and yellowish, like beads of amber strung endlessly upwards from here to the surface. So far to the surface up there. So cold down here.

And getting colder now.

Because I was descending again. Deeper and deeper. Darker and darker. Colder and colder. Down went McGinty—

Drunk. All right, so I was drunk. But that was good, because I couldn't feel the pain any more. My ears had stopped hurting. The cold didn't bother me, now. And it was easy to continue, to go all the way down. All the way down to where the treasure lay—the golden altar.

And then I saw the rock crevice, saw the great solid swarm of fish packed in a writhing mass and rising up like the dim drowned outline of a ghostly galleon. And I left the line and wriggled forward, moving like a fish myself. A swordfish, with a spear. They fled before me, these little ones. I was Neptune, scattering my subjects. Make way for the king! King of the Sea.

Drunken diver, rather. Or was it drunken driver? Could they arrest you for drunken diving? Fine you twenty clams?

I tried to clear my mind. Mustn't go on like that. Had to be careful, avoid running into whatever it was that sheared off poor Roberto's head. Funny way to die. Most men lost their heads over a woman—

And then I saw her.

I saw the woman.

She was standing perhaps fifty feet to my left, away from the crevice and the wreck. It was the glint of light that first caught my eye; a reflection brighter than anything else here in the murky dimness. I thought it might be the sunlight glinting from the scales of a large fish, and I turned my head, and I saw.

Saw the black hair floating free in a mane that masked the face. Saw the sudden movement of her body as she turned and waved the cutlass. The gleaming cutlass, razor-sharp—

Women do not walk the ocean floor brandishing cutlasses. I realized that, but my awareness was only partial. Because another part of me was whispering, now you know. Now you know what cut off Roberto's head.

And then she saw me, and the black mane whipped back, revealing her face. It was a blob of greenish-white gristle with four gaping holes; two black sockets, a jagged nasal septum, and a grinning maw that parted now as a tiny fish wriggled out.

And it wasn't the skull that frightened me, it wasn't the sight of a corpse walking here at the bottom of the sea. It was just the hideous, grotesque inconsequence of the little fish swimming out of the dead mouth.

That's what I was afraid of, and that's what I remembered as I pulled in panic for the shot-line. As I struggled to release the weights I dropped my spear and stared. The figure wavered off in the distance, disappearing into the crevice where the ship lay. And now the black bubbles were rising, cascading in clouds from the spot. Through the turbulence I could see the skull-face melting and blending, and I saw another face that could have been Roberto's, and yet others—brown, bearded, grimacing faces that formed out of bubbling blackness and disappeared in inky incoherence.

Then I was going up the line, not remembering to move slowly, but propelled by the panic, flailing forward in frantic fear.

At the fifty-foot level I forced myself to stop and wait. The water below was clear and no inchoate ichor rose about me. I counted slowly, then climbed again. Twenty feet now—another five minutes and I'd be free. Free and safe. But what if I waited, and something came after me? What if it was following me, crawling along the line?

My lungs were bursting. My head was bursting. Not with pressure, but with fright. I couldn't wait any more, I couldn't stand it, I had to get out, I had to—

I kicked and released myself, straining upwards, striving for the sun. My head broke water and I could see the light, feel it all about me.

Then it dissolved into darkness and I went down again, down into the black bubbles . . .

It was Don who hauled me out. I learned it later, when I opened my eyes and found myself lying on the deck.

"Don't try to talk," Dena said.

I nodded. I had neither the strength nor the desire. It was a good twenty minutes and two shots of rum later before I was able to sit in a deck-chair and tell my story.

Don shook his head. "Nitrogen narcosis," he said. "You had it worse than I."

"But the corpse with the cutlass—Roberto's head—"

"Hallucinations."

"Yes, but how?" I thought about it for a moment. "Was it the manuscript that set me off? The part about the pirates? Did I subconsciously remember Mary Read and Anne Bonney and the other females who sailed in Blackbeard's day?"

"You must have," Don told me.

"But we both saw Roberto."

"We were both thinking about him, and what happened down there."

"Well, what did happen, do you suppose?"

Don sighed. "Perhaps we can find out tomorrow."

"You're not going down again?" Dena asked.

"Of course I am. One more trip and I should be able to locate that altar, and the chest. A few fish churning up the silt aren't going to scare me away." He grinned at me. "Tell you what. If you're so concerned about my welfare, I'll take Howard along tomorrow for a guardian. We'll both go down. What'dya say?"

What could I say, with Dena watching me? I nodded, reluctantly. I didn't really want to go down into that deeper darkness again.

And that night, when the dreams came, I was left with still less desire to return to the wreck.

The dreams came, and I lay tossing in my bed in the old house on the hillside above the winding waterfront of Santa Rita. I knew I was there, in my bed, but at the same time I was once again writhing in deep waters.

In my dreams I swam down to the wreckage, wriggled into the crevice where the black bubbles churned, and scraped at the sand with my spear until the point wedged against a solid object. It was the chest, of course, and I could detect the outline of the heavy lid set solid on the massive golden container. I sought to brush away the encrustation of corrosion and fungoid growth and gaze upon the gold beneath, but as I reached out the lid began to rise. It swung open slowly, and the blackness seeped out; the black bubbles burst like bloating blossoms. And they were not bubbles, but heads, and each head had a face, and each face had a mouth, and each mouth was gaping wide to greet me with a grotesque grimace. Yet these were only smoky bubbles, ghost-faces floating there in the water—the broad, flat faces of savages, the bearded faces of hidalgos and Spanish mariners, the seamed and pitted countenances of corsairs; yes, and here was Roberto again, and the woman. The dark cloud floated forth, and it was like a great black bush bearing heads for fruit; a strange undersea growth waving there in the dim depths, growing before my eyes. And now the bush put forth fresh branches, and the branches were long and waving; a writhing mass of titanic tentacles. Still the smoke poured out, and billowed forth, and now I perceived that there was a body beneath the nightmare nebulosity of faces and feelers; a black body that was like a squid, a sea-serpent, a reptilian monster spawned in the dawn of pre-history when Nature shaped strange simulacra from primeval slime. And beneath the seething, shifting smokiness of that amorphous and polymorphous presence there were real eyes—real eyes that glowed and glared and glinted at me. But they were more than eyes; they were mouths as well. Yes, they were mouths, for I could see the pupils gape and the lids rolled back like lips, and I knew that the eyes would devour me, they would ingest me in their hunger, incorporate my essence into the black being of that incredible body so that I too would take my place as one of the scores of shifting shapes in the smoke which emanated from it.

It was one and it was many, it was a composite creature of an incorruptible corruption; it was insanity incarnate.

I screamed and fled from it, but the faces and the feelers flowed forth to envelop me in ichorous essence, so that I drowned in the bubbling blackness of its being. I was consumed by it.

And then there was no fear, and no revulsion, for in its place came an overwhelming expansion of awareness, so that I became a part of it and I knew. My memory was its memory, my knowledge was its knowledge. And my hunger was its hunger—

Memory.

Deep in the jungle they built the temple and reared a golden altar of worship. And behind the golden altar was the great golden ark in which I rested and waited for the sacrifice. Nor did I wait too long, for they came frequently to attend me, bringing me the captives of their warfare, trussed on poles like pigs. And when there were no captives they brought me slaves, and when there were no slaves they brought me children, and when there were no children they brought me their choicest virgins. All I devoured in the darkness, incorporating far more than flesh—for I took from living things the continuity of their consciousness and added their awareness to mine. So that I grew and grew, eternally enlarging. For I was that which is known in all legends; the creature of darkness which devours the world. And if I were not fed, if my appetite were not appeased, I would flow forth to raven freely as I had—long aeons ago, or was it yesterday, or would it be tomorrow? But if they kept me sated, I was content to dwell in the temple. And when they built the ark I entered it willingly, nor did I try to leave, for it was pleasant to curl and coil and coalesce in the darkness and wait for them to bring me fresh fare. I remembered, now . . .

Knowledge.

Time is a rushing river that flows endlessly, yet never reaches the sea. And it is pleasant to drift upon the stream, drift drowsily and content. So that when I coiled compactly in the golden chest, I willed myself to satiated sleep. And it was then that they hammered down the lid, so that I could not escape; hammered it fast to hold me captive, and put an end to sacrifice. But I was still aware; I knew when the armored white strangers came and prevailed over my worshippers, and I endured as they sought to pry open the lid of the great chest, and then abandoned their vain efforts to talk of fire and of melting down. Finally there was talk of a golden gift to their ruler and in the end the chest was borne away to the ship, together with the altar of sacrifice. I did not stir or struggle, for I anticipated the nearing moment when the chest would be opened again, and I could feast. Feast on flesh, feast on spirit. Yes, I knew, now . . .

Hunger.

I drowsed in the darkness, and then the thunder came, and the shattering sound awakened me. I felt the shock and the shudder as the sinking ship gave way and I fell into the depths; the lid of the chest burst and I was free. Yet I did not come forth, for there was no reason. Not until the bodies drifted down, sinking slowly. Then I put forth a portion of myself, bubbling out from the lid and groping until I grasped the floating forms and drew them to me. I feasted until replete, then slept once more. There was no need to emerge from the chest until the opportunity came to feed again. Time means nothing, for I endure forever. I have but to wait. I neither dwindle nor grow; nothing grows except the hunger.

But the hunger is there, and lately I have stirred, heeding its pangs. The other day I took a man—it was curious, in that he came to me willingly and saw the chest with its lid ajar. He could not lift it, of course, because of the weight of the water, but he felt along the edges. Then I bubbled forth, grasping him and pulling him down, and he threshed mightily so that the lid fell, decapitating him. The body floated away, but I did not pursue. I do not have to pursue. I am aware of his awareness now, and with it I know that there are others of his kind in a ship, just above me. They will follow him down, for they are seeking the chest and the altar. Yes, they will come to me, and soon I shall feast again.

In the feasting there is great pleasure. To taste the memories, to savor the surge of every emotion, to know the nuances of all desires; there is the richness of rage, the pungency of passion, the fine, full flavor of frantic fear. I eat it all, and I digest it, and I retain it, and that is my ruling need. Most of all I want the woman, the golden woman. And I will engulf her with my eyes, and I will take her whiteness into my blackness, and drain her body of all delight—

“No!” I was screaming now, it was my own voice that was screaming, and it was my own sweat-drenched body that threshed in ultimate fright there upon the bed in the moonlight as I awoke.

It had been a nightmare. I knew that now, and yet I believed. No subconscious fantasies can evolve without stimulation, and my stimuli had come from beneath the sea. I believed.

But when the harsh sun rose, my certainty wavered. By the time I rowed out to the yacht, I was half-ashamed to even speak about the dream. And when I started to tell Dena and Don of what had shattered my sleep, I was more than apologetic.

“Sure you weren’t hitting the rum again?” Don asked.

“No, I didn’t touch a drop. But even if it was just a nightmare, I’m convinced there’s something behind it. That business of the lid coming down to decapitate Roberto—”

“You know yourself what it would weigh, and how slowly it would move in water at that depth.”

“Yes, but if something were holding him—”

“What could hold him? Your mysterious monster, made out of black bubbles? The one who lives inside the chest?”

“We saw the bubbles, remember?”

“Sure we did. And we saw the fish that made them, churning up the silt down there in the crevice.” Don wiped his forehead with a hairy arm. “Personally, I think you cooked up this yam because you’d like to chicken out of making a dive with me. You were pretty shook up yesterday, weren’t you? Sure you were.”

“Leave him alone,” Dena said. “The poor guy almost drowned. If he doesn’t want to go back down, I don’t blame him.”

“I’ll go,” I said. “Don’t worry about me.”

“Then come on,” Don snapped. “Juan has our gear laid out. The sooner we get started, the better.”

We stripped down to our trunks, and I followed the teddy-bear over to the rail in silence. Juan helped us into our equipment. And then it was time to lower ourselves along the shot-line, lower ourselves into the drowned domain of darkness and seek what waited there . . .

Don reached the bottom before me. Spear in hand, he jacknifed through the gloom in the direction of the crevice, then waved a flipper to urge me forward.

The fish did not swarm here today, and we could see the ribs of the skeleton-ship wavering weirdly in the water. And Don swam between them, then lowered himself to the sand as he groped forward, digging his spear into the bulky, buried outline of a shape set against the side of the rocks. Suddenly he flung up a flipper again, gesturing impatiently as I held back. The spear scraped over the encrustations and bubbles rose.

Then I saw the glint and hurried forward. He had found something—it was the altar!

There was no way of determining if it had fallen flatly or upended itself in the sand—in either case it was huge; far larger than I'd expected. And its surface, beneath the silt, was hammered, gleaming gold. I peered into Don's face, beneath the goggles, and read the exultation in his eyes.

We'd found what we were looking for.

The cost of rigging up a winch and windlass to raise it from the depths would be tremendous, but the reward was worth the effort. This was a prize surpassing the dreams of any treasure-seeker. And there was still the chest—

Again, it was Don who moved forward, deeper into the debris centered between the ribs of the hulk. He stooped and groped and probed, then rounded a rocky outcropping in the wall of the crevice and literally stumbled across the rectangular lid of the great chest sunken in the sands.

I was beginning to feel faint. Part of it was residual fear, of course, but most of it was sheer excitement at the realization of our discovery.

Whatever the cause, I was conscious of a growing giddiness, and I moved back, not wanting to stray too far away from the shot-line. Don waved at me, but I shook my head and continued to retreat. Only when I saw the line slanting before me did I halt and gaze off into the crevice.

Don had stooped over the imbedded outline of the lid and now he was digging at it with his spear. I remembered his own remarks about the weight of the water and knew his puny efforts would be futile; perhaps he was beginning to suffer from nitrogen narcosis too.

But no, his attempts were not useless! Because even as I watched, the lid was raising. Slowly, very slowly, the sand began to slant and shift beneath the spear. And now I could see an opening inch up, and there was a blackness and a bubbling. It was like the blackness and the bubbling I'd encountered yesterday, during my dive, but there were no fish about to churn the silt. Yet the lid continued to rise, and the darkness flowed forth.

The darkness flowed forth, just as it had in my dream.

And then Don was backing away, and he flailed the spear before him; flailed frantically at the faces that seethed and surged in shapeless shadows. And out of the faces emerged the feelers, coils of twisting tentacles that shrouded him in smoke. I thought of the legends of the huge djinn imprisoned by Solomon in tiny bottles, and I thought of how lambent gases are compressed in minute containers, and I thought of protoplasm that proliferates instantaneously in response to the blind, insensate forces which spawned life out of the insane vortex of chaos when the world began. But this was not djinn or gas or protoplasm; it was nightmare. Black nightmare, boiling out of a golden chest at the bottom of the sea, black nightmare that emerged now in sudden, shocking solidity; oozing obscenely aloft until it towered titanically amidst its twining tendrils.

And I saw the central coils part to reveal the eyes, the eyes which were like mouths—which were mouths, because they were swallowing Don. The coils whipped him aloft, forced him against the openings, and the lid-lips came down. I could see Don's legs threshing in a blur of bubbles; one of his flippers had come off.

I forced myself forward, spear in hand. But the chest was closing; the tentacles were forcing it down from within. The black, threshing mass disappeared, carrying the white mass of Don's body with it, and the lid clanged shut. Behind it floated a mass of bubbles, and a tangle of reddish skeins, and something small and curiously white. Don's foot, sheared off at the ankle by the closing lid—

I blacked out.

Half an hour later I found myself gasping and retching on the deck in the warm sunlight. I had no memory of how I came to the surface; apparently Juan had seen me ascend and came down to hold me through the decompression stages. He bent over me, and his brown face was almost as pale as Dena's.

I told them about Don.

In Dena's face I could read only doubt and incredulity, plus a strange compassion. But Juan nodded, slowly.

"We must leave this place," he said.

I shook my head. "But you can't leave now—there's the gold, it's really down there, and it's worth a fortune—"

"What is gold to a dead man?" he murmured. "We will go back to Barbados."

"Wait!" I begged. "We've got to think things over. Dena, you understand —"

"Yes." She turned to Juan. "We can't decide anything now. Can't you see he's exhausted? Look, let me take him ashore. Tomorrow we can decide what must be done. There's no sense talking any more. And no reason to get all excited over hallucinations."

"Hallucinations!" I sat up, shaking.

She put her hand on my shoulder. "Never mind. We'll discuss it later, when you're rested. Come on, I'll go in with you. Juan can have one of the men row us ashore."

I was silent. It took all my strength to get over the side and into the rowboat. When we landed, about a mile down from the Cove, Dena and the crew-man helped me walk up the steep, winding path which led to the old house I occupied on the hill. Looking down, I could see the yacht riding out there on the waters, silhouetted against the sunset.

The crew-man went back, but Dena stayed. My serving couple, Felipe and Alicia, prepared a meal for us. Then I sent them away. The food and a few drinks restored me. By the time darkness came I was ready to talk. And Dena was ready to listen.

We sat on the terrace outside the house. The sky was bright, and I had the feeling that, if I wished, I could reach out and grasp the moon and the stars. But I was content merely to sit there and watch the play of moonlight and starlight in Dena's golden hair.

Dena filled our glasses and sank back.

"All right," she said. "What really happened down there?"

I stared out at the water. "But I already told you."

"We're alone now. You aren't talking for Juan's benefit, or the crew's."

"I realize that."

She sipped her drink. "Can't you remember? Was it really all hallucination?"

I leaned forward. "Dena, none of it was hallucination. It happened just the way I told you. We found the treasure. And that creature down there. I dreamed about it, but it's real, it actually exists. Maybe it's not the only one, either—what about all these legends of sea-serpents and monsters? What happened to the crew of the Marie Celeste? I've read about such things on land, too; jungle villages, whole primitive civilizations which had been apparently destroyed instantaneously, without warning. Suppose there are life-forms we know nothing about, spawned when the earth was young and still surviving—or spawned even before the earth evolved? What about the beings that might have come here from the stars, the alien entities that never die? Those legends—"

"Legends!" Dena brushed the hair back from her forehead, frowning. "I'm interested in the truth."

"But I'm trying to explain—"

"You don't have to explain." She stared at me levelly. "I know what happened. You and Don went down to the wreck. You found the altar, perhaps you even found the chest. And they were gold, all right."

"Yes. I wasn't lying. Those objects would be worth a fortune if we raised them."

"Of course. You thought about that, didn't you? And you thought how wonderful it would be to have that fortune, keep it for yourself. So you got hold of Don's spear, and you killed him. And then you came back up with your crazy story about the monster, knowing it would frighten Juan and the others, keep them from going down to look. Now you'll wait until they go, get your own crew, and salvage the treasure.

That's the way it was, wasn't it? You killed Don."

"No."

She came closer, her voice low. "I understand. It wasn't just for the sake of the money, was it? You wanted me. You knew you'd have to get Don out of the way, first. And you remembered what I said, about not having the guts. So it's my fault, too. I'm not afraid to face the truth—I'm partly responsible."

"You don't know what you're saying."

"Yes, I do. I'm saying that I'm sorry, but it's happened now and I can live with it. We can both live with it. We will get the treasure together. You and I. And then, if you still want me—"

Then she was in my arms and I looked down at my tarnished angel, at the golden toy, mine now for the taking. And I smiled, and I pushed her away.

"It's too late. I don't want you. Now, or ever."

"I'm not good enough for you any more, is that it?" She stood up quickly. "Now that you know about the gold, you think you can keep it all for yourself and you won't need me because you can buy other women."

"I don't need you. And I don't need other women any more, either."

"Oh, yes you do! You need me all right! Because all I have to do is go to that precious mayor of yours here on the island and tell him who murdered Don."

"Go ahead," I said. "We'll see what happens when he tries to pit himself against a God. For it is a God, you know. Stronger and stranger than any entity of Earth."

Dena stepped back, still staring.

"You're crazy," she whispered. "That's it. You've gone crazy."

"Because I don't want you as a woman any more? Because I'm through with sentimental daydreams about teddy-bears and angels? Oh, no, Dena. I'm not crazy. I was crazy, perhaps, until I gazed on the ultimate realities. What I saw was not pretty, but its truth transcends terror. I've gazed on something far more powerful than the petty forces that rule our little lives and our little lusts. There is a power stronger than all earthly desire, a hunger greater than all earthly hunger. And when I saw it today, when I recognized it down there, I did the only thing a mortal may do. I bowed down and worshipped, do you hear, Dena? I remember now what happened after Don died. I sank to my knees on the ocean floor and I worshipped!" I rose and faced her. "And then I went over to the chest and I opened the lid. I was not afraid any longer, because I knew it was aware of my emotions. I could realize that. And I could release it without harm, because it understood I meant to serve it. Dena, I opened the lid!"

"I don't believe you, I don't believe anything you're saying—"

"They believe me." I gazed out at the moonlit waters of the Cove beyond.

She followed my stare.

"Don't you see what's happening?" I said, softly. "The yacht is moving. Juan raised the anchor. He believed what I told him. And he and the crew must have made up their minds. They aren't going to wait until tomorrow. They aren't waiting for us at all. They remember what happened to Roberto and to Don and they want to get away."

Dena gasped. "You're right—the yacht is moving! What can we do?"

"We can watch," I told her, calmly. "They want to get away. But they won't. They don't know what you know now—that I opened the lid. And its hunger is growing. Look!"

The moon was very bright over the water. And even at the distance of a mile we could see the bubbles rising, see the waves churning and boiling as something broke the surface just before the vessel. It was like a wave, like a waterspout, like a giant cuttlefish. And the tentacles tossed and twisted and twined about the prow, and the little yacht tilted, and then a black bulk emerged from the waters and swept across the deck. In the distance we could hear faint screams, and then Dena was screaming too as the boat careened over on its side and the huge black blob enveloped its white hull and bore it down, down—

The black bubbles disappeared, and there was only the soft and shimmering surface of the sea, glittering in the cold silver moonlight.

“The Marie Celeste,” I murmured. “And countless other ships. Countless other mortals in all climes, in all times. When the appetite waxes, it awakens. When it wanes, it subsides. But now the hunger grows again and it will come forth to feed. Not on the bodies alone, but on the being.

It will glut on soul-substance, feast on the emotions and the psyche. First a ship, then a village, then a town, perhaps an entire island. And what is comparable to that knowledge? Does that slimy gold under the water or the tarnished gold of your body hold any allure for one who realizes his true destiny at last? His destiny to serve a God?”

“Get away from me—I’ll go to Robales—”

I pinned her arms. “You will not go to Jose Robales. You will come with me. And I will summon it to the sacrifice.”

She screamed again, and I hit her with the heel of my hand across the back of the neck. It silenced her, but did not bruise her mouth or face. I knew it would be better if she was not marked. One does not bring spoiled fruit or withered flowers as an offering to the Gods.

I carried her down to the beach, then, in the moonlight. And I stripped her and staked her out upon the sand there at the water’s edge. She was silver and gold in the moonlight, and for a moment I coveted the treasure of her body's richness. But I had spoken truly; this was as nothing to the knowledge of my destiny. I had found myself at last—I was meant to serve. To serve, and to summon.

I sent my thoughts out across the water and deep down. It was not difficult, not since I had opened the chest and let the blackness therein meet and mingle with my being. For already I was a part of it and it was a part of me. And I knew this was what it was searching for—not the crew, but the golden woman.

Now it would come to slake all hunger and all thirst. And my own appetite would be appeased in the sacrificial act.

I did not have long to wait. The bubbles burst near the shore and then it flowed forth. Larger now—for as it feasts, it grows. The black blur became a black cloud, the black cloud became a black blot, the black blot became a black body; a thousand writhing arms to caress her nakedness, a thousand pulsing lips to drink, a thousand hungry mouths to savor and to swallow.

And the blackness flowed over her whiteness and it was like an exploding ecstasy in which I was the ravisher and the ravished, the eater and the eaten, the victor and the victim, the watcher and the watched, and it was better than seeing Don, it was better than seeing the crew, and I knew it would keep getting more wonderful each time, the sensation stronger still as we kept feeding and growing, feeding and growing.

Yes, we.

Because when it was finished, and the blackness melted back into the rolling waters, leaving the beach bare before it in the moonlight, I knew that we would go on together.

There had been no altar this time, but that did not matter. We know nothing, care nothing for altars of gold. The bed is not the bride, the plate is not the meal. Anywhere and anytime, all that is necessary is soul and substance for the sacrifice. So that we can swallow and grow, swallow and grow.

I made our plans.

Jose Robales had warned me to keep the crew away from the natives in the little village behind the Cove. They were only ignorant savages, after all—probably not much better than the jungle natives who had reared the golden altar to a God. But they lived—and that is enough to we who drink life.

So I would summon the God again, tomorrow, the next day, soon. And it would come in its strength and take nourishment. Perhaps the villagers would bow down to it and then raise an altar of their own. Perhaps not. In the end, it couldn't matter. Because in the end we would take them all.

And perchance Jose Robales might come to us. If not, in due season we would go to him.

Yes, in due season we would visit everyone on the island of Santa Rita. And our awareness would grow as we incorporated all the lives and all the learning and all the lusts. And our appetite would increase. And we would grow; grow in size, grow in power, grow in strength to satisfy our dark desires.

There need be no end. It is a small distance from island to island. And as we grow we can travel faster, seize more swiftly and surely. With us there is no time and no death—nothing to halt or to hinder.

The creature that swallows the world.

Why not?

From island to island, always growing. Then on to the mainland, to the swarming cities. It will feast and I will share, it will search and I will lead, it will rule and I will serve, for ever and ever.

And I have written it down now so that all may know the truth and decide whether to join in worship or serve us in another way—as subjects, sustenance for sacrifice.

The choice is yours, but make it swiftly. For I feel the urging of that black appetite, and soon we must go forth to ravage and raven across the world . . .

(Statement of Jose Robales, mayor.)

In the matter of the man Howard Lane, presently confined to await trial on the charge of murder, these facts are known.

The foregoing account was found, in the prisoner's own hand, upon the desk in the study of his home, by Felipe and Alicia Martino, his servants.

The statement was handed to me when I visited his house early this morning, together with Officer Valdez, seeking to question him concerning the sinking of the yacht Rover, which event had been reported to me by certain natives of the village near Cutthroat Cove.

Howard Lane being asleep, I first examined the above statement and then awakened him, formally charging him with the murder of Roberto Ingali, Donald Hanson, and the woman Dena Drake.

This he of course denied, but in such a manner as to permit of only one supposition—that this account he had written truly represents his own belief as to what occurred.

It is evident that the prisoner suffers from a severe mental derangement, and I shall make it a point to see that he undergoes a complete examination before formally bringing him to trial. At the moment one can only conclude that he performed the crimes while in a state of unbalance, and—although it is not easy to determine the method—arranged for the sinking of the yacht.

Unfortunately there are as yet no witnesses who can testify to actually seeing the vessel go down, but the sudden disappearance of a seaworthy boat anchored in calm waters, coupled with the discovery this morning of timbers and bits of wreckage washed ashore in the Cove, permits of no other conclusion. It was undoubtedly Hanson's boat.

The prisoner's statement seems obviously the work of a mind obsessed with guilt, and it is to be hoped that he will recover sufficiently to make a full and sensible confession.

Before wiring to summon a physician, I shall make it my business, as an official and as a former friend of Howard Lane, to visit him in the jail and urge that course upon him.

Indeed, I would have done so today, had it not been that the reports of the wreckage washed ashore occupied my time and attention until late this afternoon.

As it is now well into the evening, I will put off my interview until tomorrow morning.

It is to be admitted that one is shaken by this sad turn of events.

The spectacle of Howard Lane, my former friend and now my prisoner, in the grip of his delusions—shrieking threats and curses like an hysterical woman—disturbs one far more than I can indicate. Even now I can hear him moaning in his cell below.

And it is sorrowful indeed to reflect upon the sudden tragedy which has visited our peaceful island.

As I sit here and gaze out across the calm waters of which the prisoner has written so vividly, I cannot reconcile this scene with such a chaos of murder and violence. As for the statement itself, absurd as it may seem to one still in full possession of his reason, there is a certain powerful if irrational logic about it—

Wait. The prisoner below is not moaning. He is shouting again, in measured cadences. It is as though he were chanting.

And the waters of the bay—

The moonlight is clear and I can see the black bubbles rising. They are moving closer to the shore, moving swiftly. And now I hear the screaming from the waterfront. They see it, they see it coming out of the water. It is black and immense, and it is slithering forward, it is coming to feast just as he said it would, it is coming to devour the w——

Hungarian Rhapsody

We're not trying to fool you with the by-line, Wilson Kane. Actually, we couldn't, because Robert Bloch's fans are going to know he wrote this story. Wilson Kane is one of prolific Bob's pen names. We use it here because it could be confusing to have two Robert Blochs on the contents page. So it's just a device to get two top yarns by one great writer into the same issue. Sneaky, huh?

RIGHT after Labor Day the weather turned cold and all the summer cottage people went home. By the time ice began to form on Lost Lake there was nobody around but Solly Vincent.

Vincent was a big fat man who had bought a year-round house early that spring. He wore loud sport-shirts all summer long, and although nobody ever saw him hunting or fishing, he entertained a lot of city people every weekend at his place. The first thing he did when he bought the house was to put up a big sign on his property which read SONOVA BEACH. Folks passing by got quite a bang out of it.

But it wasn't until fall that he took to coming into town and getting acquainted. Then he started dropping into Doc's Bar one or two nights a week, playing cards with the regulars in the back room.

Even then, Vincent didn't exactly open up. He played good poker and he smoked good cigars, but he never said anything about himself. Once, when Specs Hennessey asked him a direct question, he told the gang that he came from Chicago, and that he was a retired business man. But he never mentioned what business he had retired from.

The only time he opened his mouth was to ask questions, and he didn't really do that until the evening Specs Hennessey brought out the gold coin and laid it on the table.

"Ever see anything like that before?" he asked the gang. Nobody said anything, but Vincent reached over and picked it up.

"German, isn't it?" he mumbled. "Who's the guy with the beard—the Kaiser?"

Specs Hennessey chuckled. "You're close," he said. "That's old Franz Joseph. He used to be boss of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, forty-fifty years ago. That's what they told me down at the bank."

"Where'd you get it, in a slot-machine?" Vincent wanted to know.

Specs shook his head. "It came in a bag, along with about a thousand others."

That's when Vincent really began to look interested. He picked up the coin again and turned it in his stubby fingers. "You gonna tell what happened?" he asked.

Specs didn't need any more encouragement. "Funniest damn thing," he said. "I was sitting in the office last Wednesday when this dame showed up and asked if I was the real-estate man and did I have any lake property for sale. So I said sure, the Schultz cottage over at Lost Lake. A mighty fine bargain, furnished and everything, for peanuts to settle the estate.

"I was all set to give her a real pitch but she said never mind that, could I show it to her? And I said, of course, how about tomorrow, and she said why not right now, tonight?

"So I drove her out and we went through the place and she said she'd take it, just like that. I should see the lawyer and get the papers ready and she'd come back Monday night and close the deal. Sure enough, she showed up, lugging this big bag of coins. I had to call Hank Felch over from the bank to find out what they were and if they were any good. Turns out they are, all right. Good as gold." Specs grinned. "That's how come I know about Franz Joseph." He took the coin from Vincent and put it back in his pocket. "Anyway, it looks like you're going to have a new neighbor out there. The Schultz place is only about a half-mile down the line from yours. And if I was you, I'd run over and borrow a cup of sugar."

Vincent blinked. "You figure she's loaded, huh?"

Specs shook his head. "Maybe she is, maybe she isn't. But the main thing is, she's stacked." He grinned again. "Name is Helene Esterhazy. Helene, with an e on the end. I saw it when she signed. Talks like one of them Hungarian refugees—figure that's what she is, too. A countess, maybe, some kind of nobility. Probably busted opt from behind the Iron Curtain and decided to hole up some place where the Commies couldn't find her. Of course, I'm only guessing, because she didn't have much to say for herself."

Vincent nodded. "How was she dressed?" he asked.

"Like a million bucks." Specs grinned at him. "What is the idea, you figuring on marrying for money or something? I tell you, one look at this dame and you'll forget all about dough. She talks something like this ZaZa Gabor. Looks something like her, too, only she has red hair. Boy, if I wasn't a married man, I'd—"

"When she say she was moving in?" Vincent interrupted.

"She didn't say. But I figure right away, in a day or so."

Vincent yawned and stood up.

"Hey, you're not quitting yet, are you? The game's young—"

"Tired," Vincent said. "Got to hit the sack."

And he went home, and he hit the sack, but not to sleep. He kept thinking about his new neighbor.

Actually, Vincent wasn't too pleased with the idea of having anyone for a neighbor, even if she turned out to be a beautiful red-headed refugee. For Vincent was something of a refugee himself, and he'd come up north to get away from people; everybody except the few special friends he invited up during summer weekends. Those people he could trust, because they were former business associates. But there was always the possibility of running into former business rivals—and he didn't want to see any of them. Not ever. Some of them might nurse grudges, and in Vincent's former business a grudge could lead to trouble.

That's why Vincent didn't sleep very well at night, and why he always kept a little souvenir of his old business right under the pillow. You never could tell.

Of course, this sounded legitimate enough; the dame probably was a Hungarian refugee, the way Specs Hennessey said. Still, the whole thing might be a very clever plant, a way of moving in on Vincent which wouldn't be suspected.

In any case, Vincent decided he'd keep his eye on the old Schultz cottage down the line and see what happened. So the next morning he went into town again and bought himself a very good pair of binoculars, and the day after that he used them when the moving van drove into the drive of the Schultz place half a mile away.

Most of the leaves had fallen from the trees and Vincent got a pretty clear view from his kitchen window. The moving van was a small one, and there was just the driver and a single helper, carrying in a bunch of boxes and crates. Vincent didn't see any furniture and that puzzled him until he remembered the Schultz cottage had been sold furnished. Still, he wondered about the boxes, which seemed to be quite heavy. Could the whole story be on the up-and-up and the boxes maybe filled with more gold coins? Vincent couldn't make up his mind. He kept waiting for the woman to drive in, but she didn't show, and after a while the men climbed into their van and left.

Vincent watched most of the afternoon and nothing happened. Then he fried himself a steak and ate it, looking out at the sunset over the lake. It was then that he noticed the light shining from the cottage window. She must have sneaked in while he was busy at the stove.

He got out his binoculars and adjusted them. Vincent was a big man, and he had a powerful grip, but what he saw nearly caused the binoculars to drop from his fingers.

The curtain was up in her bedroom, and the woman was lying on the bed. She was naked, except for a covering of gold coins.

Vincent steadied himself and propped both hands up on the sill as he squinted through the binoculars.

There was no mistake about it—he saw a naked woman, wallowing in a bed strewn with gold. The light reflected from the coins, it danced and dazzled across her bare body, it radiated redly from her long auburn hair. She was pale, wide-eyed, and voluptuously lovely, and her oval face with its high cheekbones and full lips seemed transformed into a mask of wanton ecstasy as she caressed her nakedness with handfuls of shimmering gold.

Then Vincent knew that it wasn't a plant, she wasn't a phoney. She was a genuine refugee, all right, but that wasn't important. What was important was the way the blood pounded in his temples, the way his throat tightened up until he almost choked as he stared at her, stared at all that long, lean loveliness and the white and the red and the gold.

He made himself put down the binoculars, then. He made himself pull the shade, and he made himself wait until the next morning even though he got no rest that night.

But bright and early he was up, shaving close with his electric razor, dressing in the double-breasted gab that hid his paunch, using the lotion left over from summer when he used to bring the tramps up from the city. And he put on his new tie and his big smile, and he walked very quickly over to the cottage and knocked on the door.

No answer.

He knocked a dozen times, but nothing happened. The shades were all down, and there wasn't a sound.

Of course, he could have forced the lock. If he'd thought she was a plant, he'd have done so in a moment, because he carried the souvenir in his coat-pocket, ready for action. And if he'd had any idea of just getting at the coins he would have forced the lock, too. That would be the ideal time, when she was away.

Only he wasn't worried about plants, and he didn't give a damn about the money. What he wanted was the woman. Helene Esterhazy. Classy name. Real class. A countess, maybe. A writhing redhead on a bed of golden coins —

Vincent went away after a while, but all day long he sat in the window and watched. Watched and waited. She'd probably gone into town to stock up on supplies. Maybe she visited the beauty parlor, too. But she ought to be back. She had to come back. And when she did—

This time he missed her because he finally had to go to the bathroom, along about twilight. But when he returned to his post and saw the light in the front room, he didn't hesitate. He made the half-mile walk in about five minutes, flat, and he was puffing a little. Then he forced himself to wait on the doorstep for a moment before knocking. Finally, his ham-fist rapped, and she opened the door.

She stood there, staring startled into the darkness, and the lamplight from behind shone through the filmy transparency of her long hostess-gown, then flamed through the long red hair that flowed loosely across her shoulders.

"Yes?" she murmured.

Vincent swallowed painfully. He couldn't help it. She looked like a hundred-a-night girl; hell, make it a thousand-a-night, make it a million. A million in gold coins, and her red hair like a veil. That was all he could think of, and he couldn’t remember the words he’d rehearsed, the line he’d so carefully built up in advance.

“My name’s Solly Vincent,” he heard himself saying. “I’m your neighbor, just down the lake a ways. Heard about you moving in and I thought I ought to, well, introduce myself.”

“So.”

She stared at him, not smiling, not moving, and he got a sick hunch that she knew just what he’d been thinking.

“Your name’s Esterhazy, isn’t it? Tell me you’re Hungarian, something like that. Well, I figured maybe you’re a stranger here, haven’t got settled yet, and—”

“I’m quite satisfied here.” Still she didn’t smile or move. Just stared like a statue; a cold, hard, damn beautiful statue.

“Glad to hear it. But I just meant, maybe you’d like to stop in at my place, sort of get acquainted. I got some of that Tokay wine and a big record-player, you know, classic stuff. I think I even have that piece, that Hungarian Rhapsody thing, and—”

Now what had he said?

Because all at once she was laughing. Laughing with her lips, with her throat, with her whole body, laughing with everything except those ice-green eyes.

Then she stopped and spoke, and her voice was ice-green, too. “No, thank you,” she said. “As I say, I am quite satisfied here. All I require is that I am not disturbed.”

“Well, maybe some other time—”

“Let me repeat myself. I do not wish to be disturbed. Now or at any time. Good evening, Mr.—” The door closed.

She didn’t even remember his name. The stuckup snob didn’t even remember his name. Unless she’d pretended to forget on purpose. Just like she slammed the door in his face, to put him down.

Well, nobody put Solly Vincent down. Not in the old days, and not now, either.

He walked back to his place and by the time he got there he was himself again. Not the damnfool square who'd come up to her doorstep like a brush salesman with his hat in his hand. And not the jerk who had looked at her through the binoculars like some kid with hot pants.

He was Solly Vincent, and she didn't have to remember his name if she didn't want to. He'd show her who he was. And damned soon.

In bed that night he figured everything out. Maybe he'd saved himself a lot of grief by not getting involved. Even if she was a real disheroo, she was nuttier'n a fruitcake. Crazy foreigner, rolling around in a pile of coins. All these Hunky types, these refugees, were nuts. God knows what might have happened if he'd gotten mixed up with her. He didn't need a woman, anyway. A guy could always have himself a woman, particularly if he had money.

Money. That was the important thing. She had money. He'd seen it. Probably those crates were full of dough. No wonder she was hiding out here; if the Commies knew about her haul, they'd be right on the spot. That's the way he figured it, that's the way Specs Hennessey the real-estate man had figured it.

So why not?

The whole plan came to him at once. Call a few contacts in the city—maybe Carney and Fromklin, they could fence thing, including gold coins. Why the setup was perfect! She was all alone, there was nobody else around for three miles, and when it was over there wouldn't be any questions. It would look like the Commies had showed up and knocked the joint over. Besides, he wanted to see the look on her face when he came busting in—

He could imagine it now.

He imagined it all the next day, when he called Carney and Fromkin and told them to come up about nine. "Got a little deal for you," he said. "Tell you when I see you."

And he was still imagining it when they arrived. So much so that both Fromkin and Carney noticed something was wrong.

"What's it all about?" Carney wanted to know.

He just laughed. "Hope you got good springs in your Caddy," he said. "You may be hauling quite a load back to town."

"Give," Fromkin urged.

"Don't ask any questions. I've got some loot to peddle."

"Where is it?"

"I'm calling for it now."

And that's all he would say. He told them to sit tight, wait there at the house until he came back. They could help themselves to drinks if they liked. He'd only be a half-hour or so.

Then he went out. He didn't tell them where he was going, and he deliberately circled around the house in case they peeked out. But he doubled back and headed for the cottage down the way. The light was shining in the bedroom window, and it was time for the wandering boy to come home.

Now he could really let himself go, imagining everything. The way she'd look when she answered the door, the way she'd look when he grabbed her gown and ripped it away, the way she'd look when—

But he was forgetting about the money. All right, might as well admit it. The hell with the money. He'd get that, too, yes, but the most important thing was the other. He'd show her who he was. She'd know, before she died. She'd know all right.

Vincent grinned. His grin broadened as he noticed the light in the bedroom flicker and expire. She was going to sleep now. She was going to sleep in her bed of gold. So much the better. Now he wouldn't even bother to knock. He'd merely force the door, force it very quietly, and surprise her.

As it turned out, he didn't even have to do that. Because the door was unlocked. He tiptoed in very softly, and there was moonlight shining in through the window to help him find his way, and now there was the thickness in the throat again but it didn't come from confusion. He knew just what he was doing, just what he was going to do. His throat was thick because he was excited, because he could imagine her lying in there, naked on the heap of coins.

Because he could see her.

He opened the bedroom door, and the shade was up now so that the moonlight fell upon the whiteness and the redness and the golden glinting, and it was even better than he'd imagined because it was real.

Then the ice-green eyes opened and for a moment they stared in the old way. Suddenly there was a change. The eyes were flame-green now, and she was smiling and holding out her arms. Nuts? Maybe so. Maybe making love to all that money warmed her up. It didn't matter. What mattered was her arms, and her hair like a red veil, and the warm mouth open and panting. What mattered was to know that the gold was here and she was here and he was going to have them both, first her and then the money. He tore at his clothes, and then he was panting and sinking down to tear at her. She writhed and wriggled and his hands slipped on the coins and then his nails sank into the dirt beneath.

The dirt beneath—

There was dirt in her bed. And he could feel it and he could smell it, for suddenly she was above and behind him, pressing him down so that his face was rubbing in the dirt, and she'd twisted his hands around behind his back. He heaved, but she was very strong, and her cold fingers were busy at his wrists, knotting something tightly. Too late, he tried to sit up, and then she hit him with something. Something cold and hard, something she'd taken from his own pocket; my own gun, he thought.

Then he must have passed out for a minute, because when he came to he could feel the blood trickling down the side of his face, and her tongue, licking it.

She had him propped up in the corner now, and she had tied his hands and legs to the bedpost, very tightly. He couldn't move. He knew because he tried, God how he tried. The earth-smell was everywhere in the room. It came from the bed, and it came from her, too. She was naked, and she was licking his face. And she was laughing.

"You came anyway, eh?" she whispered. "You had to come, is that it? Well, here you are. And here you shall stay. I will keep you for a pet. You are big and fat. You will last a long, long time."

Vincent tried to move his head away. She laughed again.

"It isn't what you planned, is it? I know why you came back. For the gold. The gold and the earth I brought with me to sleep upon, as I did in the old country. All day I sleep upon it, but at night I awake. And when I do, you shall be here. No one will ever find or disturb us. It is good that you are strong. It will take many nights before I finish."

Vincent found his voice. "No," he croaked. "I never believed—you must be kidding, you're a refugee—"

She laughed again. "Yes. I am a refugee. But not a political refugee." Then she retracted her tongue and Vincent saw her teeth. Her long white teeth, moving against the side of his neck in the moonlight. . . .

Back at the house Carney and Fromkin got ready to climb into the Cadillac.

"He's not showing up, that's for sure," Carney said. "We'll blow before there's any trouble. Whatever he had cooked up, the deal went sour. I knew it the minute I saw his face. He had a funny look, you know, like he'd flipped."

"Yeah," Fromkin agreed. "Something wrong with old Vincent, all right. I wonder what's biting him lately."

THE END

Red Moon RIsIng

Washington teas appalled when Moscow announced a scientific triumph that made Sputnik look like a child's toy. Our leaders had to make a quick decision—with a gun pointed at their heads.

I'LL never forget the day they launched the big one.

At precisely four o'clock I was sitting in my little unpadded cell here at Globe News, pounding out the usual daily stint for a Washington dateline column called The View from Washington's Monument.

At precisely one minute after four the bulletins started coming in over the wire up front.

My office is way down at the end of the corridor, but within three minutes the bedlam had reached a pitch where I couldn't work any longer. I got up and joined the crowd in the front layout.

From the noise and the milling around, you'd think they were doing the Christmas Party bit. Until you got a look at their faces.

I realized what had happened at once.

Somebody had pushed the panic button.

About the time I managed to squeeze my way clear of the corridor, McGregor climbed up on top of his desk and everybody shut up.

It was the sight of him there that did it. McGregor isn't the kind of a man who stands on desk, and we all knew it. The effect was as shocking as seeing Albert Schweitzer sitting in with Louis Armstrong at a Newport Jazz Festival.

Any tendency to murmur a comment about this was effectively stilled by a glimpse of McGregor's face. I've been with Globe for a good many years, and I'd never seen him so stunned—not even on the night that Truman clobbered Dewey.

Then he held up his hand and started to read.

Now it would be nice to pretend I have total recall, but the truth is that I can't give a single word of direct quotes. I was too stunned to remember; I could only react, as we all reacted.

But I got the message.

There was another satellite in the sky.

Another Sputnik had been launched.

And its estimated weight was in the neighborhood of fifty tons.

That's right. One hundred thousand pounds.

No official confirmation had been received yet, of course—but it wasn't necessary. Some eight million citizens had seen the satellite in orbit as it passed over Los Angeles and environs. Signals had already been picked up as it continued its progress.

It wasn't a gag, it wasn't a flying saucer, it wasn't a publicity stunt for Mike Todd's birthday.

The sword of Damocles was hanging over our head, and it weighed fifty tons.

Runners kept pushing through to McGregor with fresh bulletins, and somewhere along the line he stopped reading them and began calling out names. So-and-so to check the rival newsservices and the TV networks immediately; so-and-so to contact our sources on the Geophysical Year project, at once; so-and-so to the Pentagon, pronto; so-and-so to the White House, soonest.

I turned away. I didn’t expect to be called; when it came to questions of actual news, The View from Washington’s Monument was pretty dim.

That’s why I was startled when I heard my name blasted out. I got up to the desk in nothing flat, and McGregor gave me a glare which told me I should have made better time.

“Where’s Carling?” he snapped.

“I don’t know. It’s his day off, isn’t it? Have you tried—”

“Yes, we tried his apartment. And we tried the Mayflower Bar and that joint down on B Street, too. You’re a buddy of his. What else would he be doing on his day off?”

“Never mind. Go out and find him, fast.”

“Right. It’ll take me just five minutes to finish up on the column, and then—”

This wasn’t my day for finishing sentences. McGregor, like the true executive he was, disposed of my column in a few well-chosen words.

I went straight back to my cubicle and picked up my hat. and coat. In order to save time, I didn’t even stop to do what he’d suggested I do with my column.

There was no need to emphasize the importance of finding Carling. At a time like this, Globe News could use his services. Leonard Carling was Science Editor. He’d copped a Pulitzer for his series on the Los Alamos Project a few years ago. A yarn like this could easily win him another.

If I could find him.

Actually, I had a pretty fair idea of where he might be. There was a little spot around the corner from his place, run by a bartender who detested rock-n’-roll and put his own collection of records on the juke box. Sometimes, on his day off, Carling would squeeze into a back booth and listen to a stack—stuff like the old Raymond Scott Quintet numbers on the Brunswick label.

I managed to flag down a taxi on the street and gave the driver the address. Apparently he had not heard about the satellite yet, because he had nothing to say. This suited me. If I found Carling, he'd do plenty of talking. As a matter of fact, he already had.

On the face of it, our friendship was a very offbeat item. Carling wasn't just another wire-service reporter; he had quite an educational background, including the M. I. T. bit. As for me, I know just enough about science to change a washer—and even there I rely more on profanity than technological know-how. But somehow, we enjoyed each other's company. Maybe it was because both of us were divorced.

Carling thought so. I remember how he'd analyzed it one night. "It isn't so much that we're lonely," he said. "Each of us has our friends. But we lack sounding-boards. That's a wife's function, you know. To serve as a sounding-board for her lord and master. To listen to all his gripes, all the complaints, all the wild ideas and foolish theories. I used to talk to Lucy about the nucleonics projects twenty-four hours a day. Come to think of it, maybe that's why she divorced me. At least you're willing to listen."

I was. Maybe I couldn't dig the scientific terminology, but his opinions always interested me. Even lately, when he'd begun to get very downbeat about the Red satellites and our own failures.

"You haven't seen anything yet!" he'd predicted, in that we-are-gathered-here-to-pay-our-last-sorrowful-tribute voice of his, just the other night. "The next one is going to be the clincher."

I didn't ask him how he knew.

Leonard Carling, on the basis of his reputation, had entree to high official circles and even higher unofficial circles. Much of his information came from the latter; he couldn't write it for publication, but he got the word.

And now his prophecy had come true.

So I was quite lathered up when I walked into the little bar and spotted Carling's gray crew-cut rising over the top of the rear booth. The place was almost empty; the bartender stood down front talking to a couple of

Department of Agriculture stenographer types who were making faces at the juke box. The juke box didn't care; it went right on playing an old John Kirby number.

Leonard Carling looked up and smiled at me.

"Sit down," he said.

I shook my head. "Grab your socks," I told him. "McGregor wants you."

"Does he know where I am?"

"Of course not. But he sent me out to find you, and I guessed."

"So you couldn't locate me." He gestured. "Sit down and have an ale."

"No time. Wait'll you hear the news."

"About the satellite?" He shrugged. "The bulletin came over TV ten minutes ago. Fifty tons, I think they said."

I stared at him. "Well, aren't you going to do something about it?"

"I am doing something about it. I'm drinking ale. Care to join me?"

He signalled the bartender before I could object. I slumped into the seat opposite him when the bartender came and waited until he brought our order and went away again. John Kirby's outfit began to play Rose Room.

"I suppose McGregor wants me to check at top-level," he mused, pouring his ale carefully. "I imagine he'd like some interviews."

"Of course. So put on your coat and—"

"No, thanks. I brought in enough interviews when the earlier Sputniks were launched. Let him rewrite them. I guarantee the story will be the same."

He was using that funeral-oration voice of his, but somehow it sounded very appropriate. I listened.

"The first interview would be with the top brass, wouldn't it? You know what they'll tell me. The military geniuses who claimed they needed billions to keep us ahead of Russia in national defense will say this only proves they need more billions to keep us ahead. The big boys who went around bragging about how America is always first in the technology race will issue statements denying there ever was a technology race. The politicians who did their best to get rid of all the egghead scientists will loudly proclaim that we need is more egghead scientists. None of these people see a real Sputnik in the sky—all they see up there is a political football.”

“But the man in the street—” I began.

“As for the man in the street, he doesn’t see anything. When the first satellite was launched, there was plenty of publicity—but actually, the average citizen was more interested in whether or not the Braves would win the World Series. Of course, hi-s wife was more excited when the second Sputnik went up—because of the dog. The way it struck her, it was a moral victory for our side; we would never send a poor, helpless little puppy to its doom that way! Then the dog died, and the public forgot the whole thing.”

“They won’t forget this one,” I said. “There’s a hundred thousand pounds up there. They saw it with the naked eye on the West Coast, and it’ll be visible to the whole country on its orbital course. By tomorrow morning there’ll be hell to pay. And you’re still willing to sit here and make With the cheap cynicism.”

“I’m using only the most expensive cynicism. The most costly, shall we say?”

“Either you’re drunk or you’ve flipped,” I told him. “But if you don’t snap out of it, half the world will be drunk or flipping within twenty-four hours. This thing is big enough to hold a dozen men. Is it a manned satellite? Maybe it’s armed. Maybe it’ll be followed by rockets with warheads. Aren’t you interested in finding out?”

“Certainly. And in due time, Von Braun and Arthur C. Clarke will write articles on the subject.”

“Be serious, won’t you? I’m no scientist, but this thing scares hell out of me.”

“Yes.” He nodded slowly. “You’re scared. And, as you say, everybody will be frightened by tomorrow. So my going out and getting interviews won’t help the situation. Something more must be done.”

“Such as sitting here and drinking, I suppose?”

“Exactly. It so happens I’m here by appointment. In a little while I expect a visitor. If our meeting goes as I think it might, it may be that I shall really be able to help.”

“A visitor? Who?”

“I am not at liberty to say.”

“You mean you already contacted a guy who—”

“He contacted me. I decided, under the circumstances, it would be wisest not to meet at my apartment. Therefore, I selected the semi-privacy of this establishment.”

“Well, why didn’t you say so in the first place? Just clue me in a little so I can tell McGregor what you’re doing.”

“No. There must be no interference. When I’m certain of my facts, I’ll notify him. Until then, just say that you couldn’t find me.”

“Look, at least give me a hint. Why all the hush-hush? Did you locate a leak somewhere? Is this government stuff?”

He shook his head.

I lowered my voice. “All right, let me guess. You’re onto the Soviet angle, isn’t that it? Somebody’s willing to spill the inside story of how they did it. That must be it. Right?”

“Don’t ask any questions. Now, run along. I’ll see you tomorrow.”

“Tomorrow,” I echoed and went away. Wondering if there would be a tomorrow.

A nasty conviction was beginning to filter through to me. Talk about the propaganda value of the previous Sputniks—this was the real thing! One look at the Red moon in the sky tonight and the man in the street might very well become the man in the cellar, the man under the bedclothes, cowering and waiting for the first bomb to fall.

I thought about it as I drank my dinner down the street. Then, as the evening wore on, I thought about it some more.

Talk about the Christmas Party bit, or New Year's Eve! The streets were jammed and the bars were crowded. Everybody was talking, everybody was yelling, everybody was drinking. But there was one difference—nobody was laughing or even smiling.

They had heard the word.

The word, out of Chicago, when the Red moon came over and the panic-stricken motorists abandoned their cars in the middle of Outer Drive.

The word, out of a small town in Pennsylvania, where an obscure religious leader of a still more obscure sect saw the sphere in the sky as a period proclaiming the end of the world and—gathering his fanatical followers—set fire to the buildings of the entire community.

The word, out of Boston, of riots in Scollay Square.

The Soviet Government must have anticipated this reaction, counted on it when they launched their miniature moon.

Miniature, hell! It weighed fifty tons. What kind of initial thrust had been necessary to launch a satellite of this size? With that kind of power, they could speed nuclear warheads around the world and back again. Maybe they'd be doing just that, soon.

Maybe they were doing it, now.

The Sputnik was circling above the globe, but the rumors circled even more swiftly down in the streets, rising from the saliva-flecked launching-platforms of human lips.

"Jeez, did you hear the latest? Air Force spotted Red bombers comin' over Alaska . . ."

"Yeah, they hit Seattle. They must of, I-was listening to CBS news and it was supposed to be a roundup, they said for Seattle to come in, and then they right away switched back to New York . . ."

"I have it on good authority, I tell you! Everything west of the Mississippi has been blacked out. The President will issue an emergency proclamation any minute now . . ."

"Shut up about the damn thing and let's get ourselves a drink!"

"—and what I want to know is, why hasn't the President gone on the air with a statement? I tell you the whole thing is part of a conspiracy, we've sold out to save our necks, and—"

"What I'm gonna do is climb in the car and get the hell out of town, right now. There's hills over in West Virginia where they'll never find you . . ."

"Who cares how much it costs? A fat lot of good it's going to do to save your money now, George!"

"I'm scared."

"Why doesn't somebody do something?"

"Have another drink!"

"To hell with you!"

"To hell with everybody!"

And that's the way it went; on the streets, in the bars, up and down Pennsylvania and along Connecticut and halfway to Chevy Chase. It wasn't a mob-scene yet, even though the cops weren't in evidence and nobody was bothering to obey the traffic signals. The character who was thinking about West Virginia was a little more farsighted than his fellows; maybe by-tomorrow at this time there would be a wild exodus from this city and from every city, but tonight it was mainly a matter of restless wandering and hysterical wondering. And finally it all blended into a blur of I'm scared why doesn't somebody do something, have a drink and to hell with you, over and over and over again until I was scared and wanted somebody to do something and wanted a drink—and then I said to hell with it.

And elbowed my way back along the streets until I came to the little bar where I'd left Leonard Carling.

He was gone, of course. The bartender said he'd left over an hour ago. Yes, he'd had company in the back booth—a little fellow with dark glasses. They'd talked for quite a while, and then he went away. Carling stuck around for another drink and then vanished.

I looked at my watch. It was almost eleven o’clock. Carling had gone home.

So I walked around the corner to his apartment. The crowd was streaming past, and I paid no attention to any of the faces wavering before me. It wasn’t until a man hurried out of the doorway and jostled me just as I walked in that I bothered to take a second look. He disappeared in the mob before I got a glimpse of his face; I couldn’t even see if he wore dark glasses or not.

Do Russian spies wear dark glasses, or is that corny? Are Russian spies corny, with or without dark glasses? Carling hadn’t really admitted anything to me.

But I’d admitted one thing to myself. Corny or not, I was frightened. For myself, for Carling, for everybody.

And I got up those stairs, fast. I hurried down the hall to his apartment door, started to press the buzzer. Then I noticed, with a shock, that light was streaming across the carpet. His door was ajar.

I pushed it open, catching sight of Carling’s profile as he sat behind his desk staring out the window.

My first reaction was relief; my second, indignation. I stormed up to him.

“Don’t you know any better than to leave the door open?” I muttered. “What’s the matter, have you got a hole in your head?”

I crossed the room in five steps. As my feet thudded across the floor, Carling nodded. At least, I thought he was nodding, then realized he was swaying and falling forward, out of the chair.

But not before I saw his forehead.

Leonard Carling did have a hole in his head.

They didn’t let me go until past noon the following day, and even then I was lucky.

I was lucky because there were fingerprints all over the room; Carling's and somebody else's—not mine. I hadn't even touched the doorknob when I came in.

I was lucky because the bartender told a straight story about my meeting with Carling and how I'd come back to find him, less than five minutes before I phoned the police about the discovery of his body.

I was lucky because they listened to what I told them about my encounter with Carling, and how I'd seen a stranger come out of the place just before I found him.

But even so, I doubt if they would have let me go—even on bail, as a material witness—if McGregor hadn't pulled strings in high places. Not with the D. C. police force, either, but with the Federal boys. Yes, they were in on it from the first. They were great on listening and not much on talking, but I managed to find out one thing which confirmed my own suspicions—Carling had evidently made some connections with the Reds.

That he was a traitor I could not and didn't believe. That the man he'd met in the tavern was a Soviet agent was still a matter of conjecture. That the man who killed him was the same person seemed even more dubious. It was much more likely that he'd managed to contact a defecting agent who gave him some information—but that another agent had then trailed him and killed him immediately. The crime was clumsily and hastily committed; evidently it was of the utmost importance to get him out of the way before he could reveal what he had learned.

But it was all theory.

And now we'd never know what he had found out.

"Maybe I can really help," he'd said.

Well, it was too late now. That's what I told McGregor, driving back along Pennsylvania after they turned me loose.

He sighed. "You're right, it is too late now. But I doubt if he could have found out anything that would stop this."

"What're you talking about?" He blinked at me. "I forgot, you've been under wraps for fourteen hours, haven't you? You didn't hear about the press conference."

"Where? The White House?" McGregor sighed again. "I wish to God that's where it was. But things have changed. This one is scheduled for two o'clock—at the Soviet Embassy."

"The Reds called—?"

He still wasn't letting me finish my sentences. "The Reds are calling everything," he muttered. "Including the shots. This is top level. The Soviet Government refused to issue any statement in reply to the questions of our own State Department last night or this morning. Instead, they set up this conference at the Embassy. Only the news service reps are to be admitted; two from each agency. And if our officials want to find out what's going on, they'll have to come and beg admittance."

"But that's fantastic!"

"What isn't?" He chewed on his pipe. "Is it fantastic that New York City is being evacuated? That a National Emergency has been proclaimed? That this damned Red moon is putting the fear of death into the citizens of Dubuque and bringing psychosis to Peoria?

"Don't you worry—our big wheels will roll into the Soviet Embassy this afternoon. You'll see them there."

I stared at him.

"That is, if you're up to it. I've got permission for two representatives from our outfit. Naturally, I wanted to cover it myself. If Carling were alive, God rest him, he'd be the other one. But in view of what happened, I thought of you. Not because of what you can write, but because of the tie-in with the story. Human interest angle, get it?" He laughed, but there was no mirth in his mouth. "Human interest! I wonder if any of us will give a damn about human interest by this time tomorrow?"

We turned off; we were approaching the Embassy now. Crowds boiled along the streets, but National Guardsmen had cleared an inner lane.

"What do you think is going to happen?" I asked.

Again the lifeless laughter came. “Isn’t it obvious? The Reds have won the war before it’s started. They weren’t ready to risk a sneak attack and they weren’t going to sit back and wait for us to try and catch up to their scientists, either. How they ever managed to get this thing into the sky I’ll never understand—but the point is, they did it. Which means they have the power to blast their bombs anywhere in the world.

“This so-called ‘press conference’ is merely a public gesture. Actually, I doubt if anybody is going to get a chance to ask questions. We’ll be told. And it won’t be a matter of issuing a prepared statement. What we’re going to hear is an ultimatum. They’re going to dictate terms of surrender. It’s all out in the open, now—an either-or proposition.”

“Do you think we’ll accept it?”

“What choice do we have?”

We were parking now. The gates of the Embassy loomed ahead. McGregor fumbled in his coat, handed me a wallet.

They were strict. And once inside, there was none of the old-style red-carpet-and-champagne treatment. As we assembled in the big hall I didn’t even notice the usual buffet and bar. setup for the press. More significant still, I saw no neat stacks of printed handouts awaiting distribution for after the conference.

We took our places on hard chairs, before a long table. I recognized a number of the boys from the other outfits: AP, UP, INS, the radio and TV networks. They weren’t fraternizing; just sitting glumly. Then the top-level people started coming in, and they were even glummer.

McGregor nudged me. “See, what did I tell you?” he whispered, fiercely. “The House, the Senate, the whole damned Cabinet! Plus the Chiefs of Staff and—”

I nudged him back. “There,” I murmured. “Two seats ahead. The little fellow with the dark glasses!”

“You’re crazy! You mean the one the bartender said was talking to Carling? It couldn’t be—”

“I’m going to find out,” I began, and started to rise.

McGregor pulled me back.

“Not now,” he said. “Here it comes!”

The doors had closed behind us and now another door opened at the end of the room. A half-dozen men filed in, all of them wearing the uniform of the Soviet Army. They took their places at the big table. Suddenly the room became quiet—deadly quiet.

Then the fat man walked out.

He wasn’t smiling and he wasn’t waving, the way he usually did in the newsreels. He merely moved to the head of the table, then stood there and stared.

There was an audible rustle as he took a paper from his pocket and laid it on the table before him. Quite deliberately he donned spectacles. Then he picked up the paper and started to read.

McGregor had guessed right. This was no press conference—not even the pretense of one.

What we were listening to was a demand for unconditional surrender.

Again, there’s no sense pretending that I can give direct quotes. The guttural voice droned on; sometimes the pompous phrases blurred, but the meaning was always clear.

As I listened, I glanced at the little man wearing the dark glasses. He sat there, hunching forward, his head protruding from the neck of his big overcoat, and in profile he resembled a turtle peering out of his carapace. The dark glasses contributed to the effect, as did his mittened hands, which twisted nervously in his lap as he listened to the ultimatum.

The guttural voice droned on.

There was no sense in maintaining a pretense any longer, the voice told us. The time for meaningless diplomacy was past. There was no more need for hypocritical protestations of friendship. Since we, as a nation, had persisted in our warmongering efforts in spite of every reasonable warning, it had been decided to take steps. Once and for all, it would be demonstrated that the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic had the might, as well as the right, to assume world leadership. We had just witnessed the first portion of that demonstration.

Now we would be given the opportunity to respond to it. A detailed agreement had been drawn up which would establish our future relationship, and in a moment its terms would be outlined.

However, if for any reason these terms were ignored, it would be necessary to allow the demonstration to proceed. We had already seen the Russian satellite. It was to be fervently hoped that we would not require a first-hand experience of comparable Russian advances in the field of thermonuclear warfare.

"Yesterday," the guttural voice proclaimed, "the Soviet Union launched a Red moon. Tomorrow we launch a Red world!"

I had been watching the turtle-profile of the man in the dark glasses. Now I was startled to see him move; though not half as startled as the Soviet spokesman when he rose and took three paces forward, facing the room.

"He lies!"

The voice was even deeper than that of the official Soviet spokesman. Deeper, and more compelling. "He lies!" the voice repeated.

"No, let me speak. You understand, of course, that it will do no good to try and harm me."

Suddenly, shockingly, the fat face of the Soviet leader began to sag. "Who are you?" he murmured. "How did you come here?"

"The credentials I presented state that I am Leonard Carling," the stranger said. "This, of course, is a falsehood, for Leonard Carling is dead—murdered by one of your agents, no doubt, after I talked to him last night.

“Originally, it had been planned that Leonard Carling be here today, to bring you the truth. He was selected on the basis of his reputation, as a proper, unbiased representative. Now he is dead, and I must speak for him.

“What he was prepared to tell you was quite simple. It is this. There is no Russian satellite in the sky today.”

The Soviet leader did not move. The uniformed men did not rise to shoot the stranger. The crowd did not murmur. The silence in that room was thick as solid glass.

“I repeat—there is no Russian satellite in the sky today. And the Russians know it. That is why they dare not harm me. Because there would be retaliation—far worse than anything with which they have threatened you.

“Naturally, they had no way of knowing just what the satellite really was. All they realized was that they had not launched it; could not possibly have launched an instrument of such magnitude. When no statement was forthcoming from your government, and panic spread, they knew no so-called western power was responsible. It was then decided to take a daring gamble; to capitalize on the general assumption that this was a Russian satellite and call for your surrender.

“It was in anticipation of this that Leonard Carling was approached and given the truth. Since he is no longer able to speak, you must listen to me.”

I wanted to believe him. And yet I had to know. Before I realized it, I was on my feet, my voice thinly insistent.

“What proof have we got? How can we be sure this isn’t just another trick—that you didn’t murder him yourself?”

The turtle-profile turned to face me.

“I am not totally unfamiliar with your police methods,” the deep voice intoned. “According to my understanding, there is the question of fingerprints found in Leonard Carling’s apartments. In order to leave fingerprints, one must have—fingers.”

And the mittened hands rose and twisted, the mittens fell to the floor. I, and everyone in the room, saw what they had concealed—the pink, webbed paws.

The pink, webbed paws that rose, now, sweeping off the dark glasses and revealing the place where the eyes should have been, and the short, blunted stalks which took their place in the rimmed sockets and evidently fulfilled their function in some unearthly way. Some unearthly way—

“I see I have convinced you in this matter,” the voice continued. “And I trust I am equally convincing in my other statements to you. When I tell you that the satellite in the sky is not a creation of Russia or any other nation. To be quite specific, it is not a satellite. You might call it a ‘spaceship’, but even this term is inadequate. It is best that you think of it as a warning.

“I do not presume to threaten, but I can advise. I suggest that all of you—as official representatives or as common citizens of your various governments—instantly abandon any further efforts to place ‘artificial moons’ in orbit. I suggest you turn your eyes away from the stars and contemplate, with renewed honesty and insight, the spectacle of life here on your own earth. You have much to do here.

“The time may come when you have achieved the vision to go beyond. But you are not presently prepared or qualified; your motives and attitudes can lead only to self-destruction.

“I ask you to convey this message to the world at large, and to act upon it. For the span of a lunar month, we shall continue to orbit the earth. If you cooperate within that time, we shall leave you. If, however, you do not comply, we shall be forced to take—further measures.

“But I sincerely hope this will not prove necessary. And once again, I urge you to heed my warning.

“I suggest that you abandon the satellite race and consider the human race.”

That was the end. The end of his speech and the end of his presence among us. I didn’t have to ask how it was that he managed to get by the stake-out at Leonard Carling’s apartment and acquire his wallet and credentials. If you can disappear into thin air at will, you undoubtedly can appear at will, too.

The point is, you can't. And I can't.

We happen to be human.

And as for him—

Well, all this happened about ten days ago, and the thing in the sky is still orbiting on schedule.

But the universal treaties have been signed, and the whole peace program is going forward, and chances are he'll carry out his part of the bargain and take the object away at the end of the month.

Meanwhile, habit is a funny thing. The papers, and most people, still refer it to as a Red moon.

Oddly enough, they could be right at that. According to the way. I heard it, Russia isn't the only thing that's Red.

Seems to me there's also a Red planet out there.

Some day, maybe, we'll have a chance to find out for ourselves, first-hand.

Some day. . . .

THE END

Egghead

Any expression of nonconformity or difference of taste was suspect, meaning a maladjusted personality.

Robert Bloch, who will be remembered for his TERROR OVER HOLLYWOOD in our June 1937 issue, and the much-discussed A WAY OF LIFE in the October 1936 issue, turns to a problem of interest to all of us these days—conformity and how the urge towards it may create new standards, new values, new ethics.

SHERRY was the first one to notice.

I picked her up in front of the sorority house about eight and I’ll never forget the way her eyes got wide as she stared at me.

“Why, Dick!” she gasped. “You are letting your hair grow!”

I couldn’t help it. I turned red as a beet. “Yeah,” I mumbled. “Kinda looks that way, doesn’t it?” Her eyes got wider. “And what’s that you’re wearing? I mean, what on earth—?”

“It’s a double-breasted suit,” I told her. “Picked it up last weekend, when I went home. I figured it was sort of different.”

“Different? It’s horrible! I’ll bet nobody’s worn one of those things in years.”’

I shrugged. “Sorry. But I thought, since we were only going to have breakfast together, it would not make much difference.” I didn’t want to see her face, so I made a big production out of looking at my watch. “Come on, it’s after eight, and I’ve got a nine-o-clock this morning. We’d better hurry.” She didn’t answer. I took her arm and steered her into the drugstore on the corner. It was crowded, as usual, and the juke was going. The big screen was behind the counter, but there were smaller ones in most of the booths. Only the two little booths at the rear didn’t have juke-screens, and of course they were vacant. Nobody wants to sit where you can’t see the screens. Right now Buzzy Blake was doing Number One—the Extra-Cola commercial.

Sherry made a face. “I suppose we’ll just have to wait for a place,” she said.

“Haven’t got time,” I told her. “Let’s grab a bite in one of the back booths.”

I sat her down before she could object, and pretty soon the waitress came up with two mugs of coffee.

“What’ll it be?” she asked.

“Cruller,” Sherry said.

The waitress looked at me and I shook my head. “No cruller. I want poached eggs. And you can take this coffee back, too. I didn’t order it.”

“You don’t want coffee?”

“I think I’d prefer cocoa instead.”

They were both staring at me. I wanted to sink right through the floor.

Sherry leaned over the table. “Dick, what’s wrong with you? Are you sick?”

“No, I’m fine. Just wanted to try something new for a change. Is there any law says you’ve got to have coffee and crullers for breakfast every morning of your life?”

“But everybody does.”

“I’m not everybody. I’m me.”

The waitress walked away, mumbling. Buzzy Blake finished the Extra-Cola song, and somebody dropped a dime for Number Two. Fuzzy Fluke, singing about King-Size Tissue. It had a real catchy beat, but Sherry wasn't listening.

"Dick, what's happened?"

I sighed. "I don't want to talk about it now. It's just that I've made up my mind. I'm sick and tired of being like everybody else on the campus. Wearing the same clothes, eating the same food, listening to the same things, thinking the same thoughts. At least I thought I might experiment a little."

"Experiment? Look, you better go see your Psych Advisor. I mean it."

"I'm all right. This is just sort of—well, you might call it a gesture of protest."

"Protest?" She was really steamed. "I want you to march right over to the barber-shop and get a decent crewcut and then put on some sensible clothes. If you think I'm going to the game with you looking like that this afternoon, you're mistaken."

"I thought we'd skip the game," I told her. "I mean, who cares? Two gangs of apes fighting over a blown-up pig bladder." Then came the thing that bombed her. "Besides, we'd have trouble getting there, anyway. I sold my car."

"What?"

"Yesterday. I figured walking's good exercise. As long as I'm right here on the campus all the time, what do I need a car for, anyway?"

"But everybody has a car, even the janitors! Suppose you did want to go to the game, the stadium's half a mile away, how could you walk to—"

She was bombed, all right. Just then somebody put on Number Three, Muzzy Miles and his outfit, and I couldn't hear the end of her sentence. But she was getting up, leaving the booth.

"Hey," I said, "what about your breakfast?"

"Never mind, I'm not hungry. And don't bother to get up. I don't want to be seen with you. Now, or ever."

"But Sherry—"

She was gone. And Muzzy Miles and a big symphonic chorus did a big production number on Ulcer-Seltzer, with trick camera-work that showed the whole gang singing and dancing inside a set that looked just like your small intestine.

It was just the sort of thing I should have been interested in, because I was sure the Prof would ask questions about it in the next Consumotivation Class. But I didn't care about it, or about my meal when it arrived. The poached eggs tasted awful.

So I skipped the cocoa and hurried down the street to the Administration building. I'd lied to Sherry, because I really did plan to see my Psych Advisor.

That was old Hastings, of course, and his office was over three blocks away. It felt kind of funny to walk that far, and I knew a lot of people were hanging out of their car-windows and staring at me as I tramped along all alone on the sidewalk.

Halfway there I noticed another guy walking, across the street. It looked like Mark Sawyer, but I couldn't be sure, Mark and I never had anything to say to each other—of course, very few people ever talked to him.

Anyway, that didn't matter. My appointment with old Hastings did.

The girl told me to go right in. Hastings sat there puffing on his pipe and smiling at me. He had the closed-circuit screen on, and I guess he was monitoring some class or other, but when I sat down he turned it off.

"What's the story, Dick?" he asked.

I shrugged. "No story. Like I said when I called you, I want to change my program to an allelective course."

He smiled and puffed. "You're a senior, aren't you, Dick?"

"You ought to know." I pointed at the desk. "You've got my file right there in front of you."

Old Hastings didn't bat an eyelash. "Sharp orientation reflex," he said. "Bet your father is the same way. He's a pretty big operator up at Major Products, isn't he?"

"President," I said. "What's that got to do with it?"

"I wish I knew." Hastings stopped the nonsense with the pipe and pulled out a regular cigarette with a cancer-canceller filter. "Look at it my way for a minute. Here's a bright student, doing excellent work for over three years. He tests out perfectly normal all along the line. Excellent adaptability, a conformity-rating of better than ninety-five per cent, routine channelization of all aggressions; a potential company man by any standards. I know, because I've just re-checked your personality profile, semester by semester. So here you are, taking a Junior Exec Course, and doing well. Next year, when you graduate, you'll go right into the Home Office with your father's company. But now you come to me and say you want to drop your studies and switch over to electives. What electives, might I ask?"

"Well, English Lit., for one."

"You mean Advanced Copywriting?"

"No, English Lit. It's down in my bulletin, under Liberal Arts."

Hastings chuckled. "Really, Dick—you must have your old bulletin, from your freshman year. Right? We cut out the whole Liberal Arts Department last semester, didn't you read about it in the paper? I'm quite sure there was a squib on it somewhere. This is a state university, not a private college. Legislature decided not to appropriate any more funds for frills."

"What about Philosophy?" I asked.

"Out," he murmured, and he wasn't smiling, now. "Don't try and tell me you didn't hear about that. We fired Professor Gotkin the year you came here. A notorious egghead."

"But I thought—I mean, I hear he's still around. He has a house just off the campus, doesn't he?"

"Unfortunately, there's no way in which the university can compel a man to vacate his own property. But I assure you, Professor Gotkin has absolutely no connection with this institution."

"Don't some students go up to his place, for some kind of private seminars?"

Hastings ground out his cigarette. “Let’s stop sparring,” he said. “Have you been seeing Gotkin? Is that where you got these ideas about changing your courses? The truth, now.”

“I’m not on trial.”

“Not yet.”

I gulped. “Is it a crime to want to study Philosophy?”

“Don’t play stupid, Dick. Of course it’s no crime, any more than it’s a crime to study, say, the history of Russia. Not if the purpose of your study is to get documentation on the evils of Communism. But suppose you didn’t have such a sensible, clearcut purpose and were just reading out of what you believed was idle curiosity? Consciously or unconsciously you’d be laying yourself open to dangerous ideas. Then your study would be a criminal matter. You see that, don’t you? Well, the same holds true for Philosophy, or any of those borderline subjects. They’re poison, Dick. Poison.”

He stepped over to the window. “Two hundred million people out there,” he murmured. “Two hundred million today, and in another generation there’ll be three hundred million. Each and every one of them equipped with drives, goals, needs. Each and every one of them vital to our economy as a consumer. All of them dependent upon the skills and techniques of a very few specialists, trained to direct those drives, set up those goals, stimulate and channelize those needs. That’s our job here, training the specialists. You’re studying to be one of them. Isn’t that enough of a positive challenge for you? Why bother with the doubts and illusions of Philosophy?”

“I don’t know,” I said. “And I can’t answer until I’ve investigated.”

Hastings scowled. “All right, you might as well have all of it. I took the liberty of getting in touch with your father this morning, after you called. He told me that under no circumstances should you be permitted to alter your program.”

“I can insist on a hearing. I can take it to the Dean.”

"Please." He came around the desk and put his hand on my shoulder. "You know what that would lead to. Now I have another suggestion. It's obvious you've been brooding about this whole business for quite some time. Perhaps you've been subject to pressure from outside influences which you don't care to talk about. That's your affair.

"On the other hand, I'm your Psych Advisor, and your mental health is my affair, too. I recommend an honorable solution. Put in for a two-week leave, for special therapy, and enter the hospital here. Let me handle the treatment. We'll do it with narco-hypnosis. There won't be any conflict involved; when you give us the names of these people—students or faculty members who have been feeding you all this nonsense about rebellion—there'll be no guilt-feelings. It's all very open and above-board. And I'm sure it will clear up the whole problem."

I jerked my hand away, I knew his receptionist was listening through the open door, but I didn't care if I shouted.

"All right, to hell with it! You can tell my father whatever you like. Tell him his son is an antisocial egghead for all I care. And as for you, you can take your psychiatric couch and shove it!"

Then I got out.

I went back to my room and waited. Three times the phone rang, and as soon as I recognized my father's voice I hung up.

The fellows came in from classes around noon, and I could hear them going through the hall. None of them stopped at my room. Word must have gone around fast.

Finally, at one o'clock, when most of them were going back to classes, my door opened.

A tall, skinny guy with glasses stood there blinking at me. At first I didn't even recognize him.

"I'm Mark Sawyer," he said. "Oh. Come on in, have a chair."

"I—I heard about this morning."

"Who hasn't?" I grinned at him. "Don't tell me you came around to say you're sorry."

"No. I came around to say I'm glad." He smiled up at me. "Surprised, too."

"Why be surprised?" I shrugged. "Sooner or later, a guy just gets fed up. You know."

"Yes, I know. But somehow I never thought you would. None of us did."

"Us?"

He hesitated. "Well, you aren't the only one, you know."

I forced a grin. "I was beginning to feel that way. When you stop to think, there's over twenty thousand students enrolled here; it gives you sort of a funny feeling when you figure that maybe you're the only one in the whole bunch who doesn't want French fries with his hamburgers."

"I understand." He hesitated a minute. "But are you sure you did not just lose your temper, on impulse?"

"Look, Sawyer. In the past six hours I've lost my girl, got my father sore at me, and told off Hastings. Chances are I'll be expelled before the week is out. Does that sound as if I was acting on impulse?"

"I guess not." He stood up. "How'd you like to be my guest this evening? Sort of a bull-session, to meet a couple of other fellows with the same ideas. We usually get together once or twice a week at a friend's house."

"Well—"

"You might find it interesting. If you feel like it, drop over. Anytime after eight. We meet at Professor Gotkin's house."

He left, then, and the rest of the afternoon passed quietly. But there was a buzzing in my stomach, and when suppertime came I didn't want to eat. I waited until it got dark and then I slipped out and headed for Professor Gotkin's house.

I walked through alleys, wondering if this was the way they always walked; the Commies, the pinkos, the eggheads. It gave me a funny feeling, a feeling of being alone. The game was over now, and the cars were packing the streets; I could hear the horns blaring and the radios going and the guys singing. And I was alone, stumbling through an alley. A dark alley. A blind alley. Alone.

Then I came to the big old house where Professor Gotkin lived, and I wasn't alone any more. Mark Sawyer met me at the door and put out his hand, and he pulled me in, down the hall and through the double-doors of the old-fashioned study. I blinked in the sudden glare.

The brightness came from one of those old-fashioned overhead lighting-fixtures; come to think of it, I didn't see a single TV-lamp in the place, and no TV set, either. Instead, the room was filled with the kind of furniture you wouldn't expect to find anywhere but in a museum. Overstaffed chairs, big sofas; real pre-atomic pieces.

Old Gotkin came up and held out his hand, and he was a museum-piece himself. He had long hair, positively bushy, and the oddest glasses I ever saw. They were rimless, so help me.

But what surprised me the most was the guys he introduced me to. There must have been almost a dozen other students in the room, and he took me around and introduced me to them. I don't know what I'd expected, really; I suppose I thought all of them would look something like Mark Sawyer. But he was the only oddball in the whole crowd. All of the other fellows looked perfectly normal and Ivy League, with crewcuts and hornrims. A couple of them even wore army gab pants and Service emblems. There were three girls, too, and I was a little shocked to realize I'd met them all before; two of them were friends of Sherry's, and the third was last year's Junior Prom Queen. Everybody seemed to be acting perfectly natural, and they all smiled at me, but I guess they could tell I was upset.

Professor Gotkin showed me to a big chair—it was a funny-looking thing, no functional lines at all, but it felt kind of comfortable—and then brought me a glass of something that turned out to be beer.

Only it was dark, and tasted strange.

"Glad to have you with us," he said. "According to what Mark tells me, you are with us, aren't you?" Mark Sawyer leaned over my shoulder. "I hope you don't mind, Dick. I took the liberty of explaining to the gang just what you had to say to me this afternoon."

I nodded. "Then I guess there's nothing more to explain."

"There's one thing you can tell us," Professor Gotkin murmured. "What are your plans for the future?"

"Well, I suppose I'd better quit school before they call a hearing and throw me out. After that, I guess I'll have to find a job on my own. My father'll be pretty sore."

"What sort of job?"

I thought about it for a moment. "Factory or manual labor. If I try for anything better, they'll check up on my record here. But maybe that won't be too bad. I mean, it's just five or six hours a day, and I'll have security."

"Security." Surprisingly enough, it was the Junior Prom Queen who spoke. "I thought you were the one who made that remark about not liking French fries with your hamburgers."

"What's that got to do with it?"

"Everything. Do you know how the average worker lives?"

"Well—"

"Take an ordinary job and you'll be a prisoner for life, in a world of French fries, surrounded by the faceless mob that eats, drinks, dresses, talks and acts on the basis of conditioned reflexes. You'll live in a prefabricated house with a prefabricated wife and a bunch of prefabricated kids. You were taking a Junior Exec course, weren't you? Then you must have studied Depth Motivation Technique. What did you think you were learning that stuff for? In order to use it on consumers, against consumers; and who are they? Manual workers, factory workers, the army of conformists and conformity-worshippers you're rebelling against. And now you think you'll find a solution by joining their ranks? Don't be ridiculous!"

"Then what should I do?" I asked.

Professor Gotkin stepped in front of me. "We've been discussing that, before your arrival," he said. "We advise you to stay right here in school."

"But I can't. I mean, they won't let me change my courses, they told me so."

He shook his head. "That's the whole point. You don't change any courses. You make your apologies, take a week off to rest your nerves, and go right back into your studies in Junior Exec."

For a minute I couldn't believe my ears. "You mean, keep on doing what I've been doing? And graduate next year, and go into the Corporation, and buy a ranchhouse, and marry the kind of a girl the Corporation wants me to marry—a girl who'll nag at me until we can buy a bigger ranchhouse? Be an Exurbanite, and drive a new car back and forth to work until I keel over with a heart attack and they drive me to the cemetery in a new hearse? Is this your idea of a solution?"

"A necessary step towards a solution," Mark Sawyer said.

"I don't get it."

"Listen, what you've just said isn't new. Everybody in this room has sounded off about the same thing, in practically the same words. But all of us are still here, going to school. And all of us will be graduating, taking regular jobs, doing our best to work our way up into key positions. Don't you see that this is the whole secret?"

"Secret of what?"

"The secret of rebellion. The only way a minority can ever hope to win. By infiltration. It's Professor Gotkin's idea."

He smiled. "Not original, I assure you. I borrowed it from the Communists."

"But—you are a Communist, aren't you?" I asked.

He frowned. "Not at all. A Communist, actually, is the follower of a political doctrine, a believer in community property, who seeks to overthrow other governmental systems by force, if necessary."

"That isn't the way I heard it." His frown deepened. "That's right, I'd forgotten. They don't teach that definition any more, do they? To you, a Communist is anyone whose ideas differ from those of the majority—or, rather, from the ideas superimposed upon the majority, who accept them without thinking. A Communist is an egghead is an individualist is a psychotic, isn't that how it goes?"

"Something like that, yes."

"And you think that any expression of nonconformity, any difference of taste from that of the mathematical majority, is an automatic indication of a maladjusted personality?"

"I suppose so."

"Still, you are aware of such a difference in yourself?" His frown smoothed into a smile. "Don't bother to answer that, Dick. Because we all feel the same way. Only we've learned not to be ashamed of it. We know that the history of this nation, and of every civilized nation, is a history of constant rebellion. It was political rebellion which won our freedom, social rebellion which expanded our frontiers, intellectual rebellion which resulted in invention and progress. Only in recent years have we fallen into the error of orienting our philosophy around an expanding economy, dependent upon a constant and complacent consumerdom. Only in recent 'years has it come to be a shameful thing to be 'different'—that individuality is equated with antisocial attitudes.

"I know, because I've lived through the change. The get-in-line-and-stay-in-line doctrine was imposed as a necessity during the War, and somehow we never managed to abandon it after the shooting was over. Mass-media dedicated itself to the noble purpose of selling masses of goods to the mass-audience. From that it was only a step to the mass-merchandising of ideas. Then came the real Communist scare, we began to be afraid of eggheads—and everybody who criticized was given that label. It's still a label, today, but soon it may be down on the books as a legal synonym for traitor. Unless we take decisive steps to prevent it."

"But what good will my returning to school do? How will it be helping to rebel by staying in line?"

"Through infiltration," the Professor said. "Don't you see? We're all doing it. Granted, the process is a slow one, but it will bear fruit. If, within ten years or even twenty years, every student in those rooms will have attained a position of importance in the outside world, there will be a chance to reverse the trend. A legislator here, a banker there, a business executive, an advertising magnate, a newspaper man, a TV producer—people like that are in a position to influence key decisions from the top level."

I glanced around. "There's only eleven of us," I said. "A drop in the bucket."

Mark Sawyer cleared his throat. "You'd be surprised if you knew how many there really were," he told me. "Not everybody's here tonight. I'll bet we have almost fifty on the campus."

"Fifty out of twenty-three thousand students?"

"Fifty of the best. The individualists, the clear-headed ones. And this isn't the only campus in the country, remember." Professor Gotkin drew himself up. "Since I left—since I was fired, rather—I haven't been idle. My connections with colleagues all over the nation have served me well. There are groups like these scattered throughout the schools, and in other places where you'd least suspect it. Army camps, labor unions, fraternal organizations; yes, and the very strongholds of the status quo. Most of our followers are young men and women like yourselves, yes, and it is from their ranks that we'll draw our real strength in the future. But even now we've got a slight toe-hold in high places. Would it surprise you if I revealed that we've already enlisted several important educators in our ranks? And no less than six Congressmen? And two practicing 'industrial psychologists' who specialize in Depth Motivation techniques?" He chuckled. "We're not entirely impractical, you see. Nor entirely helpless. But there's much to be done, and we can use able assistance. We need men like you, Dick. What do you say?"

I hesitated. “How can I be sure that you’re telling me the truth?”

“A sensible reaction. And one I’ll be glad to honor. It so happens that there are lists available to me. You are welcome to inspect the names of your—shall we call them fellow-eggheads?—right here in school. As the situation warrants, I’ll acquaint you with other members of the movement in the outside world; we hope to be eventually forming little key-groups in selected industries and professions in time to come.”

“You aren’t going to start a revolution? You’re sure of it?”

“Of course we are! But not an armed revolution; we don’t intend to overthrow the government by violence. Ours will be a much more far-reaching and long-lasting rebellion. A revolution of ideas. We’re going to take the world away from the pitchmen and their puppets and give it back to the individual, the free citizen. Are you with us?”

I nodded.

“What do you want me to do?” I asked. “Where do I begin?”

“You begin by going back to your Psych Advisor. Apologize to him. Tell him you had a fight with your girl, tell him you’ve been under a strain. If he suggests rest or treatment, take it But no narcohypnosis, of course. You understand why.”

I nodded again.

“Then, return to your classes. I’m sure there’ll be no real difficulty. You have a brilliant record. Your father and your girl will come around. Just carry on as you did before this all happened.”

I stood up. “But don’t I do anything? I mean, aren’t you carrying out any kind of program at all here on the campus?”

“You mean some sort of underground protest movement or sabotage?” Professor Gotkin shook his head. “We aren’t ready for that yet. In a few years, perhaps, when our group is stronger. Meanwhile, about all we do is proselyte. And that’s where someone like yourself will come in handy. Maybe we can work out a system; a way of bringing in more potential recruits. It’s worth thinking about, and planning for.”

“Will there be meetings like this regularly?”

"Yes, but not according to any schedule. We can't afford to attract too much attention at this stage of the game. And another thing; we don't believe it wise to congregate in social groups or be seen together anywhere outside this house. The notice of the next meeting will come to you from one of your fellow-members. I suggest, therefore, that you take steps to memorize their names."

"An excellent idea." I made a circuit of the room slowly, shaking hands with each of my fellow-conspirators. As I did so, I asked each one to repeat his or her name to me.

"Don't forget, now," Professor Gotkin cautioned.

"I won't."

"You'll be notified when to come again."

"I'll be here."

And, about a week later, I was, A lot happened in the meantime. I'd seen old Hastings and the Dean. I saw my father, too, and then there was a special two-day trip which nobody knew about. That is, not until I walked into the next meeting at Professor Gotkin's house, with the Security Officers right behind me.

We caught fifteen of the lousy eggheads right then and there, and of course we got hold of the old buzzard's secret lists. Every last one of the subversive rats on the campus was rounded up, and even I was surprised at some of the big wheels who were in on the plot.

But it was like that all over the country, they tell me. And it made a real stink—I guess you must have read about it in the papers, though.

Of course I don't claim credit for the whole thing. It was Dad's idea in the first place, when he got wind of some kind of Commie activity down here at the school. He even supplied me with the little portable wire-recorder I'd hidden in my coat when I went to Gotkin's house the first time; and that clinched it. No matter what he and the others said, they couldn't deny the evidence—it was all down on tape, the whole subversive pitch, even their names in their own voices.

Right now I guess they're being held on open charges, but that's just a formality. Dad is in pretty thick with all the right people, and they say that in just a couple of weeks Congress is going to pass a Treason Law to take care of the whole gang. It'll be retroactive, of course. They're even talking about something called the Egghead Amendment to the Constitution.

Naturally, I'm pretty happy about the way things worked out. It wasn't much fun having to pretend to be psycho, even for a little while—it must be awful to actually be that way, all queer and alone.

But it's all over now, and I'm back at school, and Sherry's with me, and Dad bought me a new convertible, and I guess right now you might say I'm kind of a hero.

It wouldn't surprise me a bit if I was elected President of the Class of 1978.

Report On Sol III

We take pride in our culture, our advancement up the evolutionary settle. But possibly "civilization" is only a comparative term.

RABOR flowed into the hall where Yem vibrated.

They twined tentacles until contact was established, and then Rabor began to pulse.

"I am ready with a preliminary report on Sol III," he vibrated.

Yem tingled. "Ah, yes. The major life-forms, I suppose?"

Rabor oozed embarrassment. "Not exactly. Kwor and Zyla dealt with the major life-forms—micro-organisms, vegetable matter, insects."

Yem tingled more strongly. "Then you gathered data on the fourth most important group—the creatures inhabiting the seas?"

Rabor fleched uneasily. "No. I was assigned to mammals."

"The flying things?"

"They are called birds. Mammals are the others—quadrapeds and bipeds. And the bipeds rule Sol III."

Yem writhed in confusion. "That is strange. One would hardly expect a minority to attain power."

"There are many strange things about Sol III," Rabor pulsated. I hardly know where to begin, it is all so incredible. Even our most creative dreamers could not throb such fantasies."

“Allow me to be the judge,” Yem pulsed. “I take it the expedition encountered no difficulties?”

“That is correct. The microorganisms paid no heed, and the other life-forms have a limited visual range. We were well above their perceptual abilities, so we could go about our studies without hindrance.”

“You infer that the inhabitants might have proven hostile if they could have perceived you?”

Rabor grinched. “Only the bipeds—but their hostility exceeds the wildest imaginings. Not only do they destroy all other life-forms for food, or merely for pleasure, but they also frequently destroy one another.”

It was Yem’s turn to grinch. “One another?”

“Yes. That is their principal occupation.”

“Are you quite sure you did not misconstrue their actions?” Yem vibrated.

“Quite sure. We were able to learn one of their two forms of communication—a primitive method called speech. A study of the meaning of these sounds, or words, confirms our findings. The second method, employing visual symbols known as writing, has not been mastered, though we have specimens for further examination. But in words and deeds, we have found the purpose of the bipeds—who call themselves men—unmistakable.”

“Fantastic!” Yem pulsed.

“I assured you it would be. Men are divided into intricate tribal units, each intent on the destruction of the other. The slightest difference in method of government, form of worship, minor custom, speech, or even pigmentation, is sufficient excuse to visit extermination upon the enemy.”

“Enemy?” Yem quizzled.

“A speech-form,” Rabor throbbed. “Meaning, ‘one whom I hate because he has something I want’ or, conversely, ‘one whom I hate because he wants something I have’. In reality, of course, the conflict is over the material possession of the planet and its resources. This conflict, waged between large groups of rivals, is called war. When waged by small groups or individuals, it is called business or competition. But the end is the same—to totally defeat the enemy, and gain more resources.

“What resources?”

“Land. Food. Minerals. Gas. Chemicals.”

“What is done with these resources?”

“Why, they are consumed and destroyed as quickly as possible. The very act of war destroys a large proportion of them. And the purpose of business is to urge and incite men to consume as much as possible. Since almost half of the men are either engaged in war or preparations for future war, and nearly all the rest are engaged in business, you can see how quickly the destruction proceeds.”

“Yet you spoke of worship,” Yem pulsated. “Do they not recognize the Supreme Being?”

“Let us say that they are aware of Him. But their recognition varies. Each group has a different concept, and each believes that its concept is the only correct one; for that reason, those of different beliefs are to be hated.”

“But are there no exceptions? Is there not a group which identifies the Supreme Being with peace, or even a group which refuses to recognize a Supreme Being at all?”

“Indeed, there are such groups. But they are the most warlike of all. In fact, the group which identifies the Supreme Being with peace has so many quarrels and disputes amongst its own members as to the exact nature of the Deity that they fight amongst themselves. And When you add to this the hatreds fomented by the differences in speech and customs, and in pigmentation—”

“Please,” Yem queebled. “You are making my tentacles ache. Can’t you vibrate about something more pleasant? Surely these men are like any other living entities. They take pleasure in reality, do they not? They revere natural beauty—”

"Not greatly. Most of their time, as I revealed to you, is spent in competition. They train for it almost from the moment of birth, and give their later lives almost entirely to that end. As a result, they live, mainly, in portions of the planet unsuited to their physical well-being, so that their bodies must be concealed by coverings and much of their time spent in artificially-heated shelters. They seldom venture forth from these dwellings except to proceed from one to another, and if they travel any distance at all, it is in an enclosed vehicle."

"But surely they can see their surroundings?"

"They take the utmost pains to avoid such awareness. Even when journeying in their vehicles, they take care to line the routes of travel with huge structures bearing words and injunctions to consume, which block out the view of nature. The dust and dirt and gases shroud their cities in a pall, and artificial illumination blots out all sight of their world as it appears by night. And they further escape consideration of nature through their arts—"

"Ah," Yem tingled. "Their arts."

"I cannot begin to make you comprehend, Rabor throbbed. "Their arts are not like ours."

"You mean they do not glorify the wonder of nature, or of life itself?" Yem wriggled in dismay. "But they have sensory apparatus, and they reproduce. Surely they enjoy the greatest of natural pleasures and make of it their principal source of artistic achievement?"

"Their enjoyment is furtive," Rabor responded writhingly. "There are many intricate laws and customs regulating participation in this pleasure. Usually the reproductive act must be accomplished in total darkness, and almost always in secrecy. Even an open allusion to the act in speech or writing is forbidden, and artists who depict it are punished by law."

"But is not the activity itself considered a form of artistic expression?"

"No—quite the contrary! The slightest deviation from custom is punishable. And the indulgence itself, hedged about as it is with danger and difficulty, is frequently further hindered by the participants themselves. One of the commonest customs, in regions where the climate permits, is for a mating couple to journey forth in a small, enclosed vehicle to a large arena where huge images are flashed upon a great screen in darkness. And there, amidst an assemblage of hundreds of other couples in their vehicles, they conduct themselves with preconditioned shame and embarrassment."

"Monstrous!" Yem tingled. "No wonder they prefer to spend their time killing one another! But one would think that it would be unsafe to assemble in such a group as the one you speak about. Do they not fear their companions?"

"No. One individual is not allowed to harm another individual for personal reasons. No man is permitted to kill his enemy, however valid the reasons may be for his hatred. And no man is permitted to end the life of a loved one—even if the loved one is doomed to pain and inevitable death. An individual who takes an individual life is a murderer, who will be killed in turn by process of law.

"If, however, an individual kills a stranger, during a war, he is a hero. The more strangers he kills, the greater a hero he becomes. He then rises to a position as leader or even ruler."

Yem twisted. "That is impossible! I cannot believe in the existence of so unnatural a life-form anywhere in the universe! A being that loathes the very act which created it, a being that hates its own kind, a being that is forbidden to destroy an actual enemy but is encouraged to kill utter strangers because of a difference in appearance or customs or belief. Rabor, I cannot accept this report of yours—it is preposterous!"

Rabor fleched and grinched simultaneously. "I swear that all this is true; all this and much more! If you could only see for yourself—"

"I will see," Yem tingled. "You will take me to Sol III yourself, and now!"

"But—"

"No objections! I shall order the ship immediately! Get ready to show me all this."

And so it came to pass that Rabor and Yem voyaged together to Sol III and set down in a region known as the Everglades, from which they quickly vulffed to a certain spot just outside Palm Beach.

"Before we observe the actual beings," Rabor proposed, "I have in mind that you should familiarize yourself with certain of their domestic customs. For this reason, I would like to conduct you to one of their dwelling-places. During this portion of Sol Ill's cycle, many of the larger ones are deserted, and we can examine one at leisure. I have in mind a certain mansion—"

"Mansion?"

"A large living-structure. The word is a contraction of two others; man, an individual being, and shun, meaning to avoid. It is a house where a man lives when he is important enough in business to be able to avoid other men. Only the leaders can live in mansions, but it is there that you will find the most representative display of Sol III culture."

"Very well," Yem throbbed.

They vulffed onward until Rabor located the mansion, which was set amidst the grounds of a private estate. It was indeed deserted, and they flowed into it freely.

Rabor conducted Yem on a hasty tour of inspection.

"Living room," he said.

"They live here? This is the room for reproduction?"

"No. As I explained, that is a private act. In a dwelling it is generally performed in the room set aside for rest—the bedroom."

"But what is all this apparatus, then?"

"Furniture. The bipeds spend most of their time doubled up or contorted into odd positions called sitting or lying down."

"This is called living?"

"Indeed. Bipeds devote most of their waking hours to labor at business or war, just so that they can enjoy a few hours to themselves, during which they sit or recline, as they please. And. of course, one-third of their lives is spent in complete rest, or sleep. This time is passed in the bedroom. Here it is."

"But such a small and gloomy place," Yem tingled. "I would not wish to pass a third of my existence here! Even if it was all devoted to pleasure."

"Bathroom," Rabor pulsed, as they flowed on. Briefly he explained the process of elimination and the functions of cleansing and adorning the body.

"Very vital," Yem throbbed. "But why then is this not the biggest room? Surely what happens here is most important of all? And is it not a source of pride to men that they can eliminate waste-products and clean themselves regularly? I should think they would want their fellow-men to observe these efforts towards betterment. A larger room—" He paused. "Like this one—"

Rabor vibrated. "No. This is the dining-room, where men eat. They gather together here in happy social groups to consume the flesh of animals and devour vegetables and fruits."

Yem quatched sneffly. "You mean they are actually happy to eat what they have killed? And they are not ashamed to perform the function publicly?"

"All their greatest festivals involve eating."

"But that is horrible! To conceal the functions which make one a better, cleaner, healthier being—and to openly display one's cruelty, greed and capacity for absorbing the substance of other living things! Ridiculous!"

Rabor quickly flowed into the study. "You wished to learn for yourself about their art and culture," he pulsated. "Here you will find evidences of what I informed you about."

His tentacles waved. "Books," he vibrated. "Containing the words of communication. "And on the walls, pictures. Men excel in the graphic arts."

Yem quiggled the pictures. "Horrible!" he fleched. "What is the meaning of these monstrosities?"

"This is, as I previously explained, art. In fact, it is the very highest form of art. Only a few great leaders are able to own such examples, which were created by a man called Picasso.

"But these things are hideous—who can bear the sight of them? Even on Saturn you won't find such horrors. Do men really look like this?"

"Of course not. It is not considered artistic to portray men as they are, nor anything in nature. Misrepresentation is the greatest and most important characteristic of creative activity. Words placed together without meaning are called poems. Lumps of inanimate substance kneaded into grotesque, misshapen forms are called sculpture. Then there are sounds, called music. But allow me to demonstrate—"

Rabor's tentacle twiddled with the dial of a television set. The screen flickered into life.

"Do not be alarmed," he throbbed. "These are only images, transmitted for enjoyment. Actually, they are meant only to consume time between business announcements. If you will only watch for a while, I am sure they will have music."

Yem watched.

He watched for almost two hours, during which he learned more about man than Rabor could ever have explained.

He saw a pile advertisement and watched animated animals singing and dancing around rolls of toilet-paper. He saw three different automobiles, each the lowest-priced of the Low Three. He witnessed divers, lumberjacks, riflemen and athletes demonstrating their virility by puffing on various brands of cigarettes. He saw the thrilling race between two pills descending into cross-sections of the human stomach.

And in between were actual human beings, as they called themselves, entertaining the viewers by shooting one another, going insane, plotting robberies and holdups and kidnappings, punching one another with their fists, or attempting to steal each other's mates. And every so often there were episodes involving various groups of bipeds called families, who seemed to live in still another world. In this world, there were no scenes of violence; everything was quite friendly and amusing, and most of the events involved methods whereby the female and the small offspring outwitted or triumphed over the male.

Yem twined with Rabor. “You deceived me,” he tingled. “There are two worlds, are there not?”

“No. This is entertainment—make-believe. Fantasies. Men are not allowed to kill one another as individuals, so they enjoy seeing the pretense. Families are not so happily grouped, but it is flattering for them to identify themselves with the images on the screen. And remember, the real underlying purpose of all this is to incite the viewer to consume more natural resources. But wait—you wished to learn about music. And that, I believe, is about to be presented now. Ah, yes!”

The figure flickered forth, gyrating with a guitar. And then the sound came.

“Yem!” Rabor grinched. “What is wrong?”

Yem writhed in agony. “No!” he squoggled. “No—stop—”

A twiddle of tentacles and the set went off.

“Thank you,” Yem fleched, weakly. “I do not believe I could have endured another moment So that is music.” He pulsed wearily. “Now I can believe you. Men are irrational beings indeed. They detest their very natures, they abhor one another, they distort everything in their lives. Is there nothing they hold sacred?”

“One thing only,” Rabor vibrated. “The symbol of power. I will show you. Usually this symbol is carefully concealed, but I know where it is hidden.”

He flowed over to the wall, parting a drape with a tentacle and grasping the knob of a safe until attuned with the combination. The safe swung open and Rabor scooped out the contents.

“Here,” he throbbed. “This is what men want.”

“But these are only little pieces of green parchment.”

“They are covered with words and pictures. Are they not interesting?”

“Interesting, perhaps. But of no value.”

“No value at all,” Rabor pulsed. “Come, shall we go back?”

And they vulffed off into the night. THE END

Word of Honor

the dangerous game of truth—and consequences

AT 2:27 IN THE AFTERNOON, Homer Gans, cashier, entered the office of his employer. the President of the First National Bank.

“I’ve got something to tell you,” he murmured. “It’s about the reserve fund. I’m into it for 40,000 dollars.”

“You’re what?”

“I embezzled from the reserve fund,” Homer said. “Been doing it for years now. and nobody ever caught on. Some of the money went to play the rates, and a lot of it has been paying somebody’s rent. You wouldn’t think to look at me that I’d be keeping a blonde on the side. But then, you don’t know how it is at home.”

The President frowned. “Oh yes I do,” he answered, taking a deep breath. “As a matter of fact. I happen to he keeping a blonde myself. Though to tell the truth, site isn’t a natural blonde.”

Homer hesitated, then sighed. “To tell the truth,” he said, “neither is mine.”

Between 2:28 and 2:48, quite a number of things happened. A model nephew told his rich anti elderly untie to go to hell and quit trying to run his life. An equally model husband told his wife he had hated her and their children for years anti frequently wished they’d all drop dead. A star shoe salesman told a female customer to quit wasting time trying on small sizes and go out and buy a couple of rowboats. At one of the embassies. a visiting diplomat paused in the midst of a flattering toast and abruptly emptied the contents of his glass upon the bald head of the American Ambassador.

And——

“Holy Toledo!” howled Wally Tibbets. Managing Editor of the Daily Express. “Has everybody Hipped?”

Reporter Joe Satterlee shrugged.

“In nine years on this rag. I’ve never pulled that ‘Stop the presses!’ stuff. But we’re standing by for a replate right now—and we’re going to stand by until we find out what gives. Got enough lead copy for a dozen front pages right now, and none of it makes sense.”

“Such as?” Satterlee gazed calmly at his boss.

“Take your pick. Our senior Senator just issued a statement of resignation-says lie’s unfit to hold office. That labor leader who built the big new union headquarters uptown went and shot himself. Police headquarters can’t keep up with the guys who are coming in and confessing everything from murder to mopery. And if you think that’s something, you ought to hear what’s going on down in the advertising department. Clients arc canceling space like mad. Three of the biggest used-ear dealers in town just yanked their ads.”

Joe Satterlee yawned. “What goes on here?”

“Thai’s just what I want you to find out. And fast.” Wally Tibbets stood up. “Go see somebody and get a statement. Try the University. Tackle the science department.”

Satterlee nodded and went downstairs to his ear.

Traffic seemed to be disrupted all over the city. and something had happened to the pedestrians. Some of them were running and the others moved along in a daze or merely stood silently in the center of die sidewalk. Fates had lost their usual mask of immobility. Some people laughed and others wept. Over in the grass of the University campus, a number of couples lay locked in close embrace, oblivious of still other couples who were fighting furiously. Joe Satterlee blinked at what he saw and drove on.

At 3:02 he drove up to the Administration Building. A burly man stood on the curb, doing a little dance of impatience He looked as though he wanted cither a taxi or a washroom, but last.

"Pardon me," Satterlee said. "Is Dean Hanson's office in this building?"

"I'm Hanson," the burly mail snapped.

"My name's Satterlee. I'm with the Daily Express——"

"Good Ford, do they know already?"

"Know what?"

"Never mind." Dean Hanson shook his head. "Can't talk to you now. Got to into a cab. I suppose I'll never get to the airport."

"Leaving town?"

"No. I've got to get my hands on Doctor Lowenquist. He's at the bottom of all this——"

Satterlee opened the door. "Come on. gel in," he said. "I'll drive you to the airport. We can talk on the way."

A wind came out of the west and the sun disappeared to cower behind a cloud.

"Storm coming up," Dean Hanson muttered. "I hat damned fool better land Indore it hits."

"Lowenquist." Satterlee said. "Isn't lie head of the School of Dentistry?"

"That's right." Hanson sighed. "All this nonsense about mad scientists is bad enough, but a mad dentist——"

"What did he do?"

"He chartered a plane this afternoon, all by himself, and look it tip over the city. He's been spraying the town with that gas of his." Hanson sighed. "I don't know anything about science. I'm just a poor University Dean, and my job is to get money out of rich alumni. But the way I hear it. Lowenquist was monkeying around with chemical anesthetics. He mixed up a new combination—like pentothal sodium, sodium amytal—only a lot stronger and more concentrated."

"Aren't those used in psychotherapy, for narcohypnosis?" Satterlee asked. "What they call truth serums?"

“This isn’t a serum. It’s a gas.”

“You can say that again.” Satterlee agreed. “So he waited for a dear, windless day and went up in a plane to dust the city with a concentrated truth gas. Is that a fact?”

“Of course it is.” Hanson replied. “You know I can’t lie to you.” He sighed again. “Nobody can lie any more. Apparently the stuff is so powerful that one sniff does the trick. Psychiatry department gives me a lot of flap about inhibitory release and bypassing the superego and if a man answers, bang up. But what it all boils down to is the gas works. Everybody who was outside, everybody with an open window or an air-conditioning unit, was affected. Almost the entire city. They can’t lie any more. They don’t even want to lie.”

“Is it? I’m not so sure. When the story hits the papers, it’ll give the whole school a bad name. I shouldn’t even have told you, but I can’t help myself. I just felt the need to be frank about everything. That’s what I was telling my secretary, before she slapped my face——”

Satterlee wheeled into the airport. “That your boy tip there?” He pointed upward, at a small plane careening between the clouds in the sudden gale.

“Yes,” Hanson shouted. “He’s trying to conic in for a landing, I think. But the wind’s too strong—”

A sudden lance of lightning pierced the sky. I lie plane wobbled and began to spin.

Satterlee gunned the motor and turned off onto the field. In the distance a siren wailed, and through the rushing rain he could see the plane spiraling clown in a crazy dive . . .

• • •

Wally Tibbets leaned back and pushed his chair away from the desk.

“I hat’s how it happened.” Satterlee told him. “The poor guy was dead before they pulled him out of the wreckage. But they found the tanks and equipment. He had the papers on him. and I persuaded Hanson to turn the stuff over to me: he was in such a daze lie didn't even think to object. So now we can back up the story with proof. I've got copies of the formula he discovered. I suppose we'll feed the dope in to the wire services, too."

Tibbets shook his head. Nope I in going to answer all inquiries with a flat denial."

"But the story——"

"Isn't going to be any story. All over now, anyway. Didn't you notice how people changed after that storm hit? Wind must have blown the gas away Everyone's back to normal. Most of them have already convinced themselves that nothing ever happened."

"But we know it did! What about all those story leads you got this afternoon?"

"Killed. Ever since the storm, we've been getting denials and retractions. Turns out the Senator isn't resigning after all—he's running for Governor.

I he laboratory's shooting himself was an accident. The polite can't get anyone to sign their confessions. The advertisers are placing new copy again. Mark my words, by tomorrow morning this whole town will have forgotten—they'll will themselves to forget. Nobody ran face the truth and remain sane."

"That's a terrible way to think," Satterlee said. "Doctor Lowenquist was a great man. He knew his discovery could work—not just here, but everywhere. After this trial run he meant to take a plane tip over Washington. Hy over Moscow, all the capitals of the world. Because ibis truth gas could elm Hire the world. Don't you see that?"

"Of course I see it. But the world shouldn't he changed."

"Why not?" Satterlee squared his shoulders. "Look here. I've been thinking. I have the formula. I could carry on where Lowenquist left off. I've saved sonic money. I could hire pilots and planes. Don't you think the world needs a dose of truth?"

"No. You saw what happened here today, on just a small scale."

“Yes. Criminals confessed, crooks re formed, people stopped lying to one another. Is that so had?”

“About the criminals, no. But for ordinary human beings this could be a terrible thing. You don’t see what happens when the doctor tells his patient that he’s dying of cancer, when the wife tells her husband he’s not actually the father of their son. Everybody has secrets, or almost every body. It’s better not to know the whole truth—about others, or about yourself.”

“But look at what goes on in the world today.”

“I am looking. That’s my job—to sit at this desk and watch the world go round. Sometimes it’s a dizzy spin, but at least it keeps going. Because people keep going. And they need lies to help them. Lies about abstract justice, and romantic love everlasting. The belief that right always triumphs. Even our concept of democracy may be a lie. Yet we cherish these lies and do our best to live by them. And maybe, little by little, our belief helps make these things come true. It’s a slow process, but in the long run it seems to work. Animals don’t lie, you know. Only human beings know how to pretend, how to make believe, how to deceive themselves and others. But that’s why they’re human beings.”

“Maybe so,” Satterlee said. “Yet think of the opportunity I have. I could even stop war.”

“Perhaps. Military and political leaders might face up to the truth about their motives and change—temporarily.”

“We could keep on spraying,” Satterlee broke in, eagerly. “There are other honest men. We’d raise funds, make this a long-term project. And who knows? Perhaps after a few doses, the change would become permanent. Don’t you understand? We could end war!”

“I understand,” Tibbets told him. “You could end war between nations. And start hundreds of millions of individual wars instead. Wars waged in human minds and human hearts. There’d be a wave of insanity, a wave of suicides, a wave of murders. There’d be a tidal inundation of truth that would drown the home, the family, the whole social structure.”

“I realize it’s a risk. But think of what we all might gain.”

Tibbets put his hand on the younger man’s shoulder. “I want you to forget this whole business,” he said, soberly. “Don’t plan to manufacture this gas and spray it over the Capitol or the Kremlin. Don’t do it, for all our sakes.”

Satterlee was silent, staring out into the night. Far in the distance a jet plane screamed.

“You’re an honest man,” Tibbets said. “One of the few. I dig that, and I admire you for it. But you’ve got to be realistic and see things my way. All I want is for you to tell me now that you won’t try anything foolish, leave the world the way it is.” He paused. “Will you give me your word of honor?”

Satterlee hesitated. He was an honest man, he realized, and so his answer was a long time coming. Then, “I promise,” Satterlee lied.

That Hell-Bound Train

Ever since 1541, when a peculiar doctor died under peculiar circumstances, our literature has crackled with contracts signed in human blood and bargains reached by the light of brimstone. Here Robert Bloch and a delightfully disreputable Faust find a new kind of balance—on a warm and surprisingly different level—between the intoxication of the impossible wish and its disconcerting morning-after, an eternity in Hell.

WHEN MARTIN WAS A LITTLE BOY, his Daddy was a Railroad Man. Daddy never rode the high iron, but he walked the tracks for the CB&Q, and he was proud of his job. And every night when he got drunk, he sang this old song about That Hell-Bound Train.

Martin didn't quite remember any of the words, but he couldn't forget the way his Daddy sang them out. And when Daddy made the mistake of getting drunk in the afternoon and got squeezed between a Pennsy tank-car and an AT&SF gondola, Martin sort of wondered why the Brotherhood didn't sing the song at his funeral.

After that, things didn't go so good for Martin, but somehow he always recalled Daddy's song. When Mom up and ran off with a traveling salesman from Keokuk (Daddy must have turned over in his grave, knowing she'd done such a tiling, and with a passenger, too!) Martin hummed the tune to himself every night in the Orphan Home. And after Martin himself ran away, he used to whistle the song softly at night in the jungles, after the other bindlestiffs were asleep.

Martin was on the road for four-five years before he realized he wasn’t getting anyplace. Of course he’d tried his hand at a lot of things—picking fruit in Oregon, washing dishes in a Montana hash-house, stealing hub-caps in Denver and tires in Oklahoma City—but by the time he’d put in six months on the chain-gang down in Alabama he knew he had no future drifting around this way on his own.

So he tried to get on the railroad like his Daddy had and they told him that times were bad.

But Martin couldn’t keep away from the railroads. Wherever he traveled, he rode the rods; he’d rather hop a freight heading north in sub-zero weather than lift his thumb to hitch a ride with a Cadillac headed for Florida. Whenever he managed to get hold of a can of Sterno, he’d sit there under a nice warm culvert, think about the old days, and often as not he’d hum the song about That Hell-Bound Train. That was the train the drunks and the sinners rode—the gambling men and the grifters, the big-time spenders, the skirt-chasers, and all the jolly crew. It would be really fine to take a trip in such good company, but Martin didn’t like to think of what happened when that train finally pulled into the Depot Way Down Yonder. He didn’t figure on spending eternity stoking boilers in Hell, without even a Company Union to protect him. Still, it would be a lovely ride. If there was such a thing as a Hell-Bound Train. Which, of course, there wasn’t.

At least Martin didn’t think there was, until that evening when he found himself walking the tracks heading south, just outside of Appleton Junction. The night was cold and dark, the way November nights are in the Fox River Valley, and he knew he’d have to work his way down to New Orleans for the winter, or maybe even Texas. Somehow he didn’t much feel like going, even though he’d heard tell that a lot of those Texas automobiles had solid gold hub-caps.

No sir, he just wasn’t cut out for petty larceny. It was worse than a sin—it was unprofitable, too. Bad enough to do the Devil’s work, but then to get such miserable pay on top of it! Maybe he'd better let the Salvation Army convert him.

Martin trudged along humming Daddy's song, waiting for a rattler to pull out of the Junction behind him. He'd have to catch it—there was nothing else for him to do.

But the first train to come along came from the other direction, roaring towards him along the track from the south.

Martin peered ahead, but his eyes couldn't match his ears, and so far all he could recognize was the sound. It was a train, though; he felt the steel shudder and sing beneath his feet.

And yet, how could it be? The next station south was Neenali-Menasha, and there was nothing due out of there for hours.

The clouds were thick overhead, and the field-mists rolled like a cold fog in a November midnight. Even so, Martin should have been able to see the headlight as the train rushed on. But there was only the whistle, screaming out of the black throat of the night. Martin could recognize the equipment of just about any locomotive ever built, but he'd never heard a whistle that sounded like this one. It wasn't signalling; it was screaming like a lost soul.

He stepped to one side, for the train was almost on top of him now. And suddenly there it was, looming along the tracks and grinding to a stop in less time than he'd believed possible. The wheels hadn't been oiled, because they screamed too, screamed like the damned. But the train slid to a halt and the screams died away into a series of low, groaning sounds, and Martin looked up and saw that this was a passenger train. It was big and black, without a single light shining in the engine cab or any of the long string of cars; Martin couldn't read any lettering on the sides, but he was pretty sure this train didn't belong on the Northwestern Road.

He was even more sure when he saw the man clamber down out of the forward car. There was something wrong about the way he walked, as though one of his feet dragged, and about the lantern he carried. The lantern was dark, and the man held it up to his mouth and blew, and instantly it glowed redly. You don’t have to be a member of the Railway Brotherhood to know that this is a mighty peculiar way of lighting a lantern.

As the figure approached, Martin recognized the conductor’s cap perched on his head, and this made him feel a little better for a moment—until he noticed that it was worn a bit too high, as though there might be something sticking up on the forehead underneath it.

Still, Martin knew his manners, and when the man smiled at him, he said, “Good evening, Mr. Conductor.”

“How did you know my name?”

The man shrugged. “How did you know I was the Conductor?”

“You are, aren’t you?”

“To you, yes. Although other people, in other walks of life, may recognize me in different roles. For instance, you ought to see what I look like to the folks out in Hollywood.” The man grinned. “I travel a great deal,” he explained.

“What brings you here?” Martin asked.

“Why, you ought to know the answer to that, Martin. I came because you needed me. Tonight, I suddenly realized you were backsliding. Thinking of joining the Salvation Army, weren’t you?”

“Well—” Martin hesitated.

“Don’t be ashamed. To err is human, as somebody-or-other-once said. Readers Digest, wasn’t it? Never mind. The point is, I felt you needed me. So I switched over and came your way.”

“What for?”

“Why, to offer you a ride, of course. Isn’t it better to travel comfortably by train than to inarch along the cold streets behind a Salvation Army band? Hard on the feet, they tell me, and even harder on the eardrums.”

“I’m not sure I’d care to ride your train, sir,” Martin said. “Considering where I’m likely to end up.

“Ah, yes. The old argument.” The Conductor sighed. “I suppose you’d prefer some sort of bargain, is that it?”

“Exactly,” Martin answered.

“Well, I’m afraid I’m all through with that sort of thing. There’s no shortage of prospective passengers any more. Why should I offer you any special inducements?”

“You must want me, or else you wouldn’t have bothered to go out of your way to find me.”

The Conductor sighed again. “There you have a point. Pride was always my besetting weakness, I admit. And somehow I’d hate to lose you to the competition, after thinking of you as my own all these years.” He hesitated. “Yes, I’m prepared to deal with you on your own terms, if you insist.”

“The terms?” Martin asked.

Standard proposition. Anything you want.”

“Ah,” said Martin.

“But I warn you in advance, there’ll be no tricks. I’ll grant you any wish you can name—but in return, you must promise to ride the train when the time comes.”

“Suppose it never comes?”

“It will.”

“Suppose I’ve got the kind of a wish that will keep me off forever?”

“There is no such wish.”

“Don’t be too sure.”

“Let me worry about that,” the Conductor told him. “No matter what you have in mind, I warn you that I’ll collect in the end. And there’ll be none of this last-minute hocus-pocus, either. No last-hour repentances, no blonde frauleins or fancy lawyers showing up to get you off. I offer a clean deal. That is to say, you’ll get what you want, and I’ll get what I want.”

“I’ve heard you trick people. They say you’re worse than a used-car salesman.”

“Now, wait a minute—”

“I apologize,” Martin said, hastily. “But it is supposed to be a fact that you can’t be trusted.”

"I admit it. On the other hand, you seem to think you have found a way out."

"A sure-fire proposition."

"Sure-fire? Very funny!" The man began to chuckle, then halted. "But we waste valuable time, Martin. Let's get down to cases. What do you want from me?"

Martin took a deep breath. "I want to be able to stop Time."

"Right now?"

"No. Not yet. And not for everybody. I realize that would be impossible, of course. But I want to be able to stop Time for myself. Just once, in the future. Whenever I get to a point where I know I'm happy and contented, that's where I'd like to stop. So I can just keep on being happy forever."

"That's quite a proposition," the Conductor mused. "I've got to admit I've never heard anything just like it before—and believe me, I've listened to some lulus in my day." He grinned at Martin. "You've really been thinking about this, haven't you?"

"For years," Martin admitted. Then he coughed. "Well, what do you say?"

"It's not impossible, in terms of your own subjective time-sense," the Conductor murmured. "Yes, I think it could be arranged."

"But I mean really to stop. Not for me just to imagine it."

"I understand. And it can be done."

"Then you'll agree?"

"Why not? I promised you, didn't I? Give me your hand." Martin hesitated. "Will it hurt very much? I mean, I don't like the sight of blood, and—"

"Nonsense! You've been listening to a lot of poppycock. We already have made our bargain, my boy. I merely intend to put something into your hand. The ways and means of fulfilling your wish. After all, there's no telling at just what moment you may decide to exercise the agreement, and I can't drop everything and come running. So it's better if you can regulate matters for yourself."

"You're going to give me a Time-stopper?"

"That's the general idea. As soon as I can decide what would be practical." The Conductor hesitated. "Ah, the very thing! Here, take my watch."

He pulled it out of his vest-pocket; a railroad watch in a silver case. He opened the back and made a delicate adjustment; Martin tried to see just exactly what he was doing, but the fingers moved in a blinding blur.

"There we are," the Conductor smiled. "It's all set, now. When you finally decide where you'd like to call a halt, merely turn the stem in reverse and unwind the watch until it stops. When it stops, Time stops, for you. Simple enough?" And the Conductor dropped the watch into Martin's hand.

The young man closed his fingers tightly around the case. "That's all there is to it, eh?"

"Absolutely. But remember—you can stop the watch only once. So you'd better make sure that you're satisfied with the moment you choose to prolong. I caution you in all fairness; make very certain of your choice."

"I will." Martin grinned. "And since you've been so fair about it, I'll be fair, too. There's one thing you seem to have forgotten. It doesn't really matter what moment I choose. Because once I stop Time for myself, that means I stay where I am forever. I'll never have to get any older. And if I don't get any older, I'll never die. And if I never die, then I'll never have to take a ride on your train."

The Conductor turned away. His shoulders shook convulsively, and he may have been crying. "And you said I was worse than a used-car salesman," he gasped, in a strangled voice.

Then he wandered off into the fog, and the train-whistle gave an impatient shriek, and all at once it was moving swiftly down the track, rumbling out of sight in the darkness.

Martin stood there, blinking down at the silver watch in his hand. If it wasn't that he could actually see it and feel it there, and if he couldn't smell that peculiar odor, he might have thought he'd imagined the whole thing from start to finish—train, Conductor, bargain, and all.

But he had the watch, and he could recognize the scent left by the train as it departed, even though there aren't many locomotives around that use sulphur and brimstone as fuel.

And he had no doubts about his bargain. That's what came of thinking things through to a logical conclusion. Some fools would have settled for wealth, or power, or Kim Novak. Daddy might have sold out for a fifth of whiskey.

Martin knew that he'd made a better deal. Better? It was foolproof. All he needed to do now was choose his moment.

He put the watch in his pocket and started back down the railroad track. He hadn't really had a destination in mind before, but he did now. He was going to find a moment of happiness. . . .

Now young Martin wasn't altogether a ninny. He realized perfectly well that happiness is a relative thing; there are conditions and degrees of contentment, and they vary with one's lot in life. As a hobo, he was often satisfied with a warm handout, a double-length bench in the park, or a can of Sterno made in 1957 (a vintage year). Many a time he had reached a state of momentary bliss through such simple agencies, but he was aware that there were better things. Martin determined to seek them out.

Within two days he was in the great city of Chicago. Quite naturally, he drifted over to West Madison Street, and there he took steps to elevate his role in life. He became a city bum, a panhandler, a moocher. Within a week he had risen to the point where happiness was a meal in a regular one-arm luncheon joint, a two-bit flop on a real army cot in a real flophouse, and a full fifth of muscatel.

There was a night, after enjoying all three of these luxuries to the full, when Martin thought of unwinding his watch at the pinnacle of intoxication. But he also thought of the faces of the honest johns he'd braced for a handout today. Sure, they were squares, but they were prosperous. They wore good clothes, held good jobs, drove nice cars. And for them, happiness was even more ecstatic—they ate dinner in fine hotels, they slept on innerspring mattresses, they drank blended whiskey.

Squares or no, they had something there. Martin fingered his watch, put aside the temptation to hock it for another bottle of muscatel, and went to sleep determined to get himself a job and improve his happiness-quotient.

When he awoke he had a hangover, but the determination was still with him. Before the month was out Martin was working for a general contractor over on the South Side, at one of the big rehabilitation projects. He hated the grind, but the pay was good, and pretty soon he got himself a one-room apartment out on Blue Island Avenue. He was accustomed to eating in decent restaurants now, and he bought himself a comfortable bed, and every Saturday night he went down to the corner tavern. It was all very pleasant, but—

The foreman liked his work and promised him a raise in a month. If he waited around, the raise would mean that he could afford a second-hand car. With a car, he could even start picking up a girl for a date now and then. Other fellows on the job did, and they seemed pretty happy.

So Martin kept on working, and the raise came through and the car came through and pretty soon a couple of girls came through.

The first time it happened, he wanted to unwind his watch immediately. Until he got to thinking about what some of the older men always said. There was a guy named Charlie, for example, who worked alongside him on the hoist. “When you’re young and don’t know the score, maybe you get a kick out of running around with those pigs. But after a while, you want something better. A nice girl of your own. That’s the ticket.”

Martin felt he owed it to himself to find out. If he didn’t like it better, he could always go back to what he had.

Almost six months went by before Martin met Lillian Gillis. By that time he’d had another promotion and was working inside, in the office. They made him go to night school to learn how to do simple book-keeping, but it meant another fifteen bucks extra a week, and it was nicer working indoors.

And Lillian was a lot of fun. When she told him she'd marry him, Martin was almost sure that the time was now. Except that she was sort of—well, she was a nice girl, and she said they'd have to wait until they were married. Of course, Martin couldn't expect to marry her until he had a little more money saved up, and another raise would help, too.

That took a year. Martin was patient, because he knew it was going to be worth it. Every time he had any doubts, he took out his watch and looked at it. But he never showed it to Lillian, or anybody else. Most of the other men wore expensive wristwatches and the old silver railroad watch looked just a little cheap.

Martin smiled as he gazed at the stem. Just a few twists and he'd have something none of these other poor working slobs would ever have. Permanent satisfaction, with his blushing bride—

Only getting married turned out to be just the beginning. Sure, it was wonderful, but Lillian told him how much better things would be if they could move into a new place and fix it up. Martin wanted decent furniture, a TV set, a nice car.

So he started taking night courses and got a promotion to the front office. With the baby coming, he wanted to stick around and see his son arrive. And when it came, he realized he'd have to wait until it got a little older, started to walk and talk and develop a personality of its own.

About this time the company sent him out on the road as a trouble-shooter on some of those other jobs, and now he was eating at those good hotels, living high on the hog and the expense-account. More than once he was tempted to unwind his watch. This was the good life. . . . Of course, it would be even better if he just didn't have to work. Sooner or later, if he could cut in on one of the company deals, he could make a pile and retire. Then everything would be ideal.

It happened, but it took time. Martin's son was going to high school before he really got up there into the chips. Martin got a strong hunch that it was now or never, because he wasn’t exactly a kid any more.

But right about then he met Sherry Westcott, and she didn’t seem to think he was middle-aged at all, in spite of the way he was losing hair and adding stomach. She taught him that a toupee could cover the bald spot and a cummerbund could cover the pot-gut. In fact, she taught him quite a lot and he so enjoyed learning that he actually took out his watch and prepared to unwind it.

Unfortunately, he chose the very moment that the private detectives broke down the door of the hotel room, and then there was a long stretch of time when Martin was so busy fighting the divorce action that he couldn’t honestly say he was enjoying any given moment.

When he made the final settlement with Lil he was broke again, and Sherry didn’t seem to think he was so young, after all. So he squared his shoulders and went back to work.

He made his pile, eventually, but it took longer this time, and there wasn’t much chance to have fun along the way. The fancy dames in the fancy cocktail lounges didn’t seem to interest him any more, and neither did the liquor. Besides, the Doc had warned him off that.

But there were other pleasures for a rich man to investigate. Travel, for instance—and not riding the rods from one hick burg to another, either. Martin went around the world by plane and luxury liner. For a while it seemed as though he would find his moment after all, visiting the Taj Mahal by moonlight. Martin pulled out the battered old watch-case, and got ready to unwind it. Nobody else was there to watch him—

And that’s why he hesitated. Sure, this was an enjoyable moment, but he was alone. Lil and the kid were gone, Sherry was gone, and somehow he’d never had time to make any friends. Maybe if he found new congenial people, he’d have the ultimate happiness. That must be the answer—it wasn’t just money or power or sex or seeing beautiful things. The real satisfaction lay in friendship.

So on the boat trip home, Martin tried to strike up a few acquaintances at the ship’s bar. But all these people were much younger, and Martin had nothing in common with them. Also they wanted to dance and drink, and Martin wasn't in condition to appreciate such pastimes. Nevertheless, he tried.

Perhaps that's why he had the little accident the day before they docked in San Francisco. "Little accident" was the ship's doctor's way of describing it, but Martin noticed he looked very grave when he told him to stay in bed, and he'd called an ambulance to meet the liner at the dock and take the patient right to the hospital.

At the hospital, all the expensive treatment and the expensive smiles and the expensive words didn't fool Martin any. He was an old man with a bad heart, and they thought he was going to die.

But he could fool them. He still had the watch. He found it in his coat when he put on his clothes and sneaked out of the hospital.

He didn't have to die. He could cheat death with a single gesture—and lie intended to do it as a free man, out there under a free sky.

That was the real secret of happiness. He understood it now. Not even friendship meant as much as freedom. This was the best thing of all—to be free of friends or family or the furies of the flesh.

Martin walked slowly beside the embankment under the night sky. Come to think of it, he was just about back where he'd started, so many years ago. But the moment was good, good enough to prolong forever. Once a bum, always a bum.

He smiled as he thought about it, and then the smile twisted sharply and suddenly, like the pain twisting sharply and suddenly in his chest. The world began to spin and he fell down on the side of the embankment.

He couldn't see very well, but he was still conscious, and he knew what had happened. Another stroke, and a bad one. Maybe this was it. Except that he wouldn't be a fool any longer. He wouldn't wait to see what was still around the corner.

Right now was his chance to use his power and save his life. And he was going to do it. He could still move, nothing could stop him.

He groped in Iris pocket and pulled out the old silver watch, fumbling with the stem. A few twists and he'd cheat death, he'd never have to ride that Hell-Bound Train. He could go on forever.

Forever.

Martin had never really considered the word before. To go on forever—but how? Did he want to go on forever, like this; a sick old man, lying helplessly here in the grass?

No. He couldn't do it. He wouldn't do it. And suddenly he wanted very much to cry, because he knew that somewhere along the line he'd outsmarted himself. And now it was too late. His eyes dimmed, there was a roaring in his ears . . .

He recognized the roaring, of course, and he wasn't at all surprised to see the train come rushing out of the fog up there on the embankment. He wasn't surprised when it stopped, either, or when the Conductor climbed off and walked slowly towards him.

The Conductor hadn't changed a bit. Even his grin was still the same.

"Hello, Martin," he said. "All aboard."

"I know," Martin whispered. "But you'll have to carry me. I can't walk. I'm not even really talking any more, am I?"

"Yes you are," the Conductor said. "I can hear you fine. And you can walk, too." He leaned down and placed his hand on Martin's chest. There was a moment of icy numbness, and then, sure enough, Martin could walk after all.

He got up and followed the Conductor along the slope, moving to the side of the train.

"In here?" he asked.

"No, the next car," the Conductor murmured. "I guess you're entitled to ride Pullman. After all, you're quite a successful man. You've tasted the joys of wealth and position and prestige. You've known the pleasures of marriage and fatherhood. You've sampled the delights of dining and drinking and debauchery, too, and you travelled high, wide and handsome. So let's not have any last-minute recriminations."

“All right,” Martin sighed. “I can’t blame you for my mistakes.

On the other hand, you can’t take credit for what happened, either. I worked for everything I got. I did it all on my own. I didn’t even need your watch.”

“So you didn’t,” the Conductor said, smiling. “But would you mind giving it back to me now?”

“Need it for the next sucker, eh?” Martin muttered.

“Perhaps.”

Something about the way he said it made Martin look up. He tried to see the Conductor’s eyes, but the brim of his cap cast a shadow. So Martin looked down at the watch instead.

“Tell me something,” he said, softly. “If I give you the watch, what will you do with it?”

“Why, throw it into the ditch,” the Conductor told him. “That’s all I’ll do with it.” And he held out his hand.

“What if somebody comes along and finds it? And twists the stem backwards, and stops Time?”

“Nobody would do that,” the Conductor murmured. “Even if they knew.”

“You mean, it was all a trick? This is only an ordinary, cheap watch?”

“I didn’t say that,” whispered the Conductor. “I only said that no one has ever twisted the stem backwards. They’ve all been like you, Martin—looking ahead to find that perfect happiness. Waiting for the moment that never comes.”

The Conductor held out his hand again.

Martin sighed and shook his head. “You cheated me after all.”

“You cheated yourself, Martin. And now you’re going to ride that Hell-Bound Train.”

He pushed Martin up the steps and into the car ahead. As he entered, the train began to move and the whistle screamed. And Martin stood there in the swaying Pullman, gazing down the aisle at the other passengers. He could see them sitting there, and somehow it didn’t seem strange at all.

Here they were; the drunks and the sinners, the gambling men and the grifters, the big-time spenders, the skirt-chasers, and all the jolly crew. They knew where they were going, of course, but they didn't seem to give a damn. The blinds were drawn on the windows, yet it was light inside, and they were all living it up—singing and passing the bottle and roaring with laughter, throwing the dice and telling their jokes and bragging their big brags, just the way Daddy used to sing about them in the old song.

"Mighty nice traveling companions," Martin said. "Why, I've never seen such a pleasant bunch of people. I mean, they seem to be really enjoying themselves!" The Conductor shrugged. "I'm afraid things won't be quite so jazzy when we pull into that Depot Way Down Yonder."

For the third time, he held out his hand. "Now, before you sit down, if you'll just give me that watch. A bargain's a bargain—" Martin smiled. "A bargain's a bargain," he echoed. "I agreed to ride your train if I could stop Time when I found the right moment of happiness. And I think I'm about as happy right here as I've ever been."

Very slowly, Martin took hold of the silver watch-stem.

"No!" gasped the Conductor. "No!"

But the watch-stem turned.

"Do you realize what you've done?" the Conductor yelled. "Now we'll never reach the Depot! We'll just go on riding, all of us—forever!"

Martin grinned. "I know," he said. "But the fun is in the trip, not the destination. You taught me that. And I'm looking forward to a wonderful trip. Look, maybe I can even help. If you were to find me another one of those caps, now, and let me keep this watch—"

And that's the way it finally worked out. Wearing his cap and carrying his battered old silver watch, there's no happier person in or out of this world—now and forever—than Martin. Martin, the new Brakeman on That Hellhound Train.

That Old Black Magic

They told me that Jed Connors was the oldest booking agent in the business, and that I could probably find him in a little joint called the Firefly Club, at the bar.

Every word of it was true. He was there, all right, and he was at the bar, and there was no doubt in my mind, after looking at him, that he was the oldest agent in the business. For all I knew, he might have been the oldest man in the world. He certainly looked the part.

I had no trouble getting acquainted. The minute I slid onto the stool next to his and suggested a drink, he began to talk. And when I introduced myself, the floodgates opened.

“Writer, huh?” Some of the wrinkles in his face arranged themselves in a smile. “Suppose you’re after a story about me. Well, like the fella says, half the lies told about me aren’t true. Mebbe I am the oldest booker in show biz, but that gag about me promoting Jenny Lind’s first tour is just a rib. I been handling talent for over fifty years, though. When I started out, I booked the big ones into the Palace. Today I’m down to working the Borscht Circuit, and I’ll even line up acts for a stag smoker if I have to. I’m not ashamed. A guy’s got to eat, even with false teeth. But if you’re looking for copy, I can give it to you. What did you have in mind? I’ve always thought the story of my life would make a great book. A great book. All’s I need is a smart young fella like you to sort of whip it into shape. Say, how’d you like to—”

I shook my head and he started to frown. But the smile came back when I signaled the bartender for a refill.

“Sounds like a good idea, Mr. Connors,” I told him. “We’ll have to talk about it some other time. Right now, though, I’m here for another reason. I was told you could give me the dope on Harlow Black.”

The frown came back. The drinks arrived too, but the frown didn’t disappear.

“Harlow Black? You wouldn’t want to know anything about him, son. That’s ancient history. Nobody cares about magicians any more, and besides, he’s been dead for over twenty years.”

“That’s just the point,” I explained. “There’s a pretty good magazine market for articles on colorful old-timers. And right now, Harlow Black is back in the news.” I nudged the drink his way. “You were his agent, weren’t you? I should think you’d have a lot to say about him.”

“Think what you please. I got nothing to say about Harlow Black. He was just another act. A screwball. All acts are screwballs, but magicians are screwier than the rest.”

“Now we’re getting somewhere,” I said. “The screwball angle, this is what I’m after. Wasn’t there some crazy business about a murder, and—”

The old man shook his head. “I wouldn’t know,” he muttered. “Now if you’re after some real material, why not take Raymond Hitchcock, say? Or Sam Bernard, there was a character for you! Let me tell you about old Sam.”

“Tell me about Harlow Black,” I persisted. “I want to write him up while the news item is fresh.”

The old eyes blinked. “News item? You keep talking about that all the time, fella. What do you mean?”

“Haven’t you seen it?” I pulled the clipping out of my pocket. “It’s about Black’s brother Henry. He and his wife were killed in a plane crash out on the Coast yesterday.”

“Let me see that.” He wasn’t polite about it; he grabbed. “Yes, that’s right. Henry J. Black. And they identified the body, guess there’s no mistake. He’s dead.”

Suddenly the elderly agent was sitting up straight on his stool again. Maybe it was a trick of the light, but he seemed to look twenty years younger. Twenty years. Harlow Black had been dead about that length of time—

"Bartender! Do it again!" Some kind of a miracle had definitely occurred, because the old man was buying. And he handed me back the clipping and said, "All right. Now I can talk. But let's take our drinks over to a booth, huh? What I've got to say may take a little time. Anyhow, I've waited twenty years to say it."

Well, if he had waited twenty years to talk, I could wait twenty minutes to listen. We took a booth.

I'm not going to bother with quotation marks from now on, because it's all the old man's story. I'm not going to say whether I believe it or not, either; for all I know, there may still be a few relatives around, ready to spring a lawsuit. The only thing to do is set down what Jed Connors had to say. And this is what he told me about Harlow Black. . . .

I said nobody cares about magicians any more, and that's the truth. But in the old vaude days, they were the biggest of the Big Time. Even toured with their own shows. I ran into a lot of 'em, handled a few, and knew 'em all. That is, I knew 'em as well as anybody ever got to know a magician.

They were a pretty close-mouthed bunch, the whole crew—mentalists, prestidigitators, escape artists—all alike. Put up a big mysterious front, because mystery was their stock in trade, from Anna Eva Fay on down to Dunninger today. And of course none of them ever talked about their tricks. I never found out about any of the great illusions, either; Chung Ling Soo's bullet-catching act, or old Kellar and his stunts, or even Fred Keating and his canary-cage routine. But to me, the biggest mystery of all was this—why did so many of the top magicians have names beginning with H? Look at the line-up and you'll see what I mean. There was Hermann the Great, and Harry Houdini, and Harry Blackstone, and Howard Thurston. And Harlow Black. Last, but not least.

Because for my money, Harlow Black was the greatest. I don't suppose you're old enough to remember him during his peak years. Whenever he booked into a town, he used to run this advance ad in the papers—,i can get out of anything! That's the way the challenge read, and he'd go on to give a list. Strait jackets, handcuffs, milk-cans, packing cases, jail cells, trunks, vaults, even refrigerator cars. He meant it, too. Because Harlow Black was the best escape artist in the world.

Oh, I'm not knocking Houdini. He was a real showman, that guy. And maybe Harlow Black copied a lot of his stunts, including the challenges to police departments and the like. But Harlow Black had that extra something—maybe it was stage presence. Houdini knew how to sell himself, how to make the tricks look hard, how to play the audience for sympathy. But Harlow Black was one up on Houdini when it came to dressing the act. You see, Houdini was a little guy, really; short and stocky and powerful, but just a little guy with bushy hair. He pitched himself as a skillful performer.

Harlow Black sold magic.

He was tall and dark and he had a mustache, but that was standard for most magicians around that time. Lots of them even dressed up to look like the Devil. Harlow Black didn't bother; he just plain looked like a magician. And he never explained. There was a sort of an air of magic about him.

I know it sounds whacky, but that's the way it was. That's what gave him his big appeal. And it was real. Ask anybody who ever saw him in the vampire bit.

That was Harlow Black's last big turn, the vampire bit. You see, when vaude died, the day of the escape artist was over. The average audience just wouldn't sit still for an hour, or even half an hour or fifteen minutes while a performer tried to get out of a water-pack or a torture cabinet behind a screen. If you wanted to get a booking as a magician, you made like Cardini, or Think-a-Drink Hoffman, maybe. Great entertainers, but not in a class with Harlow Black.

So Harlow Black took out his own show, and I booked him. He had all the standard gimmicks—sawing the girl in half, you know the bits. But he had something more. He had this finale, this vampire bit. He called it A Stake in the Future.

Dracula had just made a hit, and maybe he stole the idea from that. Wherever he got it, the turn used to kill the people. Here was Harlow Black, playing the vampire. Believe me, he looked the part, too! That was half the deal, the way he could stalk out on the stage with his eyes glittering and those white teeth of his gleaming. Then he'd start making with the illusions. Conjuring up wolves out of nowhere, in a puff of smoke. Oh, they were just a bunch of German shepherds, but they looked the part and it was still a great stunt. He had half a dozen good audience-chillers, working against this fake castle backdrop. Then he'd go into the vampire routine with this girl assistant of his. When he put his mouth down to her neck and let the cackle-bladder go, you'd swear he was drinking her blood. Half the women in the crowd would faint. The other half fainted later, usually, when he came to the big trick.

After the business with the girl, the two stooges would rush in and capture him. They'd stick him in this upright coffin, nail down the lid, and put it on a trestle, right there on the stage. Then came the real chiller. They drove the stake into the coffin, right through his heart. You could hear the pounding, see the big silver spike go splintering its way into the wood. Then came the big groan. And the point of the stake, coming through the other side of the coffin, dripping red.

That's when the rest of the ladies fainted. But whoever waited around for the finish, after the lights dimmed and went on again, could see 'em pry the lid open again and display the coffin.

It was empty, of course.

Then the music would come up, and everybody who hadn't fainted would applaud like crazy, and Harlow Black would come out on stage for his final bow—with the big red stain oozing out of his chest.

Oh, it was a real gasser, that act of his! And Harlow Black was a real magician, in my book.

Actually, I never saw too much of the guy when he was off. I routed him, of course, but most of the contract dealings were through his brother, Henry.

Yes, Henry J. Black, the fella who just died. He's the one I got to know, because whenever there was a business arrangement, Harlow sent him in. They didn't travel together; come to think of it, I never saw them together on or off the stage, but whenever something came up, Henry was there to handle it.

Houdini had a brother, too, remember? Theodore, his name was, but he set up an act of his own under the name of Hardeen. Well, that wouldn't have worked with Henry. He wasn't a magician type. Not at all.

Henry was older than Harlow, and quite gray. He was much quieter, too, and if you took a quick look at him, you'd think he was just a bum. A very sloppy dresser. But when it came to talking terms, you'd change your mind about Henry. Maybe he was quiet, but he was nobody's fool. And whenever a problem came up, Henry seemed to hear about it right away. And he'd show around, pronto.

Henry was there when the big problem came.

Her name was Lulu.

I don't have to tell you much about Lulu. There were a lot of Lulus around in show biz in the old days, and they're still around now—although today they have different names, usually with ay in them someplace.

But you know what that fella Shakespeare says about a rose by any other name. And Lulu wasn't exactly a rose. More of a tiger lily, you might say. Black tights. Red hair. A look that took you to bed with her. Get the picture?

Harlow Black did. He put her into his act. She was the gal in the blooddrinking routine, though sometimes I thought it should have been the other way around.

But I kept my thoughts to myself, at least for a while. Harlow Black had put dames into his act before, and it was always the same story. He'd have a big wild affair all season long, but when the summer layover came, the dame would usually disappear.

This time, though, I began getting reports which made me think things were working out a little different. I heard Harlow was talking marriage.

It wasn't that alone which made me hop the Chief for Chicago when Black played there. I happened to have some other deals working with Balaban and Katz. But at the same time, I made it a point to look up Black and see for myself. He was one of the biggest names in my stable, and I liked to keep tabs on his welfare. I knew Harlow Black always had a reputation for being a jealous, possessive sort of guy, and I wanted to check on this Lulu deal. If she turned out to be some kind of tramp, I knew there could be trouble.

Well, I didn't have to do much checking.

I merely went backstage the afternoon I arrived, looking for Black. Turned out that what I didn't know was there were two star dressing-rooms in this particular theatre, and by mistake I chose the wrong one. I got Lulu's instead of Harlow's.

Only it wasn't really a mistake.

Because when I opened the door, there was this redheaded dame in a clinch with Tom Martin, one of the two stooges who worked the stakepounding bit in the act.

I came in without knocking and I went out without a sound. I doubt if either of them saw me, because they were too wrapped up in each other—and that's not just a figure of speech, brother.

Anyway, I didn't stick around to see Harlow Black. Instead, I finished my other business in town and headed home. I wanted some time to think things over.

Then the show finished its route and came back to New York that summer.

That's when these marriage stories began to pile up. And that's when I decided to have a little talk. Not with Harlow, but with brother Henry.

He was coming in anyway, to discuss plans for the fall, and when he did, I let him have it.

Henry was a pale man, but when I told him about Lulu he turned even paler. I told you had a quiet voice, but when he spoke to me now it was scarcely a whisper.

“You’re sure?” he asked.

I nodded.

“And it was Tom Martin?”

I nodded again. “You’d better tip your brother off,” I said. “She’s nothing but another roundheels. But I’m surprised he doesn’t know. All you have to do is take one look at the dame.”

“But he loves her. He wants to marry her.”

I stopped nodding and shook my head. Versatile.

“It’ll never work,” I told him. “Get rid of her.”

“Maybe it would be easier to get rid of Tom Martin,” Henry suggested.

I went right on shaking my head. “Take my word for it. If it isn’t Tom Martin, it’ll be some other guy. She’s just that kind.”

Henry sighed. “I can’t believe it,” he muttered. “She seems so devoted to him. I could swear—”

“There’ll be a hell of a lot of swearing unless you get this straightened out,” I warned him. “My advice is to go to Harlow and put the cards on the table.”

So Henry went to Harlow and put his cards on the table. And the next day, Harlow Black disappeared.

“But he didn’t leave town,” Henry told me, that afternoon in my office. “He wouldn’t run off. I think it was murder. I’m going to ask for an investigation.”

“Take it easy,” I told him. “Wait a few days, see what happens. Maybe he’ll show up.”

Henry shook his head. He looked old, and tired. I couldn’t see his eyes under the drooping lids.

“He’ll never show up alive. I know.”

And that was all I could get out of him. When he went to the police, they didn't get much more.

The first thing the cops did was call in Lulu and Tom Martin. They told a straight story.

Henry had talked to his brother, all right, and Harlow lost no time in going around to see Lulu. When he walked into her hotel room the following night, Tom Martin was there.

Lulu claimed she was honest about it. She told Harlow Black to his face that she loved Tom, that they planned to get married.

According to her story, Harlow just wilted and walked out. This was pretty hard for me to believe, knowing him the way I did. Harlow Black wasn't the wilting kind.

But the police believed it. Harlow Black did walk out of that hotel room, that's certain. People in the lobby downstairs saw him go. And there were a couple of others down the street who thought they could identify the man who walked toward the river that night in the fog.

As for Lulu and Tom Martin, they had an alibi for the rest of the evening. It wasn't a pretty one, but it made sense. They'd spent the night together in her hotel room.

There was a big spread in the papers, of course, but there the matter rested for a couple of weeks.

But Henry Black didn't rest. I wasn't used to seeing Henry around very much, and now he was in my office every day.

"Why don't they do something?" he kept saying.

"What do you expect them to do? The word is out on your brother's disappearance. He's known, he'll be recognized, even if he shows up in Mexico. They're checking with all the depots and airports—"

Henry shook his head. "He won't show up in Mexico or anywhere else. He didn't need transportation for the trip he took. Somebody gave him a one-way ticket."

"Then what do you suggest?"

"I want them to drag the river," he said.

And finally, that's just what they did. Must have been three weeks later that they found something.

It wasn't too hard to find something in the East River in those days. Gangsters didn't waste money on funerals if they could help it. I remember the old vaude gag that went the rounds about gangsters—"Don't put all your yeggs in one casket."

But this is nothing to joke about. Because they came up with a body.

Matter of fact, they came up with two bodies. One was a woman, and she'd jumped a day or so before. The other had been in the water about three weeks. It was a man's corpse, that much they knew, but you know what water does to a body in hot weather. The only way Henry Black finally managed to identify it was by the ring on one swollen finger.

It was Harlow Black.

That's the way he testified before the coroner's jury, and that's the way it ended. Lulu and Tom Martin told their stories again, and so did the witnesses who had seen Harlow Black leave the hotel and head for the river. It looked as if he'd taken a walk down there to think things over, slipped off the pier in the fog, and drowned.

So the verdict was accidental death, and the whispering campaign said it was suicide.

The Lambs and the Friars got ready for a big funeral, but Henry Black wouldn't hear of it.

"My brother was not a churchgoer," he said. "He didn't believe in ceremonies. We'll have a private interment."

It was damned private, too. Just Henry, Lulu, Tom Martin and I rode out to the little cemetery in Queens.

I won't forget that afternoon. It was raining, of course, and I felt like hell. Not only because of what had happened but because of the tension in the air. Henry was acting mighty odd.

Lulu and Tom Martin knew it, too.

All the way out there, in the car, he wouldn't speak to them. He just kept staring. It wasn't until we saw the coffin lowered into the grave that he talked.

"What are your plans?" he asked.

Lulu shrugged. "Nothing's changed," she said. "Tom and I are still going to get married."

Henry shook his head.

"Harlow wouldn't like that," he said.

"But Harlow's dead."

Henry shook his head again.

"What do you mean?"

"I talked to him last night."

"You—what?"

"Well, put it this way. He talked to me."

"You mean he's alive?"

"I didn't say that."

"But when I said he was dead, you shook your head."

Henry blinked. "What do we know about life and death?" he asked. "That was Harlow's question, remember? Didn't he ever speak to you about that, Lulu?"

"You mean spiritualism, stuff like that? I never paid any attention to such nonsense."

"If you'd been in my room last night, you'd have paid attention," Henry told her. "Harlow was there. He spoke to me. He told me to warn you two. You must never marry. That is to be your punishment for what happened."

"What do you mean?" Tom Martin demanded. "What are you getting at?"

"Do you really want me to tell you?" Henry answered. "In front of him?" And he nodded toward me.

Tom Martin got very white, and I thought Lulu would pass out.

Henry shrugged. "Maybe it was a hallucination, or a dream. I'm just passing the word along. The two of you are to separate, for good. If not—"

He left it at that, and turned away. I rode back to town with him in one car, and Lulu and Tom Martin took another.

“All right, now,” I said to Henry. “What was all that about? Did you really talk to Harlow?”

He sighed. “I won’t try to convert you to spiritualism. But how else would I know the truth? You saw the way Lulu and Tom took it, didn’t you?”

“Cut out the mystery. That was your brother’s racket. What are you getting at?”

“The truth, like I said. Which is that they killed Harlow. Or Tom did, rather. He followed him when he left, caught up with him down on the pier. Then he knocked Harlow over the head and dumped him into the water.”

“But you can’t prove it! The police would never believe—”

Henry nodded. “I guess they wouldn’t. The important thing is, Lulu and Tom Martin believe it.”

“All right,” I said. “That’s your theory. And you cooked up the ghost story just to keep them from getting married, as a sort of revenge for your brother, is that it? Well, I don’t like the idea, Henry.”

“It isn’t an idea,” Henry insisted. “I know. And I know my brother, too. The way he felt about Lulu.” He paused. “Look, do me a favor. If you ever get wind that those two are together, give them another warning. I’d hate to see Harlow come back from the grave—”

“Knock it off,” I said. And meant it. All this talk was getting me down. It was crazy. Or Henry was crazy. Maybe the poor old guy had flipped over his brother’s death. The quiet ones do, sometimes. You know the old saying about still waters run deep. I wondered what Henry would do now that Harlow was gone and the act was finished.

But it wasn’t my problem, and I was glad to say goodbye to him. Frankly, he gave me the creeps. I didn’t like his murder theory and I didn’t like the crazy line about coming back from the grave.

Still, I remembered it.

And two months later, when I got tipped off about Lulu and Tom Martin running off to Jersey to get married, I decided to do something about it.

Against my better judgment, I called Henry at his brother's house, where he'd been staying ever since Harlow had died. I was almost relieved when I couldn't locate him there, until I realized that if anyone was to do anything, it would have to be me.

My tip had included information on where Lulu and Tom Martin were staying; they were in Atlantic City.

So that night I went down.

I didn't have any trouble locating them. They had a big suite at one of the big hotels, and they were throwing a champagne party. I got the red carpet treatment, but no chance to do any talking while the brawl went on. And it went on for quite a while.

It must have been close to two o'clock when the guests cleared out. I stuck around, waiting for my chance. By this time, I'd taken on quite a load myself, and I was a little hazy about just what I intended to say.

Mind you, I didn't believe any of that warning from the grave hooey. But I wanted to pass the word along. Just in case.

So finally we got together in the parlor of the suite, and Lulu kicked off her shoes, and Tom went around turning off the overhead lights and one of the lamps, and we got ready to relax.

And that's when the bedroom door opened.

At first we thought it was one of the guests, somebody who'd been sleeping it off. We turned, ready to make with the wisecracks.

But there were no wisecracks when Harlow Black walked into the room.

He stood there in his evening dress and his eyes glittered. He didn't look like a ghost and he didn't look like a man. He looked like a magician. He looked like a vampire, like something which couldn't die.

All of us were a little loaded, but one look at him sobered us up. We sat there and stared while Harlow Black walked over to the sofa where the bride and groom were sitting.

And he looked down at them with his gleaming eyes and he opened his mouth and showed his gleaming teeth, and he reached into his coat and pulled out the gleaming knife.

I recognized the knife, of course. It was the one he used regularly in his act.

I recognized it by the curved hilt, that quivered back and forth after the blade plunged into Tom Martin’s heart.

He toppled over on the floor, and the knife quivered, and Lulu and I stared at it, and when we looked up again Harlow Black was gone.

Then Lulu screamed.

What happened after that was rugged. The cops, the jail, the hearing, the inquest—it was all a nightmare. But nothing like the nightmare that started it, the nightmare of seeing Harlow Black again.

They tried to pin the rap on me, and then they tried to pin it on Lulu. But they couldn’t, of course. Henry showed up the next day and told his story, and I guess he was the one who suggested in his quiet way that they check the fingerprints on the knife against some old ones in police files all over the country. You see, when Harlow Black used to do the escape act from jail cells, part of the gag was to book him in like a regular prisoner and give him the works—take his fingerprints and everything.

So they checked.

And found Harlow Black’s fingerprints on the knife.

After that they had to let us go. I don’t know where Lulu went, but I had to hide out for a couple of weeks until the excitement died down. The papers had a fine time. Harlow Black wasn’t dead. He was dead and had come back from the grave. It was all a publicity stunt.

Oh, they had quite a time.

And so did I. Finally I caught up with Henry.

“All right,” I said. “Let’s have it. This damned gag has gone far enough. Ruined my business, nearly got me a stretch in pokey. I want a straight answer. Where’s that crazy brother of yours? Where’s Harlow?”

Henry blinked at me. “I haven’t seen him,” he said. “You’re the one who claims he did.”

“Damned right I did. And dead men don’t go around committing murder.”

"But he swore he would. He swore he'd come back. He kept his word."

"I'll never buy that."

Henry spread his hands. "Would it interest you to find out?" he asked, softly. "The police are going to reopen his grave and examine the body again. This afternoon. Do you want to come along?"

I went along.

And I stood there with Henry, at the side of the excavation, while the gravediggers shoveled and sweated and finally brought up the coffin.

I stared at the coffin and Henry stared at me.

"He said he'd come back from the grave," Henry whispered.

That's when I passed out. When I looked at the empty coffin in Harlow Black's grave. The coffin that had been splintered and forced from inside. . . .

It's time for quotation marks again. And it was time for another drink, too, when Jed Connors finished his story.

Only I wasn't so sure it was finished.

"What happened then?" I asked.

He waved his hand vaguely. "Big sensation. Nationwide search for Harlow Black. More fuss in the papers. I holed up for almost a year before things finally died down."

"But they never found Harlow Black?"

He shook his head. "Never."

"And what became of Henry?"

"He went abroad until the heat was off. Refused to talk about it any more. Never gave any more interviews, either. When he came back he drifted out to the Coast—he'd gone into some business or other out there—and a little while later I heard he got married. That was the last, until you showed me this clipping. He's dead, now."

"That's right," I said. "He's dead now, and when you heard about it, you suddenly decided you could talk. So tell me the rest of it."

Jed Connors smiled and lifted his glass. “Pretty smart, aren’t you? All right, I guess I might as well. Took me a while to figure things out—but after all, I’ve had more than twenty years. And I guess I know, now. In fact, I knew the truth right there at the grave, when I fainted.

“It wasn’t the sight of the empty coffin that made me pass out. It was seeing Henry stare at me. Stare at me with his eyes open. I’d have recognized that glitter anywhere. He had Harlow’s eyes.”

“You mean, Henry and his brother had—?”

The little agent sighed.

“There was no Henry,” he said. “Just Harlow Black. Figure it out for yourself. Nobody ever saw the two of them together—I never did. Henry was just Harlow Black’s offstage character. Without the hair rinse, the false mustache, the built-up shoes, the fancy clothes and the loud voice. Harlow Black used Henry as a disguise, for business purposes. A screwball trick, but like I said, magicians are the screwiest.

“But that’s how he knew what he claimed to know, about Harlow Black being followed by Tom Martin that night, getting slugged and thrown into the water. Which is probably just what really happened. Only the water revived him, and he crawled out like the old escape artist he was. Crawled out and plotted revenge.

“How he planted his ring on the finger of the corpse, I dunno. Maybe he did it the very night he was slugged—maybe he went out and murdered a guy, then slipped a ring on his finger and waited for the body to show up. I wouldn’t put anything past him. Not Harlow Black!

“Anyway, it worked. But the police wouldn’t indict Tom Martin because of Lulu’s alibi. So Harlow rigged up his little ghost story to frighten the two of them, keep them apart. And when that idea fell through, he merely walked in and killed Tom Martin in cold blood.”

I gulped my drink. “But what about the grave?” I asked.

The agent grinned. “Leave it to Harlow Black to build an illusion,” he said. “Simple trick for him to sneak out there the night before it was to be opened and do a little digging himself. Splinter the coffin, nail the lid back on.

“And the body? What did he do with the body?”

“Who knows? Dumped it somewhere, maybe back in the river again. I didn’t ask. I didn’t even want to think about it.”

“You never told this story to the police?”

“I told you I didn’t want to think about it. With a guy like Harlow Black running around loose, it wasn’t safe to ask questions. Besides, in a way, everything worked out. Tom Martin did steal his girl and try to murder him. He got what was coming to him, all right. And so did Harlow.”

I looked at the little agent. “You’re sure you recognized him?”

“Positive. And when I saw those eyes of his, I knew all I had to know. Which was to keep my mouth shut, as long as he lived. Nobody could stand in Harlow Black’s way when he was after what he wanted.”

“But he wanted Lulu.”

“He got her, too. Didn’t I tell you that when Henry came back and went out to the Coast he got married?”

“Lulu? You mean after all that happened, after all he knew, he came back posing as his own brother and married the girl?”

The agent shook his head solemnly. “Love,” he said. “That old black magic. Besides, didn’t I tell you magicians were all screwballs?”

Block That Metaphor

In dealing with Mechs, "Guard your tongue" was the worst advice—they would obligingly guard it for you!

IT was to be a formal affair-white shorts and tails—and Lane Borden wondered just how well Vorm would fit in.

The servants and attaches here at the Embassy were used to the presence of visiting extraterrestials, but even they seemed disturbed by Vorm.

If he had been a mere robot, there wouldn't be any problem, but the idea of a sentient intelligence housed in a wholly synthetic body was difficult to accept. The body itself was not repulsive; it was largely metallic, but humanoid in its general contours. There were some rather disturbing differences, though.

An engineer would probably grant the advantage of having six visual perceptors, or "eyes," situated equidistantly around the entire cranial compartment. Still, the knowledge that Vorm really had "eyes in the back of his head" and could observe everything in a room simultaneously created an unnerving effect Then, too, Vorm's "mouth" was just a speaking-tube, and as for his "nose"—

Lane Borden remembered what had happened earlier in the afternoon, when he'd conducted Vorm into his own apartments at the Embassy for a little informal chat That was when Borden's fiancée had made an unexpected appearance.

Borden was justly proud of Margaret Zurich. She was a strikingly beautiful woman and an intergalactically famous pianist—one of the few who still excelled in the ancient art of non-electronic musicianship. Borden really envied her talent.

But when she abruptly entered the room where he sat with Vorm, he felt neither pride nor envy, merely a frantic fear.

“Excuse me a moment,” he said, nodding to Vorm as he rose and crossed over to Margaret Zurich. Before she could object, he took her arm and led her out into the anteroom. Even so, he wasn’t at all certain that he’d managed to act in time to prevent a crisis.

“DARLING, what’s the matter?” Margaret asked. She stared at Borden’s throat. “And what’s that thing you’re wearing around your neck?”

“It’s a jammer,” Borden told her, opening a desk drawer and producing a duplicate of the contrivance. “Just take this one for yourself. Here, I’ll show you how to put it on.”

“But whatever for?”

“You’ve heard of jammers, haven’t you?”

“Oh. Of course. I’ve just never seen one.” She frowned. “You mean that creature in there is a telepath?”

“No, not in the ordinary sense. This instrument doesn’t scramble thought patterns. You’ll notice it’s worn around the neck, at the larynx. It scrambles subvocalizations.”

“The thoughts one put into words but doesn’t speak aloud?”

“Close enough. The point is he has unusual hearing ability which extends to detecting subvocalizations. That’s why we wear jammers—to scramble the unspoken sounds.”

“But I don’t—”

“Please, we’ll discuss it later. I don’t want to keep my guest waiting.”

Throat masked, pulse obscured by electronic impulse, Margaret reentered the room and met the visitor.

She seemed startled by Vorm's appearance, and even more startled when he acknowledged her introduction by abruptly reaching up and unscrewing the flaring spout above his speaking-tube. He reached into the diplomatic pouch strapped to his waist and drew out a blunt nozzle which he inserted in the gaping hole.

Margaret Zurich pretended not to notice, but Borden could see she was unsettled. Later on, he must take her aside and explain that nose-changing was a token of polite greeting in Vorm's world. Vorm's race did not need noses.

Once, perhaps, millenia ago, they had been creatures of flesh and blood. Then, like hermit crabs, they had retreated into their synthetic shells; created the shells, in fact, to shield themselves from mortal frailties. They had substituted mechanical evolution for physical evolution and now only the intelligence remained, encased in fabricated bodies that were wholly functional.

In a completely prostheticized body, the nose was only a special tool. The diplomatic pouch Vorm carried must contain a dozen different nasal attachments, each one designed for use in a given situation. Borden knew of one which served as a drill, another which was a sort of acetylene torch, still another which was merely a great razor-sharp cutting instrument. These were all useful to Vorm's race in the mines of their planet.

YES, Borden would have to make Margaret understand Vorm's alienness, his super-sensitive faculties, his freedom from the physiological demands of eating, voiding, sleeping. Margaret was not like those in the street mobs who yelled, "Down with the dirty Mechs!" Mechs. Mechanical monsters, without regard for human feelings or human lives.

Borden would set Margaret straight on that point, too. It had been an accident when the Mechs killed some of the humans in the first contact crew to reach their planet. The crew hadn't known that the Mechs could detect subvocalizations, nor had they realized another important psychological difference. The Mechs interpreted everything literally. There were no similes, no figures of speech, no abstractions or hyperbole in their concepts.

So when a crew member, exhausted by the rigors of the long journey and discouraged by his first glimpse of the barren planet, had subvocalized to himself, “Volunteering for an expedition like this—I ought to have my head examined!” the Mechs had taken him obligingly but lethally at his unspoken word.

There had been more killing, a whole series of tragic incidents, until someone had been astute enough to ask the Mechs the reason for their actions. And the Mechs explained. Apparently they told the truth about everything—just as they accepted every statement of others as the truth. When it was learned that they detected subvocalizations, “heard” them, in fact, like humanly audible speech, the remedy became obvious. From then on, crew members wore quickly improvised jammers. And as an added precaution, they tried to avoid even thinking in exaggerated terms.

Borden and his people had set up the invitation which brought Vorm to Earth, and he'd studied the problems connected with this first visit very thoroughly. The Mechs could be indispensable allies. If the proper treaties and agreements could be made, the Mechs might solve many vital problems. For example, a Mech could work where humans couldn't—in the mines of hot planets, on the peaks of cold planets, and amidst poisonous atmospheres or none at all.

Borden was determined to see that emissary Vorm enjoyed his stay here, but he had to admit that this business of taking everything literally was awkward at times.

For example, before Margaret left the room after her brief visit, she and Borden embraced. Worm didn't comprehend the gesture, and after she departed he indicated his curiosity.

Borden tried to tell him something about physical contact, but the whole concept of tactile, functioning flesh was strange to the prosthetic being.

“No love,” Borden mused. “I know you speak the truth, but it’s hard for me to accept. I just can’t seem to get it through my head.” Vorm reached into the diplomatic pouch and pulled out a gleaming nasal attachment. “I could drill an opening,” he suggested.

BORDEN said hastily, “You don’t understand,” aware that he’d made a slip despite his conscientious effort to avoid one. “I was merely using a figure of speech.”

“Speech is formless.”

Borden nodded. “True. Yours is a realistic race.”

“Very,” Vorm acknowledged. “Perhaps that is why we do not comprehend your emotions.”

“But you do have feelings of your own. You know what I mean when I speak of fear, greed, pride. And you have esthetic appreciation. You have told me that you enjoy music, for example.”

“Yes,” Vorm replied, resonating in amplified excitement. “You promised to play something for me, did you not?”

“Gladly,” Borden told him.

And he was glad of the reminder. It would be easier to play than to continue the discussion on an abstract plane, trying to avoid lingual pitfalls.

Besides, the music might help drown out the disconcerting sound which was faintly audible from outside the Embassy. All afternoon long, the crowds had been parading back and forth, carrying their stupid placards, don’t mix with mechs! and no deals with monsters! were the mildest inscriptions. And the fools kept shouting, “We know you’ve got a Mech in there! Will you bring him out or do you want us to come in and get him?”

Well, they wouldn’t come in. Borden had the gates locked and guards posted. But it was embarrassing under the circumstances. He wished he could go out and explain the truth about those unfortunate first clashes between Vorm's race and the early contact crews. But it would take time to register, even with a person of Margaret's intelligence. In order to make a mob comprehend clearly, a whole campaign of indoctrination and education must be mounted.

Such a campaign was in the works, but it hadn't been launched as yet. Vorm's visit had been premature and unexpected; the best Borden could hope to do was shield him from the hostility of the uninformed masses. So much depended on the success of this meeting—and it was up to Borden, meanwhile, to establish and maintain cordial relations.

Borden knew how to play the role of a charmer. He had a collection of antique tapes, and he put on a few for his visitor. Vorm seemed to enjoy the mild dissonances—the finale of Prokofieffs Chout, the rhythms of Villa-Lobos' Urapuri, Respighi's Fountains of Rome, and other primitive examples of olden "symphonic" musical compositions.

Noting Vorm's reaction, Borden excused himself and went off to dress, leaving his guest happily twiddling with his stereophonic and binaural ear-vents.

VORM'S preoccupation continued long enough for Borden to get down into the dining hall and check on dinner arrangements; long enough for him to admit and greet the guests who arrived—awkwardly but sensibly—through a rear entrance. It just wasn't safe to use the front entry, with the mob outside.

As it grew dark, the crowd increased. They were going to make a big demonstration, Borden knew, but there was no help for it.

He was just thankful that most of the invited guests actually showed up, despite the unpleasant situation. Most of them were government people and all of them had been briefed about their conduct. They wore jammers as a matter of course.

When the group had assembled, Borden brought Vorm into the hall and introduced him around. For the most part, the humans managed to conceal whatever strain or agitation his presence inspired, but there was a noticeable increase in the consumption of before-dinner cocktails. Lawrence, the butler (it was a part of Embassy tradition to employ live servitors), circulated with his tray for a good half-hour or more before dinner was announced.

Vorm went in with Margaret Zurich on his arm. She displayed admirable composure. Again, Borden was proud of her, and he had no reason to be ashamed of his guests. They ate and drank quite naturally and pretended not to notice that Vorm merely sat there and employed his oral orifice for speaking purposes only.

If he felt awkward—or experienced actual repugnance—at the spectacle of human beings ingesting nourishment, he did not betray his reaction. His speaking-tube was in constant use and he seemed pleased to meet so many officials and dignitaries.

Borden noticed that he had inserted a different nasal attachment in honor of the occasion. It was a star-shaped instrument, obviously ornamental, for it was studded with diamonds. Several of the ladies openly admired it. Borden wondered what they would have said if Vorm had chosen instead to wear his drill, or perhaps the long razorlike knife. Surely the ladies would have remembered the "murdering monster" stories and reacted unpleasantly.

For that matter, Vorm probably regarded the throat-jammers as ceremonial decoration. If he was aware of the absence of subvocalizations, he gave no sign.

All was well. There were no untoward incidents during the course of the dinner and Borden was quite relieved at its successful conclusion. He led his guests into the drawing room and there announced that Margaret would play a few selections in honor of the distinguished visitor.

Some of the guests had never actually seen an old-fashioned "piano" before, but all of them were aware of Margaret's reputation as an artist. They settled down to enjoy the impromptu musicale.

Borden and Vorm sat together, directly before the instrument. Vorm seemed fascinated with the spectacle of a "live" performance.

MARGARET'S repertoire was classical, of course. She specialized in the three Bs—Bartok, Brubeck and Bernstein—and Borden sat back, beaming in pride as she played.

"Do you play?" Vorm asked softly.

"A very little," Borden admitted. "But I lack the touch." He hesitated. "Sometimes I think I wasn't cut out for diplomacy. I should have been a—"

There was a sudden crash, and Borden jumped to his feet.

Everyone started at the sound, then stared at the pavement block which had landed on the tesselated floor. Through the broken window came the clamor of the mob outside.

Lawrence hurried over to Borden's side and whispered. Borden faced his guests with a set smile.

"Please don't be alarmed," he said. "There has been a slight accident downstairs. I'll attend to it. Margaret, if you'll be good enough to continue —"

And she did continue, while Borden raced down the hall, then took the stairway steps two at a time. Lawrence followed him with a force-gun such as the guards were holding in the foyer below.

"Nasty," Lawrence said. "They got through the gates somehow. It's all the men can do to keep them from breaking down the door. Captain Rollins is afraid they'll have to open fire soon unless something is done to disperse the crowd. He wants your orders—"

Borden nodded and brushed past him.

"Wait, sir!" the butler quavered. "You aren't going out there, are you? Here, you forgot the gun—"

Borden kept going. At the door, Captain Rollins stepped up to intercept him. Borden walked past without a word and opened the door.

The roar of the mob struck him like a great blow.

"Give us the Mech! We know he's in there!"

Borden raised his hands, palms outward, to show he was unarmed. The gesture had its inevitable, immemorial quieting effect.

Afterward, he couldn't quite remember just what it was he had to, say. But words come easily to the trained diplomat, and Borden had risen to his present position due to superior qualifications.

He started out by telling the crowd they had nothing to fear. Yes, there was a Mech inside, but couldn't they see guards had been posted all around the building for the protection of the public? The Mech couldn't possibly escape to harm anyone. Besides, he didn't want to do any harm. Right now he was listening to music. Yes, the Mech was a music-lover! And if they didn't believe it, they could hear for themselves, through the window.

So there was absolutely no danger. The Mech was guarded, would be guarded until tomorrow, when he'd return to his own planet. He had come here under government invitation, to conclude a treaty. The government needed Mechs to mine metals for the Galaxy.

BORDEN found himself explaining about the death of the crewmen during the first contacts. He went into a simplified description of subvocalization, using his own jammer by way of illustration.

As he lifted it back from his neck, there was a single frightening moment of realization which he forced himself to suppress. Smiling, he went on with his talk.

There was nothing to be alarmed about, he repeated. In fact, the Mech thought the guards were here to protect him—he was afraid of people! If it hadn't been for the music, he'd probably be hiding under his bed right now!

This got a laugh from the mob, and after that the rest was routine. In five minutes, Borden managed to break up the assemblage. In ten minutes, the street in front of the Embassy was almost cleared. Borden was able to turn matters over to Captain Rollins.

"You did a wonderful job, sir," Rollins told him. He paused. "Why, what's the matter?"

"Look at this." Borden held up the jammer. "When I took it off to show the crowd just now, I noticed the input feeder was broken. It isn't working."

"Think it came loose when you removed it?"

"I hope so." Borden's voice was tense. "I'd hate to think I'd been sitting upstairs with our guest without the protection of a jammer." He spied Vorm coming down the stairs, and turned, quickly detaching the jammer from Captain Rollins' throat. "I'll need this," he said. He barely managed to adjust it when Vorm arrived at the foot of the stairway.

"I'm sorry, but I had to come," Vorm said. "I know I caused you this trouble."

"It was all a mistake," Borden answered. "A misunderstanding."

"Gracious of you to say so," Vorm droned, his cranium bobbing. "But I understand what happened. They came to destroy me and you turned them away. You saved me."

"Do not be offended. They just didn't understand."

"I am not offended. I admire you. You see, I do possess certain of your emotions after all. While our race does not comprehend love, it knows admiration. And it knows gratitude. I am grateful to you, Mr. Borden. I must reward you."

"No need, I assure you."

"I shall see to it that we conclude the treaty of which you spoke."

"I am overwhelmed."

"But that is not enough. I must think of something suitable for you, personally."

"Forget it, please."

"I never forget anything."

"Shall we join the others?"

THEY did, and the episode concluded. Margaret made no attempt to resume playing, and in a short while the guests departed. Although reasonably sure that there was no longer any danger from the crowd, Borden insisted that they again use the rear exit. As for Margaret, he persuaded her to stay over for the night. “I’ll feel safer if you do,” he told her.

“Very well, if you insist.”

She said good night to Vorm, and Lawrence escorted her down the hall to one of the guest apartments at the end of the corridor.

Borden was left alone with Vorm, but not for long. He was embarrassed by the Mech’s protestations of gratitude.

“Isn’t there something you want?” he kept repeating.

“Not a thing.” Borden shook his head emphatically. “Now if I may be excused—”

“That is right. You must rest, is it not so? There is much I do not understand about the human structure.”

“Good night.”

“It is, isn’t it?” Vorm agreed.

Borden retired to his own quarters. It had been an eventful evening. The affair was successfully concluded, the mob had dispersed, Vorm was favorably inclined toward a treaty. There was nothing to worry about—except, perhaps, the matter of the defective jammer. Quite probably it had failed when he took it from his throat out there before the mob. But if it had failed earlier—

Frantically, he attempted to recall any subvocalizations he might have made earlier in the course of the evening. It was an almost hopeless effort; one is scarcely aware of the constant and habitual phenomenon. Borden could only hope that his conscious efforts to think and speak only in literal terms had been successful; that he had not inadvertently emitted some perfectly normal idiom which might be capable of disturbing interpretation.

He could not fall into deep slumber until near dawn, and he must have overslept as a consequence, because when he awoke, Lawrence was shaking him and saying something to the effect that Vorm had gone.

“Gone?” Borden sat upright in bed. “But I was to take him to the launching-site myself.”

“Captain Rollins did so, sir. And knowing you were tired—”

"But I meant to say good-by."

"It wasn't really necessary. Vorm told me to express his gratitude."

"That again!"

"I'm afraid so, sir. You seem to have made a lasting impression on him because of your conduct last night. A diplomatic triumph, if I may say so." He coughed. "In fact, he left you a little farewell gift."

LAWRENCE extended the small white box and Borden fumbled with the wrappings.

"What for? More gratitude, I presume?"

"Exactly," Lawrence smiled. "He said he'd spent hours trying to think of something for a man who claimed he had everything. Fortunately, he told me, he forgets nothing. And he happened to remember that you expressed a certain wish last night, which he was happy to be able to fulfill." Borden halted in his efforts to untie the package. "A wish?" he muttered. "I don't recall—"

"He said that now you would be able to play the piano well." Borden put down the package, very slowly.

He stood up, thinking about Vorm. Vorm, who didn't understand love, but who knew gratitude. Vorm, who didn't comprehend human flesh and its frailty, but who knew that he could change parts of his own body at will, by simply unscrewing one instrument and replacing it with another.

Vorm, who took everything absolutely literally. Vorm, who could install a nasal appendage which was like a great razor.

"What's the matter, sir?" Lawrence murmured. "Aren't you even going to look at your gift?"

But Borden was already running down the hall toward Margaret's room.

He knew it was too late, just as he knew what must be in the package. Because now it came to him—he could remember how he and Vorm had sat there watching Margaret play the piano.

"Do you play?" Vorm had asked.

“A very little. But I lack the touch,” Borden had replied. And he’d paused, and the subvocalization must have come then. Yes, it must have come then, and the jammer was already broken, and Vorm had heard the unspoken wish—the wish he’d just granted, literally.

Borden raced down the hall, the subvocalization thundering in his ears. Yes, he remembered the words now. “I wish I had those fingers—”

A Lesson for the Teacher

Ruth Bailey wanted to engage in matrimony. But she was faced with two problems—a gorgeous young competitor and a guy who wanted to practice a while before he signed up.

ALL right," said Ruth Bailey. "Let's face it. I'm thirty-seven.

"Thirty-seven," she repeated. "That's the age when even the biggest Hollywood stars have trouble getting another five-year contract from a major studio. The age when a dramatic actress thinks twice before playing a fourteen-year-old Juliet, and then goes ahead and does it anyway, praying that the critics will be kind. At thirty-seven the career woman stops being a private secretary and begins to climb. It's the time when a prostitute has to decide whether to become a madame or a scrubwoman; when a society matron sheds her third husband and looks for a fourth, and the housewife starts pestering her husband about moving out to the suburbs and joining a country club. Why, at thirty-seven some women become grandmothers! Time to sit back and enjoy the menopause that refreshes."

Ruth Bailey shook her head and smiled wryly. "That old saying about life begins at forty may hold true for men, but thirty-seven is the crucial time for most women. And what have I to show for it?"

Nobody answered her question, because Ruth Bailey was talking to herself. She'd found herself getting into the habit lately, and it was beginning to worry her. Lots of things were beginning to worry Ruth recently. Like being lonely at night and nobody giving a damn about her, and overhearing the kids talk about “Old Lady Bailey” at school.

Kids. All those young people.

She sat down on the bed and thought about them for a moment. For fifteen years she’d been a school-teacher, and there’d been nothing in her life but kids. Was it really fifteen years since Nick had been killed in the war? That’s right—she’d been just twenty-two then, and ever since that time she’d taught. The way it looked now, she’d go right on teaching until she retired.

For a while Ruth had thought she might be getting somewhere with Harold Ferris, the manual-training instructor. Things had even reached the point where he invited her over to look at his ship-models.

Maybe she shouldn’t have turned the invitation down. But at the time, Ruth thought it wise to play coy and kittenish. That was last semester, before Ann Corwin came to join the high school faculty. Ann Corwin, the Home Ec instructor—what on earth would a man like Harold Ferris see in her? Why, she was nothing but a young snip!

Ruth’s lips shaped themselves into the wry smile again. That was the answer, of course. Ann Corwin was young. Young, and pretty; just the kind of a girl who any red-blooded manualtraining teacher would invite up to inspect his flotilla. She’d probably seen the whole fleet by now, while as for Ruth—“I guess I just missed the boat,” she told herself.

She rose and stood before the mirror. She didn’t preen. Thirty-seven is no age for preening, if you’re an honest woman. And Ruth was, she insisted, honest. Still, she had to admit what she saw wasn’t too bad. Her hair was still brown and glossy. Her skin, and the flesh beneath it, remained firm. She had good color and her figure wasn’t too bad—maybe she’d been smart never to go in for the uplift bra fad.

“You’re no spring chicken,” she told herself earnestly, “but I’m damned if you’re an old hen, either.”

Well, it was nothing to cackle about. She was still thirty-seven, whether she looked her age or not, and today was her birthday. A fine celebration she was having, too. No relatives in the world to remember the occasion with presents, and Harold Ferris hadn't even sent her a card. No cake, no candles. "Just as well," she mused. "The heat from thirty-seven candles would kill me."

Sure, that was the way.

Laugh it off. Kid herself about it. Only all at once, standing there in front of the glass, Ruth Bailey didn't feel like kidding herself any longer. She peered at the mirror intently—not at her reflection, but at the shiny surface itself. The mirror had been here in her room ever since she moved in, fifteen years ago. Now it was beginning to speckle, to dull and tarnish in spots. You couldn't really notice it until you looked closely, but the process of decay was going on. And it would continue, slowly but inexorably. Eventually the mirror would crack; then it would be discarded in the junk-heap, with nobody to mourn its former, forgotten brightness—

"Oh, stop!" she told herself, turning away. But there was nothing else to look at in the bedroom except the bed. And nothing to do. In spite of all the old jokes, Ruth had never found a man hiding under her bed.

"And what's more, you never will," she said, aloud. "This is the way it's always been, the way it always will be." Her voice broke. "Damn it, why can't there be a man under the bed, just once? Even a brush salesman?"

In a moment, she realized angrily, the tears would come.

Because there was no man under her bed, no man in her bed, no man at all.

Her eyes brightened, ready for liquid release, then widened suddenly at the sound of a knock on the door.

Ruth opened it and stared up at her visitor.

He was young, he was dark, but above all, he was tall. He must have been six feet five, at least, and he towered above her in a way no brush salesman would ever do. Brush salesmen are small and neat and cheerful. This man was big, and he wore a rumpled slack-suit and his gray eyes were grave. But he was a man.

"Miss Bailey?" His voice was deep, very resonant, and he spoke with just the slightest hesitant trace of an accent. "You are Miss Bailey, are you not?"

Ruth nodded, but he didn't seem quite satisfied.

"The Miss Bailey who teaches the Social Science at the upper school?"

"High school," she corrected, congratulating herself that she'd guessed right about the trace of accent. "I teach Social Science, yes."

"Good. I was told I could find you here." He paused. "My name is Clay." He paused again, as if he expected some reaction from Ruth.

"Pleased to meet you," she said, mechanically. Her next phrase was no better, but she had to say something. "What can I do for you?"

"I would like you to teach me."

Ruth blinked. "But—"

"I know. It is all most unregular. But I made to inquire at the school, for someone who would be a private tutor. And you were suggested. It was said that your evenings were free."

Yes, Ruth told herself, my evenings are free.

"Oh, I do not mean that I will not pay," said Clay. He smiled. "My English is not too perfect. That is one of the things I wish you to help me about."

"Then why not take a night-school course in English?" Ruth asked. "There are some very good—"

"Please. I am a stranger, I do not feel yet at ease in a group. Besides, it is not just a matter of language. It is the customs, the folkways, the Social Sciences you instruct, this I wish to learn. I have so little of it where I come from."

"And that is—?" Ruth murmured.

"Martinique," Clay told her. "Fort-de-France."

"The West Indies? How exciting."

Clay shrugged. “Very dull. Very, how you say, provincial. I must learn the whole world. You will help me?” And he smiled again.

The smile decided her. After all, why not? He was a man, a handsome man. And her evenings were free.

“Why not?” Ruth answered. “Shall we say three nights a week? My fee will be five dollars an evening.”

“Agreed. Can we start tomorrow night? Here?”

Ruth hesitated, thinking of her landlady. A mean, gossiping old biddy—she was bound to talk. Well, let her talk. It was about time Ruth gave her something to chew on. About time? It was literally now or never.

Ruth returned Clay’s smile, with interest. “Tomorrow night.” she echoed. “Here.”

And so it began.

At first Ruth was uneasy. How could she work out a formal program of instruction for a grown man? She was no Margaret Mead.

But then, Clay was no ordinary student. He much preferred the informal discussion, the question-and-answer approach. He was not just interested in facts and figures; he did not want mere knowledge, but understanding.

So they talked. They talked of cabbages and kings, and it sometimes became a seminar in philosophy rather than a lesson in civics. Ruth was delighted with Clay’s perceptive mind, with his incisive questions.

Ruth was delighted with Clay, period.

She admitted as much to herself. He was shy, even to the point of reticence, concerning his own background and achievements—but eager to learn every detail of her own existence, past and present. It was all very flattering. His deference to her opinions, his courtesy, his reliance on her judgment, formed a startling contrast to the attitude of her regular daily pupils.

Her daily pupils. Ruth had always found it difficult to face them. Now it was becoming intolerable. The kids were awful, and getting worse. The change had started way back at the end of the war. That’s when the convertibles began to show up in the parking-lot, and the reefers began to turn up in the pockets of the leather jackets. Then came rock-n’-roll and the I’m-Tough cult of Brando and Dean. Respect and responsibility vanished, and with it the wish to learn. Oh, there were still exceptions, and Ruth didn’t make the mistake of damning an entire generation as juvenile delinquents. But sometimes it seems as if the rebel veils of the rebels without a cause drowned out all other sounds, and it was a blessed relief to seek refuge in those nights with Clay. Ruth found herself looking forward to each evening—the three a week she spent teaching, and the two nights when they just went out together.

For that was the most recent development, the going out together. Clay had suggested it.

“Why not?” he argued. “What better way is there for me to learn—how is it said?—the folkways and the culture? To dine, to enjoy the entertainment, it is all a part of Social Sciences.”

Ruth didn’t resist very strenuously. She knew what was happening to her, of course, but she didn’t really care. In fact, she had reached the point where she took an exultant delight in the opportunity to flaunt Clay’s company to the world.

After years of dining in shabby tea-rooms at a deuce-table next to the swinging doors of the kitchen it was pure heaven to walk into a good restaurant on the arm of a handsome man and be wined and dined in style. A childish vanity, childishly phrased, but it meant a lot to the woman in Ruth. And Ruth was increasingly conscious of her womanhood. Once she assured herself that Clay seemed to possess ample funds, she had no further scruples about his extra-curricular attentions. She accepted the pleasures, enjoyed them.

And that, of course, was the cause of her downfall.

Came the inevitable night when she and Clay bumped into Harold Ferris and Ann Corwin. The manual-training teacher and his colleague were out on the town. At first Ruth looked upon the meeting as the climax of her personal triumphs. She enjoyed the astonished look on Harold Ferris's face when introduced to Clay, and was just catty enough to relish the poorly-concealed envy of Ann Corwin when she covertly contrasted her aging escort with Ruth's handsome pupil.

But after Harold and Ann joined them at their table and had a few drinks, Ruth began to regret the affair. Particularly when Clay asked the younger woman to dance.

Harold Ferris was asking her questions about Clay, and she answered impatiently, her eyes and mind intent on the couple circling the floor. They moved perfectly together; the tall, youthful man and the tall, youthful blonde. Youthful. That's what they had in common—youth. They were talking and smiling at one another, and all at once Ruth realized the truth. She wondered if Harold Ferris had any inkling of it; that these two belonged together.

Apparently he did not, for he said nothing and exhibited no sign of jealousy. And there was just the bare possibility that there was no reason for being jealous, either, for when Clay and Ann returned to the table they behaved quite decorously.

When Clay escorted Ruth home that evening, it was as if nothing had changed. He never even spoke of the blonde girl. For a moment Ruth was relieved. Maybe she was just imagining things. As usual, under these circumstances, she began the old interior debate again—should she ask him in? For the corny nightcap, the corny clinch? She'd never dared, knowing it was corny; knowing, at the same time, that she wanted just that. Perhaps tonight was the time.

He was standing outside the door now as she fumbled for her key; he was looking down at her and smiling, and his eyes were warm. She had only to look up and say—

But he said it first.

“I shall not be seeing you tomorrow night.”

“No lesson?”

He shook his head. “We will resume the night after, yes? It is that I have a former—no, a previous—engagement. Yes, other plans.”

“Oh.”

“It is with your friend, the Miss Corwin.”

“Oh,” said Ruth again, and what she wanted to do was cry and curse at the same time, what she wanted to say was, Damn it, did you have to tell me, don’t you even care enough about me to lie about it?

What kind of a man was Clay anyway, to brush her off, come out with it in cold blood, and still stand there and smile at her? So he was a foreigner, he was from Martinique; weren’t Frenchmen supposed to be gallant?

“She is very pretty, Miss Corwin. And I have a feeling I may learn much from her, too. The Social Sciences, you know.”

“Yes,” said Ruth. “The Social Sciences.” She stooped and inserted the key in the lock. “And now will you please go away? I’m very tired.”

“Tired?” A frown creased Clay’s forehead. “But I was hoping we might still talk. There is a thought I wished to express, about the—what is the word?—sexual relationships of society.”

Ruth wanted to laugh in his face. No, that wasn’t true; she wanted to cry in his face. Instead she straightened up and said, very quickly, “Anything you want to learn in that department you can find out from Miss Corwin. She’s an exceptionally competent instructor.”

Then she walked inside and slammed the door.

The next forty-eight hours were the hardest. It was bad that first night, it was worse the next day, it was almost unbearable the night following, and the succeeding day was utter agony.

But by the time the third evening arrived, Ruth had faced up to everything.

She sat before the mirror after her lonely supper and made her summation. “I should have known nothing would come of it, really. I’m too old for him, for one thing. Besides, I know next to nothing about the man, the whole affair is utterly ridiculous. If he shows up tonight I’m going to tell him to go to hell. Only—

“I love him.”

She could have skipped the rest. But the rest was true, too, and the rest was important. Any good Social Science teacher could tell you that. But at the moment, Ruth was not a good Social Science teacher. She was a frightened, middle-aged woman in love. No, not even a woman—just an emptiness, an emptiness which waited to be filled, wanted to be filled, had to be filled in spite of rhyme or reason. An emptiness sitting on the edge of the bed, gazing into a blank mirror and poised for the sound of footsteps which were going to come this way, must come this way.

They came.

And Ruth rose, and went to the door, knowing what she would say to him, knowing what she would do. She’d not ask questions, she’d not demand answers. She’d just hold out her arms and nothing else would matter.

The girl ran into the room.

“Ann! What are you doing here?”

“Where is he? Where is he?”

“I don’t know. If it’s Clay you mean, he has a room—”

“Yes. I went there first. I told the police to look for him there.”

“Police?”

“Oh, God, I’m so frightened—”

Ruth looked at her. She’d been crying and her face was drawn. Her lips trembled as she spoke.

“He’s crazy, that’s what’s the matter,” Ann was murmuring. “Last night we went out, and then afterwards, in his room—but you know, too, don’t you? I mean, he must have—" She broke off abruptly, shuddering.

"No," said Ruth, softly. "I don't know. Do you want to tell me about it?"

"It wasn't so much what he did. It was the way he talked to me, the way he looked at me—and the questions. I mean, you don't ask questions, not unless you're a maniac. That's when I knew he was crazy. And then I saw the six toes, and he said yes, other things were different, too, and he showed me—" She shuddered again, her voice breaking. "He's a maniac, that's what he is, and I went to the police, and I wanted to warn you. If he comes here, you'd better call them right away." She hesitated. "Is he coming here?"

It was Ruth's turn to hesitate. "I don't think so," she said, at last.

"All right. They'll catch him anyway, at his room when he goes back. They know there's something wrong. I guess they investigated. Harold told me not to worry. I'm going to see him right now, he's waiting for me. But, Ruth, be careful! Please!"

Ruth nodded.

Long after Ann left she was still nodding, nodding to herself and to her reflection in the mirror.

Then she stopped nodding as he came. And she opened the door, and she did not hold out her arms. She just sat there and stared at the floor and said, "The police are looking for you. Ann told them. They know all about you, now."

"All about me?"

"Well, what they don't know, they'll find out. So you might as well tell me, too. Your name isn't Clay, is it? And you're not from Martinique, either. And you have six toes, and—"

"Six toes? Did she tell you that?"

"She told me everything." Ruth looked at him for the first time and was surprised to find him blushing. "How could you?" she sighed. "How could you do it? She thought you were crazy, staring at her and asking her questions. Questions, for heaven's sake! Why on earth—?"

"Because I wanted to learn," he said, softly. "Didn't you say she could teach me? That is why. Because I wanted to learn on earth. Learn everything."

He moved closer and gazed down. "I am not altogether ignorant, you know. I read books first, many books, before I dared make contacts. And I remembered the advice of some of your anthropologists. They say the best way to learn about a different culture is to find a native woman, and discover the customs of the country. That is why I sought Ann."

"Why her, why not me?" Ruth snapped.

"There was a reason."

"I'm too old."

"Old?" The frown appeared on his forehead. Then he smiled and shook his head. "Old? As you reckon time, you are thirty-seven, no?"

"Yes," Ruth admitted.

He took her hand. "That is as I thought. So there is no problem. I, as you reckon time, am four hundred and twelve."

"But—"

"You're not afraid, are you? Because of the age, because of the six toes? Otherwise, basically, we are very much alike. That is why I was sent here, because we discovered how similar you were to us. I came to learn your ways. No, not with any idea of conquest in mind—merely understanding. There is much that your culture can contribute to ours. I found that out from your teaching. At the outset the thought was that I would learn and return home, to become a teacher to my own world. Now I have another idea. If your police are seeking me, it is best if I leave at once. But there is no need for me to go alone. Will you come with me?"

"As a teacher?"

"Yes. He took her other hand. "And as my—what is the word—wife?"

"That's the word," Ruth said, softly. "And there are other words." She stared at him for a moment.

"I love you," he whispered. "Then that's settled." Ruth stood up. "How do you leave?

What does one pack for a trip in a flying saucer?"

He chuckled. "No saucer. Just hold my hands. It is a psycho-physical process which we call czorgy. Oh, there will be much for you to learn now, too."

"I'm sure of it, darling." Ruth grasped his hands.

"Now?" she asked. . . .

There was quite a scandal over Ruth's disappearance with the handsome foreigner. Both Harold Ferris and Ann Corwin were particularly upset.

Unfortunately for their peace of mind, Ruth never reported her whereabouts. It was quite impossible, due to the limitations of the postal system. And even if she could have managed it, she hesitated to send them a card to say that she and her star pupil were honeymooning on far Arcturus.

THE END

This Crowded Earth

1. Harry Collins—1997

THE telescreen lit up promptly at eight a.m. Smiling Brad came on with his usual greeting. “Good morning—it’s a beautiful day in Chicagee!”

Harry Collins rolled over and twitched off the receiver. “This I doubt,” he muttered. He sat up and reached into the closet for his clothing.

Visitors—particularly feminine ones—were always exclaiming over the advantages of Harry’s apartment. “So convenient,” they would say. “Everything handy, right within reach. And think of all the extra steps you save!”

Of course most of them were just being polite and trying to cheer Harry up. They knew damned well that he wasn’t living in one room through any choice of his own. The Housing Act was something you just couldn’t get around; not in Chicagee these days. A bachelor was entitled to one room—no more and no less. And even though Harry was making a speedy buck at the agency, he couldn’t hope to beat the regulations.

There was only one way to beat them and that was to get married. Marriage would automatically entitle him to two rooms—if he could find them someplace.

More than a few of his feminine visitors had hinted at just that, but Harry didn’t respond. Marriage was no solution, the way he figured it. He knew that he couldn’t hope to locate a two-room apartment any closer than eighty miles away. It was bad enough driving forty miles to and from work every morning and night without doubling the distance. If he did find a bigger place, that would mean a three-hour trip each way on one of the commutrains, and the commutrains were murder. The Black Hole of Calcutta, on wheels.

But then, everything was murder, Harry reflected, as he stepped from the toilet to the sink, from the sink to the stove, from the stove to the table.

Powdered eggs for breakfast. That was murder, too. But it was a fast, cheap meal, easy to prepare, and the ingredients didn't waste a lot of storage space. The only trouble was, he hated the way they tasted. Harry wished he had time to eat his breakfasts in a restaurant. He could afford the price, but he couldn't afford to wait in line more than a half-hour or so. His office schedule at the agency started promptly at ten-thirty. And he didn't get out until three-thirty; it was a long, hard five-hour day. Sometimes he wished he worked in the New Philly area, where a four-hour day was the rule. But he supposed that wouldn't mean any real saving in time, because he'd have to live further out. What was the population in New Philly now? Something like 63,000,000, wasn't it? Chicagee was much smaller—only 38,000,000, this year.

This year. Harry shook his head and took a gulp of the Instantea. Yes, this year the population was 38,000,000, and the boundaries of the community extended north to what used to be the old Milwaukee and south past Gary. What would it be like next year, and the year following?

Lately that question had begun to haunt Harry. He couldn't quite figure out why. After all, it was none of his business, really. He had a good job, security, a nice place just two hours from the Loop. He even drove his own car. What more could he ask?

And why did he have to start the day like this, with a blinding headache?

Harry finished his Instantea and considered the matter. Yes, it was beginning again, just as it had on almost every morning for the past month. He'd sit down at the table, eat his usual breakfast, and end up with a headache. Why?

It wasn't the food; for a while he'd deliberately varied his diet, but that didn't make any difference. And he'd had his usual monthly checkup not more than ten days ago, only to be assured there was nothing wrong with him. Still, the headaches persisted. Every morning, when he'd sit down and jerk his head to the left like this—

That was it. Jerking his head to the left. It always seemed to trigger the pain. But why? And where had he picked up this habit of jerking his head to the left?

Harry didn't know.

He glanced at his watch. It was almost nine, now. High time that he got started. He reached over to the interapartment video and dialled the garage downstairs.

"Bill," he said. "Can you bring my car around to Number Three?"

The tiny face in the hand-screen grinned sheepishly. "Mr. Collins, ain't it? Gee, I'm sorry, Mr. Collins. Night crew took on a new man, he must have futzed around with the lists, and I can't find your number."

Harry sighed. "It's one-eight-seven-three-dash-five," he said. "Light blue Pax, two-seater. Do you want the license number, too?"

"No, just your parking number. I'll recognize it when I see it. But God only knows what level it's on. That night man really—"

"Never mind," Harry interrupted. "How soon?"

"Twenty minutes or so. Maybe half an hour."

"Half an hour? I'll be late. Hurry it up!"

Harry clicked the video and shook his head. Half an hour! Well, you had to expect these things if you wanted to be independent and do your own driving today. If he wanted to work his priority through the office, he could get his application honored on the I.C. Line within a month. But the I.C. was just another commutrain, and he couldn't take it. Standing and swaying for almost two hours, fighting the crowds, battling his way in and out of the sidewalk escalators. Besides, there was always the danger of being crushed. He'd seen an old man trampled to death on a Michigan Boulevard escalator-feeder, and he'd never forgotten it.

Being afraid was only a partial reason for his reluctance to change. The worst thing, for Harry, was the thought of all those people; the forced bodily contact, the awareness of smothered breathing, odors, and the crushing confinement of flesh against flesh. It was bad enough in the lines, or on the streets. The commutrain was just too much.

Yet, as a small boy, Harry could remember the day when he'd loved such trips. Sitting there looking out of the window as the scenery whirled past—that was always a thrill when you were a little kid. How long ago had that been? More than twenty years, wasn't it?

Now there weren't any seats, and no windows. Which was just as well, probably, because the scenery didn't whirl past any more, either. Instead, there was a stop at every station on the line, and a constant battle as people jockeyed for position to reach the exit-doors in time.

No, the car was better.

Harry reached for a container in the cabinet and poured out a couple of aspirystamines. That ought to help the headache. At least until he got to the office. Then he could start with the daily quota of yelIo.wjackets. Meanwhile, getting out on the street might help him, too. A shame there wasn't a window in this apartment, but then, what good would it do, really? All he could see through it would be the next apartment.

He shrugged and picked up his coat. Nine-thirty, time to go downstairs. Maybe the car would be located sooner than Bill had promised; after all, he had nine assistants, and not everybody went to work on this first daylight shift.

Harry walked down the hall and punched the elevator button. He looked at the indicator, watched the red band move towards the numeral of this floor, then sweep past it.

"Pull up!" he muttered. "Oh, well."

He reached out and touched both sides of the corridor. That was another thing he disliked; these narrow corridors. Two people could scarcely squeeze past one another without touching. Of course, it did save space to build apartments this way, and space was at a premium. But Harry couldn't get used to it. Now he remembered some of the old buildings that were still around when he was a little boy—

The headache seemed to be getting worse instead of better. Harry looked at the indicator above the other elevator entrance. The red band was crawling upward, passing him to stop on 48. That was the top floor.

Now it was moving down, down; stopping on 47, 46, 45, 44, 43, and—here it was!

“Stand back, please!” said the tape. Harry did his best to oblige, but there wasn’t much room. A good two dozen of his upstairs neighbors jammed the compartment. Harry thought he recognized one or two of the men, but he couldn’t be sure. There were so many people, so many faces. After a while it got so they all seemed to look alike. Yes, and breathed alike, and felt alike when you were squeezed up against them, and you were always being squeezed up against them, wherever you went. And you could smell them, and hear them wheeze and cough, and you went falling down with them into a bottomless pit where your head began to throb and throb and it was hard to move away from all that heat and pressure. It was hard enough just to keep from screaming—

Then the door opened and Harry was catapulted out into the lobby. The mob behind him pushed and clawed because they were in a hurry; they were always in a hurry these days, and if you got in their way they’d trample you down like that old man had been trampled down; there was no room for one man in a crowd any more.

Harry blinked and shook his head.

He gripped the edge of the wall and clung there in an effort to avoid being swept out of the lobby completely. His hands were sticky with perspiration. They slipped off as he slowly inched his way back through the crush of the mob.

“Wait for me!” he called. “Wait for me, I’m going down!” But his voice was lost in the maelstrom of sound just as his body was lost in the maelstrom of motion. Besides, an automatic elevator cannot hear. It is merely a mechanism that goes up and down, just like the other mechanisms that go in and out, or around and around, and you get caught up in them the way a squirrel gets caught in a squirrel-cage and you race and race, and the best you can hope for is to keep up with the machinery.

The elevator door clanged shut before Harry could reach it. He waited for another car to arrive, and this time he stood aside as the crowd emerged, then darted in behind them.

The car descended to the first garage level, and Harry stood gulping gratefully in the comparative isolation. There weren't more than ten people accompanying him.

He emerged on the ramp, gave his number to the attendant, and waved at Bill in his office. Bill seemed to recognize him; at least he nodded, briefly. No sense trying to talk—not in this sullen subterranea, filled with the booming echo of exhausts, the despairing shriek of brakes. Headlights flickered in the darkness as cars whirled past, ascending and descending on the loading platforms. The signal systems winked from the walls, and tires screeched defiance to the warning bells.

Old-fashioned theologians, Harry remembered, used to argue whether there really was a Hell, and if so, had it been created by God or the Devil? Too bad they weren't around today to get an answer to their questions. There was a Hell, and it had been created by General Motors.

Harry's temples began to throb. Through blurred eyes, he saw the attendant beckoning him down the line to a platform marked Check-Out #3. He stood there with a cluster of others, waiting.

What was the matter with him today, anyway? First the headache, and now his feet were hurting. Standing around waiting, that's what did it. This eternal waiting. When he was a kid, the grownups were always complaining about the long seven-hour work days and how they cut into their leisure time. Well, maybe they had reason to gripe, but at least there was some leisure before work began or after it was through. Now that extra time was consumed in waiting. Standing in line, standing in crowds, wearing yourself out doing nothing.

Still, this time it wasn't really so bad. Within ten minutes the light blue Pax rolled up before him. Harry climbed in as the attendant slid out from behind the wheel and prepared to leave.

Then a fat man appeared, running along the ramp. He gestured wildly with a plump thumb. Harry nodded briefly, and the fat man hurled himself into the seat beside him and slammed the door.

They were off. Harry read the signals impatiently, waiting for the green Go. The moment he saw it he gunned his motor and got the car up to twenty-two and zipped away.

That's what he liked, that's what he always waited for. Of course it was dangerous, here in the tunnel system under the garage, but Harry always got a thrill out of speed. The Pax could do thirty-five or even forty, probably, on a theoretical open road. Still, twenty-two was enough to satisfy Harry.

He whizzed up the ramp, turned, headed for the street-level, then braked and waited for the signal to emerge.

Harsh sunlight pierced the smog and he felt his eyes watering. Now the street noises assailed his ears; the grinding of gears, the revving of motors. But at least the total volume was lower, and with the windows tightly closed against the acrid air, he could hear.

Turning to the fat man beside him he said, "Hello, Frazer. What's the urgency V

"Got to get downtown before eleven," the fat man answered. "Board meeting today, but I forgot about it. Knew I wouldn't have time to wait for the car, and I was hoping I'd find someone who'd give me a lift. Lucky for me that you came along when you did."

Harry nodded but did not reply. At the moment he was trying to edge into the traffic beyond. It flowed, bumper to bumper, in a steady stream; a stream moving at the uniform and prescribed rate of fifteen miles per hour. He released his brakes and the Pax nosed forward until a truck sounded its horn in ominous warning. The noise hurt Harry's head; he winced and grimaced.

"What's the matter?" asked Frazer.

"Headache," Harry muttered. He menaced a Chevsoto with his bumper. "Damn it, I thought they didn't allow those big four-passenger jobs on this arterial during rush hours!” Gradually he managed to turn until he was in the righthand lane. “There,” he said. “We’re off.”

And so they were, for all of three minutes, with the speed set at fifteen on autopilot. Then a signal went into action somewhere up ahead, and the procession halted. Harry flicked his switch. As was customary, horns sounded indignantly on all sides—a mechanical protest against a mechanical obstruction. Harry winced again.

“Hangover?” Frazer asked, solicituously. “Try aspirystamine.”

Harry shook his head. “No hangover. And I’ve already taken three, thanks. Nothing does any good. So I guess it’s just up to you.”

“Up to me?” Frazer was genuinely puzzled. “What can I do about your headaches?”

“You’re on the Board of City Planners, aren’t you?”

“That’s right.”

“Well, I’ve got a suggestion for you to give to them. Tell them to start planning to drop a couple of heavy thermo-nucs on this area. Clean out twenty or thirty million people. We’d never miss ’em.”

Frazer chuckled wryly. “I wish I had a buck for every time I’ve heard that suggestion.”

“Ever stop to think why you hear it so often? It’s because everybody feels the same way—we can’t take being hemmed in like this.”

“Well, a bomb wouldn’t help. You know that.” Frazer pursed his lips. “Robertson figured out what would happen, with the chain-reaction.”

Harry glanced sideways at his companion as the car started forward once again. “I’ve always wondered about that,” he said. “Seriously, I mean. Is the story really true, or is it just some more of this government propaganda you fellows like to hand out?”

Frazer sighed. “It’s true, all right. There was a scientist named Robertson, and he did come up with the thermo-nuc formula, way back in ’75. Proved it, too. Use what he developed and the chain-reaction would never end. Scientists in other countries tested the theory and agreed; there was no collusion, it just worked out that way on a practical basis. Hasn't been a war since—what more proof do you want?"

"Well, couldn't they just use some of the old-fashioned hydrogen bombs?"

"Be sensible, man! Once a war started, no nation could resist the temptation to go all-out. Fortunately, everyone realizes that. So we have peace. Permanent peace."

"I'll take a good war anytime, in preference to this."

"Harry, you don't know what you're talking about. You aren't so young that you can't remember what it was like in the old days. Everybody living in fear, waiting for the bombs to fall. People dying of disease and worried about dying from radiation and fallout. All the international rivalries, the power-politics, the eternal pressures and constant crises. Nobody in his right mind would want to go back to that. We've come a mighty long way in the last twenty years or so."

Harry switched to autopilot and sat back. "Maybe that's the trouble," he said. "Maybe we've come too far, too fast. I wasn't kidding about dropping those thermo-nucs, either. Something has to be done. We can't go on like this indefinitely. Why doesn't the Board come up with an answer?"

Frazer shrugged his heavy shoulders. "You think we haven't tried, aren't trying now? We're aware of the situation as well as you are—and then some. But there's no easy solution. The population just keeps growing, that's all. No war to cut it down, contagious diseases at a minimum, average life-expectancy up to ninety years or better. Naturally, this results in a problem. But a bomb won't help bring about any permanent solution. Besides, this isn't a local matter, or even a national one. It's global. What do you think those summit meetings are all about?"

"What about birth control?" Harry asked. "Why don't they really get behind an emigration movement?"

"We can't limit procreation by law. You know that." Frazer peered out at the swarming streams on the sidewalk levels. "It's more than a religious or a political question—it's a social one. People want kids. They can afford them. Besides, the Housing Act is set up so that having kids is just about the only way you can ever get into larger living-quarters."

"Couldn't they try reverse-psychology? I mean, grant priority to people who are willing to be sterilized?"

"They tried it, on a limited experimental scale, about three years ago out on the West Coast."

"I never heard anything about it."

"Damned right you didn't," Frazer replied, grimly. "They kept the whole project under wraps, and for a good reason.

The publicity might have wrecked the Administration."

"What happened?"

"What do you suppose happened? There were riots. Do you think a man and his wife and three kids, living in three rooms, liked the idea of standing by and watching a sterilized couple enjoy a four-room place with lawn space? Things got pretty ugly, let me tell you. There was a rumor going around that the country was in the hands of homosexuals—the churches were up in arms—and if that wasn't bad enough, we had to face up to the primary problem. There just wasn't, just isn't, enough space. Not in areas suitable for maintaining a population. Mountains are still mountains and deserts are still deserts. Maybe we can put up housing in such regions, but who can live there? Even with decentralization going full blast, people must live within reasonable access to their work. No, we're just running out of room."

Again the car halted on signal. Over the blasting of the horns, Harry repeated his query about emigration.

Frazer shook his head, but made no attempt to reply until the horns had quieted and they were under way once more.

"As for emigration, we're just getting some of our own medicine in return. About eighty years ago, we clamped down and closed the door on immigrants; established a quota. Now the same quota is being used against us, and you can't really blame other nations for it. They're facing worse population increases than we are. Look at the African Federation, and what's happened even worse, in spite of all the wealth! And South America is even worse, in spite of all the reclamation projects. Fifteen years ago, when they cleared out the Amazon Basin, they thought they'd have enough room for fifty years to come. And now look at it—two hundred million, that's the latest figure we've got."

"So what's the answer?" Harry asked.

"I don't know. If it wasn't for hydroponics and the Ag Culture controls, we'd be licked right now. As it is, we can still supply enough food, and the old supply-and-demand takes care of the economy as a whole. I have no recommendations for an overall solution, or even a regional one. My job, the Board's job, is regulating housing and traffic and transportation in Chicagee. That's about all you can expect us to handle."

Again they jolted to a stop and the horns howled all around them. Harry sat there until a muscle in the side of his jaw began to twitch. Suddenly he pounded on the horn with both fists.

"Shut up!" he yelled. "For the love of Heaven, shut up!"

Abruptly he slumped back. "Sorry," he mumbled. "It's my damned headache. I—I've got to get out of this."

"Job getting you down?"

"No. It's a good job. At least everybody tells me so. Twenty-five hours a week, three hundred bucks. The car. The room. The telescreen and liquor and yellow-jackets. Plenty of time to kill. Unless it's the time that's killing me."

"But—what do you want?" Harry stepped on the accelerator and they inched along. Now the street widened into eight traffic lanes and the big semis joined the procession on the edge of the downtown area.

"I want out," Harry said. "Out of this."

"Don't you ever visit the National Preserves?" Frazer asked.

"Sure I do. Fly up every vacation. Take a tame plane to a tame government resort and catch my quota of two tame fish. Great sport! If I got married, I'd be entitled to four tame fish. But that's not what I want. I want what my father used to talk about. I want to drive into the country, without a permit, mind you; just to drive wherever I like. I want to see cows and chickens and trees and lakes and sky."

"You sound like a Naturalist."

"Don't sneer. Maybe the Naturalists are right. Maybe we ought to cut out all this phoney progress and phoney peace that passeth all understanding. I'm no liberal, don't get me wrong, but sometimes I think the Naturalists have the only answer."

"But what can you do about it?" Frazer murmured. "Suppose for the sake of argument that they are right. How can you change things? We can't just will ourselves to stop growing, and we can't legislate against biology. More people, in better health, with more free time, are just bound to have more offspring. It's inevitable, under the circumstances. And neither you nor I nor anyone has the right to condemn millions upon millions of others to death through war or disease."

"I know," Harry said. "It's hopeless, I guess. All the same, I want out." He wet his lips. "Frazer, you're on the Board here. You've got connections higher up. If I could only get a chance to transfer to Ag Culture, go on one of those farms as a worker—"

Frazer shook his head. "Sorry, Harry. You know the situation there, I'm sure. Right now there's roughly ninety million approved applications on file. Everybody wants to get into Ag Culture."

"But couldn't I just buy some land, get a government contract for foodstuffs?"

"Have you got the bucks? A minimum forty acres leased from one of the farm corporations will cost you two hundred thousand at the very least, not counting equipment." He paused. "Besides, there's Vocational Ap. What did your tests show?"

"You're right," Harry said. "I'm supposed to be an agency man. An agency man until I die. Or retire on my pension, at fifty, and sit in my little room for the next fifty years, turning on the telescreen every morning to hear some loudmouthed liar tell me it's a beautiful day in Chicagee. Who knows, maybe by that time we'll have a hundred billion people enjoying peace and progress and prosperity. All sitting in little rooms and—"

"Watch out!" Frazer grabbed the wheel. "You nearly hit that truck." He waited until Harry's face relaxed before relinquishing his grip. "Harry, you'd better go in for a checkup. It isn't just a headache with you, is it?"

"You're not fooling," Harry told him. "It isn't just a headache."

He began to think about what it really was, and that helped a little. It helped him get through the worst part, which was the downtown traffic and letting Frazer off and listening to Frazer urge him to see a doctor.

Then he got to the building parking area and let them take his car away and bury it down in the droning darkness where the horns hooted and the headlights glared.

Harry climbed the ramp and mingled with the ten-thirty shift on its way up to the elevators. Eighteen elevators in his building, to serve eighty floors. Nine of the elevators were express to the fiftieth floor, three were express to sixty-five. He wanted one of the latter, and so did the mob. The crushing, clinging mob. They pressed and panted the way mobs always do; mobs that lynch and torture and dance around bonfires and guillotines and try to drag you down to trample you to death because they can't stand you if your name is Harry and you want to be different.

They hate you because you don't like powdered eggs and the telescreen and a beautiful day in Chicagee. And they stare at you because your forehead hurts and the muscle in your jaw twitches and they know you want to scream as you go up, up, up, and try to think why you get a headache from jerking your head to the left.

Then Harry was at the office door and they said good morning when he came in, all eighty of the typists in the outer office working their electronic machines and offering him their electronic smiles, including the girl he had made electronic love to last Saturday night and who wanted him to move into a two-room marriage and have children, lots of children who could enjoy peace and progress and prosperity.

Harry snapped out of it, going down the corridor. Only a few steps more and he'd be safe in his office, his own private office, almost as big as his apartment. And there would be liquor, and the yellowjackets in the drawer. That would help. Then he could get to work.

What was today's assignment? He tried to remember. It was Wilmer-Klibby, wasn't it? Telescreenads for Wilmer-Klibby, makers of window-glass.

Window-glass.

He opened his office door and then slammed it shut behind him. For a minute everything blurred, and then he could remember.

Now he knew what caused him to jerk his head, what gave him the headaches when he did so. Of course. That was it.

When he sat down at the table for breakfast in the morning he turned his head to the left because he'd always done so, ever since he was a little boy. A little boy, in what was then Wheaton, sitting at the breakfast table and looking out of the window. Looking out at summer sunshine, spring rain, autumn haze, the white wonder of newfallen snow.

He'd never broken himself of the habit. He still looked to the left every morning, just as he had today. But there was no window any more. There was only a blank wall. And beyond it, the smog and the clamor and the crowds.

Window-glass. Wilmer-Klibby had problems. Nobody was buying window-glass any more. Nobody except the people who put up buildings like this. There were still windows on the top floors, just like the window here in his office.

Harry stepped over to it, moving very slowly because of his head. It hurt to keep his eyes open, but he wanted to stare out of the window. Up this high you could see above the smog. You could see the sun like a radiant jewel packed in the cotton cumulus of clouds. If you opened the window you could feel fresh air against your forehead, you could breathe it in and breathe out the headache.

But you didn't dare look down. Oh, no, never look down, because then you'd see the buildings all around you. The buildings below, black and sooty, their jagged outlines like the stumps of rotten teeth. And they stretched off in all directions, as far as the eye could attain; row after row of rotten teeth grinning up from the smog-choked throat of the streets. From the maw of the city far below came this faint but endless howling, this screaming of traffic and toil. And you couldn't help it, you breathed that in too, along with the fresh air, and it poisoned you and it did more than make your head ache. It made your heart ache and it made your soul sick, and it made you close your eyes and your lungs and your brain against it.

Harry reeled, but he knew this was the only way. Close your brain against it. And then, when you opened your eyes again, maybe you could see the way things used to be—

It was snowing out and it was a wet snow, the very best kind for snowballs and making a snowman, and the whole gang would come out after school.

But there was no school, this was Saturday, and the leaves were russet and gold and red so that it looked as if all the trees in the world were on fire. And you could scuff when you walked and pile up fallen leaves from the grass and roll in them.

And it was swell to roll down the front lawn in summer, just roll right down to the edge of the sidewalk like it was a big hill and let Daddy catch you at the bottom, laughing.

Mamma laughed too, and she said, Look, it's springtime, the lilacs are out, do you want to touch the pretty lilacs, Harry?

And Harry didn't quite understand what she was saying, but he reached out and they were purple and smelled of rain and soft sweetness and they were just beyond the window, if he reached a little further he could touch them—

And then the snow and the leaves and the grass and the lilacs disappeared, and Harry could see the rotten teeth again, leering and looming and snapping at him. They were going to bite, they were going to chew, they were going to devour, and he couldn't stop them, couldn't stop himself. He was falling into the howling jaws of the city.

His last conscious effort was a desperate attempt to gulp fresh air into his lungs before he pinwheeled down. Fresh air was good for headaches . . .

2. Harry Collins—1998

IT TOOK them ten seconds to save Harry from falling, but it took him over ten weeks to regain his balance.

In fact, well over two months had passed before he could fully realize just what had happened, or where he was now. They must have noticed something was wrong with him that morning at the office, because two supervisors and an exec rushed in and caught him just as he was going out of the window. And then they had sent him away, sent him here.

"This is fine," he told Dr. Manschoff. "If I'd known how well they treated you, I'd have gone couch-happy years ago."

Dr. Manschoff's plump face was impassive, but the little laugh-lines deepened around the edges of his eyes. "Maybe that's why we take such care not to publicize our recent advances in mental therapy," he said. "Everybody would want to get into a treatment center, and then where would we be?"

Harry nodded, staring past the doctor's shoulder, staring out of the wide window at the broad expanse of rolling countryside beyond.

"I still don't understand, though," he murmured. "How can you possibly manage to maintain an institution like this, with all the space and the luxuries? The inmates seem to lead a better life than the adjusted individuals outside. It's topsy-turvy."

"Perhaps." Dr. Manschoff's fingers formed a pudgy steeple. "But then, so many things seem to be topsy-turvey nowadays, don't they? Wasn't it the realization of this fact which precipitated your own recent difficulties?"

“Almost precipitated me bodily out of that window,” Harry admitted, cheerfully. “And that’s another thing. I was sent here, I suppose, because I’d attempted suicide, gone into shock, temporary amnesia, something like that.”

“Something like that,” the doctor echoed, contemplating his steeple.

“But you didn’t give me any treatment,” Harry continued. “Oh, I was kept under sedation for a while, I realize that. And you and some of the other staff-members talked to me. But mainly I just rested in a nice big room and ate nice big meals.”

“So?” The steeple’s fleshy spire collapsed.

“So what I want to know is, when does the real treatment start? When do I go into analysis, or chemotherapy, and all that?”

Dr. Manschoff shrugged. “Do you think you need those things now?”

Harry gazed out at the sunlight beyond the window, halfsquinting and half-frowning. “No, come to think of it, I don’t believe I do. I feel better now than I have in years.”

His companion leaned back. “Meaning that for years you felt all wrong. Because you were constricted, physically, psychically, and emotionally. You were cramped, squeezed in a vise until the pressure became intolerable. But now that pressure has been removed. As a result you no longer suffer, and there is no need to seek escape in death or denial of identity.

“This radical change of attitude has been brought about here in just a little more than two months’ time. And yet you’re asking me when the ‘real treatment’ begins.”

“I guess I’ve already had the real treatment then, haven’t I?”

“That is correct. Prolonged analysis or drastic therapy is unnecessary. We’ve merely given you what you seemed to need.”

“I’m very grateful,” Harry said. “But how can you afford to do it?”

Dr. Manschoff built another temple to an unknown god. He inspected the architecture critically now as he spoke. “Because your problem is a rarity,” he said.

"Rarity? I'd have thought millions of people would be breaking down every month. The Naturalists say—"

The doctor nodded wearily. "I know what they say. But let's dismiss rumors and consider facts. Have you ever read any official report stating that the number of cases of mental illness ran into the millions?"

"No, I haven't."

"For that matter, do you happen to know of anyone who was ever sent to a treatment center such as this?"

"Well, of course, everybody goes in to see the medics for regular checkups and this includes an interview with a psych. But if they're in bad shape he just puts them on extra tranquilizers. I guess sometimes he reviews their Vocational Apt tests and shifts them over into different jobs in other areas."

Dr. Manschoff bowed his head in reverence above the steeple, as if satisfied with the labors he had wrought. "That is roughly correct. And I believe, if you search your memory, you won't recall even a mention of a treatment center. This sort of place is virtually extinct, nowadays. There are still some institutions for those suffering from functional mental disorders—paresis, senile dementia, congenital abnormalities. But regular checkups and preventative therapy take care of the great majority. We've ceased concentrating on the result of mental illnesses and learned to attack the causes.

"It's the old yellow fever problem all over again, you see. Once upon a time, physicians dealt exclusively with treatment of yellow fever patients. Then they shifted their attention to the source of the disease. They went after the mosquitoes, drained the swamps, and the yellow fever problem vanished.

"That's been our approach in recent years. We've developed social therapy, and so the need for individual therapy has diminished.

"What were the sources of the tensions producing mental disturbances? Physical and financial insecurity, the threat of war, the aggressive patterns of a competitive society, the unresolved Oedipus-situation rooted in the oldstyle family relationship. These were the swamps where the mosquitoes buzzed and bit. Most of the swamps have been dredged, most of the insects exterminated.

"Today we're moving into a social situation where nobody goes hungry, nobody is jobless or unprovided for, nobody needs to struggle for status. Vocational Apt determines a man's rightful place and function in society, and there's no longer the artificial distinction imposed by race, color or creed. War is a thing of the past. Best of all, the old-fashioned 'home-life, with all of its unhealthy emotional ties, is being replaced by sensible conditioning when a child reaches school age. The umbilical cord is no longer a permanent leash, a strangler's noose, or a silver-plated life-line stretching back to the womb."

Harry Collins nodded. "I suppose only the exceptional cases ever need to go to a treatment center like this."

"Exactly."

"But what makes me one of the exceptions? Is it because of the way the folks brought me up, in a small town, with all the old-fashioned books and everything? Is that why I hated confinement and conformity so much? Is it because of all the years I spent reading? And why—"

Dr. Manschoff stood up. "You tempt me," he said. "You tempt me strongly. As you can see, I dearly love a lecture—and a captive audience. But right now, the audience must not remain captive. I prescribe an immediate dose of freedom."

"You mean I'm to leave here?"

"Is that what you want to do?"

"Frankly, no. Not if it means going back to my job."

"That hasn't been decided upon. We can discuss the problem later, and perhaps we can go into the answers to those questions you just posed. But at the moment, I'd juggest you stay with us, though without the restraint of remaining in your room or in the wards. In other words, I want you to start going outside again."

"Outside?"

"You'll find several square miles of open country just beyond the doors here. You're at liberty to wander around and enjoy yourself. Plenty of fresh air and sunshine—come and go as you wish. I've already issued instructions which permit you to keep your own hours. Meals will be available when you desire them."

"You're very kind."

"Nonsense. I'm prescribing what you need. And when the time comes, we'll arrange to talk again. You know where to find me."

Dr. Manschoff dismantled his steeple and placed a half of the roof in each trouser-pocket.

And Harry Collins went outdoors.

It was wonderful just to be free and alone—like returning to that faraway childhood in Wheaton once again. Harry appreciated every minute of it during the first week of his wandering.

But Harry wasn't a child any more, and after a week he began to wonder instead of wander.

The grounds around the treatment center were more than spacious; they seemed absolutely endless. No matter how far he walked during the course of a day, Harry had never encountered any walls, fences or artificial barriers; there was nothing to stay his progress but the natural barriers of high, steeply-slanting precipices which seemed to rim all sides of a vast valley. Apparently the center itself was set in the middle of a large canyon—a canyon big enough to contain an airstrip for helicopter landings. The single paved road leading from the main buildings terminated at the airstrip, and Harry saw helicopters arrive and depart from time to time; apparently they brought in food and supplies.

As for the center itself, it consisted of four large structures, two of which Harry was familiar with. The largest was made up of apartments for individual patients, and staffed by nurses and attendants. Harry's own room was here, on the second floor, and from the beginning he'd been allowed to roam around the communal halls below at will.

The second building was obviously administrative—Dr. Manschoff's private office was situated therein, and presumably the other staff-members operated out of here.

The other two buildings were apparently inaccesible; not guarded or policed or even distinguished by signs prohibiting access, but merely locked and unused. At least, Harry had found the doors locked when—out of normal curiosity—he had ventured to approach them. Nor had he ever seen anyone enter or leave the premises. Perhaps these structures were unnecessary under the present circumstances, and had been built for future accomodations.

Still, Harry couldn't help wondering.

And now, on this particular afternoon, he sat on the bank of the little river which ran through the valley, feeling the mid-summer sun beating down upon his forehead and staring down at the eddying current with its ripples and reflections.

Ripples and reflections . . .

Dr. Manschoff had answered his questions well, yet new questions had arisen.

Most people didn't go crazy any more, the doctor had explained, and so there were very few treatment centers such as this.

Question: Why were there any at all?

A place like this cost a fortune to staff and maintain. In an age where living-space and areable acreage was at such a premium, why waste this vast and fertile expanse? And in a society more and more openly committed to the policy of promoting the greatest good for the greatest number, why bother about the fate of an admittedly insignificant group of mentally disturbed patients?

Not that Harry resented his situation; in fact, it was almost too good to be true.

Question: Was it too good to be true?

Why, come to realize it, he'd seen less than a dozen other patients during his entire stay here! All of them were male, and all of them—apparently—were recovering from a condition somewhat similar to his own. At least, he'd recognized the same reticence and diffidence when it came to exchanging more than a perfunctory greeting in an encounter in an outer corridor. At the time, he'd accepted their unwillingness to communicate; welcomed and understood it because of his condition. And that in itself wasn't what he questioned now.

But why were there so few patients beside himself? Why were they all males? And why weren't they roaming the countryside now the way he was?

So many staff-members and so few patients. So much room and luxury and freedom, and so little use of it. So little apparent purpose to it all.

Question: Was there a hidden purpose?

Harry stared down into the ripples and reflections, and the sun was suddenly intolerably hot, its glare on the water suddenly blinding and bewildering. He saw his face mirrored on the water's surface, and it was not the familiar countenance he knew—the features were bloated, distorted, shimmering and wavering.

Maybe it was starting all over again. Maybe he was getting another one of those headaches. Maybe he was going to lose control again.

Yes, and maybe he was just imagining things. Sitting here in all this heat wasn't a good idea.

Why not take a swim?

That seemed reasonable enough. In fact, it seemed like a delightful distraction. Harry rose and stripped. He entered the water awkwardly—one didn't dive, not after twenty years of abstinence from the outdoor life—but he found that he could swim, after a fashion. The water was cooling, soothing. A few minutes of immersion and Harry found himself forgetting his speculations. The uneasy feeling had vanished. Now, when he stared down into the water, he saw his own face reflected, looking just the way it should. And when he stared up.

He saw her standing there, on the bank.

She was tall, slim, and blonde. Very tall, very slim, and very blonde.

She was also very desirable.

Up until a moment ago, Harry had considered swimming a delightful distraction. But now—

“How’s the water?” she called.

“Fine.”

She nodded, smiling down at him.

“Aren’t you coming in?” he asked.

“No.”

“Then what are you doing here?”

“I was looking for you, Harry.”

“You know my name?”

She nodded again. “Dr. Manschoff told me.”

“You mean, he sent you here to find me?”

“That’s right.”

“But I don’t understand. If you’re not going swimming, then why—I mean—”

Her smile broadened. “It’s just part of the therapy, Harry.”

“Part of the therapy?”

“That’s right. Part.” She giggled. “Don’t you think you’d like to come out of the water now and see what the rest of it might be?”

Harry thought so.

With mounting enthusiasm, he eagerly embraced his treatment and entered into a state of active cooperation.

It was some time before he ventured to comment on the situation. “Manschoff is a damned good diagnostician,” he murmured. Then he sat up. “Are you a patient here?”

She shook her head. “Don’t ask questions, Harry. Can’t you be satisfied with things as they are?”

"You're just what the doctor ordered, all right." He gazed down at her. "But don't you even have a name?"

"You can call me Sue."

"Thank you."

He bent to kiss her but she avoided him and rose to her feet. "Got to go now."

"So soon?"

She nodded and moved towards the bushes above the bank.

"But when will I see you again?"

"Coming swimming tomorrow?"

"Yes."

"Maybe I can get away for more occupational therapy then."

She stooped behind the bushes, and Harry saw a flash of white.

"You are a nurse, aren't you," he muttered. "On the staff, I suppose. I should have known."

"All right, so I am. What's that got to do with it?"

"And I suppose you were telling the truth when you said Manschoff sent you here. This is just part of my therapy, isn't it?"

She nodded briefly as she slipped into her uniform. "Does that bother you, Harry?"

He bit his lip. When he spoke, his voice was low, "Yes, damn it, it does. I mean, I got the idea—at least, I was hoping—that this wasn't just a matter of carrying out an assignment on your part."

She looked up at him gravely. "Who said anything about an assignment, darling?" she murmured. "I volunteered."

And then she was gone.

Then she was gone, and then she came back that night in Harry's dreams, and then she was at the river the next day and it was better than the dreams, better than the day before.

Sue told him she had been watching him for weeks now. And she had gone to Manschoff and suggested it, and she was very glad. And they had to meet here, out in the open, so as not to complicate the situation or disturb any of the other patients.

So Harry naturally asked her about the other patients, and the whole general setup, and she said Dr. Manschoff would answer all those questions in due time. But right now, with only an hour or so to spare, Was he going to spend it all asking for information? Matters were accordingly adjusted to their mutual satisfaction, and it was on that basis that they continued their almost daily meetings for some time.

The next few months were perhaps the happiest Harry had ever known. The whole interval took on a dreamlike quality—idealized, romanticized, yet basically sensual. There is probably such a dream buried deep within the psyche of every man, Harry reflected, but to few is it ever given to realize its reality. His early questioning attitude gave way to a mood of mere acceptance and enjoyment. This was the primitive drama, the very essence of the male-female relationship; Adarh and Eve in the Garden. Why waste time seeking the Tree of Knowledge?

And it wasn't until summer passed that Harry even thought about the Serpent.

One afternoon, as he sat waiting for Sue on the river bank, he heard a sudden movement in the brush behind him.

"Darling?" he called, eagerly.

"Please, you don't know me that well." The deep masculine voice carried overtones of amusement.

Flushing, Harry turned to confront the intruder. He was a short, stocky, middle-aged man whose bristling gray crewcut almost matched the neutral shades of his gray orderly's uniform.

"Expecting someone else, were you?" the man muttered. "Well, I'll get out of your way."

"That's not necessary. I was really just daydreaming, I guess. I don't know what made me think—" Harry felt his flush deepen, and he lowered his eyes and his voice as he tried to improvise some excuse.

"You're a lousy liar," the man said, stepping forward and seating himself on the bank next to Harry. "But it doesn't really matter. I don't think your girlfriend is going to show up today, anyway."

"What do you mean? What do you know about—"

"I mean just what I said," the man told him. "And I know everything I need to know, about you and about her and about the situation in general. That's why I'm here, Collins."

He paused, watching the play of emotions in Harry's eyes.

"I know what you're thinking right now," the gray-haired man continued. "At first you wondered how I knew your name. Then you realized that if I was on the staff in the wards I'd naturally be able to identify the patients. Now it occurs to you that you've never seen me in the wards, so you're speculating as to whether or not I'm working out of the administration offices with that psychiatric no good Manschoff. But if I were, I wouldn't be calling him names, would I? Which means you're really getting confused, aren't you, Collins? Good!"

The man chuckled, but there was neither mockery, malice, nor genuine mirth in the sound. And his eyes were sober, intent.

"Who are you?" Harry asked. "What are you doing here?"

"The name is Ritchie, Arnold Ritchie. At least, that's the name they know me by around here, and you can call me that. As to what I'm doing, it's a long story. Let's just say that right now I'm here to give you a little advanced therapy."

"Then Manschoff did send you?"

The chuckle came again, and Ritchie shook his head. "He did not. And if he even suspected I was here, there'd be hell to pay."

"Then what do you want with me?"

"It isn't a question of what I want. It's a question of what you need. Which is, like I said, advanced therapy. The sort that dear old kindly permissive Father-Image Manschoff doesn't intend you to get."

Harry stood up. “What’s this all about?”

Ritchie rose with him, smiling for the first time. “I’m glad you asked that question, Collins. It’s about time you did, you know. Everything has been so carefully planned to keep you from asking it. But you were beginning to wonder just a bit anyway, weren’t you?”

“I don’t see what you’re driving at.”

“You don’t see what anyone is driving at, Collins. You’ve been blinded by a spectacular display of kindness, misdirected by self-indulgence. I told you I knew everything I needed to know about you, and I do. Now I’m going to ask you to remember these things for yourself; the things you’ve avoided considering all this while.

“I’m going to ask you to remember that you’re twenty-eight years old, and that for almost seven years you were an agency man and a good one. You worked hard, you did a conscientious job, you stayed in line, obeyed the rules, never rebelled. Am I correct in my summary of the situation?”

“Yes, I guess so.”

“So what was your reward for all this unceasing “effort and eternal conformity? A one-room apartment and a one-week vacation, once a year. Count your blessings, Collins. Am I right?”

“Right.”

“Then what happened? Finally you flipped, didn’t you? Tried to take a header out of the window. You chucked your job, chucked your responsibilities, chucked your future and attempted to chuck yourself away. Am I still right?”

“Yes.”

“Good enough. And now we come to the interesting part of the story. Seven years of being a good little boy got you nothing but the promise of present and future frustration. Seven seconds of madness, of attempted self-destruction, brought you here. And as a reward for bucking the system, the system itself has provided you with a life of luxury and leisure—full permission to come and go as you please, live in spacious ease, indulge in the gratification of every appetite, free of responsibility or restraint. Is that true?"

"I suppose so."

"All right. Now, let me ask you the question you asked me. What's it all about?"

Ritchie put his hand on Harry's shoulder. "Tell me that, Collins. Why do you suppose you've received such treatment? As long as you stayed in line, nobody gave a damn for your comfort or welfare. Then, when you committed the cardinal sin of our present-day society—when you rebelled—everything was handed to you on a silver platter. Does that make sense?"

"But it's therapy. Dr. Manschoff said—"

"Look, Collins. Millions of people flip every year. Millions more attempt suicide. How many of them end up in a place like this?"

"They don't, though. That's just Naturalist propaganda. Dr. Manschoff said—"

"Dr. Manschoff said! I know what he said, all right. And you believed him, because you wanted to believe him. You wanted the reassurance he could offer you—the feeling of being unique and important. So you didn't ask him any questions, you didn't ask any questions of yourself. Such as why anybody would consider an insignificant little agency man, without friends, family or connections, worth the trouble of rehabilitating at all, let alone amidst such elaborate and expensive surroundings. Why, men like you are a dime a dozen these days—Vocational Apt can push a few buttons and come up with half a million replacements to take over your job. You aren't important to society, Collins. You aren't important to anyone at all, besides yourself. And yet you got the red-carpet treatment. It's about time somebody yanked that carpet out from under you. What's it all about?"

Harry blinked. "Look here, I don't see why this is any of your business. Besides, to tell the truth, I'm expecting—"

"I know who you're expecting, but I've already told you she won't be here. Because she's expecting."

"What—?"

“It’s high time you learned the facts of life, Collins. Yes, the well-known facts of life—the ones about the birds and the bees, and barefoot boys and blondes, too. Your little friend Sue is going to have a souvenir.”

“I don’t believe it! I’m going to ask Dr. Manschoff.”

“Sure you are. You’ll ask Manschoff and he’ll deny it. And so you’ll tell him about me. You’ll say you met somebody in the woods today—either a lunatic or a Naturalist spy who infiltrated here under false pretenses. And Manschoff will reassure you. He’ll reassure you just long enough to get his hands on me. Then he’ll take care of both of us.”

“Are you insinuating—”

“Hell, no! I’m telling you!” Ritchie put his hand down suddenly, and his voice calmed. “Ever wonder about those other two big buildings on the premises here, Collins? Well, I can tell you about one of them, because that’s where I work. You might call it an experimental laboratory if you like. Sometime later on I’ll describe it to you. But right now it’s the other building that’s important; the building with the big chimney. That’s a kind of an incinerator, Collins—a place where the mistakes go up in smoke, at night, when there’s nobody to see. A place where you and I will go up in smoke, if you’re fool enough to tell Manschoff about this.”

“You’re lying.”

“I wish to God I was, for both our sakes! But I can prove what I’m saying. You can prove it, for yourself.”

“How?”

“Pretend this meeting never occurred. Pretend that you just spent the afternoon here, waiting for a girl who never showed up. Then do exactly what you would do under those circumstances. Go in to see Dr. Manschoff and ask him where Sue is, tell him you were worried because she’d promised to meet you and then didn’t appear.

“I can tell you right now what he’ll tell you. He’ll say that Sue has been transferred to another treatment center, that she knew about it for several weeks but didn’t want to upset you with the news of her departure. So she decided to just slip away. And Manschoff will tell you not to be unhappy. It just so happens that he knows of another nurse who has had her eye on you—a very pretty little brunette named Myrna. In fact, if you go down to the river tomorrow, you'll find her waiting for you there."

"What if I refuse?"

Ritchie shrugged. "Why should you refuse? It's all fun and games, isn't it? Up to now you haven't asked any questions about what was going on, and it would look very strange if you started at this late date. I strongly advise you to cooperate. If not, everything is likely to—quite literally—go up in smoke." Harry Collins frowned. "All right, suppose I do what you say, and Manschoff gives me the answers you predict. This still doesn't prove that he'd be lying or that you're telling me the truth."

"Wouldn't it indicate as much, though?"

"Perhaps. But on the other hand, it could merely mean that you know Sue has been transferred, and that Dr. Manschoff intends to turn me over to a substitute. It doesn't necessarily imply anything sinister."

"In other words, you're insisting on a clincher, is that it?"

"Yes."

"All right." Ritchie sighed heavily. "You asked for it." He reached into the left-hand upper pocket of the gray uniform and brought out a small, stiff square of glossy paper.

"What's that?" Harry asked. He reached for the paper, but Ritchie drew his hand back.

"Look at it over my shoulder," he said. "I don't want any fingerprints. Hell of a risky business just smuggling it out of the files—no telling how well they check up on this material."

Harry circled behind the smaller man. He squinted down. "Hard to read."

"Sure. It's a photostat. I made it myself, this morning; that's my department. Read carefully now. You'll see it's a transcript of the lab report. Susan Pulver, that's her name, isn't it? After due examination and upon completion of preliminary tests, hereby found to be in the second month of pregnancy. Putative father, Harry Collins—that's you, see your name? And here's the rest of the record."

"Yes, let me see it. What's all this about inoculation series? And who is this Dr. Leffingwell?" Harry bent closer, but Ritchie closed his hand around the photostat and pocketed it again.

"Never mind that, now. I'll tell you later. The important thing is, do you believe me?"

"I believe Sue is pregnant, yes."

"That's enough. Enough for you to do what I've asked you to. Go to Manschoff and make inquiries. See what he tells you. Don't make a scene, and for God's sake don't mention my name. Just confirm my story for yourself. Then I'll give you further details."

"But when will I see you?"

"Tomorrow afternoon, if you like. Right here."

"You said he'd be sending another girl—"

Ritchie nodded. "So I did. And so he'll say. I suggest you beg to be excused for the moment. Tell him it will take a while for you to get over the shock of losing Sue this way."

"I won't be lying," Harry murmured.

"I know. And I'm sorry. Believe me, I am." Ritchie sighed again. "But you'll just have to trust me from now on."

"Trust you? When you haven't even explained what this is all about?"

"You've had your shock-therapy for today. Come back for another treatment tomorrow."

And then Ritchie was gone, the gray uniform melting away into the gray shadows of the shrubbery above the bank.

A short time later, Harry made his own way back to the center in the gathering twilight. The dusk was gray, too. Everything seemed gray now.

So was Harry Collins' face, when he emerged from his interview with Dr. Manschoff that evening. And it was still pallid the next afternoon when he came down to the river bank and waited for Ritchie to reappear.

The little man emerged from the bushes. He stared at Harry's drawn countenance and nodded slowly.

"I was right, eh?" he muttered.

"It looks that way. But I can't understand what's going on. If this isn't just a treatment center, if they're not really interested in my welfare, then what am I doing here?"

"You're taking part in an experiment. This, my friend, is a laboratory. And you are a nice, healthy guinea pig."

"But that doesn't make sense.

I haven't been experimented on. They've let me do as I please."

"Exactly. And what do guinea pigs excel at? Breeding."

"You mean this whole thing was rigged up just so that Sue and I would—?"

"Please, let's not be so egocentric, shall we? After all, you're not the only male patient in this place. There are a dozen others wandering around loose. Some of them have their favorite caves, others have discovered little bypaths, but all of them seem to have located ideal trysting-places. Whereupon, of course, the volunteer nurses have located them."

"Are you telling me the same situation exists with each of the others?"

"Isn't it fairly obvious? You've shown no inclination to become friendly with the rest of the patients here, and none of them have made any overtures to you. That's because everyone has his own little secret, his own private arrangement. And so all of you go around fooling everybody else, and all of you are being fooled. I'll give credit to Manschoff and his staff on that point—he's certainly mastered the principles of practical psychology."

"But you talked about breeding. With our present overpopulation problem, why in the world do they deliberately encourage the birth of more children?"

"Very well put. 'Why in the world' indeed! In order to answer that, you'd better take a good look at the world."

Arnold Ritchie seated himself on the grass, pulled out a pipe, and then replaced it hastily. "Better not smoke," he murmured. "Be awkward if we attracted any attention and were found together."

Harry stared at him. "You are a Naturalist, aren't you?"

"I'm a reporter, by profession."

"Which network?"

"No network. Newzines. There are still a few in print, you know."

"I know. But I can't afford them."

"There aren't many left who can, or who even feel the need of reading them. Nevertheless, mavericks like myself still cling to the ancient and honorable practices of the Fourth Estate. One of which is ferreting out the inside story, the news behind the news."

"Then you're not working for the Naturalists."

"Of course I am. I'm working for them and for everybody else who has an interest in learning the truth." Ritchie paused. "By the way, you keep using that term as if it were some kind of dirty word. Just what does it mean? What is a Naturalist, in your book?"

"Why, a radical thinker, of course. An opponent of government policies, of progress. One who believes we're running out of living space, using up the last of our natural resources."

"What do you suppose motivates Naturalists, really?"

"Well, they can't stand the pressures of daily living, or the prospects of a future when we'll be still more hemmed in."

Ritchie nodded. "Any more than you could, a few months ago, when you tried to commit suicide. Wouldn't you say that you were thinking like a Naturalist then?"

Harry grimaced. "I suppose so."

"Don't feel ashamed. You saw the situation clearly, just as the so-called Naturalists do. And just as the government does. Only the government can't dare admit it—hence the secrecy behind this project."

"A hush-hush government plan to stimulate further breeding? I still don't see—"

"Look at the world," Ritchie repeated. "Look at it realistically. What's the situation at present? Population close to six billion, and rising fast. There was a leveling-off period in the Sixties, and then it started to climb again. No wars, no disease to cut it down. The development of synthetic foods, the use of algae and fungi, rules out famine as a limiting factor. Increased harnessing of atomic power has done away with widespread poverty, so there's no economic deterrent to propagation. Neither church nor state dares set up a legal prohibition. So here we are, at the millennium. In place of international tension we've substituted internal tension. In place of thermonuclear explosion, we have a population explosion."

"You make it look pretty grim."

"I'm just talking about today. What happens ten years from now, when we hit a population-level of ten billion? What happens when we reach twenty billion, fifty billion, a hundred? Don't talk to me about more substitutes, more synthetics, new ways of conserving top-soil. There just isn't going to be room for everyone!"

"Then what's the answer?"

"That's what the government wants to know. Believe me, they've done a lot of searching; most of it sub rosa. And then along came this man Leffingwell, with his solution. That's just what it is, of course—an endocrinological solution, for direct injection."

"Leffingwell? The Dr. Leffingwell whose name was on that photostat? What's he got to do with all this?"

"He's boss of this project," Ritchie said. "He's the one who persuaded them to set up a breeding-center. You're his guinea pig."

"But why all the secrecy?"

"That's what I wanted to know. That's why I scurried around, pulled strings to get a lab technician's job here. It wasn't easy, believe me. The whole deal is being kept strictly under wraps until Leffingwell's experiments prove out. They realized right away that it would be fatal to use volunteers for the experiments—they'd be bound to talk, there'd be leaks. And of course, they anticipated some awkward results at first, until the technique is refined and perfected. Well, they were right on that score. I’ve seen some of their failures.” Ritchie shuddered. “Any volunteer—any military man, government employee or even a so-called dedicated scientist who broke away would spread enough rumors about what was going on to kill the entire project. That’s why they decided to use mental patients for subjects. God knows, they had millions to choose from, but they were very particular. You’re a rare specimen, Collins.”

“How so?”

“Because you happen to fit all their specifications. You’re young, in good physical condition. Unlike ninety percent of the population, you don’t even wear contact lenses, do you? And your aberration was temporary, easily removed by removing you from the tension-sources which created it. You have no family ties, no close friends, to question your absence. That’s why you were chosen—one of the two hundred.”

“Two hundred? But there’s only a dozen others here now.”

“A dozen males, yes. You’re forgetting the females. Must be about fifty or sixty in the other building.”

“But if you’re talking about someone like Sue, she’s a nurse—”

Ritchie shook his head. “That’s what she was told to say. Actually, she’s a patient, too. They’re all patients. Twelve men and sixty women, at the moment. Originally, about thirty men and a hundred and seventy women.”

“What happened to the others?”

“I told you there were some failures. Many of the women died in childbirth. Some of them survived, but found out about the results—and the results, up until now, haven’t been perfect. A few of the men found out, too. Well, they have only one method of dealing with failures here. They dispose of them. I told you about that chimney, didn’t I?”

“You mean they killed the offspring, killed those who found out about them?”

Ritchie shrugged.

“But what are they actually doing? Who is this Dr. Leffingwell? What’s it all about?”

"I think I can answer those questions for you."

Harry wheeled at the sound of the familiar voice.

Dr. Manschoff beamed down at him from the top of the river bank. "Don't be alarmed," he said. "I wasn't following you with any intent to eavesdrop. I was merely concerned about him." His eyes flickered as he directed his gaze past Harry's shoulder, and Harry turned again to look at Arnold Ritchie.

The little man was no longer standing and he was no longer alone. Two attendants now supported him, one on either side, and Ritchie himself sagged against their grip with eyes closed. A hypodermic needle in one attendant's hand indicated the reason for Ritchie's sudden collapse.

"Merely a heavy sedative," Dr. Manschoff murmured. "We came prepared, in expectation of just such an emergency." He nodded at his companions. "Better take him back now," he said. "I'll look in on him this evening, when he comes out of it."

"Sorry about all this," Manschoff continued, sitting down next to Harry as the orderlies lifted Ritchie's inert form and carried him up the slanting slope. "It's entirely my fault. I misjudged my patient—never should have permitted him such a degree of freedom. Obviously, he's not ready for it yet. I do hope he didn't upset you in any way."

"No. He seemed quite"—Harry hesitated, then went on hastily—"logical."

"Indeed he is." Dr. Manschoff smiled. "Paranoid delusions, as they used to call them, can often be rationalized most convincingly. And from what little I heard, he was doing an excellent job, wasn't he?"

"Well—"

"I know." A slight sigh erased the smile. "Leffingwell and I rare mad scientists, conducting biological experiments on human guinea pigs. We've assembled patients for breeding purposes and the government is secretly subsidizing us. Also, we incinerate our victims—again, with full governmental permission. All very logical, isn't it?"

"I didn't mean that," Harry told him. "It's just that he said Sue was pregnant and he was hinting things."

"Said?" Manschoff stood up. "Hinted? I'm surprised he didn't go further than that. Just today, we discovered he'd been using the office facilities—he had a sort of probationary position, as you may have guessed, helping out the staff in administration—to provide tangible proof of his artistic creations. He was writing out 'official reports' and then photostating them. Apparently he intended to circulate the results as 'evidence' to support his delusions. Look, here's a sample."

Dr. Manschoff passed a square of glossy paper to Harry, who scanned it quickly. It was another laboratory report similar to the one Ritchie had shown him, but containing a different set of names.

"No telling how long this sort of thing has been going on," Manschoff said. "He may have made dozens. Naturally, the moment we discovered it, we realized prompt action was necessary. He'll need special attention."

"But what's wrong with him?"

"It's a long story. He was a reporter at one time—he may have told you that. The death of his wife precipitated a severe trauma and brought him to our attention. Actually, I'm not at liberty to say any more regarding his case; you understand, I'm sure."

"Then you're telling me that everything he had to say was a product of his imagination?"

"No, don't misunderstand. It would be more correct to state that he merely distorted reality. For example, there is a Dr. Leffingwell on the staff here; he is a diagnostician and has nothing to do with psychotherapy per se. And he has charge of the hospital ward in Unit Three, the third building you may have noticed behind Administration. That's where the nurses maintain residence, of course. Incidentally, when any nurses take on a—special assignment, as it were, such as yours, Leffingwell does examine and treat them. There's a new oral contraception technique he's evolved which may be quite efficacious. But I'd hardly call it an example of sinister experimentation under the circumstances, would you?"

Harry shook his head. "About Ritchie, though," he said. "What will happen to him?"

"I can't offer any prognosis. In view of my recent error in judgment concerning him, it's hard to say how he'll respond to further treatment. But rest assured that I'll do my best for his case. Chances are you'll be seeing him again before very long."

Dr. Manschoff glanced at his watch. "Shall we go back now?" he suggested. "Supper will be served soon."

The two men toiled up the bank.

Harry discovered that the doctor was right about supper. It was being served as he returned to his room. But the predictions concerning Ritchie didn't work out quite as well.

It was after supper—indeed, quite some hours afterwards, while Harry sat at his window and stared sleeplessly out into the night—that he noted the thick, greasy spirals of black smoke rising suddenly from the chimney of the Third Unit building. And the sight may Rave prepared him for the failure of Dr. Manschoff's prophecy regarding his disturbed patient.

Harry never asked any questions, and no explanations were ever forthcoming.

But from that evening onward, nobody ever saw Arnold Ritchie again.

3. President Winthrop—1999

THE Secretary of State closed the door.

"Well?" he asked.

President Winthrop looked up from the desk and blinked. "Hello, Art," he said. "Sit down."

"Sorry I'm late," the Secretary told him. "I came as soon as I got the call."

“It doesn’t matter.” The President lit a cigarette and pursed his lips around it until it stopped wobbling. “I’ve been checking the reports all night.”

“You look tired.”

“I am. I could sleep for a week. That is, I wish I could.”

“Any luck?”

The President pushed the papers aside and drummed the desk for a moment. Then he offered the Secretary a gray ghost of a smile.

“The answer’s still the same.”

“But this was our last chance—”

“I know.” The President leaned back. “When I think of the time and effort, the money that’s been poured into these projects! To say nothing of the hopes we had. And now, it’s all for nothing.”

“You can’t say that,” the Secretary answered. “After all, we did reach the moon. We got to Mars.” He paused. “No one can take that away from you. You sponsored the Martian flights. You fought for the appropriations, pushed the project, carried it through. You helped mankind realize its greatest dream—”

“Save that for the newscasts,” the President said. “The fact remains, we’ve succeeded. And our success was a failure. Mankind’s greatest dream, eh? Read these reports and you’ll find out this is mankind’s greatest nightmare.”

“Is it that bad?”

“Yes. The President slumped in his chair. “It’s that bad. We can reach the moon at will. Now we can send a manned flight to Mars. But it means nothing. We can’t support life in either place. There’s absolutely no possibility of establishing or maintaining an outpost, let alone a large colony or a permanent human residence. That’s what all the reports conclusively demonstrate.

“Every bit of oxygen, every bit of food and clothing and material, would have to be supplied. And investigations prove there’s no chance of ever realizing any return. The cost of such an operation is staggeringly prohibitive. Even if there was evidence to show it might be possible to undertake some mining projects, it wouldn't begin to defray expenses, once you consider the transportation factor."

"But if they improve the rockets, manage to make room for a bigger payload, wouldn't it be cheaper?"

"It would still cost roughly a billion dollars to equip a flight and maintain a personnel of twenty men for a year," the President told him. "I've checked into that, and even this estimate is based on the most optimistic projection. So you can see there's no use in continuing now. We'll never solve our problems by attempting to colonize the moon or Mars."

"But it's the only possible solution left to us."

"No it isn't," the President said. "There's always our friend Leffingwell."

The Secretary of State turned away. "You can't officially sponsor a thing like that," he muttered. "It's political suicide."

The gray smile returned to the gray lips. "Suicide? What do you know about suicide, Art? I've been reading a few statistics on that, too. How many actual suicides do you think we had in this country last year?"

"A hundred thousand? Two hundred, maybe?"

"Two million." The President leaned forward. "Add to that, over a million murders and six million crimes of violence."

"I never knew—"

"Damned right you didn't! We used to have a Federal Bureau of Investigation to help prevent such things. Now the big job is merely to hush them up. We're doing everything in our power just to keep these matters quiet, or else there'd be utter panic. Then there's the accident total and the psycho rate. We can't build institutions fast enough to hold the mental cases, nor train doctors enough to care for them. Shifting them into other jobs in other areas doesn't cure, and it no longer even disguises what is happening. At this rate, another ten years will see half the nation going insane. And it's like this all over the world.

"This is race-suicide, Art. Race-suicide through sheer fecundity. Leffingwell is right. The reproductive instinct, unchecked, will overbalance group survival in the end. How long has it been since you were out on the streets?"

The Secretary of State shrugged. "You know I never go out on the streets," he said. "It isn't very safe."

"Of course not. But it's no safer for the hundreds of millions who have to go out every day. Accident, crime, the sheer maddening proximity of the crowds—these phenomena are increasing through mathematical progression. And they must be stopped. Leffingwell has the only answer."

"They won't buy it," warned the Secretary. "Congress won't, and the voters won't, any more than they bought birth-control. And this is worse."

"I know that, too." The President rose and walked over to the window, looking out at the skyscraper apartments which loomed across what had once been the Mall. He was trying to find the dwarfed spire of Washington's Monument in the tangled maze of stone.

"If I go before the people and sponsor Leffingwell, I'm through. Through as President, through with the Party. They'll crucify me. But somebody in authority must push this project. That's the beginning. Once it's known, people will have to think about the possibilities. There'll be opposition, then controversy, then debate. And gradually Leffingwell will gain adherents. It may take five years, it may take ten. Finally, the change will come. First through volunteers. Then by law. I only pray that it happens soon."

"They'll curse your name," the Secretary said. "They'll try to kill you. It's going to be hell."

"Hell for me if I do, yes. Worse hell for the whole world if I don't."

"But are you quite sure it will work? His method, I mean?"

"You saw the reports on his tests, didn't you? It works, all right. We've got more than just abstract data, now. We've got films for the telescreenings all set up."

"Films? You mean you'll actually show what the results are? Why, just telling the people will be bad enough. And admitting the government sponsored the project under wraps. But when they see, nothing on earth can save you from assassination."

"Perhaps. It doesn't really matter." The President crushed his cigarette in the ashtray. "One less mouth to feed. And I'm getting pretty sick of synthetic meals, anyway."

President Winthrop turned to the Secretary, his eyes brightening momentarily. "Tell you what, Art. I'm not planning on breaking the proposal to the public until next Monday. What say we have a little private dinner party on Saturday evening, just the Cabinet members and their wives? Sort of a farewell celebration, in a way, but we won't call it that, of course? Chef tells me there's still twenty pounds of hamburger in the freezers."

"Twenty pounds of hamburger? You mean it?" The Secretary of State was smiling, too.

"That's right." The President of the United States grinned in anticipation. "Been a long time since I've tasted a real, honest-to-goodness hamburger."

4. Harry Collins—2000

HARRY didn't ask any questions. He just kept his mouth shut and waited. Maybe Dr. Manschoff suspected and maybe he didn't. Anyway, there was no trouble. Harry figured there wouldn't be, as long as he stayed in line and went through the proper motions. It was all a matter of pretending to conform, pretending to agree, pretending to believe.

So he watched his step—except in the dreams, and then he was always falling into the yawning abyss.

He kept his nose clean—but in the dreams he smelled the blood and brimstone of the pit.

He managed to retain a cheerful smile at all times—though, in the dreams, he screamed.

Eventually, he even met Myrna. She was the pretty little brunette whom Ritchie had mentioned, and she did her best to console him—only in dreams, when he embraced her, he was embracing a writhing coil of slimy smoke.

It may have been that Harry Collins went a little mad, just having to pretend that he was sane. But he learned the way, and he managed. He saved the madness (or was it the reality?) for the dreams.

Meanwhile he waited and said nothing.

He said nothing when, after three months or so, Myrna was suddenly "transferred" without warning.

He said nothing when, once a week or so, he went in to visit with Dr. Manschoff.

He said nothing when Manschoff volunteered the information that Ritchie had been "transferred" too, or suggested that it would be best to stay on for "further therapy."

And he said nothing when still a third nurse came his way; a woman who was callid, complaisant, and nauseatingly nymphomaniac.

The important thing was to stay alive. Stay alive and try to learn.

It took him almost an additional year to find out what he wanted to find out. More than eight months passed before he found a way of sneaking out of his room at night, and a way of getting into that Third Unit through a delivery door which was occasionally left open through negligence.

Even then, all he learned was that the female patients did have their living quarters here, along with the members of the staff and—presumably—Dr. Leffingwell. Many of the women were patients rather than nurses, as claimed, and a good number of them were in various stages of pregnancy, but this proved nothing.

Several times Harry debated the possibilities of taking some of the other men in his Unit into his confidence. Then he remembered what had happened to Arnold Ritchie and decided against this course. The risk was too great. He had to continue alone.

It wasn't until Harry managed to get into Unit Four that he got what he wanted (what he didn't want) and learned that reality and dreams were one and the same.

There was the night, more than a year after he'd come to the treatment center, when he finally broke into the basement and found the incinerators. And the incinerators led to the operating and delivery chambers, and the delivery chambers led to the laboratory and the laboratory led to the incubators and the incubators led to the nightmare.

In the nightmare Harry found himself looking down at the mistakes and the failures and he recognized them for what they were, and he knew then why the incinerators were kept busy and why the black smoke poured.

In the nightmare he saw the special units containing those which were not mistakes or failures, and in a way they were worse than the others. They were red and wriggling there beneath the glass, and on the glass surfaces hung the charts which gave the data. Then Harry saw the names, saw his own name repeated twice—once for Sue, one for Myrna. And he realized that he had contributed to the successful outcome or issue of the experiments (outcome? Issue? These horrors?) and that was why Manschoff must have chosen to take the risk of keeping him alive. Because he was one of the good guinea pigs, and he had spawned, spawned living, mewing abominations.

He had dreamed of these things, and now he saw that they were real, so that nightmare merged with now, and he could gaze down at it with open eyes and scream at last with open mouth.

Then, of course, an attendant came running (although he seemed to be moving ever so slowly, because everything moves so slowly in a dream) and Harry saw him coming and lifted a bell-glass and smashed it down over the man's head (slowly, ever so slowly) and then he heard the others coming and he climbed out of the window and ran.

The searchlights winked across the courtyards and the sirens vomited hysteria from metallic throats and the night was filled with shadows that pursued.

But Harry knew where to run. He ran straight through the nightmare, through all the fantastic but familiar convolutions of sight and sound, and then he came to the river and plunged in.

Now the nightmare was not sight or sound, but merely sensation. Icy cold and distilled darkness; ripples that ran, then raced and roiled and roared. But there had to be a way out of the nightmare and there had to be a way out of the canyon, and that way was the river.

Apparently no one else had thought of the river; perhaps they had considered it as a possible avenue of escape and then discarded the notion when they realized how it ripped and raged among the rocks as it finally plunged from the canyon's mouth. Obviously, no one could hope to combat that current and survive.

But strange things happen in nightmares. And you fight the numbness and the blackness and you claw and convulse and you twist and turn and toss and then you ride the crests of frenzy and plunge into the troughs of panic and despair and you sweep round and round and sink down into nothingness until you break through to the freedom which comes only with oblivion.

Somewhere beyond the canyon's moiling maw, Harry Collins found that freedom and that oblivion. He escaped from the nightmare, just as he escaped from the river.

The river itself roared on without him.

And the nightmare continued, too . . .

5. Minnie Schultz—2009

WHEN Frank came home, Minnie met him at the door. She didn't say a word, just handed him the envelope containing the notice.

"What's the matter?" Frank asked, trying to take her in his arms. "You been crying."

"Never mind." Minnie freed herself. "Just read what it says there."

Frank read slowly, determineedly, his features contorted in concentration. Vocational Apt had terminated his schooling at the old grade-school level, and while like all students he had been taught enough so that he could read the necessary advertising commercials, any printed message of this sort provided a definite challenge.

Halfway through the notice he started to scowl. "What kind of monkey business is this?"

"No monkey business. It's the new law. Everybody that gets married in Angelisco takes the shots, from now on. Fella from State Hall, he told me when he delivered this."

"We'll see about this," Frank muttered. "No damn government's gonna tell me how to run my life. Sa free country, ain't so?"

Minnie's mouth began to twitch, "They're coming back tomorra morning, the fella said. To give me the first shots. Gee, honey, I'm scared, like. I don't want 'em."

"That settles it," Frank said. "We're getting out of this place, fast."

"Where'd we go?"

"Dunno. Someplace. Texas, maybe. I was listening to the 'casts at work today. They don't have this law in Texas. Not yet, anyway. Come on, start packing."

"Packing? But how'll we get there?"

"Fly. We'll jet right out."

"You got prior'ty reservations or something?"

"No." The scowl returned to Frank's forehead. "But maybe if I pitch 'em a sob story, tell 'em it's our honeymoon, you know, then we could—"

Minnie shook her head. "It won't work, honey. You know that. Takes six months to get a prior'ty clearance or whatever they call it. Besides, your job and all—what'll you do in Texas? They've got your number listed here. Why, we couldn't even land, like. I bet Texas is even more crowded than Angelisco these days, in the cities. And all the rest of it is Ag Culture project, isn't it?"

Frank was leaning against the sink, listening. Now he took three steps forward and sat down on the bed. He didn't look at her as he spoke.

"Well, we gotta do something," he said. "You don't want those shots and that's for sure. Maybe I can have one of those other things instead, those whaddya-call-'ems."

"You mean where they operate you, like?"

"That's right. A vas-something. You know, sterilize you. Then we won't have to worry."

Minnie took a deep breath. Then she sat down and put her arm around Frank.

"But you wanted kids," she murmured. "You told me, when we got married, you always wanted to have a son—"

Frank pulled away.

"Sure I do," he said. "A son. That's what I want. A real son. Not a freak. Not a damned little monster that has to go to the Clinic every month and take injections so it won't grow. And what happens to you if you take your shots now? What if they drive you crazy or something?"

Minnie put her arm around Frank again and made him look at her. "That's not true," she told him. "That's just a lot of Naturalist talk. I know."

"Hell you do."

"But I do, honey! Honest, like! May Stebbins, she took the shots last year, when they asked for volunteers. And she's all right. You seen her baby yourself, remember? It's the sweetest little thing, and awful smart! So maybe it wouldn't be so bad."

"I'll ask about being operated tomorrow," Frank said. "Forget it. It don't matter."

"Of course it matters." Minnie looked straight at him. "Don't you think I know what you been going through? Sweating it out on that job day after day, going nuts in the traffic, saving up the ration coupons so's we'd have extra food for the honeymoon and all?

“You didn’t have to marry me, you know that. It was just like we could have a place of our own together, and kids. Well, we’re gonna have ’em, honey. I’ll take the shots.”

Frank shook his head but said nothing.

“It won’t be so bad,” Minnie went on. “The shots don’t hurt at all, and they make it easier, carrying the baby. They say you don’t even get morning sickness or anything. And just think, when we have a kid, we get a chance for a bigger place. We go right on the housing lists. We can have two rooms. A real bedroom, maybe.”

Frank stared at her. “Is that all you can think about?” he asked. “A real bedroom?”

“But honey—”

“What about the kid?” he muttered. “How you suppose it’s gonna feel? How’d you like to grow up and not grow up? How’d you like to be a midget three feet high in a world where everybody else is bigger? What kind of a life you call that? I want my son to have a decent chance.”

“He will have.”

Minnie stared back at him, but she wasn’t seeing his face. “Don’t you understand, honey? This isn’t just something happening to us. We’re not special. It’s happening to everybody, all over the country, all over the world. You seen it in the ‘casts, haven’t you? Most states, they adopted the laws. And in a couple more years it’ll be the only way anyone will ever have kids. Ten-twenty years from now, the kids will be growing up. Ours won’t be different then, because from now on all the kids will be just like he is. The same size.”

“I thought you was afraid of the shots,” Frank said.

Minnie was still staring. “I was, honey. Only, I dunno. I keep thinking about Grandma.”

“What’s the old lady got to do with it?”

“Well, I remember when I was a little girl, like. How my Grandma always used to tell me about her Grandma, when she was a little girl.

"She was saying about how in the old days, before there even was an Angelisco—when her Grandma came out here in a covered wagon. Just think, honey, she was younger than I am, and she come thousands and thousands of miles in a wagon! With real horses, like! Wasn't any houses, no people or nothing. Except Indians that shot at them. And they climbed up the mountains and they crossed over the deserts and went hungry and thirsty and had fights with those Indians all the way. But they never stopped until they got here. Because they was the pioneers."

"Pioneers?"

"That's what Grandma said her Grandma called herself. A pioneer. She was real proud of it, too. Because it means having the courage to cut loose from all the old things and try something new when you need to. Start a whole new world, a whole new kind of life."

She sighed. "I always wanted to be a pioneer, like, but I never thought I'd get the chance."

"What are you talking about? What's all this got to do with us, or having a kid?"

"Don't you see? Taking these shots, having a baby this new way—it's sort of being a pioneer, too. Gonna help bring a new kind of people into a new kind of world. And if that's not being a pioneer, like, it's the closest I can come to it. It sounds right to me now."

Minnie smiled and nodded. "I guess I made up my mind just now. I'm taking the shots."

"Hell you are!" Frank told her. "We'll talk about it some more in the morning."

But Minnie continued to smile.

And that night, as she lay in the utility bed, the squeaking of the springs became the sound of turning wheels. The plastic walls and ceiling of the eightieth-floor apartment turned to billowing canvas, and the thunder of the passing jets transformed itself into the drumming hoofbeats of a million buffalo.

Let Frank talk to her again in the morning if he liked, Minnie thought. It wouldn't make any difference now. Because you can't stop us pioneers.

6. Harry Collins—2012

HARRY crouched behind the boulders, propping the rifle up between the rocks, and adjusted the telescopic sights. The distant doorway sprang into sharp focus. Grunting with satisfaction, he settled down to his vigil. The rifle-barrel had been dulled down against detection by reflection, and Harry's dark glasses protected him against the glare of the morning sun. He might have to wait several hours now, but he didn't care. It had taken him twelve years to come this far, and he was willing to wait a little while longer.

Twelve years. Was it really that long?

A mirror might have answered him; a mirror might have shown him the harsh features of a man of forty-two. But Harry needed no mirror. He could remember the past dozen years only too easily—though they had not been easy years.

Surviving the river was only the beginning. Animal strength carried him through that ordeal. But he emerged from the river as an animal; a wounded animal, crawling through the brush and arroyo outside the southern Colorado canyon.

And it was animal cunning which preserved him. He'd wandered several days until he encountered Emil Grizek and his outfit. By that time he was half-starved and completely delirious. It took a month until he was up and around again.

But Emil and the boys had nursed him through. They took turns caring for him in the bunkhouse; their methods were crude but efficient and Harry was grateful. Best of all, they asked no questions. Harry's status was that of a hunted fugitive, without a Vocational Apt record or rating. The authorities or any prospective employers would inquire into these things, but Emil Grizek never seemed curious. By the time Harry was up and around again, he'd been accepted as one of the bunch. He told them his name was Harry Sanders, and that was enough.

Two months after they found him, he'd signed on with Emil Grizek and found a new role in life.

Harry Collins, advertising copywriter, had become Harry Sanders, working cowhand.

There was surprisingly little difficulty. Grizek had absentee employers who weren't interested in their foreman's methods, just as long as he recruited his own wranglers for the Bar B Ranch. Nobody demanded to see Apt cards or insisted on making out formal work-reports, and the pay was in cash. Cowhands were hard to come by these days, and it was an unspoken premise that the men taking on such jobs would be vagrants, migratory workers, fugitives from justice and injustice. A generation or so ago they might have become tramps—but the last of the hoboes had vanished along with the last of the freight trains. Once the derelicts haunted the canyons of the big cities; today there was no place for them there, so they fled to the canyons of the west. Harry had found himself a new niche, and no questions asked.

Oddly enough, he fitted in. The outdoor life agreed with him, and in a matter of months he was a passable cowpoke; within a year he was one of Grizek's top hands.

He learned to ride a bucking jeep with the best of them, and he could spot, single out, and stun a steer in forty seconds flat; then use his electronic brander on it and have the critter back on its feet in just under a minute.

Work was no problem, and neither was recreation. The bunkhouse offered crude but adequate facilities for living; old-fashioned air-conditioning and an antique infra-red broiler seemed good enough for roughing it, and Cookie at least turned out real man-sized meals. Eating genuine beef and honest-to-goodness baked bread was a treat, and so was having the luxury of all that space in the sleeping quarters. Harry thrived on it.

And some of the other hands were interesting companions. True, they were renegades and mavericks, but they were each of them unique and individual, and Harry enjoyed listening to them fan the breeze during the long nights.

There was Big Phil, who was pushing sixty now. But you'd never know it, not unless you got him to talking about the old days when he'd been a boy in Detroit. His daddy had been one of the last of the Union Men, back in the days of what they used to call the Organized Labor Movement. He could tell you about wage-hour agreements and the Railroad Brotherhood and contract negotiations almost as if he knew of these things through personal experience. He even remembered the Democratic Party. Phil got out when the government took over and set up Vocational Apt and Industrial Supervision; that's when he drifted west.

Tom Lowery's family had been military; he claimed to have been a member of the last graduating class ever to leave West Point. When the armament race ended, his prospects of a career vanished, and he settled down as a guard at Canaverel. Finally, he'd headed for the open country.

Bassett was the scholar of the outfit. He could sit around and quote old-time book-authors by the hour—classic writers like Prather and Spillane. In another age he might have been a college professor or even a football coach; he had an aptitude for the arts.

And there was Lobo, the misogynist, who had fled a wife and eleven children back in Monterey; and Januzki, who used to be mixed up with one of those odd religious cults out on the Coast. He bragged he'd been one of the Big Daddy-Os in the Beat Generationists, and he argued with Bassett about some old-time evangelist named Kerouac.

Best of all, though, Harry liked talking to Nick Kendrick. Nick's hobby was music, and he treasured his second-hand stereophonic unit and collection of tapes. He too was a classicist in his way, and there was many a long winter night when Harry sat there listening to ancient folk songs. The quaint atonalities of progressive jazz and the childishly frantic rhythms of "cool sounds" were somehow soothing and reassuring in their reminder of a simple heritage from a simpler age.

But above all, these men were wranglers, and they took a peculiar pride in the traditions of their own calling. There wasn't a one of them who wouldn't spend hours mulling over the lore of the range and the prairie. They knew the Great Names from the Great Days—Eugene Autry, Wyatt Earp, the legendary Thomas Mix, Dale Robertson, Paladin, and all the others; men who rode actual horses in the era when the West was really an untamed frontier.

And like the cowboys they were, they maintained the customs of other days. Every few months they rode a bucking helicopter into some raw western town—Las Vegas, or Reno, or even over to Palm Springs—to drink recklessly in the cocktail lounges, gamble wildly at the slots, or "go down the line" with some telescreen model on location for outdoor ad-backgrounds. There were still half a dozen such sin-cities scattered throughout the west; even the government acknowledged the need of lonely men to blow off steam. And though Ag Culture officially disapproved of the whole cowhand system, and talked grimly of setting up new and more efficient methods for training personnel and handling the cattle ranges, nothing was ever done. Perhaps the authorities knew that it was a hopeless task; only the outcasts and iconoclasts had the temperament necessary to survive such loneliness under an open sky. Citydwelling conformists just could not endure the monotony.

But even Emil Grizek's hands marvelled at the way Harry lived. He never joined them in their disorderly descent upon the scarlet cities of the plain, and most of the time he didn't even seem to watch the telescreen. If anything, he deliberately avoided all possible contact with civilization.

Since he never volunteered any information about his own past, they privately concluded that he was just a psychopathic personality.

"Strong regressive and seclusive tendencies," Bassett explained, solemnly.

“Sure,” Nick Kendrick nodded, wisely. “You mean a Mouldy Fig, like.”

“Creeping Meatball,” muttered cultist Januzki. Not being religious fanatics, the others didn’t understand the reference. But gradually they came to accept Harry’s isolationist ways as the norm—at least, for him. And since he never quarreled, never exhibited any signs of dissatisfaction, he was left to his own pattern.

Thus it was all the more surprising when that pattern was rudely and abruptly shattered.

Harry remembered the occasion well. It was the day the Leff Law was officially upheld by the Supremist Courts. The whole business came over the telescreens and there was no way of avoiding it—you couldn’t avoid it, because everybody was talking about it and everybody was watching.

“Now what do you think?” Emil Grizek demanded. “Any woman wants a baby, she’s got to have those shots. They say kids shrink down into nothing. Weigh less than two pounds when they’re born, and never grow up to be any bigger than midgets. You ask me, the whole thing’s plumb loco, to say nothing of psychotic.”

“I dunno.” This from Big Phil. “Reckon they just about have to do something, the way cities are filling up and all. Tell me every spot in the country, except for the plains states here, is busting at the seams. Same in Europe, Africa, South America. Running out of space, running out of food, all over the world. This man Leffingwell figures on cutting down on size so’s to keep the whole shebang going.”

“But why couldn’t it be done on a voluntary basis?” Bassett demanded. “These arbitrary rulings are bound to result in frustrations. And can you imagine what will happen to the individual family constellations? Take a couple that already has two youngsters, as of now. Suppose the wife submits to the inoculations for her next child and it’s born with a size-mutation. How in the world will that child survive as a midget in a family of giants? There’ll be untold damage to the personality—”

“We’ve heard all those arguments,” Tom Lowery cut in. “The Naturalists have been handing out that line for years. What happens to the new generation of kids, how do we know they won't be mentally defective, how can they adjust, by what right does the government interfere with private lives, personal religious beliefs; all that sort of thing. For over ten years now the debate's been going on. And meanwhile, time is running out. Space is running out. Food is running out. It isn't a question of individual choice any longer—it's a question of group survival. I say the Courts are right. We have to go according to law. And back the law up with force of arms if necessary."

"We get the message," Januzki agreed. "But something tells me there'll be trouble. Most folks need a midget like they need a monkey on their backs."

It's a gasser, pardners," said Nick Kendrick. "Naturalists don't dig this. They'll fight it all along the line. Everybody's gonna be all shook up.

It is still a good idea," Lobo insisted. "This Dr. Leffingwell, he has made the tests. For years he has given injections and no harm has come. The children are healthy, they survive. They learn in special schools—"

"How do you know?" Bassett demanded. "Maybe it's all a lot of motivationalist propaganda.

"We have seen them on the telescreens, no?"

"They could be faking the whole thing."

"But Leffingwell, he has offered the shots to other governments beside our own. The whole world will adopt them.

"What if some countries don't? What if our kids become midgets and the Asiatics refuse the inoculations?"

"They won't. They need room even more than we do."

"No sense arguing," Emil Grizek concluded. "It's the law. You know that. And if you don't like it, join the Naturalists." He chuckled. "But better hurry. Something tells me there won't be any Naturalists around after a couple of years. Now that there's a Leff Law, the government isn't likely to stand for too much criticism." He turned to Harry. "What do you think?" he asked.

Harry shrugged. "No comment," he said.

But the next day he went to Grizek and demanded his pay in full.

"Leaving?" Grizek muttered. "I don't understand. You've been with us almost five years. Where you going, what you intend to do? What's got into you all of a sudden?"

"Time for a change," Harry told him. "I've been saving my money."

"Don't I know it? Never touched a penny in all this time." Grizek ran a hand across his chin. "Say, if it's a raise you're looking for, I can—"

"No, thanks. It's not that. I've money enough."

"So you have. Around eighteen, twenty thousand, I reckon, what with the bonuses." Emil Grizek sighed. "Well, if you insist, that's the way it's got to be, I suppose. When you plan on taking off?"

"Just as soon as there's a 'copter available."

"Got one going up to Colorado Springs tomorrow morning for the mail. I can get you aboard, give you a check—"

"I'll want my money in cash."

"Well, now, that isn't so easy.

Have to send up for a special draft. Take a week or so."

"I can wait."

"All right. And think it over. Maybe you'll decide to change your mind."

But Harry didn't change his mind. And ten days later he rode a 'copter into town, his money-belt strapped beneath his safety-belt.

From Colorado Springs he jetted to Kancity, and from Kancity to Memphisee. As long as he had money, nobody asked any questions. He holed up in cheap airtels and waited for developments.

It wasn't easy to accustom himself to urbanization again. He had been away from cities for over seven years now, and it might well have been seven centuries. The overpopulation problem was appalling. The outlawing of private automotive vehicles had helped, and the clearing of the airlanes served a purpose; the widespread increase in the use of atomic power cut the smog somewhat. But the synthetic food was frightful, the crowding intolerable, and the welter of rules and regulations attending the performance of even the simplest human activity past all his comprehension. Ration cards were in universal use for almost everything; fortunately for Harry, the black market accepted cash with no embarrassing inquiries. He found that he could survive.

But Harry's interest was not in survival; he was bent upon destruction. Surely the Naturalists would be organized and planning a way!

Back in '98, of course, they'd been merely an articulate minority without formal unity—an abstract, amorphous group akin to the "Liberals" of previous generations. A Naturalist could be a Catholic priest, a Unitarian layman, an atheist factory hand, a government employee, a housewife with strong prejudices against governmental controls, a wealthy man who deplored the dangers of growing industrialization, an Ag Culture worker who dreaded the dwindling of individual rights, an educator who feared widespread employment of social psychology, or almost anyone who opposed the concept of Mass Man, Mass-Motivated. Naturalists had never formed a single class, a single political party.

Surely, however, the enactment of the Leffingwell Law would have united them! Harry knew there was strong opposition, not only on the higher levels but amongst the general population. People would be afraid of the inoculations; theologians would condemn the process; economic interests, real-estate owners and transportation magnates and manufacturers would sense the threat here. They'd sponsor and they'd subsidize their spokesmen and the Naturalists would evolve into an efficient body of opposition.

So Harry hoped, arid so he thought, until he came out into the cities; came out into the cities and realized that the very magnitude of Mass Man mitigated against any attempt to organize him, except as a creature who labored and consumed. Organization springs from discussion, and discussion from thought—but who can think in chaos, discuss in delirium, organize in a vacuum? And the common citizen, Harry realized, had seemingly lost the capacity for group action. He remembered his own existence years ago—either he was lost in a crowd or he was alone, at home. Firm friendships were rare, and family units survived on the flimsiest of foundations. It took too much time and effort just to follow the rules, follow the traffic, follow the incessant routines governing even the simplest life-pattern in the teeming cities. For leisure there was the telescreen and the yellowjackets, and serious problems could be referred to the psych in routine checkups. Everybody seemed lost in the crowd these days.

Harry discovered that Dr. Manschoff had indeed lied to him; mental disorders were on the increase. He remembered an old, old book—one of the very first treatises on sociological psychology. The Lonely Crowd, wasn't it? Full of mumbo-jumbo about "inner-directed" and "outer-directed" personalities. Well, there was a grain of truth in it all. The crowd, and its individual members, lived in loneliness. And since you didn't know very many people well enough to talk to, intimately, you talked to yourself. Since you couldn't get away from physical contact with others whenever you ventured abroad, you stayed inside—except when you had to go to work, had to line up for food-rations or supplies, had to wait for hours for your check-ups on off-days. And staying inside meant being confined to the equivalent of an old-fashioned prison cell. If you weren't married, you lived in "solitary"; if you were married, you suffered the presence of fellow-inmates whose habits became intolerable, in time. So you watched the screen more and more, or you increased your quota of sedation, and when that didn't help you looked for a real escape. It was always available to you if you searched long enough; waiting at the tip of a knife, in the coil of a rope, the muzzle of a gun. You could find it at the very bottom of a bottle of pills or at the very bottom of the courtyard outside your window. Harry recalled looking for it there himself, so many years ago.

But now he was looking for something else. He was looking for others who shared not only his viewpoint but his purposefulness.

Where were the Naturalists?

Harry searched for several years.

The press?

But there were no Naturalists visible on the telescreens. The news and the newsmakers reflected a national philosophy—adopted many generations ago by the Founding Fathers of, mass-communication in their infinite wisdom—"What's good for General Motors is good for the country." And according to. them, everything happening was good for the country; that was the cardinal precept in the science of autobuyology. There were no Arnold Ritchies left any more, and the printed newzine seemed to have vanished.

The clergy?

Individual churches with congregations in physical attendance, seemed difficult to find. Telepreachers still appeared regularly every Sunday, but their scripts—like everyone else's—had been processed in advance. Denominationalism and sectarianism had waned, too; all of these performers seemed very much alike, in that they were vigorous, forthright, inspiring champions of the status quo.

The scientists?

But the scientists were a part of the government, and the government was a one-party system, and the system supported the nation and the nation supported the scientists. Of course, there were still private laboratories subsidized for industrial purposes, but the men who worked in them seemed singularly disinterested in social problems. In a way, Harry could understand their position. It isn't likely that a dedicated scientist, a man whose specialized research has won him a Nobel Prize for creating a new detergent, will be worldly enough to face unpleasant realities beyond the walls of his antiseptic sanctum. After all, there was precedent for such isolationism—did the sainted Betty Crocker ever enlist in any crusades? As for physicians, psychiatrists and mas' pychologists, they were the very ones who formed the hard core of Leffingwell's support.

The educators, then?

Vocational Apt was a part of the government. And the poor pedagogues, who had spent generations hacking their way out of the blackboard jungles, were only too happy to welcome the notion of a coming millennium when their small charges would be still smaller. Even though formal schooling, for most youngsters, terminated at fourteen, there was still the problem of overcrowding. Telescreening and teletesting techniques were a help, but the problem was essentially a physical one. And Leffingwell was providing a physical solution. Besides, the educators had been themselves educated, through Vocational Apt. And while they, and the government, fervently upheld the principle of freedom of speech, they had to draw the line somewhere. As everyone knows, freedom of speech does not mean freedom to criticize.

Business men?

Perhaps there were some disgruntled souls in the commercial community, whose secret heroes were the oil tycoons of a bygone era or the old-time Stock Exchange clan united under the totems of the bull or the bear. But the day of the rugged individualist was long departed; only the flabby individualist remained. And he had the forms to fill out and the inspectors to contend with, and the rationing to worry about and the taxes to meet and the quotas to fulfill. But in the long run, he managed. The business man worked for the government, but the government also worked for him. His position was protected. And if the government said the Leff Shots would solve the overpopulation problem—without cutting down the number of consumers—well, was that really so bad? Why, in a generation or so there'd be even more customers! That meant increased property values, too.

It took Harry several years to realize he'd never find Naturalists organized for group action. The capacity for group action had vanished as the size of the group increased. All interests were interdependent; the old civic, fraternal, social and anti-social societies had no present purpose any more. And the once-familiar rallying-points—whether they represented idealistic humanitarianism or crass self-interest—had vanished in the crowd. Patriotism, racialism, unionism, had all been lost in a moiling megalopolitanism.

There were protests, of course. The mothers objected, some of them. Ag Culture, in particular, ran into difficulties with women who revived the quaint custom of "going on strike" against the Left Law and refused to take their shots. But it was all on the individual level, and quickly coped with. Government medical authorities met the women at checkup time and demonstrated that the Leff Law had teeth in it. Teeth, and scalpels. The rebellious women were not subdued, slain, or segregated—they were merely sterilized. Perhaps more would have come of this if their men had backed them up; but the men, by and large, were realists. Having a kid was a headache these days. This new business of injections wasn't so bad, when you came right down to it. There'd still be youngsters around, and you'd get the same allotment for extra living space—only the way it worked out, there'd be more room and the kids would eat less. Pretty good deal. And it wan't as if the young ones were harmed. Some of them seemed to be a lot smarter than ordinary—like on some of the big quizshows, youngsters of eight and nine were winning all those big prizes. Bright little ones. Of course, these must be the ones raised in the first special school the government had set up. They said old Leffingwell, the guy who invented the shots, was running it himself. Sort of experimenting to see how this new crop of kids would make out . . .

It was when Harry learned about the school that he knew what he must do.

And if nobody else would help him, he'd act on his own. There might not be any help from organized society, but he still had disorganized society to turn to.

He spent the next two years and the last of his money finding a way. The pattern of criminality had changed, too, and it was no easy matter to find the assistance he needed. About the only group crime still flourishing was hijacking; it took him a long while to locate a small undercover outfit which operated around St. Louie and arrange to obtain a helicopter and pilot. Getting hold of the rifle was still more difficult, but he managed. And by the time everything was assembled, he'd found out what he needed to know about Dr. Leffingwell and his school.

As he'd suspected, the school was located in the old canyon, right in the same buildings which had once served as experimental units. How many youngsters were there, Harry didn't know. Maybe Manschoff was still on the staff, and maybe they'd brought in a whole new staff. These things didn't matter. What mattered was that Leffingwell was on the premises. And a man who knew his way about, a man who worked alone and to a single purpose, could reach him.

Thus it was that Harry Collins crouched behind the boulder that bright May morning and waited for Dr. Leffingwell to appear. The helicopter had dropped him at the upper end of the canyon the day before, giving him a chance to reconnoitre and familiarize himself with the terrain once again. He'd located Leffingwell's quarters, even seen the man through one of the lower windows. Harry had no trouble recognizing him; the face was only too familiar from a thousand 'casts viewed on a thousand screens. Inevitably, some time today, he'd emerge from the building. And when he did, Harry would be waiting.

He shifted behind the rocks and stretched his legs. Twelve years had passed, and now he'd come full circle. The whole business had started here, and here it must end. That was simple justice.

And it is justice, Harry told himself. It's not revenge. Because there'd be no point to revenge; that was only melodramatic nonsense. He was no Monte Cristo, come to wreak vengeance on his cruel oppressors. And he was no madman, no victim of a monomaniacal obsession. What he was doing was the result of lengthy and logical consideration.

If Harry Collins, longtime fugitive from a government treatment center, tried to take his story to the people, he'd be silenced without a hearing. But his story must be heard. There was only one way to arrest the attention of a nation—with the report of a rifle.

A bullet-in Leffingwell's brain; that was the solution of the problem. Overnight the assassin would become a national figure. They'd undoubtedly try him and undoubtedly condemn him, but first he'd have his day in court. He'd get a chance to speak out. He'd give all the voiceless, unorganized victims of the Leff Law a reason for rebellion—and offer them an example. If Leffingwell had to die, it would be in a good cause. Moreover, he deserved to die. Hadn't he killed men, women, infants, without mercy?

But it's not revenge, Harry repeated. And I know what I'm doing. Maybe I was disturbed before, but I'm sane now. Perfectly logical. Perfectly calm. Perfectly controlled.

Yes, and now his sane, logical, calm, controlled eyes noted that the distant door was opening, and he sighted through the 'scope and brought his sane, logical, calm, controlled hand up along the barrel to the trigger. He could see the two men emerging, and the shorter, plumper of the two was Leffingwell. He squinted at the high forehead with its receding hairline; it was a perfect target. A little squeeze now and he knew what would happen. In his sane, logical, calm, controlled mind he could visualize the way the black hole would appear in the center of that forehead, while behind it would be the torn and dripping redness flecked with gray—"What are you doing?" Harry whirled, staring; staring down at the infant who stood smiling beside him. It was an infant, that was obvious enough, and implicit in the diminutive stature, the delicate limbs and the oversized head. But infants do not wear the clothing of preadolescent boys, they do not enunciate with clarity, they do not stare coolly and knowingly at their elders. They do not say, "Why do you want to harm Dr. Leffingwell?"

Harry gazed into the wide eyes. He couldn't speak.

"You're sick, aren't you?" the child persisted. "Let me call the doctor. He can help you."

Harry swung the rifle around. "I'll give you just ten seconds to clear out of here before I shoot."

The child shook his head. Then he took a step forward. "You wouldn't hurt me," he said, gravely. "You're just sick. That's why you talk this way." Harry leveled the rifle. "I'm not sick," he muttered. "I know what I'm doing. And I know all about you, too. You're one of them, aren't you? One of the first of Leffingwell's brood of illegitimates."

The child took another step forward. “I’m not illegitimate,” he said. “I know who I am. I’ve seen the records. My name is Harry Collins.”

Somewhere the rifle exploded, the bullet hurtling harmlessly overhead. But Harry didn’t hear it. All he could hear, exploding in his own brain as he went down into darkness, was the sane, logical, calm, controlled voice of his son.

7. Michael Cavendish—2027

MIKE was just coming through the clump of trees when the boy began to wave at him. He shifted the clumsy old Jeffrey .475, cursing the weight as he quickened his pace. But there was no help for it, he had to carry the gun himself. None of the boys were big enough.

He wondered what it had been like in the old days, when you could get fullsized bearers. There used to be game all over the place, too, and a white hunter was king.

And what was there left now? Nothing but pygmies, all of them, scurrying around and beating the brush for dibatags and gerenuks. When he was still a boy, Mike had seen the last of the big antelopes go; the last of the wildebeestes and zebra, too. Then the carnivores followed—the lions and the leopards. Simba was dead, and just as well. These natives would never dare to come out of the villages if they knew any lions were left. Most of them had gone to Cape and the other cities anyway; handling cattle was too much of a chore, except on a government farm. Those cows looked like moving mountains alongside the average boy.

Of course there were still some of the older generation left; Kikiyu and even a few Watusi. But the free inoculations had begun many years ago, and the life-cycle moved at an accelerated pace here. Natives grew old and died at thirty; they matured at. fifteen. Now, with the shortage of game, the elders perished still more swiftly and only the young remained outside the cities and the farm projects.

Mike smiled as he waited for the boy to come up to him. He wasn't smiling at the boy—he was smiling at himself, for being here. He ought to be in Cape, too, or Kenyarobi. Damned silly, this business of being a white hunter, when there was nothing left to hunt.

But somehow he'd stayed on, since Dad died. There were a few compensations. At least here in the forests a man could still move about a bit, taste privacy and solitude and the strange, exotic tropical fruit called loneliness. Even that was vanishing today.

It was compensation enough, perhaps, for lugging this damned Jeffrey. Mike tried to remember the last time he'd fired it at a living target. A year, two years? Yes, almost two. That gorilla up in Ruwenzori country. At least the boys swore it was ingagi. He hadn't hit it, anyway. Got away in the darkness. Probably he'd been shooting at a shadow. There were no more gorillas—maybe they had been taking the shots, too. Perhaps they'd all turned into rhesus monkeys.

Mike watched the boy run towards him. It was a good five hundred yards from the river bank, and the short brown legs couldn't move very swiftly. He wondered what it felt like to be small. One's sense of proportion must be different. And that, in turn, would affect one's sense of values. What values applied to the world about you when you were only three feet high?

Mike wouldn't know. He was a big man—almost five feet seven.

Sometimes Mike reflected on what things might be like if he'd been born, say, twenty years later. By that time almost everyone would be a product of Leff shots, and he'd be no exception. He might stay with people his own age in Kenyarobi without feeling self-conscious, clumsy, conspicuous. Pressed, he had to admit that was part of the reason he preferred to remain out here at Dad's old place now. He could tolerate the stares of the natives, but whenever he ventured into a city he felt awkward under the scrutiny of the young people. The way those teen-agers looked up at him made him feel a monster, rather.

Better to endure the monotony, the emptiness out here. Yes, and wait for a chance to hunt. Even though, nine times out of ten, it turned out to be a wild goose-chase. During the past year or so Mike had hunted nothing but legends and rumors, spent his time stalking shadows.

Then the villagers had come to him, three days ago, with their wild story. Even when he heard it, he realized it must be pure fable. And the more they insisted, the more they protested, the more he realized it simply couldn’t be.

Still, he’d come. Anything to experience some action, anything to create the illusion of purpose, of—

“Tembo!” shrieked the boy, excited beyond all pretense of caution. “Up ahead, in river. You come quick, you see!”

No. It couldn’t be. The government surveys were thorough. The last record of a specimen dated back over a half-dozen years ago. It was impossible that any survivors remained. And all during the safari these past days, not a sign or a print or a spoor.

“Tembo!” shrilled the boy. “Come quick!”

Mike cradled the gun and started forward. The other bearers shuffled behind him, unable to keep pace because of their short legs and—he suspected—unwilling to do so for fear of what might lie ahead.

Halfway towards the river bank, Mike halted. Now he could hear the rumbling, the unmistakable rumbling. And now he could smell the rank mustiness borne on the hot breeze. Well, at least he was down-wind.

The boy behind him trembled, eyes wide. He had seen something, all right. Maybe just a crocodile, though. Still some crocs around. And he doubted if a young native would know the difference.

Nevertheless, Mike felt a sudden surge of unfamiliar excitement, half expectancy and half fear. Something wallowed in the river; something that rumbled and exuded the stench of life.

Now they were approaching the trees bordering the bank. Mike checked his gun carefully. Then he advanced until his body was aligned with the trees. From here he could see and not be seen. He could peer down at the river—or the place where the river had been, during the rainy season long past. Now it was nothing but a mudwallow under the glaring sun; a huge mudwallow, pitted with deep, circular indentations and dotted with dung.

But in the middle of it stood tembo.

Tembo was a mountain, tembo was a black block of breathing basalt. Tembo roared and snorted and rolled red eyes.

Mike gasped.

He was a white hunter, but he'd never seen a bull elephant before. And this one stood eleven feet at the shoulders if it stood an inch; the biggest creature walking the face of the earth.

It had risen from the mud, abandoned its wallowing as its trunk curled about, sensitive to the unfamiliar scent of man. Its ears rose like the outspread wings of some gigantic jungle bat. Mike could see the flies buzzing around the ragged edges. He stared at the great tusks that were veined and yellowed and broken—once men had hunted elephants for ivory, he remembered.

But how could they? Even with guns, how had they dared to confront a moving mountain? Mike tried to swallow, but his throat was dry. The stock slipped through his clammy hands.

"Shoot!" implored the boy beside him. "You shoot, now!"

Mike gazed down. The elephant was aware of him. It turned deliberately, staring up the bank as it swayed on the four black pillars of its legs. Mike could see its eyes, set in a mass of grayish wrinkles. The eyes had recognized him.

They knew, he realized. The eyes knew all about him; who he was and what he was and what he had come here to do. The eyes had seen man before—perhaps long before Mike was born. They understood everything; the gun and the presence and the purpose.

"Shoot!" the boy cried, not bothering to hold his voice down any longer. For the elephant was moving slowly towards the side of the wallow, moving deliberately to firmer footing, and the boy was afraid. Mike was afraid, too, but he couldn't shoot.

"No," he murmured. "Let him go. I can't kill him."

"You must," the boy said. "You promise. Look—all the meat. Meat for two, three villages."

Mike shook his head. “I can’t do it,” he said. “That isn’t meat. That’s life. Bigger life than we are. Don’t you understand? Oh, the bloody hell with it! Come on.

The boy wasn’t listening to him. He was watching the elephant. And now he started to tremble.

For the elephant was moving up onto solid ground. It moved slowly, daintily, almost mincing as its legs sampled the surface of the shore. Then it looked up and this time there was no doubt as to the direction of its gaze—it stared intently at Mike and the boy on the bank. Its ears fanned, then flared, Suddenly the elephant raised its trunk and trumpeted fiercely.

And then, lowering the black battering-ram of its head, the beast came forward. A deceptively slow lope, a scarcely accelerated trot, and then all at once it was moving swiftly, swiftly and surely and inexorably towards them. The angle of the bank was not steep and the elephant’s speed never slackened on the slope. Its right shoulder struck a sapling and the sapling splintered. It was crashing forward in full charge. Again it trumpeted, trunk extended like a flail of doom.

“Shoot!” screamed the boy.

Mike didn’t want to shoot. He wanted to run. He wanted to flee the mountain, flee the incredible breathing bulk of this grotesque giant. But he was a white hunter, he was a man, and a man is not a beast; a man does not run away from life in any shape or size.

The trunk came up. Mike raised the gun. He heard the monster roar, far away, and then he heard another sound that must be the gun’s discharge, and something hit him in the shoulder and knocked him down. Recoil? Yes, because the elephant wasn’t there any more; he could hear the crashing and thrashing down below, over the rim of the river bank.

Mike stood up. He saw the boy running now, running back to the bearers huddled along the edge of the trail.

He rubbed his shoulder, picked up his gun, reloaded. The sounds from below had ceased. Slowly, Mike advanced to the lip of the bank and stared down.

The bull elephant had fallen and rolled into the wallow once more. It had taken a direct hit, just beneath the right ear, and even as Mike watched, its trunk writhed feebly like a dying serpent, then fell forward into the mud. The gigantic ears twitched, then flickered and flopped, and the huge body rolled and settled.

Suddenly Mike began to cry.

Damn it, he hadn't wanted to shoot. If the elephant hadn't charged like that—

But the elephant had to charge. Just as he had to shoot. That was the whole secret. The secret of life. And the secret of death, too.

Mike turned away, facing the east. Kenyarobi was east, and he'd be going there now. Nothing to hold him here in the forests any longer. He wouldn't even wait for the big feast. To hell with elephant-meat, anyway. His hunting days were over.

Mike walked slowly up the trail to the waiting boys.

And behind him, in the wallow, the flies settled down on the lifeless carcass of the last elephant in the world.

8. Harry Collins—2029

THE guards at Stark Falls were under strict orders not to talk. Each prisoner here was exercised alone in a courtyard runway, and meals were served in the cells. The cells were comfortable enough, and while there were no telescreens, books were available—genuine, oldstyle books which must have been preserved from libraries dismantled fifty years ago or more. Harry Collins found no titles dated later than 1975. Every day or so an attendant wheeled around a cart piled high with the dusty volumes. Harry read to pass the time.

At first he kept anticipating his trial, but after a while he almost forgot about that possibility. And it was well over a year before he got a chance to tell his story to anyone.

When his opportunity came, his audience did not consist of judge or jury, doctor, lawyer or penologist. He spoke only to Richard Wade, a fellow-prisoner who had been thrust into the adjoining cell on the evening of October 11th, 2013.

Harry spoke haltingly at first, but as he progressed the words came more easily, and emotion lent its own eloquence. His unseen auditor on the other side of the wall did not interrupt or question him; it was enough, for Harry, that there was someone to listen at last.

"So it wasn't a bit like I'd expected," he concluded. "No trial, no publicity. I've never seen Leffingwell again, nor Manschoff. Nobody questioned me. By the time I recovered consciousness, I was here in prison. Buried alive."

Richard Wade spoke slowly, for the first time. "You're lucky. They might have shot you down on the spot."

"That's just what bothers me," Harry told him. "Why didn't they kill me? Why lock me up incommunicado this way? There aren't many prisons left these days, with food and space at such a premium."

"There are no prisons left at all—officially," Wade said. "Just as there are no longer any cemeteries. But important people are still given private burials and their remains secretly preserved. All a matter of influence."

"I've no influence. I'm not important. Wouldn't you think they'd consider it risky to keep me alive, under the circumstances? If there'd ever be an investigation—"

"Who would investigate? Not the government, surely."

"But suppose there's a political turnover. Suppose Congress want to make capital of the situation?"

"There is no Congress."

Harry gasped. "No Congress?"

"As of last month. It was dissolved. Henceforth we are governed by the Cabinet, with authority delegated to department heads."

"But that's preposterous! Nobody'd stand still for something like that!"

“They did stand still, most of them. After a year of careful preparation—of wholesale exposes of Congressional graft and corruption and inefficiency. Turned out that Congress was the villain all along; the Senators and Representatives had finagled tariff-barriers and restrictive trade-agreements which kept our food supply down. They were opposing international federation. In plain language, people were sold a bill of goods—get rid of Congress and you’ll have more food. That did it.”

“But you’d think the politicians themselves would realize they were cutting their own throats! The state legislatures and the governors—”

“Legislatures were dissolved by the same agreement,” Wade went on. “There are no states any more; just governmental districts. Based upon sensible considerations of area and population. This isn’t the oldtime expanding economy based on obsolescence and conspicuous consumption. The primary problem at the moment is sheer survival. In a way, the move makes sense. Old-fashioned political machinery couldn’t cope with the situation; there’s no time for debate when instantaneous decisions are necessary to national welfare. You’ve heard how civil liberties were suspended during the old wars. Well, there’s a war on right now; a war against hunger, a war against the forces of fecundity. In another dozen years or so, when the Leff shot generation is fullgrown and a lot of the elderly have died off, the tensions will ease. Meanwhile, quick action is necessary. Arbitrary action.”

“But you’re defending dictatorship!”

Richard Wade made a sound which is usually accompanied by a derisive shrug. “Am I? Well, I didn’t when I was outside. And that’s why I’m here now.”

Harry Collins cleared his throat. “What did you do?”

“If you refer to my profession, I was a scripter. If you refer to my alleged criminal activity, I made the error of thinking the way you do, and the worse error of attempting to inject such attitudes in my scripts. Seems that when Congress was formally dissolved, there was some notion of preparing a timely show—a sort of historical review of the body, using old film clips.

What my superiors had in mind was a comedy of errors; a cavalcade of mistakes and misdeeds showing just why we were better off without supporting a political sideshow. Well, I carried out the assignment and edited the films, but when I drafted a rough commentary, I made the mistake of taking both a pro and con slant. Nothing like that ever reached the telescreens, of course, but what I did was promptly noted. They came for me at once and hustled me off here. I didn't get a hearing or a trial, either."

"But why didn't they execute you? Or—" Harry hesitated—"is that what you expect?"

"Why didn't they execute you?" Wade shot back. He was silent for a moment before continuing. "No, I don't expect anything like that, now. They'd have done it on the spot if they intended to do so at all. No, I've got another idea about people like you and myself. And about some of the Congressmen and Senators who dropped out of sight, too. I think we're being stockpiled."

"Stockpiled?"

"It's all part of a plan. Give me a little time to think. We can talk again, later." Wade chuckled once more. "Looks as if there'll be ample opportunity in the future."

And there was. In the months ahead, Harry spoke frequently with his friend behind the wall. He never saw him—prisoners at Stark Falls were exercised separately, and there was no group assembly or recreation. Surprisingly adequate meals were served in surprisingly comfortable cells. In the matter of necessities, Harry had no complaints. And now that he had someone to talk to, the time seemed to go more swiftly.

He learned a great deal about Richard Wade during the next few years. Mostly, Wade liked to reminisce about the old days. He talked about working for the networks—the commercial networks, privately owned, which flourished before the government took over communications media in the '803.

"That's where you got your start, eh?" Harry asked.

"Lord, no, boy! I'm a lot more ancient than you think. Why, I'm pushing sixty-five. Born in 1940. That's right, during World War II. I can almost remember the atomic bomb, and I sure as hell remember the sputniks. It was a crazy period, let me tell you. The pessimists worried about the Russians blowing us up, and the optimists were sure we had a glorious future in the conquest of space. Ever hear that old fable about the blind men examining an elephant? Well, that's the way most people were; each of them groping around and trying to determine the exact shape of things to come. A few of us even made a little money from it for a while, writing science fiction. That's how I got my start."

"You were a writer?"

"Sold my first story when I was eighteen or so. Kept on writing off and on for almost twenty years. Of course, Robertson's thermo-nuc formula came along in '75, and after that everything went to pot. It knocked out the chances of future war, but it also knocked out the interest in speculation or escape-fiction. So I moved over into television for a while, and stayed with it. But the old science fiction was fun while it lasted. Ever read any of it?"

"No," Harry admitted. "That was all before my time. Tell me, though—did any of it make sense? I mean, did some of those writers foresee what was really going to happen?"

"There were plenty of penny prophets and nickel Nostradamuses," Wade told him. "But as I said, most of them were assuming war with the Communists or a new era of space travel. Since Communism collapsed and space flight was just an expensive journey to a dead end and dead worlds, it follows that the majority of fictional futures were founded on fallacies. And all the rest of the extrapolations dealt with superficial social manifestations.

"For example, they wrote about civilizations dominated by advertising and mass-motivation techniques. It's true that during my childhood this seemed to be a logical trend—but once demand exceeded supply, the whole mechanism of stimulating demand, which was advertising's chief function, bogged down. And mass-motivation techniques, today, are dedicated almost entirely to maintaining minimum resistance to a system insuring our survival.

“Another popular idea was based on the notion of an expanding matriarchy—a geronto-matriarchy, rather, in which older women would take control. In an age when women outlived men by a number of years, this seemed possible. Now, of course, shortened working hours and medical advances have equalized the life-span. And since private property has become less and less of a factor in dominating our collective destinies, it hardly matters whether the male or the female has the upper hand.

“Then there was the common theory that technological advances would result in a pushbutton society, where automatons would do all the work. And so they might—if we had an unlimited supply of raw materials to produce robots, and unlimited power-sources to activate them. As we now realize, atomic power cannot be utilized on a minute scale.

“Last, but not least, there was the concept of a medically-orientated system, with particular emphasis on psychotherapy, neurosurgery, and parapsychology. The world was going to be run by telepaths, psychosis eliminated by brainwashing, intellect developed by hypnotic suggestion. It sounded great—but the conquest of physical disease has occupied the medical profession almost exclusively.

“No, what they all seemed to overlook, with only a few exceptions, was the population problem. You can’t run a world through advertising when there are so many people that there aren’t enough goods to go around anyway. You can’t turn it over to big business when big government has virtually absorbed all of the commercial and industrial functions, just to cope with an ever-growing demand. A matriarchy loses its meaning when the individual family unit changes character, under the stress of an increasing population-pressure which eliminates the old-fashioned home, family circle, and social pattern. And the more we must conserve dwindling natural resources for people, the less we can expend on experimentation with robots and machinery. As for the psychologist-dominated society, there are just too many patients and not enough physicians. I don’t have to remind you that the military caste lost its chance of control when war disappeared, and that religion is losing ground every day. Class-lines are vanishing, and racial distinctions will be going next. The old idea of a World Federation is becoming more and more practical. Once the political barriers are down, miscegenation will finish the job. But nobody seemed to foresee this particular future. They all made the mistake of worrying about the hydrogen-bomb instead of the sperm-bomb."

Harry nodded thoughtfully, although Wade couldn't see his response. "But isn't it true that there's a little bit of each of these concepts in our actual situation today?" he asked. "I mean, government and business are virtually one and the same, and they do use propaganda techniques to control all media. As for scientific research, look at how we've rebuilt our cities and developed synthetics for food and fuel and clothing and shelter. When it comes to medicine, there's Leffingwell and his inoculations. Isn't that all along the lines of your early science fiction?"

"Where's your Underground?" Richard Wade demanded.

"My what?"

"Your Underground," Wade repeated. "Hell, every science fiction yarn about a future society had its Underground! That was the whole gimmick in the plot. The hero was a conformist who tangled with the social order—come to think of it, that's what you did, years ago. Only instead of becoming an impotent victim of the system, he'd meet up with the Underground Movement, Not some sourball like your friend Ritchie, who tried to operate on his own hook, without real plans or system, but a complete sub rosa organization, bent on starting a revolution and taking over. There'd be wise old priests and wise old crooks and wise old officers and wise old officials, all playing a double game and planning a coup. Spies all over the place, get me? And in no time at all, our hero would be playing tag with the top figures in the government. That's how it worked out in all the stories.

"But what happens in real life? What happened to you, for example? You fell for a series of stupid tricks, stupidly perpetrated—because the people in power are people, and not the kind of synthetic super-intellects dreamed up by frustrated fiction-fabricators. You found out that the logical candidates to. constitute an Underground were the Naturalists; again, they were just ordinary individuals with no genius for organization. As for coming in contact with key figures, you were actually on hand when Leffingwell completed his experiments. And you came back, years later, to hunt him down. Very much in the heroic tradition, I admit. But you never saw the man except through the telescopic sights of your rifle. That was the end of it. No modern-day Machiavelli has hauled you in to play cat-and-mouse games with you, and no. futuristic Freud has bothered to wash your brain or soft-soap your, subconscious. You just aren't that important, Collins."

"But they put me in a special prison. Why?"

"Who knows? They put me here, too."

"You said something once, about stockpiling us. What did you mean?"

"Well, it was just an old science fiction idea, I suppose. I'll tell you about it tomorrow, eh?"

And so the matter—and Harry Collins—rested for the night.

The next day Richard Wade was gone.

Harry called to him and there was no answer. And he cried out and he cursed and he paced his cell and he walked alone in the courtyard and he begged the impassive guards for information, and he sweated and he talked to himself and he counted the days and he lost count of the days.

Then, all at once, there was another prisoner in the adjacent cell, and his name was William Chang, and he was a biologist. He was reticent about the crime he had committed, but quite voluble about the crimes committed by others in the world outside. Much of what he said, about genes and chromosomes and recessive characteristics and mutation, seemed incomprehensible to Harry. But in their talks, one thing emerged clearly enough—Chang was concerned for the future of the race. "Leffingwell should have waited," he said. "It's the second generation that will be important. As I tried to tell my people—"

"Is that why you're here?"

Chang sighed. “I suppose so. They wouldn’t listen, of course. Overpopulation has always been the curse of Asia, and this seemed to be such an obvious solution. But who knows? The time may come when they need men like myself.”

“So you were stockpiled too.”

“What’s that?”

Harry told him about Richard Wade’s remarks, and together they tried to puzzle out the theory behind them.

But not for long. Because once again Harry Collins awoke in the morning to find the adjoining cell empty, and once again he was alone for a long time.

At last a new neighbor came. His name was Lars Neilstrom. Neilstrom talked to him of ships and shoes and sealing-wax and the thousand and one things men will discuss in their loneliness and frustration, including—inevitably—their reasons for being here.

Neilstrom had been an instructor under Vocational Apt, and he was at a loss to explain his presence at Stark Falls. When Harry spoke of the stockpiling theory, his fellow-prisoner demurred. “It’s more like Kafka than science fiction,” he said. “But then, I don’t suppose you’ve ever read any Kafka.”

“Yes, I have,” Harry told him. “Since I came here I’ve done nothing but read old books. Lately they’ve been giving me microscans. I’ve been studying up on biology and genetics; talking to Chang got me interested. In fact, I’m really going in for self-education. There’s nothing else to do.”

“Self-education! That’s the only method left nowadays.” Neilstrom sounded bitter. “I don’t know what’s going to become of our heritage of knowledge in the future. I’m not speaking of technological skill; so-called scientific information is carefully preserved. But the humanities are virtually lost. The concept of the well-rounded individual is forgotten. And when I think of the crisis to come—”

“What crisis?”

"A new generation is growing up. Ten or fifteen years from now we'll have succeeded in erasing political and racial and religious divisions. But there'll be a new and more dangerous differentiation; a physical one. What do you think will happen when half the world is around six feet tall and the other half under three?"

"I can't imagine."

"Well, I can. The trouble is, most people don't realize what the problem will be. Things have moved too swiftly. Why, there were more changes in the last hundred years than in the previous thousand! And the rate of acceleration increases. Up until now, we've been concerned about too rapid technological development. But what we have to worry about is social development."

"Most people have been conditioned to conform."

"Yes. That's our job in Vocational Apt. But the system only works when there's a single standard of conformity. In a few years there'll be a double one, based on size. What then?"

Harry wanted some time to consider the matter, but the question was never answered. Because Lars Neilstrom went away in the night, as had his predecessors before him. And in succeeding interludes, Harry came to know a half-dozen other transient occupants of the cell next to his. They came from all over, and they had many things to discuss, but always there was the problem of why they were there—and the memory of Richard Wade's premise concerning stockpiling.

There came a time when the memory of Richard Wade merged with the memory of Arnold Ritchie. The past was a dim montage of life at the agency and the treatment center and the ranch, a recollection of lying on the river bank with women in attitudes of opisthotonos or of lying against the boulders with a rifle.

Somewhere there was an image of a child's wide eyes and a voice saying, "My name is Harry Collins." But that seemed very far away. What was real was the cell and the years of talking and reading the microscans and trying to find a pattern.

Harry found himself describing it all to a newcomer who said his name was Austin—a soft-voiced man who became a resident of the next cell one day in 2029. And eventually he came to Wade's theory.

"Maybe there were a few wiser heads who foresaw a coming crisis," he concluded. "Maybe they anticipated a time when they might need a few nonconformists. People like ourselves who haven't been passive or persuaded. Maybe we're the government's insurance policy. If an. emergency arises, we'll be freed."

"And then what would you do?" Austin asked, softly. "You're against the system, aren't you?"

"Yes. But I'm for survival." Harry Collins spoke slowly, thoughtfully. "You see, I've learned something through the years of study and contact here. Rebellion is not the answer."

"You hated Leffingwell."

"Yes, I did, until I realized that all this was inevitable. Leffingwell is not a villain and neither is any given individual, in or out of government. Our road to hell has been paved with only the very best of intentions. Killing the engineers and contractors will not get us off that road, and we're all on it together. We'll have to find a way of changing the direction of our journey. The young people will be too anxious to merely rush blindly ahead. Most of my generation will be sheeplike, moving as part of the herd, because of their conditioning. Only we oldtime rebels will be capable of plotting a course. A course for all of us."

"What about your son?" Austin asked.

"I'm thinking of him," Harry Collins answered. "Of him, and of all the others. Maybe he does not need me. Maybe none of them need me. Maybe it's all an illusion. But if the time ever comes, I'll be ready. And meanwhile, I can hope."

"The time has come," Austin said, gently.

And then he was standing, miraculously enough, outside his cell and before the door to Harry's cell, and the door was opening. And once again Harry stared into the wide eyes he remembered so well—the same wide eyes, set in the face of a fullgrown man. A fullgrown man, three feet tall. He stood up, shakily, as the man held out his hand and said, “Hello, Father.”

“But I don’t understand—”

“I’ve waited a long time for this moment. I had to talk to you, find out how you really felt, so that I’d be sure. Now you’re ready to join us.”

“What’s happening? What do you want with me?”

“We’ll talk later.” Harry’s son smiled. “Right now, I’m taking you home.”

9. Eric Donovan—2031

ERIC was glad to get to the office and shut the door. Lately he’d had this feeling whenever he went out, this feeling that people were staring at him. It wasn’t just his imagination: they did stare. Every younger person over a yard high got stared at nowadays, as if they were freaks. And it wasn’t just the staring that got him down, either.

Sometimes they muttered and mumbled, and sometimes they called names. Eric didn’t mind stuff like “dirty Naturalist.” That he could understand—once upon a time, way back, everybody who was against the Leff Law was called a Naturalist. And before that it had still another meaning, or-so he’d been told. Today, of course, it just meant anyone who was over five feet tall.

No, he could take the ordinary name-calling, all right. But sometimes they said other things. They used words nobody ever uses unless they really hate you, want to kill you. And that was at the bottom of it, Eric knew. They did hate him, they did want to kill him.

Was he a coward? Perhaps. But it wasn’t just Eric’s imagination. You never saw anything about such things on the telescreens, but Naturalists were being killed every day. The older people were still in the majority, but the youngsters were coming up fast. And there were so many more of them.

Besides, they were more active, and this created the illusion that there were Yardsticks everywhere.

Eric sat down behind his desk, grinning. Yardsticks. When he was a kid it had been just the other way around. He and the rest of them who didn't get shots in those early days considered themselves to be the normal ones. And they did the namecalling. Names like "runt" and "half-pint" and "midgie." But the most common name was the one that stuck—Yardstick. That used to be the worst insult of all.

But now it wasn't an insult any more. Being taller was the insult. Being a dirty Naturalist or a son-of-a-Naturalist. Times certainly had changed.

Eric glanced at the communicator. Almost noon, and it had not flicked yet. Here he'd been beaming these big offers, you'd think he'd get some response to an expensive beaming program, but no. Maybe that was the trouble—nobody liked big things any more. Everything was small.

He shifted uneasily in his chair. That was one consolation, at least; he still had oldtime furniture. Getting to be harder and harder to find stuff that fitted him these days. Seemed like most of the firms making furniture and bedding and household appliances were turning out the small stuff for the younger generation. Cheaper to make, less material, and more demand for it. Government allocated size priorities to the manufacturers.

It was even murder to ride public transportation because of the spacer-reductions. Eric drove his own jetter. Besides, that way was safer. Crowded into a line, with a gang of Yardsticks, with only a few other Naturalists around, there might be trouble.

Oh, it was getting to be a Yardstick world, and no mistake Smaller furniture, smaller meals, smaller sizes in clothing, smaller buildings—

That reminded Eric of something and he frowned again. Dammit, why didn't the communicator flick? He should be getting some kind of inquiries. Hell, he was practically giving the space away!

But there was only silence, as there had been all during this past week. That's why he let Lorette go. Sweet girl, but there was no work for her here any more. No work, and no pay, either. Besides, the place spooked her. She'd been the one who suggested leaving, really.

"Eric, I'm sorry, but I just can't take this any more. All alone in this huge building—it's curling my toes!"

At first he tried to talk her out of it. "Don't be silly, luscious! There's Bernstein, down on ten, and Saltonstall above us, and Wallaby and Son on fourteen, I tell you, this place is coming back to life, I can feel it! I'll beam for tenants next week, you'll see—"

Actually he'd been talking against his own fear and Lorette must have known it. Anyway, she left. And now he was here alone.

Alone.

Erie didn't like the sound of that word. Or the absence of sound behind it. Three other tenants in a ninety-story building. Three other tenants in a place that had once held three thousand. Why, fifty years ago, when this place went up, you couldn't buy a vacancy. Where had the crowds gone to?

He knew the answer, of course. The Leff shots had created the new generation of Yardsticks, and they lived in their own world. Their shrunken, dehydrated world of dollhouses and miniatures. They'd deserted the old-fashioned skyscrapers and cut the big apartment buildings up into tiny cubicles; two could occupy the space formerly reserved for one.

That had been the purpose of the Leff shots in the first place—to put an end to overcrowding and conserve on resources. Well, it had worked out. Worked out too perfectly for people like Eric Donovan. Eric Donovan, rental agent for a building nobody wanted any more; a ninety-storey mausoleum. And nobody could collect rent from ghosts.

Ghosts.

Eric damned near jumped through the ceiling when the door opened and this man walked in. He was tall and towheaded. Eric stared; there was something vaguely familiar about his face. Something about those ears, that was it, those ears. No, it couldn't be, it wasn't possible—

Eric stood up and held out his hand. "I'm Donovan," he said.

The towheaded man smiled and nodded. “Yes, I know. Don’t you remember me?”

“I thought I knew you from someplace. You wouldn’t be—Sam Wolzek?”

The towheaded man’s smile became a broad grin. “That’s not what you were going to say, Eric. You were going to say ‘Handle-head’, weren’t you? Well, go on, say it. I don’t mind. I’ve been called a lot worse things since we were kids together.”

“I can’t believe it,” Eric murmured. “It’s really you! Old Handle-head Wolzek! And after all these years, turning up to rent an office from me. Well, what do you know!”

“I didn’t come here to rent an office.”

“Oh? Then—”

“It was your name that brought me. I recognized it on the beamings.”

“Then this is a social call, eh? Well, that’s good. I don’t get much company these days. Sit down, have a reef.”

Wolzek sat down but refused the smoke. “I know quite a bit about your setup,” he said. “You and your three tenants. It’s tough, Eric.”

“Oh, things could be worse.” Eric forced a laugh. “It isn’t as if my bucks depended on the number of tenants in the building. Government subsidizes this place. I’m sure of a job as long as I live.”

“As long as you live.” Wolzek stared at him in a way he didn’t like. “And just how long do you figure that to be?”

“I’m only twenty-six,” Eric answered. “According to statistics, that gives me maybe another sixty years.”

“Statistics!” Wolzek said it Kka a dirty word. “Your life-expectancy isn’t determined by statistics any more. I say you don’t have sixty months left. Perhaps not even sixty days.”

“What are you trying to hand me?”

“The truth. And don’t go looking for a silver platter underneath it, either.”

"But I mind my own business. I don't hurt anybody. Why should I be in any danger?"

"Why does a government subsidy support one rental manager to sit here in this building every day—but ten guards to patrol it every night?"

Eric opened his mouth wide before shaping it for speech. "Who told you that?"

"Like I said, I know the setup." Wolzek crossed his legs, but he didn't lean back. "And in case you haven't guessed it, this is a business call, not a social one." Eric sighed. "Might have figured," he said. "You're a Naturalist, aren't you?"

"Of course I am. We all are."

"Not I."

"Oh yes—whether you like it or not, you're a Naturalist, too. As far as the Yardsticks are concerned, everyone over three feet high is a Naturalist. An enemy. Someone to be hated, and destroyed."

"Think I'd believe that? Sure, I know they don't like us, and why should they? We eat twice as much, take up twice the space, and I guess when we were kids we gave a lot of them a hard time. Besides, outside of a few exceptions like ourselves, all the younger generation are Yardsticks, with more coming every year. The older people hold the key positions and the power. Of course there's a lot of friction and resentment. But you know all that."

"Certainly." Wolzek nodded. "All that and more. Much more. I know that up until a few years ago, no Yardstick held any public office or government position. Now they're starting to move in, particularly in Europasia. But there's so many of them now—adults, in their early twenties—that the pressure is building up. They're impatient, getting out of hand. They won't wait until the old folks die off. They want control now. And if they ever manage to get it, we're finished for good."

"Impossible!" Eric said.

"Impossible?" Wolzek's voice was a mocking echo. "You sit here in this tomb and when somebody tells you that the world you know has died, you refuse to believe it. Even though every night, after you sneak home and huddle up inside your room trying not to be noticed, ten guards patrol this place with subatomics, so the Yardstick gangs won't break in and take over. So they won't do what they did down south—overrun the office buildings and the factories and break them up, cut them down to size for living quarters."

"But they were stopped," Eric objected. "I saw it on the telescreen, the security forces stopped them—"

"Crapola!" Wolzek pronounced the archaicism with studied care. "You saw films. Faked films. Have you ever traveled, Eric? Ever been down south and seen conditions there?"

"Nobody travels nowadays. You know that. Priorities."

"I travel, Eric. And I know. Security forces don't suppress anything in the south these days. Because they're made up of Yardsticks now; that's right, Yardsticks exclusively. And in a few years that's the way it will be up here. Did you ever hear about the Chicagee riots?"

"You mean last year, when the Yardsticks tried to take over the synthetic plants at the Stockyards?"

"Tried? They succeeded. The workers ousted management. Over fifty thousand were killed in the revolution—oh, don't look so shocked, that's the right word for it!—but the Yardsticks won out in the end."

"But the telescreen showed—"

"Damn the telescreen! I know because I happened to be there when it happened. And if you had been there, you and a few million other ostriches who sit with your heads buried in telescreens, maybe we could have stopped them."

"I don't believe it. I can't!"

"All right. Think back. That was last year. And since the first of this year, what's happened to the standard size meat-ration?"

"They cut it in half," Eric admitted. "But that's because of Ag shortages, according to the telescreen reports—" He stood up, gulping. "Look here, I'm not going to listen to any more of this kind of talk. By rights, I ought to turn your name in."

"Go ahead." Wolzek waved his hand. "It's happened before. I was reported when I blasted the Yardsticks who shot my father down when he tried to land his jet in a southern field. I was reported when they killed Annette."

"Annette?"

"You remember that name, don't you, Eric? Your first girl, wasn't she? Well, I'm the guy who married her. Yes, and I'm the guy who talked her into having a baby without the benefit of Leff shots. Sure, it's illegal, and only a few of us ever try it any more, but we both agreed that we wanted it that way. A real, life-sized, normal baby. Or abnormal, according to the Yardsticks and the stupid government.

"It was a dirty scum of a government doctor who let her die on the table when he discovered the child weighed seven pounds. That's when I really woke up, Eric. That's when I knew there was going to be only one decision to make in the future—kill or be killed."

"Annette. She died, you say?"

Wolzek moved over and put his hand on Eric's shoulder. "You never married, did you, Eric? I think I know why. It's because you felt the way I did about it. You wanted a regular kid, not a Yardstick. Only you didn't quite have the guts to try and beat the law. Well, you'll need guts now, because it's getting to the point where the law can't protect you any more. The government is made up of old men, and they're afraid to take action. In a few years they'll be pushed out of office all over the world. We'll have Yardstick government then, all the way, and Yardstick law. And that means they'll cut us down to size."

"But what can you—we—do about it?"

"Plenty. There's still a little time. If we Naturalists can only get together, stop being just a name and become an organized force, maybe the ending will be different. We've got to try, in any case."

“The Yardsticks are human beings, just like us,” Eric said, slowly. “We can’t just declare war on them, wipe them out. It’s not their fault they were born that way.”

Wolzek nodded. “I know. Nothing is anybody’s fault, really. This whole business began in good faith. Leffingwell and some of the other geniuses saw a problem and offered what they sincerely believed was a solution.”

“But it didn’t work,” Eric murmured.

“Wrong. It worked only too well. That’s the trouble. Sure, we eliminated our difficulties on the physical level. In less than thirty years we’ve reached a point where there’s no longer any danger of overcrowding or starvation. But the psychological factor is something we can’t cope with. We thought we’d ended war and the possibilities of war a long time ago. But it isn’t foreign enemies we must fear today. We’ve created a nation divided into Davids and Goliaths—and David and Goliath are always enemies.”

“David killed Goliath,” Eric said. “Does that mean we’re going to die?”

“Only if we’re as stupid as Goliath was. Only if we wear our telescreens like invincible and pay no attention to the slingshot in David’s hands.” Eric lit a reef. “All right,” he said. “You don’t have to lecture. I’m willing to join. But I’m no Goliath, really. I never had a fight in my life. What could I do to help?”

“You’re a rental agent. You have the keys to this building. The guards don’t bother you by day, do they? You come and go as you please. That means you can get into the cellars. You can help us move the stuff down there. And we’ll take care of the guards some night, after that.”

“I don’t understand.”

The friendly pressure on Eric’s shoulder became a fierce grip. “You don’t have to understand. All you do is let us plant the stuff in the cellars and let us get rid of the guards afterwards in our own way. The Yardsticks will do the rest.”

“You mean, take over the building when it’s not protected?”

“Of course. They’ll take it over completely, once they see there’s no opposition. And they’ll remodel it to suit themselves, and within a month there'll be ten thousand Yardsticks sitting in this place."

"The government will never stand still for that."

"Wake up! It's happening all over, all the time, and nothing is being done to prevent it. Security is too weak and officials are too timid to risk open warfare. So the Yardsticks win, and I'm going to see that they win this place."

"But how will that help us?"

"You don't see it yet, do you? And neither will the Yardsticks. Until, some fine day three or four months from now, we get around to what will be planted in the cellars. Somebody will throw a switch, miles away, and—boom!"

"Wolzek, you couldn't—"

"It's coming. Not only here, but in fifty other places. We've got to fight fire with fire, Eric. It's our only chance. Bring this thing out into the open. Make the government realize this is war. Civil war. That's the only way to force them to take real action. We can't do it any other way; it's illegal to organize politically, and petitions do no good. We can't get a hearing. Well, they'll have to listen to the explosions."

"I just don't know—"

"Maybe you're the one who should have married Annette after all." Wolzek's voice was cold. "Maybe you could have watched her, watched her scream and beg and die, and never wanted to move a muscle to do anything about it afterwards. Maybe you're the model citizen, Eric; you and the thousands of others who are standing by and letting the Yardsticks chop us down, one by one. They say in Nature it's the survival of the fittest. Well, perhaps you're not fit to survive."

Eric wasn't listening. "She screamed," he said. "You heard her scream?"

Wolzek nodded. "I can still hear her. I'll always hear her."

"Yes." Eric blinked abruptly. "When do we start?"

Wolzek smiled at him. It was a pretty good smile for a man who can always hear screaming. "I knew I could count on you," he murmured. "Nothing like old friends."

“Funny, isn’t it?” Eric tried to match his smile. “The way things work out. You and I being kids together. You marrying my girl. And then, us meeting up again this way.

“Yes,” said Wolzek, and he wasn’t smiling now. “I guess it’s a small world.”

10. Harry Collins—2032

HARRY’S son’s house was on the outskirts of Washington, near what had once been called Gettysburg. Harry was surprised to find that it was a house, and a rather large one, despite the fact that almost all the furniture had been scaled down proportionately to fit the needs of a man three feet high.

But then, Harry was growing accustomed to surprises.

lie found a room of his own, ready and waiting, on the second floor; here the furniture was of almost antique vintage, but adequate in size. And here, in an atmosphere of unaccustomed comfort, he could talk.

“So you’re a physician, eh?” Harry gazed down into the diminutive face, striving to accept the fact that he was speaking to a mature adult. His own son—his and Sue’s—a grown man and a doctor! It seemed incredible. But then, nothing was more incredible than the knowledge that he was actually here, in his child’s home.

“We’re all specialists in one field or another,” his son explained. “Every one of us born and surviving during the early experimental period received our schooling under a plan Leffingwell set up. It was part of his conditional agreement that we become wards of the state. He knew the time might come when we’d be needed.”

“But why wasn’t all this done openly?”

“You know the answer to that. There was no way of educating us under the prevailing system, and there was always a danger we might be singled out as freaks who must be destroyed—particularly in those early years. So

Leffingwell relied on secrecy, just as he did during his experimentation period. You know how you felt about that. You believed innocent people were being murdered. Would you have listened to his explanations, accepted the fact that his work was worth the cost of a few lives so that future billions of human beings might be saved? No, there was no time for explanation or indoctrination. Leffingwell chose concealment."

"Yes," Harry sighed. "I understand that better now, I think. But I couldn't see it then, when I tried to kill him." He flushed. "And I still can't quite comprehend why he spared me after that attempt."

"Because he wasn't the monster you thought him to be. When I pleaded with him—"

"You were the one!"

Harry's son turned away. "Yes. When I was told who you really were, I went to him. But I was only a child, remember that. And he didn't spare you out of sentimentality. He had a purpose."

"A purpose in sending me to prison, letting me rot all these years while —"

"While I grew up. I and the others like myself. And while the world outside changed." Harry's son smiled. "Your friend Richard Wade was right, you know. He guessed a great deal of the truth. Leffingwell and Manschoff and the rest of their associates deliberately set out to assemble a select group of nonconformists—men of specialized talents and outlooks.

There were over three hundred of you at Stark Falls. Richard Wade knew why."

"And so he was dragged off and murdered."

"Murdered? No, Father, he's very much alive, I assure you. In fact, he'll be here tonight."

"But why was he taken away so abruptly, without any warning?"

"He was needed. There was a crisis, when Dr. Leffingwell died." Harry's son sighed. "You didn't know about that, did you? There's so much for you to learn. But I'll let him tell you himself, when you see him this evening."

Richard Wade told him. And so did William Chang and Lars Neilstrom and all the others. During the ensuing weeks, Harry saw each of them again. But Wade's explanation was sufficient.

"I was right," he said. "There was no Underground when we were at Stark Falls. What I didn't realize, though, was that there was an Overground."

"Overground?"

"You might call it that. Leffingwell and his staff formed the nucleus. They foresaw the social crisis which lay ahead, when the world became physically divided into the tall and the short, the young and the old. They knew there'd be a need of individuality then—and they did create a stockpile. A stockpile of the younger generation, specially educated; a stockpile of the older generation, carefully selected. We conspicuous rebels were incarcerated and given an opportunity to think the problem through, with limited contact with one another's viewpoints."

"But why weren't we told the truth at the beginning, allowed to meet fact-to-face and make some sensible plans for the future?"

Harry's son interrupted. "Because Dr. Leffingwell realized this would defeat the ultimate purpose. You'd have formed your own in-group, as prisoners, dedicated to your own welfare. There'd be emotional ties—"

"I still don't know what you're talking about. What are we supposed to prepare for now?"

Richard Wade shrugged. "Leffingwell had it all planned. He foresaw that when the first generation of Yardsticks—that's what they call themselves, you know—came of age, there'd be social unrest. The young people would want to take over, and the older generation would try to remain in positions of power. It was his belief that tensions could be alleviated only by proper leadership on both sides.

"He himself had an important voice in government circles. He set up an arrangement whereby a certain number of posts would be assigned to people of his choice, both young and old. Similarly, in the various professions, there'd be room for appointees he'd select. Given a year or two of training, Leffingwell felt that we'd be ready for these positions. Young men, like your son, would be placed in key spots where their influence would be helpful with the Yardsticks. Older men such as yourself would go into other assignments—in communications media, chiefly. The skillful use of group-psychological techniques could avert open clashes. He predicted a danger-period lasting about twenty years—roughly, from 2030 to 2050. Once we weathered that span, equilibrium would be regained, as a second and third generation came along and the elders became a small minority. If we did our work well and eliminated the sources of prejudice, friction and hostility, the transition could be made. The Overground in governmental circles would menace us. This was Leffingwell's plan, his dream."

"You speak in the past tense," Harry said.

"Yes." Wade's voice was harsh. "Because Leffingwell is dead, of cerebral hemorrhage. And his plan died with him. Oh, we still have some connections in government; enough to get men like yourself out of Stark Falls. But things have moved too swiftly. The Yardsticks are already on the march. The people in power—even those we relied upon—are getting frightened. They can't see that there's time left to train us to take over. And frankly, I'm afraid most of them have no inclination to give up their present power. They intend to use force."

"But you talk as though the Yardsticks were united."

"They are uniting, and swiftly. Remember the Naturalists?" Harry nodded, slowly. "I was one, once. Or thought I was."

"You were a liberal. I'm talking about the new Naturalists. The ones bent on actual revolution."

"Revolution?"

"That's the word. And that's the situation. It's coming to a head, fast."

"And how will we prevent it?"

"I don't know." Harry's son stared up at him. "Most of us believe it's too late to prevent it. Our immediate problem will be survival. The Naturalists want control for themselves. The Yardsticks intend to destroy the power of the older generation. And we feel that if matters come to a head soon, the government itself may turn on us, too. They'll have to."

"In other words," said Harry, "we stand alone."

"Fall alone, more likely," Wade corrected.

"How many of us are there?"

"About six hundred," said Harry's son. "Located in private homes throughout this eastern area. If there's violence, we don't have a chance of controlling the situation."

"But we can survive. As I see It, that's our only salvation at the moment—to somehow survive the coming conflict. Then, perhaps, we can find a way to function as Leffingwell planned."

"We'll never survive here.

They'll use every conceivable weapon."

"But since there's no open break with the government yet, we could still presumably arrange for transportation facilities."

"To where?"

"Some spot in which we could weather the storm. What about Leffingwell's old hideout?"

"The units are still standing." Harry's son nodded. "Yes, that's a possibility. But what about food?"

"Grizek."

"What?"

"Friend of mine," Harry told him. "Look, we're going to have to work fast. And yet we've got to do it in a way that won't attract any attention; not even from the government. I suggest we set up an organizing committee and make plans." He frowned. "How much time do you think we have—a year or so?"

"Six months," his son hazarded.

"Four, at most," Wade said. "Haven't you been getting the full reports on those riots? Pretty soon they'll declare a state of national emergency and then nobody will be going anywhere."

"All right." Harry Collins grinned. "We'll do it in four months."

Actually, as it worked out, they did it in just a day or so under three.

Five hundred and forty-two men moved by jetter to Colorado Springs; thence, by helicopter, to the canyon hideaway. They moved in small groups, a few each week. Harry himself had already established the liaison system, and he was based at Grizek's ranch. Grizek was dead, but Bassett and Tom Lowery remained and they cooperated. Food would be ready for the ‘copters that came out of the canyon.

The canyon installation itself was deserted, and the only problem it presented was one of rehabilitation. The first contingent took over.

The jetters carried more than their human cargo; they were filled with equipment of all sorts—microscans and laboratory instruments and devices for communication. By the time the entire group was assembled, they had the necessary implementation for study and research. It was a well-conceived and well-executed operation.

To his surprise, Harry found himself acting as the leader of the expedition, and he continued in this capacity after they were established. The irony of the situation did not escape him; to all intents and purposes he was now ruling the very domain in which he had once languished as a prisoner.

But with Wade and Chang and the others, he set up a provisional system which worked out very well. And proved very helpful, once the news reached them that open revolt had begun in the world outside.

A battered ‘copter landed one evening at dusk, and the wounded pilot poured out his message, then his life's blood.

Angelisco was gone. Washington was gone. The Naturalists had struck, using the old, outlawed weapons. And it was the same abroad, according to the few garbled reports thereafter obtainable only via ancient shortwave devices.

From then on, nobody left the canyon except on weekly ‘copter-lifts to the ranch grazing lands for fresh supplies. Fortunately, that area was undisturbed, and so were its laconic occupants. They neither knew nor cared what went on in the world outside; what cities were reported destroyed, what forces triumphed or went down into defeat, what activity or radioactivity prevailed.

Life in the canyon flowed on, more peacefully than the river cleaving its center. There was much to do and much to learn. It was, actually, a monastic existence, compounded of frugality, abstinence, continence and devotion to scholarly pursuits. Within a year, gardens flourished; within two years herds grazed the grassy slopes; within three years cloth was being woven on looms in the ancient way and most of the homespun arts of an agrarian society had been revived. Men fell sick and men died, but the survivors lived in amity. Harry Collins celebrated his sixtieth birthday as the equivalent of a second-year student of medicine; his instructor being his own son. Everyone was studying some subject, acquiring some new skill. One-time rebellious natures and one-time biological oddities alike were united by the common bond of intellectual curiosity.

It was, however, no Utopia. Some of the younger men wanted women, and there were no women. Some were irked by confinement and wandered off; three of the fleet of eleven ‘copters were stolen by groups of malcontents. From time to time there would be a serious quarrel. Six men were murdered. The population dwindled to four hundred and twenty.

But there was progress, in the main. Eventually Banning joined the group, from the ranch, and under his guidance the study-system was formalized. Attempts were made to project the future situation, to prepare for the day when it would be possible to venture safely into the outside world once again and utilize newly-won abilities.

Nobody could predict when that would be, nor what kind of world would await their coming. By the time the fifth year had passed, even shortwave reports had long since ceased. Rumors persisted that radioactive contamination was widespread, that the population had been virtually decimated, that the government had fallen, that the Naturalists had set up their own reign only to fall victim to internal strife.

“But one thing is certain,” Harry Collins told his companions as they assembled in the usual monthly meeting on the grounds before the old headquarters building one afternoon in July. “The fighting will end soon. If we hear nothing more within the next few months, we’ll send out observation parties. Once we determine the exact situation, we can plan accordingly. The world is going to need what we can give. It will use what we have learned. It will accept our aid. One of these days—”

And he went on to outline a carefully-calculated program of making contact with the powers that be, or might be. It sounded logical and even the chronic grumblers and habitual pessimists in the group were encouraged.

If at times they felt the situation fantastic and the hope forlorn, they were heartened now. Richard Wade summed it up succinctly afterwards, in a private conversation with Harry.

“It isn’t going to be easy,” he said. “In the old science fiction yarns I used to write, a group like this would have been able to prevent the revolution. At the very least, it would decide who won if fighting actually broke out. But in reality we were too late to forestall revolt, and we couldn’t win the war no matter on whose side we fought. There’s just one job we’re equipped for—and that’s to win the peace. I don’t mean we’ll step out of here and take over the world, either. We’ll have to move slowly and cautiously, dispersing in little groups of five or six all over the country. And we’ll have to sound out men in the communities we go to, find those who are willing to learn and willing to build. But we can be an influence, and an important one. We have the knowledge and the skill. We may not be chosen to lead, but we can teach the leaders. And that’s important.”

Harry smiled in agreement. They did have something to offer, and surely it would be recognized—even if the Naturalists had won, even if the entire country had sunk into semibarbarism. No use anticipating such problems now. Wait until fall came; then they’d reconnoitre and find out. Wait until fall.

It was a wise decision, but one which ignored a single, important fact. The Naturalists didn’t wait until fall to conduct their reconnaissance.

They came over the canyon that very night; a large group of them in a large jetter.

And they dropped a large bomb . . .

11. Jesse Pringle—2039

THEY were after him. The whole world was in flames, and the buildings were falling, the mighty were fallen, the Day of Judgment was at hand.

He ran through the flames, blindly. Blind Samson. Eyeless in Gaza, treading at the mill. The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceedingly small.

Small. They were all small, but that didn’t matter. They had the guns and they were hunting him down to his doom. Day of doom. Doomsday. The great red dragon with seven heads and ten horns was abroad in the land.

They had unleashed the dragon and his breath was a fire that seared, and his tail was a thunder that toppled towers. The dragon was searching him out for his sins; he would be captured and set to labor in the mill.

But he would escape, he must escape! He was afraid of them, small as they were, and great oaks from little acorns grow, it’s the little things that count, and he dare not go a-hunting for fear of little men.

Jesse crouched against the dock, watching the grain-elevators burn. The whole city was burning, Babylon the mighty, the whole world was burning in God’s final wrath of judgment.

Nobody believed in God any more, nobody read the Bible, and that’s why they didn’t know these things. Jesse knew, because he was an old man and he remembered how it had been when he was a little boy. A little boy who learned of the Word of God and the Wrath of God.

He could see the reflection of the flames in the water, now, and the reflection was shimmery and broken because of the black clusters floating past. Large clusters and small clusters. There were bodies in the water, the bodies of the slain.

Thunder boomed from the city behind him. Explosions. That’s how it had started, when the Naturalists began blowing up the buildings. And then the Yardsticks had come with their weapons, hunting down the Naturalists. Or had it been that way, really? It didn’t matter, now. That was in another country and besides, the wench was dead.

The wench is dead. His wench, Jesse’s wench. She wasn’t so old. Only seventy-two. But they killed her, they blew off the top of her head and he could feel it when they did. It was as if something had happened in his head, and then he ran at them and screamed, and there was great slaughter amongst the heathen, the forces of unrighteousness.

And Jesse had fled, and smote evil in the name of the Lord, for he perceived now that the time was at hand.

How the mighty are fallen.

Jesse blinked at the water, wishing it would clear, wishing his thoughts would clear. Sometimes for a moment he could remember back to the way things really were. When it was still a real world, with real people in it. When he was just a little boy and everybody else was big.

Strange. Now he was an old man, a big old man, and almost everybody else was little.

He tried to think what it had been like, so long ago. It was too long. All he could remember about being small was that he had been afraid. Afraid of the bigger people.

And now he was big, and afraid of the smaller people.

Of course they weren’t real. It was just part of the prophecy, they were the locusts sent to consume and destroy. He kept telling himself there was nothing to fear; the righteous need not fear when the day of judgment is at hand.

Only somewhere inside of him was this little boy, crying, “Mama, Mama, Mama!” And somewhere else was this old man, just staring down into the water and waiting for them to find him.

Another explosion sounded.

This one was closer. They must be bombing the entire city. Or else it was the dragon, lashing his tail.

Somebody ran past Jesse, carrying a torch. No, it wasn't a torch—his hair was on fire. He jumped into the water, screaming, "They're coming! They're coming!"

Jesse turned and blinked. They were coming, all right. He could see them pouring out of the alleyway like rats. Rats with gleaming eyes, gleaming claws.

Suddenly, his head cleared. He realized that he was going to die. He had, perhaps, one minute of life left. One minute out of eighty years. And he couldn't fool himself any longer. He was not delirious. Day of judgment—that was nonsense. And there was no dragon, and these were not rats. They were merely men. Puny little men who killed because they were afraid.

Jesse was a big man, but he was afraid, too. Six feet three inches tall he was, when he stood up straight as he did now, watching them come—but he knew fear.

And he resolved that he must not take that fear with him into death. He wanted to die with something better, than that. Wasn't there something he could find and cling to, perhaps some memory—?

A minute is so short, and eighty years is so long. Jesse stood there, swaying, watching them draw nearer, watching them as they caught sight of him and raised their weapons.

He scanned rapidly into the past. Into the past, before the time the wench was dead, back to when you and I were young Maggie, back still earlier, and earlier, seeking the high point, the high school, that was it, the high school, the highlight, the moment of triumph, the game with Lincoln. Yes, that was it. He hadn't been ashamed of being six feet three inches then, he'd been proud of it, proud as he raised his arms and—

Splashed down into the water as the bullets struck.

And that was the end of Jesse Pringle. Jesse Pringle, champion basketball center of the Class of '79 . . .

12. Littlejohn—2065

THE helicopter landed on the roof, and the attendants wheeled it over to one side. They propped the ladder up, and Littlejohn descended slowly, panting.

They had a coasterchair waiting and he sank into it, grateful for the rest. Hardy fellows, these attendants, but then they were almost three feet tall. More stamina, that was the secret. Common stock, of course, but they served a purpose. Somebody had to carry out orders.

When they wheeled the coasterchair into the elevator, Littlejohn descended. The elevator halted on the first floor and he breathed a sigh of relief. Great heights always made him faint and dizzy, and even a short helicopter trip took its toll—the mere thought of soaring two hundred feet above the ground was enough to paralyze him.

But this journey was vital. Thurmon was waiting for him.

Yes, Thurmon was waiting for him here in the council chamber. The coasterchair rolled forward into the room and again Littlejohn felt a twinge of apprehension. The room was vast—too big for comfort. It must be all of fifty feet long, and over ten feet in height. How could Thurmon stand it, working here?

But he had to endure it, Littlejohn reminded himself. He was head of the council.

Thurmon was lying on the couch when Littlejohn rolled in, but he sat up and smiled.

“I greet you,” he said.

“I greet you,” Littlejohn answered. “No, don’t bother to stay seated. Surely we don’t need to be ceremonious.”

Thurmon picked up his ears at the sound of the unfamiliar word. He wasn’t the scholarly type, like Littlejohn. But he appreciated Littlejohn’s learning and knew he was important to the council. They needed scholars these days, and antiquarians too. One has to look to the past when rebuilding a world.

"You sent for me?" Littlejohn asked. The question was purely rhetorical, but he wanted to break the silence. Thurmon looked troubled as he replied.

"Yes. It is a matter of confidence between us."

"So be it. You may speak in trust."

Thurmon eyed the door. "Come nearer," he said.

Littlejohn pressed a lever and rolled up to the couchside. Thurmon's eyes peered at him through the thick contact lenses. Littlejohn noted the deep wrinkles around his mouth, but without surprise. After all, Thurmon was an old man—he must be over thirty.

"I have been thinking," Thurmon said, abruptly. "We have failed."

"Failed?"

Thurmon nodded. "Need I explain? You have been close to the council for many years. You have seen what we've attempted, ever since the close of the Naturalist wars."

"A magnificent effort," Littlejohn answered politely. "In less than thirty years an entire new world has risen from the ruins of the old. Civilization has been restored, snatched from the very brink of a barbarism that threatened to engulf us."

"Nonsense," Thurmon murmured.

"What?"

"Sheer nonsense, Littlejohn. You're talking like a pedant."

"But I am a pedant." Littlejohn nodded. "And it's true. When the Naturalists were exterminated, this nation and other nations were literally destroyed. Worse than physical destruction was the threat of mental and moral collapse. But the Yardstick councils arose to take over. The concept of small government came into being and saved us. We began to rebuild on a sensible scale, with local, limited control. The little community arose—"

"Spare me the history lesson," said Thurmon, dryly. "We rebuilt, yes. We survived. In a sense, perhaps, we even made certain advances. There is no longer any economic rivalry, no social distinctions, no external pressure. I think I can safely assume that the danger of future warfare is forever banished. The balance of power is no longer a factor. The balance of Nature has been partially restored. And only one problem remains to plague mankind."

"What is that?"

"We face extinction," Thurmon said.

"But that's not true," Littlejohn interrupted. "Look at history and—"

"Look at us." Thurmon sighed. "You needn't bother with history. The answer is written in our faces, in our own bodies. I've searched the past very little, compared to your scholarship, but enough to know that things were different in the old days. The Naturalists, whatever else they might have been, were strong men. They walked freely in the land, they lived lustily and long.

"Do you know what our average life-expectancy is today, Littlejohn? A shade under forty years. And that only if one is fortunate enough to lead a sheltered existence, as we do. In the mines, in the fields, in the radioactive areas, they die before the age of thirty."

Littlejohn leaned forward. "Schuyler touches on just that point in his Psychology of Time," he said, eagerly. "He posits the relationship between size and duration. Time is relative, you know. Our lives, short as they may be in terms of comparative chronology, nevertheless have a subjective span equal to that of the Naturalists in their heyday."

"Nonsense," Thurman said, again. "Did you think that is what concerns me—whether or not we feel that our lives are long or short?"

"What then?"

"I'm talking about the basic elements essential to survival. I'm talking about strength, stamina, endurance, the ability to function. That's what we're losing, along with the normal span of years. The world is soft and flabby. Yardstick children, they tell us, were healthy at first. But their children are weaker. And their grandchildren, weaker still. The effect of the wars, the ravages of radiation and malnutrition, have taken a terrible toll. The world is soft and flabby today. People can't walk any more, let alone run. We find it difficult to lift and bend and work—"

"But we won't have to worry about such matters for long," Littlejohn hazarded. "Think of what's being done in robotics. Those recent experiments seem to prove—"

"I know." Thurmon nodded. "We can create robots, no doubt. We have a limited amount of raw materials to allocate to the project, and if we can perfect automatons they'll function quite adequately. Virtually indestructible, too, I understand. I imagine they'll still be able to operate efficiently a hundred or more years from now—if only they learn to oil and repair one another. Because by that time, the human race will be gone."

"Come now, it isn't that serious—"

"Oh, but it is!" Thurmon raised himself again, with an effort. "Your study of history should have taught you one thing, if nothing else. The tempo is quickening. While it took mankind thousands of years to move from the bow and arrow to the rifle, it took only a few hundred to move from the rifle to the thermonuclear weapon. It took ages before men mastered flight, and then in two generations they developed satellites; in three, they reached the moon and Mars."

"But we're talking about physical development."

"I know. And physically, the human race altered just as drastically in an equally short span of time. As recently as the nineteenth century, the incidence of disease was a thousandfold greater than it is now. Life was short then. In the twentieth century disease lessened and life-expectancy doubled, in certain areas. Height and weight increased perceptibly with every passing decade. Then came Leffingwell and his injections. Height, weight, life-expectancy have fallen perceptibly every decade since then. The war merely hastened the process."

"You appear to have devoted a great deal of time to this question," Littlejohn observed.

"I have," answered the older man. "And it is not a question. It is a fact. The one fact that confronts us all. If we proceed along our present path, we face certain extinction in a very short time. The strain is weakening constantly, the vitality is draining away. We sought to defeat Nature—but the Naturalists were right, in their way."

"And the solution?"

Thurmon was silent for a long moment. Then, "I have none," he said.

"You have consulted the medical authorities?"

"Naturally. And experiments have been made. Physical conditioning, systems of exercise, experimentation in chemotherapy are still being undertaken. There's no lack of volunteers, but a great lack of results. No, the answer does not lie in that direction."

"But what else is there?"

"That is what I had hoped you might tell me," Thurmon said. "You are a scholar. You know the past. You speak often of the lessons of history—" Littlejohn was nodding, but not in agreement. He was trying to comprehend. For suddenly the conviction came to him clearly; Thurmon was right. It was happening, had happened, right under their smug noses. The world was weakening. It was slowing down, and the race is only to the swift.

He cursed himself for his habit of thinking in platitudes and quotations, but long years of study had unfitted him for less prosaic phraseology. If he could only be practical. Practical.

"Thurmon," he said. "There is a way. A way so obvious, we've all overlooked it—passed right over it."

"And that is—?"

"Stop the Leffingwell injections!"

"But—"

"I know what you'll say. There have been genetic mutations. Very true, but such mutations can't be universal. A certain percentage of offspring will be sound, capable of attaining full growth. And we don't have the population-problem to cope with any more. There's room for people again. So why not try it? Stop the injections and allow babies to be born as they were before." Littlejohn hesitated before adding a final word, but he knew he had to add it; he knew it now. "Normally," he said.

Thurmon nodded. “So that is your answer.”

“Yes. I—I think it will work.”

“So do the biologists,” Thurmon told him. “A generation of normal infants, reared to maturity, would restore mankind to its former stature, in every sense of the word. And now, knowing the lessons of the past, we could prepare for the change to come. We could rebuild the world for them to live in, rebuild it psychically as well as physically. We’d plan to eliminate the rivalry between the large and the small, the strong and the weak. It wouldn’t be difficult because there’s plenty for all. There’d be no trouble as there was in the old days. We’ve learned to be psychologically flexible.”

Littlejohn smiled. “Then that is the solution?” he asked.

“Yes. Eliminating the Leffingwell injections will give us a good proportion of normal children again. But where do we find the normal women to hear them?”

“Normal women?”

Thurmon sighed, then reached over and placed a scroll in the scanner. “I have already gone into that question with research technicians,” he said. “And I have the figures here.” He switched on the scanner and began to read.

“The average nubile female, aged thirteen to twenty-one, is two feet, ten inches high and weighs forty-eight pounds.” Thurmon flicked the switch again and peered up. “I don’t think I’ll bother with pelvic measurements,” he said. “You can already see that giving birth to a six or seven-pound infant is a physical impossibility under the circumstances. It cannot be done.”

“But surely there must be some larger females! Perhaps a system of selective breeding, on a gradual basis—”

“You’re talking in terms of generations. We haven’t got that much time.” Thurmon shook his head. “No, we’re stopped right here. We can’t get normal babies without normal women, and the only normal women are those who began life as normal babies.”

“Which comes first?” Littlejohn murmured. “The chicken or the egg?”

“What’s that?”

“Nothing. Just an old saying. From history.”

Thurmon frowned. “Apparently, then, that’s all you can offer in your professional capacity as an historian. Just some old sayings.” He sighed. “Too bad you don’t know some old prayers. Because we need them now.”

He bowed his head, signifying the end of the interview.

Littlejohn rolled out of the room.

His ‘copter took him back to his own dwelling, back across the rooftops of New Chicagee. Ordinarily, Littlejohn avoided looking down. He dreaded heights, and the immensity of the city itself was somehow appalling. But now he gazed upon the capital and center of civilization with a certain morbid affection.

New Chicagee had risen on the ashes of the old, after the war’s end. Use of thermo-nucs had been limited, fortunately, so radioactivity did not linger, and the vast craters hollowed out by ordinary warheads had been partially filled by rubble and debris. Artificial fill had done the rest of the job, so that now New Chicagee was merely a flat prairie as it must have been hundreds of years ago—a flat prairie on which the city had been resurrected. There were almost fifty thousand people here in the capital; the largest congregation of population on the entire continent. They had built well and surely this time, built for the security and certainty of centuries to come.

Littlejohn sighed. It was hard to accept the fact that they had been wrong; that all this would end in nothingness. They had eliminated war, eliminated disease, eliminated famine, eliminated social inequality, injustice, disorders external and internal—and in so doing, they had eliminated themselves.

The sun was setting in the west, and long shadows crept over the city below. Yes, the sun was setting and the shadows were gathering, the night was coming to claim its own. Darkness was falling, eternal darkness.

It was quite dark by the time Littlejohn’s ‘copter landed on the rooftop of his own dwelling; so dark, in fact, that for a moment he didn’t see the strange vehicle already standing there. Not until he had settled into his coasterchair did he notice the presence of the other ‘copter, and then it was too late. Too late to do anything except sit and stare as the gigantic shadow loomed out of the night, silhouetted against the sky.

The shadow shambled forward, and Littlejohn gaped, gaped in terror at the titanic figure. He opened his mouth to speak, but words did not form; there were no words to form, for how does one address an apparition?

Instead, it was the apparition which spoke.

“I have been waiting for you,” it said.

“Y-yes—”

“I want to talk to you.” The voice was deep, menacing.

Littlejohn shifted in his coasterchair. There was nowhere to go, no escape. He gazed up at the shadow. Finally he summoned a response. “Shall we go inside?” he asked.

The figure shook its head. “Where? Down into that dollhouse of yours? It isn’t big enough. I’ve already been there. What I have to say can be said right here.”

“W-who are you?”

The figure stepped forward, so that its face was illuminated by the fluorescence streaming from the open door which led to the inclined chairway descending to Littlejohn’s dwelling.

Littlejohn could see the face, now—the gigantic, wrinkled face, scarred and seared and seamed. It was a human face, but utterly alien to the humanity Littlejohn knew. Faces such as this one had disappeared from the earth a lifetime ago. At least, history had taught him that. History had not prepared him for the actual living presence of a—

“Naturalist!” Littlejohn gasped. “You’re a Naturalist! Yes, that’s what you are!”

The apparition scowled.

“I am not a Naturalist. I am a man.

“But you can’t be! The war—”

“I am very old. I lived through your war. I have lived through your peace. Soon I shall die. But before I do, there is something else which must be done.”

“You’ve come here to kill me?”

“Perhaps.” The looming figure moved closer and stared down. “No, don’t try to summon help. When your servants saw me, they fled. You’re alone now, Littlejohn.”

“You know my name.”

“Yes, I know your name. I know the names of everyone on the council. Each of them has a visitor tonight.”

“Then it is a plot, a conspiracy?”

“We have planned this very carefully, through the long years. It’s all we lived for, those few of us who survived the war.”

“But the council wasn’t responsible for the war! Most of us weren’t even alive, then. Believe me, we weren’t to blame—”

“I know.” The gigantic face creased in senile simulation of a smile. “Nobody was ever to blame for anything, nobody was ever responsible. That’s what they always told me. I mustn’t hate mankind for multiplying, even though population created pressure and pressure created panic that drove me mad. I mustn’t blame Leffingwell for solving the overpopulation problem, even though he used me as a guinea-pig in his experiments. I mustn’t blame the Yardsticks for penning me up in prison until revolution broke out, and I mustn’t blame the Naturalists for bombing the place where I took refuge. So whose fault was it that I’ve gone through eighty years of assorted hell? Why did I, Harry Collins, get singled out for a lifetime of misery and misfortune?” The huge old man bent over Littlejohn’s huddled form. “Maybe it was all a means to an end. A way of bringing me here, at this moment, to do what must be done.”

“Don’t harm me—you’re not well, you’re—”

“Crazy?” The old man shook his head. “No, I’m not crazy. Not now. But I have been, at times, during my life. Perhaps we all are, when we attempt to face up to the complications of an average existence, try to confront the problems which are too big for a single consciousness to cope with in a single lifespan. I’ve been crazy in the city, and crazy in the isolation of a cell, and crazy in the welter of war. And perhaps the worst time of all was when I lost my son.

“Yes, I had a son, Littlejohn. He was one of the first, one of Leffingwell’s original mutations, and I never knew him very well until the revolution came and we went away together. He was a doctor, my boy, and a good one. We spent almost five years together and I learned a lot from him. About medicine, but that wasn’t important then. I’m thinking of what I learned about love. I’d always hated Yardsticks, but my son was one, and I came to love him. He had plans for rebuilding the world, he and I and the rest of us. We were going to wait until the revolution ended and then help restore sanity in civilization.

“But the Naturalists flew over and dropped their bomb, and my boy died. Over four hundred of our group died there in the canyon—four hundred who might have changed the fate of the world. Do you think I can forget that? Do you think I and the few others who survived have ever forgotten? Can you blame us if we did go crazy? If we hid away out there in the western wilderness, hid away from a world that had offered us nothing but death and destruction, and plotted to bring death and destruction to that world in return?

“Think about it for a moment, Littlejohn. We were old men, all of us, and the world had given us only its misery to bear during our lifetimes. The world we wanted to save was destroying itself; why should we be concerned with its fate or future?

“So we changed our plans, Littlejohn. Perhaps the shock had been too much. Instead of plotting to rebuild the world, we turned our thoughts to completing its destruction. Our tools and texts were gone, buried in the rubble with the bodies of fine young men. But we had our minds. Crazed minds, you’d call them—but aware of reality. The grim reality of the post-revolutionary years.

“We burrowed away in the desert. We schemed and we dreamed. From time to time we sent out spies. We knew what was going on. We knew the Naturalists were gone, that six-footers had vanished from a Yardstick world.

We knew about the rehabilitation projects. We watched your people gradually evolve new patterns of living and learning. Some of the former knowledge was rescued, but not all. Our little group had far more learning than you've ever dreamed of. Fifty of us, between ourselves, could have surpassed all your scientists in every field.

"But we watched, and we waited. And some of us died of privation and some of us died of old age. Until, at last, there were only a dozen of us to share the dream. The dream of destruction. And we knew that we must act swiftly, or not at all.

"So we came into the world, cautiously and carefully, moving unobtrusively and unobserved. We wanted to contemplate the corruption, seek out the weaknesses in your degenerate civilization. And we found them, immediately. Those weaknesses are everywhere apparent, for they are physical. You're one of a dying race, Littlejohn. Mankind's days are numbered. There's no need for grandiose schemes of reactivating warheads in buried missile-centers, of loosing thermo-nucs upon the world. Merely by killing off the central council here in New Chicagee, we can accomplish our objective. A dozen men die, and there's not enough initiative left to replace them. It's as simple as that. And as complicated."

Harry Collins nodded. "Yes, as complicated. Because the only weaknesses we've observed are physical ones. We've seen enough of the ways of this new civilization to realize that.

"All of the things I hated during my lifetime have disappeared now—the crowding, the competition, the sordid self-interest, the bigotry, intolerance, prejudice. The antisocial aspects of society are gone. There is only the human race, living much closer to the concept of Utopia than I ever dreamed possible. You and the other survivors have done well, Littlejohn."

"And yet you come to kill us."

"We came for that purpose. Because we still retained the flaws and failings of our former cultures. We looked for targets to blame, for villains to hate and destroy. Instead, we found this reality.

"No, I'm not crazy, Littlejohn. And I and my fellows aren't here to execute revenge. We have returned to the original plan; the plan Leffingwell had, and my son, and all the others who worked in their own way for their dream of a better world. We come now to help you. Help you before you die—before we die."

Littlejohn looked up and sighed. "Why couldn't this have happened before?" he murmured. "It's too late now."

"But it isn't too late. My friends are here. They are telling your fellow council-members the same thing right now. We may be old, but we can still impart what we have learned. There are any number of technological developments to be made. We can help you to increase your use of atomic power. There's soil reclamation and irrigation projects and biological techniques—"

"You said it yourself," Littlejohn whispered. "We're a dying race. That's the primary problem. And it's an insoluble one. Just this afternoon—" And he told him about the interview with Thurmon.

"Don't you understand?" Littlejohn concluded. "We have no solution for survival. We're paying the price now because for a while we wouldn't heed history. We tried to defeat Nature and in the end Nature has defeated us. Because we would not render unto Caesar the things which are—"

Harry Collins smiled. "That's it," he said.

"What?"

"Caesar. That's the answer. Your own medical men must have records. I know, because I learned medicine from my son. There used to be an operation, in the old days, called a caesarean section—used on normal women and on dwarfs and midgets too, in childbirth. If your problem is how to deliver normal children safely, the technique can be revived. Get hold of some of your people. Let's see what data you have on this. I'll be glad to furnish instruction."

There was excitement after that. Too much excitement for Littlejohn. By the time the council had assembled in emergency session, by the time plans were formulated and he returned to his own dwelling in the helicopter, he was completely exhausted. Only the edge of elation sustained him; the realization that a solution had been found.

As he sank into slumber he knew that he would sleep the clock around.

And so would Harry Collins. The old man and his companions, now guests of the council, had been temporarily quartered in the council-chambers. It was the only structure large enough to house them and even so they had to sleep on the floor. But it was sufficient comfort for the moment.

It was many hours before Harry Collins awoke. His waking was automatic, for the tiny telescreen at the end of the council room glowed suddenly, and the traditional voice chirped forth to interrupt his slumber.

“Good morning,” said the voice. “It’s a beautiful day in New Chicagee!”

v Harry stared at the screen and then he smiled.

“Yes,” he murmured. “But tomorrow will be better.”

THE END

F.O.B. Venus

Sometimes you get the idea, from reading science fiction that if there is intelligent life on other planets and if the natives ever get bored someone ups and yells, "Let's invade Earth!" Then everyone brightens up and away they go. Poor old picked-on Earth! Anyhow, here's a story about some of the most gorgeous invaders you'll ever meet.

HAROLD FOLLANSBEE was the first to see one. In a world filled with military observers, civil defense watchers, professional astronomers and amateur sighters of flying saucers and other celestial crockery, Harold Follansbee was a most unlikely candidate for the honor of welcoming our first visitor from Outer Space.

Follansbee was a most timid, withdrawn and introverted type (even his toenails were ingrown) and he scarcely ventured outdoors except when journeying to and from his job. He seldom even dared look out of the window since an unfortunate morning when, suffering from a severe hangover, he'd pulled up the shade and discovered that it was bleeding outside.

He worked in the heart of downtown Chicago, buried away on the topmost floor of a large music store. Here he served as the clerical custodian of the sheet-music department.

That Harold Follansbee, in this obscure position, would be apt to encounter an Alien, was a most improbable circumstance.

But strange things happen, even in Chicago.

And thus it was that Follansbee became privileged to make the initial contact with an extra-terrestrial presence.

One morning, when the upper storey of the shop was seemingly devoid of customers, he leaned lovingly over a bound volume of Chopin preludes and surreptitiously pencilled a mustache on the portrait adorning the latest song number by Jerry Lee Lewis.

It was at this precise moment that Harold Follansbee looked up and confronted a visitor.

Although he did not know it, the fate of the world might conceivably have rested upon his reaction. If Follansbee had done the sensible thing and run, screaming, for his very life, perhaps things might have been different.

But few men, Follansbee included, are apt to flee from the sight of a beautiful woman. And this woman was lovely beyond the dreams of the poets who hymn the praises of Miss Rheingold, or even Brigitte Bardot.

There was absolutely nothing about her appearance to suggest an ultra-terrene origin; as a matter of fact, in her lowcut and tightly-fitted dress, she could hardly have looked more earthy.

Nor was there anything to hint that her impromptu visit to the sheet-music department of the store was based on a desire to become better-acquainted with mundane melody, in order to pass successfully as a human being.

Follansbee had no way of knowing that she had hovered above Earth for months in the mother-ship, before she and her sisters had been catapulted to earth in individual capsules which were destroyed immediately upon landing. He did not realize that during the hovering stage she and her kind spent their time absorbing AM and I'M broadcasts to learn the language and pick up news and information. He could not possibly conceive she had acquired a passionate liking for the romantic German ballads of Schubert, Schumann and Hugo Wolf; to a point where her first impulse upon landing on earth was to procure samples of such music for herself.

Even without this knowledge, Follansbee might still have saved the world, had he himself been a reader of science fiction. But he despised the stuff.

Consequently, he attached no meaning or importance to her introductory remarks as she riffled through a stack of art-songs, smiled pleasantly at him, and murmured the first words ever spoken by an Alien to an earth-man—"Take me to your lieder."

Joel Francis picked her up in Harold's Club, in Reno. She said her name was Yvette, which Joel Francis didn't exactly believe—inasmuch as his own name was Joe Francisco, or had been before he got out of stir, grew the sideburns, and started hanging around Reno and making a pitch for the divorcees.

But it didn't matter to Joel what her real name was. The important thing was, she was stacked, but good. Two big stacks of silver cartwheels in front of her on the dice-table, and a lot of folding lettuce in her big purse. The moment Joel noticed, he was attracted to her.

When he got a chance to look behind the stacks, he found that she had a wealth of personal assets, too. Best of all, she was alone and a stranger in town. After striking up a conversation (it isn't difficult, if you have sideburns like Joel Francis, and you work your way over to a place next to a dame at the dice-table and haul out a silver dollar and smile at her and say, "Will you bet this one for me, for luck?") he did his best to convince her that she was not alone any more and need not be a stranger.

The next step was in the direction of the bar. Here, Joel found out all that he wanted or needed to know. She was alone and she was in the chips. Yvette wouldn't tell him anything about her divorce, but that didn't mean anything. A lot of these chicks played it cool when it came to discussing personal matters—particularly when they were as flashy as she was.

Usually, it was because they'd been hitched to some old pappy guy with a fat bankroll and they came out here to cut in on it via the alimony route. They knew they had a soft touch, and they were sort of embarrassed.

Joel didn't care. He knew when he had a soft touch, too, and he wasn't embarrassed at all. His specialty was playing this kind of babe for all she was worth, going the whole route from cocktails to fun and games. He had a buddy named Cono who stayed in the background, but somehow always managed to show up at various motels at the oddest hours. This buddy was sort of a photographybug, you might say, and he took some real unusual pictures. He was real proud of the pictures, too; he always managed to bring the prints around later and show them to the dames and ask if they wanted to buy some. The pictures were quite expensive, and the negatives usually cost a small fortune, but most of the dames decided to buy. Particularly when they found out that such photos, introduced as evidence in court, might hurt a wife's chances of getting alimony payments.

Joel didn't tell Yvette about Cono and the camera, of course. He just bought her a few drinks and made with the small-talk and told her about his big ranch out in the valley. Joel really didn't own a ranch, of course, and his only experience along that line came from the time he was on the Honor Farm at the State Penitentiary back home, but she didn't ask too many questions.

In fact, she didn't ask any questions at all. Not even when Joel made the suggestion about driving out to this little motel he knew about. She seemed to go for the idea right away, just as she seemed to go for Joel.

Actually, it might have been wiser if Joel had been the one who had asked a few questions—although there is some doubt that Yvette would have revealed her eager cooperation was based on the premise that it was her given task to study human biology, and the reproductive factor in particular.

But Joel, after a few drinks, wasn't inclined to make inquiries. Never look a gift horse in the mouth; not when you have a beautiful filly like this one. And she was lovely, and she did cling to him, and when they got to the car she slid next to him on the seat and offered her lips and arms quite eagerly. Joel, despite his long experience and his long sideburns, found himself responding with unusual ardor and reacting with unusual anticipation.

Thus it was that he started the car in quite a hurry and drove out of town very fast, with Yvette in the seat beside him, her arms around him and her lips nibbling at his ear. Her nearness and the liquor and the speed were all mitigating factors, perhaps, as was the indecorous imagery which now filled Joel Francis with pleasurable euphoria.

But fast freights take no account of mitigating factors. And when Joel hit the railroad crossing on the outskirts of town, doing seventy, the fast freight loomed out of nowhere and hit him.

The next thing Joel Francis knew was the grinding, twisting sensation as the car compressed about him like a beer-can crushed by a giant hand. And like a beer-can, squeezed and emptied, it was flung into the darkness of a ditch.

One moment Joel was sitting there, speeding along without a care in the world, with this beautiful babe crawling all over him. The next minute he was lying in the overturned car, with the hood pinning his legs so he couldn’t get free and crawl out.

At that he was pretty lucky, because the windshield had gone and the huge, jagged splinters of glass might have sliced his head clean off his body.

He closed his eyes and tried to wriggle loose, but he could not make it. He couldn’t make it, but Yvette could. She was still at his side, and her legs hadn’t been caught at all, so it was very easy for her to roll over and put her arms around him in a continuation of a loving embrace. She held him tightly; very tightly indeed.

So Joel wondered what the hell, had shock driven her screwy? Had she really flipped, did she think he was going to lie here in the wreck and make with the love bit? He tried to ease her off, but she wouldn't let go; she was awfully strong and in a minute she'd probably try to kiss him.

That's when Joel opened his eyes again and now there was enough light for him to see.

Enough light for him to realize that, whatever else she might be doing, she wouldn't be kissing him. Because the glass from the windshield had caught her, all right.

The thing making love to him didn't survive very long. Just long enough for him to see that it didn't have any head. Just long enough to drive Joel Francis mad.

Lawrence P. Dunlap hired her because she was the prettiest of the eighteen applicants for the job, and he kept her on because she was the smartest. Not just of the eighteen—but of all the women he had ever met.

Dunlap had met a lot of women in his time, too; but that time, for him, was long since past. Now he was only interested in making enough money to retire on, so he never attempted to inject the personal element in his relationship with Leona Cummings.

She started off as a good stenographer and became an excellent private secretary; just when she advanced to the role of indispensable assistant, Dunlap couldn't quite recall. It had surprised him to learn that she was a student of economics, with a particular interest in the stock market. This seemed a rather odd hobby for so charming a young lady, even though she was an orphan who lived alone in a room at the YWCA, without friends or social interests.

Still, Dunlap did not object. In fact, he came to the point where he encouraged her to discuss the ramifications of his own business, which was real estate.

At fifty, he prided himself on the accumulation of a modest fortune; his wife wore mink, his son drove a Lancia, and he himself was a nonathlete member of the Athletic Club and a non-farming member of the Country Club. He was thinking quite seriously of retiring pretty soon now.

At fifty-one, however, Lawrence P. Dunlap was not quite so self-assured. Casual conversations with Leona Cummings had convinced him he was missing several opportunities. She’d given him shrewd hints on various deals, current and pending, and offered him sound advice on future projects.

It was at her suggestion that he bought out a contracting firm in order to bid on an expressway program coming up that fall. It was due to her foresight that he managed to acquire title to large blocs of land adjoining the proposed route. When his bid went through, Leona Cummings was instrumental in getting him to buy into the syndicate which formed to put up a huge shopping center in the new development.

Naturally, all this took money, and Dunlap had to mortgage his holdings. He spread himself pretty thin, but if everything went smoothly he’d have his money back in a year and then he could retire and watch the profits roll in.

Leona Cummings, meanwhile, was indispensable, as always. There were all sorts of delicate negotiations and arrangements to be made with aldermen, members of city planning commissions, union officials, and neighborhood politicians. Leona Cummings handled them as a go-between and his name was never connected with the exchange of cash for promises.

It was also fortunate that she was available to put in proxy bids for property, to head up the shrewdly-devised network of dummy corporations and holding companies which were necessary to establish if Dunlap didn’t want his connections revealed. If it ever leaked out that he was profiting from the building of the expressway, profiting from the sale of land adjoining it, and profiting from the leasing and resale of business property as a result of his other efforts, there might be embarrassing consequences down at City Hall and in the offices of the Collector of Internal Revenue. Rut with Leona Cummings as a front, there were neither leaks nor consequences. And a modest investment of a hundred thousand or so—spread judiciously through token corporate entities in order to establish credit for loans—made Dunlap a millionaire on his fifty-second birthday. He was ready to retire, now, and not to the ranchhouse he presently owned. He could build a mansion.

He felt so good about it that he paid Leona Cummings a Christmas bonus of over a thousand dollars, in cash, so she needn't declare it on her tax returns. She was properly grateful, too.

So grateful, in fact, that she came to him several days later with a further suggestion. A housing project was the ticket—a complete, multi-million-dollar venture with several thousand units. He owned the land, and the deal could be financed easily enough. She had already taken the liberty of consulting Bert Harkin, their attorney.

At first, Dunlap demurred. I've got enough money now," he said. "I'd like to quit. Isn't every man who can retire at fifty-two."

"Isn't every man who can be a multi-millionaire at fifty-three," Leona Cummings told him. "Just one more year."

And in one more year the project was almost completed. Leona was invaluable; she took most of the load off Dunlap's shoulders as the work progressed. Not only did she assume the job of fronting for the development corporation putting up the cracker-box units; she also took over the responsibilities in the promotional firm which was formed to handle sales and advertising of the houses to the general public.

The business boomed. Leona Cummings hadn't lied; at fifty-three, Dunlap was a multi-millionaire. Of course it was all on paper—his money was invested in the various corporate structures controlling the area. "But I can sell out for five or six million right now," he told her, the evening he handed her a three-thousand-dollar bonus as a token of his appreciation.

And that's just what I plan to do. Sell out and retire. Build me a place down in Florida and—"

"You can't," Leona Cummings said. "The next few years will quadruple your holdings. Values are skyrocketing. Besides, there's talk of another expressway down on the South Side. Suppose you got in on that the same way. Why, you'd end up owning half the property in town! And that's not all—you'd own the property-owners, too! That's something I wanted to talk to you about, Mr. Dunlap. There's no reason why you shouldn't think about getting into politics. Oh, maybe you wouldn't care to run for office yourself, but you could groom a couple of bright young men. With the people you have in the areas you control, you could bring a lot of pressure to bear, swing a lot of votes. How'd you like to own this town, really own it, and everyone in it? Why—"

Dunlap was almost carried away by her argument. Almost, but not quite. He shook his head. "Maybe so," he agreed. "I think it can be done. But I'm not going to do it. If I were ten years younger, perhaps, I'd be interested. Right now I just want to get out. I want you to call Harkin for a meeting. I've got to arrange a gradual liquidation—"

Leona Cummings shook her head. "I've spoken to him. There's no need of a meeting. That is, if you insist on retiring."

"Of course I insist. And I intend to liquidate."

"You can't liquidate."

"What do you mean?"

"You forget, Mr. Dunlap, that you're not the legal head of these businesses. I am."

"But the voting stock—"

"Much of it is under my name, remember? And there's probably more than you think. You signed a lot of papers in the past few years. Harkin tells me you signed over practically everything."

"What are you trying to tell me? Are you by any chance threatening to squeeze me out of my own business?"

"Of course not, Mr. Dunlap. You squeezed yourself out. You don't have a business any more. And all I'm telling you is that if you're set on retiring, you're perfectly free to do so, right now. You can walk out of this office this very minute without having to sign a thing."

"Now see here, I'll have the law—"

"I think it would be better for you if you forgot about the legal aspect. That's what Mr. Harkin said, after I showed him some of the papers you directed me to make out concerning a few little deals."

"This is blackmail, you can't get away with it! Turning me out of my own office."

"My office. My businesses." Leona Cummings smiled brightly and wrote out a check. "Here you are," she said. "A little retirement gift as a token of our association. Four thousand dollars. That's what you paid me in bonuses. I've saved the money, because I always intended to give it back to you. A sentimental gesture."

"But—"

"I wish you happiness in your retirement," Leona Cummings told him. "It's what you've always wanted, isn't it?"

So Lawrence P. Dunlap took the check. His own home was still mortgaged, and the four thousand dollars would not buy him a ranchhouse or a mansion, or a big place down in Florida. About all it did buy was liquor, during the next year. And on his fifty-fourth birthday, when he read in the papers about Leona Cummings and her new South Side housing project development, he found he had just about enough money left to buy a second-hand revolver and some brand-new bullets.

Then Dunlap finally retired, to the family plot at the cemetery.

Clark Holton never knew where she came from and he didn't inquire.

There is no telling how many of them came during the early years: creatures like the one who called herself Margaret Kern.

A surname was hardly necessary, for in most instances—Margaret's included—marriage soon brought a new one.

She was Margaret Holton, now, his very own Margaret, six years married and the mother of a five-year-old girl named Peggy.

All of them who married, it seems, were monoparous, and all of them gave birth to perfectly normal-appearing, golden-haired little girls. Replicas of their nature.

Clark Holton was proud of his daughter and he adored his lovely wife. She was wise in those ways a man desires wisdom in a woman, and charmingly naive in others. Although he knew nothing about her background previous to their marriage, he was entirely content in the present. Margaret saw to that.

If there was anything strange or disconcerting about his wife and child', Clark Holton remained totally unaware of it—at least, until too late. He never realized that Margaret's particular assignment was the study of human anatomy and physiology, or that she had given birth to Peggy merely to provide herself with a readily available assistant.

One night, in the cellar, he found out.

The next day Margaret was telling her neighbors that Clark Holton had gone away on a long business trip. In fact, he'd been transferred to the firm's Alabama plant, and while he got established and looked for a home down there, she intended to sell the house up here and then join him.

Calm and unruffled—and completely bathed after all that grimy wrestling with the furnace at midnight—precocious little Peggy played in the yard outside the window.

Margaret gazed fondly at her offspring as the neighbor lady beamed and gushed over the youngster.

"Why, she looks simply adorable," the neighbor lady cooed. "Just like you!"

Margaret acknowledged the flattery, but even an Alien has some compunctions to be fair and truthful. So she glanced out at Peggy, who was squatting in the dust and playing marbles with the souvenirs she had insisted on retaining from last night's incident.

"Yes," Margaret replied. "She does resemble me. But she has her father's eyes."

Roy Hinchley realized that his couch was sagging and the leather was worn away by the squirmings of numberless neurotics and countless psychotics—but never, in all the years of his psychotherapeutic practice, had he ever entertained a patient like this one. Talk about paranoid delusions!

There was no need to, because the patient was doing all the talking.

“Don’t ask me how I found out, Doctor, but I swear to you it’s true.”

“What’s true?”

“There aren’t any women left in the world any more.”

The patient sat up. “That’s why I came to you for help, Doctor. Not just because I need it myself, but because we all need it—all we men—now that the women are gone.”

Roy Hinchley opened his mouth, but the patient didn’t wait for his reply. He continued to report.

“Sure, I know they look like women, and they even act like women—sometimes. But they are not, I tell you. They’re invaders from another planet. That’s the only possible answer.

“You see, they must have studied us first and figured out a logical method of conquest. No need to start a destructive war, once they figured out our own system of sexual relationships here on earth. All they had to do was marry us and take over. They saw how easy it was for our own earth-women to do just that; they’ve done it for generations, you know, as wives and mothers. So these creatures merely assumed female form and followed suit—with refinements and improvements of their own. They came down here and married all the best men, the key men, and pretty soon they’ll be running everything, owning everything. Look at all the beautiful young widows of wealthy and prominent citizens who’ve become important factors in business and industry and government just in the last few years.”

“Not all of these women are widows,” Roy Hinchley said.

“Some of them aren’t even married.”

“That’s true. They’re too smart to follow just one pattern. Some of them infiltrated as spinsters, some of them play the role of the power behind the throne. But they're squeezing us out, more and more. They control eighty per cent of the buying power, most of the investments, and pretty soon they won't need men at all any more, even as fronts. I'll tell you something else I found out, too, Doctor—after I started studying this thing in earnest. Something's happening to the birth-rate."

"It's common knowledge, yes," Roy Hinchley admitted. "The birth-rate is declining, a bit."

"A bit? It's dropping fantastically. These creatures only seem to have one child. And have you noticed—it's always a female? I've written letters to Washington—"

Roy Hinchley repressed a sigh. Of course he'd written letters to Washington; these patients usually did. It was almost useless to attempt to reason with them, but one had to try.

"But there are over a billion women on earth. Surely you don't mean to imply that each and every one of them is an—outsider? Think of your own relatives, your mother, your sister—"

"That's just it, Doctor," the patient murmured. "That is how I found out, you know. Because of my sister. She's not my sister any more. Oh, she still looks like my sister, but she's changed. She's got a demon in her, one of those things from outer space. In the last six months she's pushed me out of the family business, taking over everything for herself. It's happening everywhere, Doctor. Naturally, there are only a few thousand who came here in assumed human form; who were able to marry and masquerade in that method. The others waited until they could profit by the knowledge of those who came first to spy and to learn. Now the rest are gradually infiltrating in a new way. They're occupying the bodies of our real women, too. Displacing their personalities with other entities. That's how the mass changeover is taking place.

"It's happening everywhere, Doctor. And when a few men like myself begin to suspect the truth, they just seem to disappear. That's why I came to you. You know something about the mind, the personality. You can warn people, they'll listen to you.

"You've got to help me tell them. Tell them the earth is being conquered. Not on the battlefield, but in the boudoir. Tell them mankind is being—"

Dr. Roy Hinchley managed to get rid of his patient at last. The first step was to prescribe mild sedation. The second step, before he returned for another appointment, was to get in touch with this sister of his; find out something about the background of the situation. Maybe Clara would have some suggestions.

He closed his office for the day and prepared to mount the stairs to his second-floor apartment. Clara would be waiting for him there and he could tell her about this patient.

Up until recently, of course, he'd preserved a professional seal of silence concerning the confidences he heard, but lately Clara had begun to exhibit a profound interest in the nature of his work. Strange that she should suddenly become so fascinated after all these years. But then, she'd changed a great deal lately; developed an insight which was positively remarkable. And she'd taken to reading up on medicine and surgery, too.

Dr. Hinchley shrugged. Funny, the delusions patients will get. If he'd told this man about Clara, he'd have rationalized that it was all proof of what he'd been saying about Aliens taking over the minds and bodies of human women. A rather engaging theory, in a way—at least it might explain such things as the sudden craze for sack dresses. Hard to imagine a real woman wanting to dress like that.

But that was nonsense. Dr. Hinchley, chuckling as he climbed the stairs, was just another husband contemplating the apparently inexplicable behavior of just another wife.

And when he opened the door, and Clara plunged the gleaming scalpel into his throat with surgical precision, he was still thinking—even as you and I—"Now, what do you suppose got into her lately?"

The last man on earth sat in a room. There was no knock on the door; only a faint hissing, as the creatures pumped in the lethal gas . . .

The Deadliest Art

Noted mystery and science fiction writer Robert Bloch has a particular talent for the offbeat, the wry unexpected. Here he offers a deadly duo—modern fables about two very different kinds of desire, and their unpleasant consequences.

I: the Ungallant Hunter

It was a hot night, even for the tropics. Vickery was just mixing a gin-and-splash when he heard the discreet tap at the hotel-room door.

“Sarah?” he murmured.

A man entered quickly arid quietly, bolting the door behind him.

“I’m Fenner,” he said. “Sarah’s husband.” He grinned down at Vickery in the chair. “Surprised to see me? Sarah was.”

“Really, now.” Vickery started to rise.

“Don’t bother,” Fenner told him. “Just stay where you are.” Still grinning, he pulled the big Webley out of his jacket and pointed it at Vickery’s stomach.

“Sitting target,” Vickery “said. “Not very sporting, old boy.”

“You’re a fine one to talk about sportsmanship, after what you did with my wife. Great White Hunter, eh? Adjoining hotel-rooms and all—must have been quite a safari.”

Vickery sighed. “I suppose there’s no sense my denying it. So shoot and be hanged.”

“Just the point. I don’t mean to be hanged. So I won’t shoot.” Still holding the gun, Fenner fumbled in his jacket-pocket and produced a small leather pouch. He opened it gingerly, then dropped a squirming, brilliantly-colored object at Vickery’s feet It looked like a tiny coral bracelet, but it was alive.

“Better not move,” Fenner muttered. “Yes, it’s, a krait. Deadliest little snake in the world, they say.”

Tenner, wait, listen to me—” The tiny coral bracelet suddenly uncoiled. Before Vickery could draw back, pink lightning struck. Again and again the krait sunk its fangs into Vickery’s right leg, through the thin trouser-cloth.

Vickery gasped and closed his eyes, making no move to crush the serpent. Suddenly it subsided sluggishly and coiled up again in the center of the carpet.

Fenner gulped, wiped his forehead, and rose. He put the gun over on the table. “I’ll leave this,” he said. “Maybe you’ll want to use it. They tell me that in less than ten minutes—”

Vickery chuckled. “Fenner, you are a mug!”

“What d’ye mean?”

“A bazaar-native sells you a harmless grass-snake and you take his word that its a krait. Just as you took the word of a jealous woman that we were having an affair. Actually, old boy, she was miffed because I wanted no part of her.” Vickery chuckled again. “Not a gallant statement, I admit, but you’re entitled to know the truth.”

“You don’t expect me to swallow that, do you?”

“Suit yourself.” Vickery waved a hand. “Oh, don’t go. Sit down and have a peg with me. Nothings going to happen—you’ll soon see.”

And nothing did happen, except that Fenner had his drink, and a short talk which fully convinced him that Vickery was as innocent and harmless as the tiny snake that was curled up on the carpet.

When he left, he apologized profusely to Vickery for everything. He'd sent Sarah packing on the first plane to London, and planned to follow her himself in the morning.

Vickery wished him godspeed. "Take your gun," he said. "And the snake, too. You needn't bother with the pouch—just put it in your pocket. Snakes love warmth and body-contact."

After Fenner left for the adjoining room formerly occupied by his wife, Vickery continued his preparations for retiring. His mind busied itself with mathematical calculations. How long would it be, for example, until Sarah arrived in London and he could put through a call? How much had she said the old boy was worth? And just how long would it take for that krait to stir in annoyance in Fenner's pocket and strike through the cloth into his fat flesh?

The answer to the last question was provided quickly.

Vickery heard the man screaming through the thin wall of the adjoining room, at the precise moment that he sat down on the bed and unbuckled the straps of his artificial leg.

II: A Fast Fix

GORDY WAS GIGGING DATES AROUND Chi and it was a real drag, until he latched onto Uncle Louie.

Just in time, too, because they'd started the countdown on the rocket to Flipville. He got the word from Phil, one of the cats in the combo he was working with.

"You've got a big habit," Phil said. "Go see the man. Uncle Louie—a boy's best friend."

Gordy went to see him right away, because he did have the biggest kind of a habit, and with a capital "H".

Uncle Louie turned out to be an old cat who ran a pawnshop for a front, down on South State. He had the stuff, and it was mellow, and he gave Gordy the fastest kind of a fix.

So everything was copasetic, except in the wallet department. The gigs weren’t bringing in enough to pay for his kicks.

When he asked for credit, Uncle Louie made like a federal case. Gordy pawned his watch, his studs, his fancy threads. But the habit was bigger than both of them, and pretty soon Gordy was one sick Daddy-O. He began missing on the rim-shots and his paradiddles were off.

“You want a fix?” Uncle, Louie said. “So pawn the drums.”

“Hock my traps? Man, I can’t play without ‘em, like.”

“You’re shaking so you can’t play anyway,” Uncle Louie told him, and it was true. “Look, I give you a week’s supply. A whole week.”

It sounded like a gasser to Gordy. A week on the stuff would straighten him out so he could fly again. “All right,” he said. “I’ll go for broke.”

But the week went by, and then another two days, and Gordy was climbing the walls. The shakes hadn’t come yet, but the voices were here in hi-fi.

At first when Phil showed up at his pad and told him about the lake cruise bit, he didn’t believe it was for real. But Phil laid it to him solid. “We book for the whole summer, starting tomorrow night, So pull yourself together and we’ll ball.”

Gordy fell up to Uncle Louie’s place that night, figuring to explain the job set-up so the old cat would give him a break—let him have his traps and maybe a little goose-juice on the cuff.

Only Uncle Louie wasn’t having any. “No dough, no drums,” he kept saying. “I ain’t in business for my health.”

He was a fine one to talk about health, with Gordy digging his wig for a fix. Gordy grabbed him by the collar, talking up a storm. He came on strong about how he had to have it, and his traps too.

Uncle Louie tried to brush him off. So Gordy went behind the counter and dug out his traps for himself. Then there was a hassle, and that’s when the traps fell and Uncle Louie kicked the heads in.

He did it, the old cat busted the traps right in front of Gordy’s eyes and busted Gordy’s job. Until Gordy found himself busting Uncle Louie, with the big hatchet he’d grabbed from under the counter—busting him again and again, and screaming in that high, bugged voice.

So Gordy got his fix after all. But Uncle Louie must have gone to the bank earlier; because there was no dough around the place tonight. Nothing but pawnshop junk. No dough, no traps. And tomorrow Gordy would need his drums. But the heads were busted in—just like Uncle Louies head.

The old cat was. dead affright.

He looked at the drumheads and at Uncle Louie, and at the hatchet in his hand. Then he noticed there was a whole case full of medical instruments under the counter . . .

The next night he lugged his drums up the gangplank of the excursion boat. He was nine times higher than the Wrigley tower, but he was ready to play and he did play. The traps had never sounded better.

“So you got ’em back,” Phil said. “How’d you operate, man? Uncle Louie is a pretty tough customer.”

Gordy did a fast paradiddle on his brand new drumheads. Then he grinned. “You know the old saying,” he said. “There’s more than one way to skin a cat.”

NIghtmare Number Four

(With apologies to the late Stephen Vincent Benét)

We thought it was a Joke
When we read it in the papers that afternoon—

About some nut inventor down in Georgia
With a device for printing matter on air.
No, it wasn't skywriting again,
Or television. It printed matter on the air for you to read: It was permanent
And wouldn't blow away.

But there it was.
Just an item in the paper. It didn't mean much.
Something to laugh about, or tell your wife,
"What will these guys think of next?"
And most people didn't even see it, I suppose.
That's why it came as such a shock
When the advertisers took it up.

I remember the morning
When I looked out of the window and saw the sign hanging there (Just hanging there, you understand, in bold black letters) Reading:
"HAVE YOU TAKEN A GOOD LAXATIVE LATELY, OLD TIMER?"

I know I blinked.
The letters were black as ink, but solid to the touch: They hung there and they didn’t go away.

Well, this was how it started—and on the streets, going to work, There were more signs to read.
“EAT REEKIES—THEY’RE GOOD FOR YOU!”
“HAVE YOU HAD YOUR WINTER FUR RELINED?”
and
“GET YOUR CRANKCASE DRAINED.”
Passengers puzzled on the bus, but we weren’t sore, then.
The signs were small at first;
Just two feet high, black and white—“POOPSI-COLA HITS THE SPOT.”

After while we noticed the men with spray guns
Like insect exterminators, spraying the letters out.
Little crowds used to watch them do it.
And the TV comedians made gags,
And the columnists filled their columns,
And somebody wrote a song about it.
But nobody wrote indignant letters to the newspapers Yet

Then they began spraying signs over the lawns
And over driveways
And above houses
And the streets were choked with signs, signs, signs.
Black specks of printed matter, wherever your eyes turned.
Advertising firms were sued by property owners,
But the air was free. Wasn’t it?
The courts thought so.

Motorists complained the signs blocked visibility.

There were accidents.
Men were killed, but the ads went on.
To sell more bread.
To sell more tonics to help digest the bread.
To sell more laxatives to get rid of the bread
Once it was digested.
And then, of course—they advertised more bread again.

That's how it was, and we might have gotten used to it, in time If only the signs hadn't started getting BIGGER
And THICKER.
Two feet tall in the air.
Then five feet.
Then ten.
And the letters a foot thick.
The air was black. Foul.

There was some secret ink they used, and when you breathed it, It made you retch.
But that was all right, too.
One of the signs said "USE FLETCH'S PILLS AND STOP RETCHING."
There was a cure
But not for blindness, not for insanity,
Not for the perpetual sight of signs
Floating over Broadway and Park Avenue.

Twisting between clotheslines in the slums,
Weaving across the swimming pools on palatial estates.
Blocking the boulevards
Shadowing the sun in a black blot over the city—
The signs, reading, "TENDER SKIN LIKES VELVY-DOWN TISSUE," "EAT MORE KOHLRABI WEEK," "GET RID OF YOUR UGLY

PIMPLES!" and "THROW AWAY YOUR TRUSS!"

And then they made the signs in color to light up the night, And blindness and insanity began to pile up vital statistics.
Regular advertising died
Because this was cheaper and more profitable.
What if the signs did tangle up in streaming criss-crosses?
What if you looked out of the window and saw nothing but reams of it,
Illegibly imprinted on air?

They got the insects to work, then.
Inoculated them, I suppose. Trained them, perhaps To void out the signs.
No more sprayers.
Insect thoraxes spewed out the signs in patterns.
They must have bred the bugs on Madison Avenue.
Some genius thought it up—
The Man in the Gray Flannel Overalls.

Of course we tried to pass some laws.
We always do, when it's too late,
And it was too late now.
There were insects everywhere. Insects in clouds, Insects in black swarms, spurting from distended bellies; Each forming his little letter—its dot, his dash, her period.
And that, of course, was the beginning
Of the end.

Too many insects.
Too many to train, too many to control. So they bred.
Bred, and flew, and devoured.
They made nests in crates of VELVY-DOWN. They nibbled at the trusses.
They bored through boxes of FLETCH'S PILLS.

It didn’t do any good to reline your winter furs.
They ate them, too,
And bred again.

The skies were really black now. Black with flying forms.
It was too late.
The plague came, and then the famine.
They called out the Marines.
But how are you going to bayonet an insect?
And pretty soon,
What with plague and famine and all,
There weren’t any Marines any more.

There weren’t any consumer goods left to consume, Nor any consumers.
And—belated blessing!—there weren’t any advertisers either.
Just the insects
Flying aimlessly through ink-spattered air, droning by the signs Made meaningless through lack of eyes to read them. And insect retinas
Flickered down on an empty world where there was nothing left But words.

Lucky for me
I saved a few to write this down. . . .

The Screaming People

Stephen lived in a world of agony—always fearful that he. too, would become one of

IT BEGINS in darkness.

They call it sleep, but it's only a darkness. I lie there curled in the womb-posture and the darkness is all around me. When sleep comes, I merely draw some of that darkness inside me; the warm, rich, all-encompassing darkness, the darkness that is the nourishing blood of the night.

Womb-posture. A fetus lacks awareness, but I know that I'm asleep. I like to sleep.

"Take it easy. Rest, relax. Get plenty of sleep." That's what the doctors told me. And I'm willing to follow orders.

Roxie tells me I'm lazy, but I don't care; not if she lets me sleep. Not if she lets me go into the darkness, where I can be alone.

I'm alone now. I don't even have to think about the necessity of sleep any more. I'm safe. No one can get to me, not even myself. Not even myself. That's very important, somehow. I'm really alone, the way I want to be.

Better than that, I can burrow so deeply down into the darkness that I lose myself completely. There is no me, there's nothing but night.

Night—and the Voice.

I have to call it that, although it really isn't a Voice—I don't hear it, merely sense its presence. It exists, suddenly, somewhere in the darkness around me.

It emerges as a buzzing which I cannot locate in time or space. Does it impinge upon me from far away or is it whispering beside my ear?

"It doesn't matter."

The Voice tells me that. And I realize this is true. It doesn't matter where the Voice comes from. It's a part of the darkness. I need the darkness around me, so I must accept the Voice.

Then it grows.

Maybe the Voice feeds on darkness too, because it expands immediately until everything else is blotted out.

Even the darkness is engulfed by the Voice. The Voice, speaking to me, telling me what I must do if I want to go back into the dark.

"Get up. Get dressed. Go to Hexler's."

I'm asleep. I don't want to get out of bed. I don't want to go anywhere. And I've never heard of Hexler's.

But the Voice realizes all that. It understands. And it tells me I have to go.

"Get up. Get dressed. Go to Hexler's." Over and over again. I try to escape from it, into the darkness, but the darkness is gone now. There's only the Voice, telling me what I must do. In order to retreat into the safety of the dark again, I have to obey. There's no question of refusal. If I refuse, I'll stay here forever, listening to the Voice and I don't want to do that.

So it's easier to do as I'm told. The Voice will direct me. All I need do is listen and accept, and the Voice will lead me back into the darkness. The Voice knows the way.

Everything is so simple. I'm not conscious of awakening but I know—a part of me knows—that I've left the bed. No need for lights; I can find my clothing in the dark, without even opening my eyes. I can dress in the dark, quickly and quietly. The Voice anticipates everything.

But where's the door? If I could only open my eyes—

"Very well. Open your eyes."

That's better. I can go now. But where?

"Hexler's. Hexler's house."

So it's a house.

"James P. Hexler. 100 North Azure Drive."

The Voice will guide me, the Voice will never fail, because it knows. I can trust it, I must trust it. There's something familiar about the Voice. "His Master's Voice." Funny, that should come into my head. Records. I'm in the transcription game myself.

Mustn't think about that, though. Must concentrate on what the Voice is telling me. I'm getting instructions now.

"Walk quietly."

I open the door, tiptoe into the hall, close the door behind me. The Voice anticipates every movement.

And then I'm out on the street, alone in the night. Alone, yet not alone. Because the Voice is with me.

"Turn west."

The wind angers the grass. I gaze up at the ancient, evil world of the moon. It radiates an orange aura of corruption.

"North, into the canyon."

On steeply-sloping hills, the trees bow and beckon before me. Huddled behind them, strange houses squat, blinded by night.

"Enter the fifth driveway."

The hill is high, the path uncertain.

"Climb."

Why couldn't I have come around the front, where the walk leads to a gate?

"Climb!"

I climb the hill, and then the wall is before me; the high stone wall ringing the hilltop. I pause, uncertain.

“Climb!”

My fingers claw, my knees lock, my back arches. But somehow there is no pain. The Voice protects and directs. My forehead is wet and an engine throbs in my chest. But I’m straddling the top of the wall, gazing down through the trees at the dark house on the hilltop.

“Jump!”

I float on the wind. The falling dream. My ankles are wrapped in cotton batting as I land. No, that’s illusion. I must remember to be careful of illusions. I must remember that the Voice alone is real. There is nothing but the Voice and the will to obey it.

Now I must walk towards the house, approaching it from the rear. I must stay within the shadows of the trees, where the moon’s rays are barred by branches. Where I remain in the shadows.

The house of stone is huge; a mansion, built in the days when men thought of such edifices as mansions. The myriad heads of its cupolas are gray, silvered by the touch of time and moonlight. Myriad heads and one body—a hydra-house.

Why do I think of that? I don’t think in such terms. But the Voice does. The Voice is thinking for me. The night holds no secrets for the Voice. All I need do is listen and obey.

“Look for the open window.”

Yes, look for the open window. Look for the silver lining. Look for the bluebird. That’s my voice now, my thought. Or am I just remembering something that was already told to me, a long time ago?

A long time ago I was in bed, asleep. Maybe I’m still asleep. Maybe I’m just dreaming.

“The open windoio—”

The Voice doesn't want me to wonder about such things. The Voice is telling me that somewhere along this side of the house there is a window, open and waiting.

Yes. I can see it. The sill is low. I can reach it, climb over it. That's what I'm supposed to do. And I must be quiet, exceedingly quiet. Yes, I hear, I know.

But it's dark. If I had my lighter—

"No light."

Of course. No light. I can stand here until my eyes grow accustomed to the dimness. Carrots for night vision. Night vision—a vision born of the night. Stand in the strange house now and try to see.

There's a musty odor in this room, a museum smell. I stand quietly, breathe softly, because no one must know I'm here.

I am a stranger and afraid, in a house I never made.

I blink at the sudden light. Is there somebody outside? No, it's only the moon shining through the trees as it rises. I can see now.

The long room is like a museum hall, lined with cases. I start down it.

The Voice guides me. Watch out for creaking floorboards. Don't bump against the glass. Breathe slowly, quietly.

Behind the glass I see figurines, pottery, vases, horses.

Chinese art—Ming, Sung, Han, Tang. I don't know my dynasties. Big Kwan Yin. Foo dogs. A Ho-Ti in the milky perfection of jade. That's valuable, the jade. Tao—

"Go to the stairs."

The staircase is around the corner, in the outer hallway. There are other rooms opening off the hall, containing more glass cases. A fortune in the stuff. Hexler must be filthy rich.

"Move slowly."

I must climb the stairs. They creak, so easy does it. One step at a time. And now where?

"The third door on the left."

It’s darker here in the upper hall, because all the doors are closed. One, two, three. Here.

Now, open the door. Open it just a trifle, as the Voice directs. There’s moonlight streaming through the window and I can see.

I’m standing in a bedroom, a vast bedroom. The high, canopied bed in the corner is a million miles away. Its curtains waver slowly in the breeze from the open window, billowing back and forth like batwings flapping in the dark. The bed is a huge beast, crouching over its prey—

I walk silently, threading a path through the tables lining the long room. There are bell-jars on the tables, with more jade beneath them. Jade and ebony and ivory. There’s a jackal-headed figure beneath one jar. That would be Anubis, the Opener of the Way. Who opened the way for me?

And what’s that sound . . .?

I hear a tinkling. A tinkling in the moonlight, a faint clicking and clattering. Something is stirring in the breeze; the same breeze that ripples the short hairs rising along the nape of my neck.

Now I see it, on the table, next to the bed. There’s a little silver skeleton, mounted on a pedestal.

I stare at it, but there’s no mistake. It’s a perfectly-fashioned miniature skeleton, completely articulated; a silver skeleton with ruby eyes, hinged and jointed and hung from a hook rising out of the pedestal’s base.

No wonder it clicks and clatters. For the tiny figure is weaving with the wind, bobbing and grimacing in a dance of death.

Death.

I must get out of here. What am I doing? This is all wrong, I must—

“The window-seat. Open the window-seat.”

The Voice commands, but I can’t obey. I have to get away from this place.

“The window-seat. Just open it and take the box. Then you can go.”

Yes. I could do that. I could do that, very quickly. Nobody will see me. Those little red eyes are only rubies. I can take it, fast, and then I can run.

The seat swings up. Funny, there was a lock here, I can see that, but it's broken now. I lift the seat. And here's the box. A black velvet box, long and shallow. I can hold it. I can hold it as I run down the hall—

"Go to the bed."

I don't want to go to the bed. I want to run. I'm going to run. Except that I can't move. All at once I'm back there in the desert, pinned underneath the car, and my arms and legs are paralyzed and I'm trying to get away from the pain in my head, trying to sink down into the darkness. That's why I need the darkness, still need it now; to get away from the memory, and the pain.

And the only way to find the darkness again is to let the Voice guide me. I must follow the Voice. That's the only way.

"Go to the bed."

I put the black case down on the table and walk over to the bed. It won't hurt to look. Even if the batwings flap, even if the tiny skeleton moves in its dans macabre, I can look. I can gaze through the parted curtains.

The room is a museum and I am staring down at a mummy. Gaunt, stiffened limbs, wrapped in the folds of the bedding. A bald, shrivelled skull. A face that is old and wrinkled and brown and dry. No bitumen seals the lips, so it cannot be a mummy; it must be a man. A very old man, sleeping in a canopy bed, sleeping the sleep of the aged which is like death. His chest neither rises nor falls. His tongue is limp, in his open mouth. I can hear nothing but the faint clattering of the little silver skeleton.

There are deep pools of shadow covering the old man's eyes. I bend forward, peering into them. Surely there will be a ripple; the stone of my gaze must inevitably plumb those depths.

No ripple. No movement.

"Now."

The Voice is not speaking to me. It is talking to my hands.

They know what to do.

It's so simple, and there's nothing to fear. Besides, the Voice will leave me if I obey. Then I can run away, then I can sleep, then I can go back into the darkness where there is neither Voice nor dreams nor memory of pain.

I have to sleep. It's the only sure way. The only sure way to banish silver skeletons and yawning corridors and mummies grinning up into endless darkness—

"Now."

Besides, I won't be doing it. Only my hands. My restless, moving hands.

"Find a pillow."

There is a pillow under the old man's head. There was a pillow.

Now it is above his head, over his face. My hands hold it there, until the eyes and the open mouth are blotted out. My hands press a whiteness into the darkness.

No sound. No movement. My hands press and press and my wrists ache, but the Voice wants to be sure, very sure.

A century later, I turn away and pick up the black case from the table. The moonlight is dimming and the darkness increases.

All at once the Voice is gone. There is only that insane jangling, that damnable clicking from the obscene little grotesque on the table.

My hands put a stop to the mummy-vision. I can end this torment, too.

I grasp the silver figure and hurl it to the floor. Let my feet put a stop to the skeleton-spectre. It's good to feel it crunch and splinter beneath my heel. See, I can dance too, now!

There, it's done. And I'm alone in the dark, at last. I must grope my way out of the room, ever so slowly. I must creep down the stairs, out of the house, back through the strangeness of the silent streets. But the Voice is gone and I shall sleep once more . . . untormented sleep.

I turn at the doorway for a last look. Blur of moonlight, swirl of shadows. And in the center of the room, the broken jumbled heap of tiny silver bones . . .

Somebody was poking me in the ribs. I opened my eyes.

Then I knew it was all right because I was in bed, in my own apartment, with the sunlight streaming through the blinds. I was back in the world of morning, and bacon-and-eggs, and Roxie.

Roxie was doing the poking, of course. Her slim arm extended from beneath the covers of the twin bed next to mine, as she jabbed the pointed, painted nail of her index finger against my pajamas.

I was wearing pajamas! How could that be? Had I undressed again and —?

A quick glance to my right showed my clothing hung neatly over the back the way Roxie always hung it for me. My jacket wasn't there. It would be in the closet. Roxie put it on a hanger before we went to bed.

Yes. Of course. It had to be that way.

"Wake up. What's the matter?"

Husky voice. I could remember the way she used it when she sang. No control, but the fire came through.

"What's wrong with you, Steve? Another nightmare?"

"Nightmare?"

"You've been tossing and turning and groaning like a—I don't know what." She laughed. "I had an awful time waking you up. She must have been pretty."

"That was no lady, that was something I ate." I sat up and grinned. It wasn't hard to do.

Roxie was something to grin at—something to whistle at, too. I never could understand what she saw in me, but there was no doubt about what I saw in her.

She was a beautiful redhead. Repeat, beautiful. Because there are plenty of redheads per se (or per henna, for that matter) but very few worthy of that much-abused adjective. Generally speaking, every girl with orange hair or caramel-colored hair is, by courtesy, a redhead. But Roxie's hair, in ordinary light, was really red. And there was no accompanying dermatological disorder; no hint of freckles or blotches in the smooth skin.

I reached over and took her in my arms. Not a bad deal. But she kept one eye on the clock. Thirty-six seconds later she said, “Steve—time to get up. You’ll be late.”

I made a face at the clock, but I got up.

“Want me to fix breakfast, honey?” she called, as I started shaving.

“No, don’t bother. I’ll catch something downtown.” I stared at my countenance in the mirror. There were sagging pouches under my eyes. And no wonder. That dream last night had been the worst. Worse than the reality of the night on the desert, the night I was pinned under the car; worse than the weeks that followed.

I really ought to tell Roxie about the dream, but not now. This evening, perhaps, when I came home; then we could talk.

Right now the thing to do was to get down to the office. I had a job to hold, peddling one-minute commercials, twenty-second transcriptions, thirty-second recordings for station-breaks in a world of hard-sell which had nothing to do with last night’s fantasy of dancing death. So it was time to face today’s reality. Out, damned spot-announcement.

I adjusted my tie, picked up my coat, slung it over my arm, kissed Roxie good-bye at the door, and made my exit.

It wasn’t until I was halfway down the stairs that I put my coat on, and I was actually striding through the foyer of the apartment lobby before I became conscious of the unaccustomed bulk inside the jacket.

That’s when I pulled out the long, shallow, black velvet box. It was utterly empty, but utterly real.

And that, of course, is when the nightmare began again. Not in darkness, this time, but in broad daylight—the harsh, acrid, smog-obscured daylight of what, in Los Angeles, passes for reality.

So I didn't go to the office after all. I phoned them from a public cubicle at the corner, and then I boarded a Sunset bus. That's right, a bus; everybody drives in L.A., but I'm the lone exception—have been, ever since that night out on the desert when the car rolled over.

Right now the car was rolling over again, and the little silver skeleton was jangling, and I wanted to run home to Roxie and bury myself in her arms. But you can't go home again, and you can't tell the woman you love that everything is a nightmare and she is only a part of it. You can't seek reality through a mother-substitute.

Dr. Wagram had made that perfectly clear. And that's why I had to go to him now.

I took the bus not far from Angel's Flight and rode past the new County buildings on Hill. All the while I kept a tight grip on that damned black velvet box, because it was a part of reality now. I had to keep my grip on reality until I reached Dr. Wagram. He could explain things to me; there must be an explanation, and I wasn't going to start screaming right here in a public bus.

And I forced myself to stare out at Los Angeles, though that didn't reassure me very much. For fantasy is reality out here. I gaped at a cordon of men who groped with canes against the searing sunlight as I passed the Braille Institute of America. I blinked while the weird figure in the Space Patrol helmet whizzed past on his police motorcycle. After the bus turned onto Sunset I noted the headquarters of the National Judo Association—and tried to picture what went on inside, with little success. No more than I obtained as I attempted to visualize how the TV dreams were being made in the studios at Sunset and Cahuenga.

If anything, that bus-ride was a continuation of flight and fugue. Why, I wondered, had they bothered to build a Disneyland out here, when every street-corner offered its own vista of escape? I turned my head to the left and saw Schwab's Pharmacy; turned it to the right and saw a Chinese pagoda towering high on the hillside; stared straight ahead at the palms of the Garden of Allah. And here was a midget roaring by, all alone in the enclosed immensity of an outsize imperial. Following him came Irish McCalla—Sheena of the Jungle, one of the tallest women in show business—crouched over the wheel of her tiny copper-colored Volkswagon.

And now I climbed to the west, along the gaudy improbabilities of restaurant row—that Japanese place, and Ciro's, and the Mocambo and Scandia—all utterly unreal here in the sunlight because they were asleep, their painted faces and neon eyes closed against the glare of the day. Like vampires, they came alive only after dark, and maybe that's the secret; maybe these Strip restaurants are vampires. Or run for the benefit of vampires who venture forth only at night and who know the password and enter to drink blood from the crimson concealment of crystal goblets. And that would lend a certain sinister significance to the name of the street itself—Sunset Boulevard. Could there be any more appropriate designation for a thoroughfare peopled by the Undead?

I thought of some of the waxy, pallid faces I'd glimpsed in the night along this route; thought of the feral, feverish eyes, the too-bright, too-crimson lips pulled back from the white and gleaming teeth; thought of this army awaiting sunset on Sunset; awaiting it in crypts concealed beneath the big houses up there in the canyons. They were waiting now, waiting for the sun to fade before they awoke to walk and drink their fill in a world of mist and moonlight and silver skeletons—

And then I was back in my nightmare again and I thought of the big house on the hillside, and the other big house I was searching for now.

I left the bus just in time and started running up the slope of the hill to my left, and it was a nightmare, it was just the way it had been in my dream, only this time no Voice prompted me. I knew where I was going, and why, and I didn't stop until I rounded the turn on the private entry-way and came to the stone arch on which was imbedded the neat little bronze plaque reading Carl Wagram.

I was sweating and panting, but I didn't slow down.

I started to run along the drive, towards the big doorway, and it was like running through water, or something thicker. What is thicker than water?

Blood.

Yes, I was running through blood, because everything was turning red.

My heart was pounding so loudly I could hear it even through the black velvet of the box inside my jacket. And now it seemed as though I could hear other sounds, too. There was the tinkling of tiny silver bones, and a harsh grating noise which seemed to come from far beneath the surface of the earth. It's hollow and empty down there in the crypts, and even the echoes are monstrously magnified when the coffin-lids are opened from within and they come crawling out. They had heard my heart and that's why they were coming to get me, because they knew it was pumping blood and I was running through blood and they thirsted. Blood is redder than Roxie's hair, and if you're blind and groping through the redness with a cane you can't escape; even judo won't save you when they wrap their cold arms around you and drag you down into the darkness. I could hear them coming closer and closer, and there was only one way to shut out the sound.

I screamed.

I screamed as I stumbled up the steps, screamed as I beat upon the door, screamed as I fell into Dr. Wagram's waiting arms.

I was still screaming when he put me back in the womb . . .

It was very pleasant in the womb.

I lay there for a long time, coiled up fetally (fatally?—no, there was nothing to be afraid of here) and stark naked. Naked as a newborn babe, naked as an unborn babe with only a gossamer covering of lanugo to protect it. But there was no need for protection because this was the womb. It was dark and it was red, and the walls were soft and moist and rubbery and there was a faint and faroff murmuring which soothed and sated me.

I wasn't afraid to think now, wasn't afraid to remember. Although I didn't have too much to recall. Here I was, back in the womb, yet my actual memories didn't extend back past my thirtieth birthday.

My thirtieth birthday—that was the night I'd rolled the car over.

That was the night I'd been driving to Vegas; at least they surmised it had been my destination, for why else would I be racing across the desert in an open convertible with four thousand dollars in cash in the glove-compartment?

That's the amount they found when they found me—or, rather, when he found me. For it was Dr. Carl Wagram who, en route from Las Vegas to Los Angeles, pulled his car over to the side of the road and discovered me lying there in the ditch with half the convertible crushing my body. I'd suffered compound fractures of both arms and both legs, my skull had been smashed, and yet I was still able to scream. I must have been screaming for half an hour before he came along.

Even now—even here in the womb, where nothing could harm me—I still didn't care to dwell on what happened. Actually, it all came to me via second-hand report, because when Wagram arrived I slipped down into the merciful oblivion of concussion-induced coma. And there I stayed for the next ten days, while Wagram accompanied me to the nearest town, supervised the work of the doctor who put the casts on me, represented me in the police investigation which followed, and finally—after two surgeons flew out from L.A., examined my head injuries, and pronounced my condition hopeless and my brain-damage so extensive as to render the case inoperable—chartered a private plan and flew me back to his own clinic here. Then he operated; Dr. Carl Wagram, who learned his neuro-surgery in war-torn Munich. He put the plates into my skull and my head healed and he grafted the skin and hair grew and there was even a touch of cosmetological miracle involved. By the time my casts were off, my physical recovery was assured.

This left me with but one problem.

Amnesia.

Complete and total amnesia.

Oh, I could comprehend consciousness, and I could even speak after a fashion. But I was unable to remember a single solitary moment of my life before that crash. Existence, for me, began with a scream of pain out there on the desert.

My name?

Stephen Edmundson, according to the driver's license and the registration of the crumpled car.

My address?

A motel, just south of Venice, in the Santa Monica area, which I'd occupied for just three weeks. And it was during those three weeks that I'd obtained both my license and the automobile. I'd paid cash for the latter, and the dealer at the used car lot had a sketchy record and a vague recollection of my coming in and making the transaction. But that was all.

The motel proprietor knew nothing about me except that I'd showed up one afternoon, wearing a nondescript outfit and carrying a single piece of luggage. I had paid him in cash, too, and we had no further dealings except for my weekly settlement of the rent. Apparently I'd gone out, applied for a driver's license, took my tests—that was on record, too—and bought the second-hand convertible. In the meanwhile I'd lived quietly, unobtrusively, made no contacts and no friends.

Dr. Wagram investigated, of course, and so did the police. They didn't have much to go on. When I drove out of the motel I'd acquired new luggage and a complete new wardrobe, down to socks and handkerchiefs and underwear. They were able to find out where I'd bought some of it, but never learned what happened to my old clothing. Obviously, I'd discarded the lot.

So they checked the military authorities, but there was no record of any Stephen Edmundson in Service.

And they checked with the FBI and they put out the usual bulletins and inquiries and tried to match fingerprints—without results.

No family claimed me, no friends stepped forward, no wife or children rushed to identify me. Nor was there any clue as to what I'd been doing holing up in a Venice motel with about seven thousand dollars in cash—or what I'd intended to do with the four thousand I had left when I took off in the general direction of Las Vegas.

I couldn't remember.

My mind couldn't remember and my body couldn't remember. Thirty years had been wiped out.

At first there was even the painful and embarrassing matter of re-learning the simple physiological habit-patterns governing ingestion and elimination. And, after the casts were removed, the business of learning to walk again. I was like a child; more accurately, like a newborn infant.

And that, I suppose, is why Dr. Wagram put me in the womb.

I knew where Wagram picked up his neuropsychiatric techniques, but never did discover where he'd acquired his theories. And even after I'd regained a certain measure of comprehension, a certain vocabulary which extended my frame of reference, I was unable to obtain satisfaction in the matter.

"There's no point in explaining," Wagram told me. The short, plump, balding little man regarded me with enigmatic eyes. "Poor Reich tried to explain about the orgone, and they laughed at him. Moreno's psychodrama techniques haven't won general acceptance. Even Jung has had trouble with his theories about the use of the mandala. The innovator, the unorthodox practitioner, had best be silent and let his work speak for itself, in terms of results.

"I will say only this. Out of trauma comes fugue, out of fugue comes the retreat to the womb. Many psychotherapists attempt to block this retreat. As the record attests, few succeed. So I have chosen another course. The patient seeks the safety and comfort of the womb? Very well, I will give it to him. I have built a womb, where he is safe and secure, where he can find rest and reassurance. When the time comes that life stirs anew within him, when he desires to be born again, he and I together will weave an umbilical cord of words—a cord of dependency which will be snapped only when the moment of psychic rebirth arrives.

"The orthodox analyst becomes a father-image. I extend that; I become the mother-image as well. And the womb serves. It has served others amongst my patients; it will serve you."

And it did.

Since that time I've heard it argued, by reputable psychotherapists, that the gaudy little room which Dr. Wagram set up as an artificial womb is a ridiculous concept, a charlatan conceit.

But it worked, for me.

It saved my life. It gave me a life, in place of the one I'd lost when memory melted away there in the desert.

There came a time when I could talk again, when I could reason again. And when I could feel emotion.

I never did manage to recover a knowledge of what had gone before. The past was not recaptured and I learned to accept Thomas Wolfe's bitter dictum—you can't go home again. But there were clues.

Wagram may have been an unorthodox practitioner, but he didn't scorn the use of orthodox methodology when the situation indicated its employment. I took batteries of the usual tests, and Wagram probed with depth techniques, free association and all the rest. There were clues in my reactions—indications of learned responses.

Somewhere in my past I'd acquired the equivalent of a college education, plus a variety of motor and manual skills which reflected practical experience. Perhaps I'd been in the Merchant Marine for a while (though again a search of the records gave no confirmation). I'd lived in a colder climate for a time; I was familiar with the operation of a typewriter; I'd enjoyed sports. But all these things were haphazard inferences at best, and they afforded little reassurance.

I couldn't stay in the womb forever. And I couldn't stay at Wagram's clinic forever. The time was coming when I must go back into the world—a world I never knew, and that didn't know me.

I had no family, no friends, no ties of any sort. And I had no money, either. The cash had gone; mainly to the doctors and the officials, and only a surprisingly small sum to Wagram, who refused to even entertain the notion of future indebtedness. In fact, he insisted that I take six hundred dollars with me when I left his place.

"The data afforded me in connection with your case is invaluable," he told me. "I consider the time and effort spent on you to be a sound investment which will bring me ample returns in the future."

Wagram was wonderful. It was he who found me a place to live, pulled strings to get me my first sales job. From that, after a few months of orientation—during which I kept coming back to him for reassurance whenever necessary—I finally stepped into my present position with the transcription agency. And that's where I'd met Roxie.

She'd come in, one day, with an agent, a Ben Clermer. He was one of those hearty, gregarious boys, a tactile tactitian—continually patting you on the back, holding your arm while he talked to you. He pawed every woman he met. It was a compulsion, really. He couldn't help putting his hands on you, digging you in the ribs, going through all the motions employed by a successful pickpocket.

But I don’t like pickpockets, and I didn’t much care for Ben Clermer; particularly when I saw him pawing Roxie.

That’s when I knew I was falling in love with her—when I began to resent his familiarity.

They came in several times; Roxie was hoping to get a job belting out singing commercials. Unfortunately, she didn’t have the voice for it. Those husky, untrained tones just didn’t lend themselves to cooing over the delights of a liquid detergent. And she lacked the disciplined projection necessary for a career as a straight singer. Roxie had, I learned, knocked around the fringes of show biz for a number of years; she’d been a nitery chorine in her teens, done bits in strawhat stock, even had a season as assistant to a carney magician. She’d started out at fifteen as a beautiful redhead, and she ended up, at twenty-three, as a beautiful redhead.

Somewhere along the line there had been a brief, unsuccessful marriage and any number of brief, unsuccessful liaisons. I never asked her about the past—I’d learned to be pretty sensitive myself about this. But I did, eventually, broach the matter of her future.

“I don’t know what Clermer has told you,” I said.

“But I can imagine. He keeps giving you the buildup, doesn’t he? Well, in a way, I don’t blame him. You can catch more flies with honey than you can with vinegar. I believe that’s how it goes.”

“That’s a left-handed compliment if I ever heard one,” Roxie answered.

“I’m a left-handed guy. And right now I’m not interested in feeding you compliments. I want to give you a taste of the truth.”

“Which is—?”

“You can’t sing. You dance well enough for the second line, but in another couple of years you’ll be too old for chorus work. Your speaking-voice is fair, but you’d need a lot of training if you ever hoped to make it in radio or TV as an actress. It would take time and money, and let’s face it—you haven’t too much of either.”

“What are you suggesting, then?” she asked me. “Could be you’re out shilling for some Business College?”

“That’s a possibility,” I said. “But frankly, it hadn’t occurred to me. I was going to give you a bit of more obvious advice. The same advice you get from your mirror every morning.”

“Which is?”

“Get married.”

She made a face. “Clermer’s already married.”

“He’s not the only man in the world.”

“I know. But a girl has to wait until she’s asked.”

“Consider yourself asked, then.”

“Steve—”

“I make a hundred and a quarter a week here, average. Sometimes up to a hundred and fifty, if the commissions go good and the residuals pay off. I don’t have anything much put aside in the bank, but I’ve no obligations either. No family, no other responsibilities. We could find an apartment. You wouldn’t have to just sit around all day, you know—suppose you did want to take a little coaching, learn a bit about acting? There’d be the time and the money for that. And when you’re set, I could see about making some contacts for you. I may not be an agent, but I’ve got a few connections in the field. How does that sound to you?”

“Pretty good, as far as it goes. But there’s one little part you left out. Something about love and—”

“Roxie!” I said that part then, “with my arms around her; said it and meant it and felt it. And I hadn’t stopped saying it and meaning it and feeling it during the past year we’d been together.

Of course I’d asked Dr. Wagram, first. We had a long talk about marriage and its risks—particularly as they might apply to someone in my rather unusual position and circumstances. He hadn’t been too encouraging.

But I didn't need encouragement at the time. I needed Roxie. And for a while she took the place of any continuing therapy: It wasn't for many months that I went back to Dr. Wagram's clinic.

When I went, Roxie wasn't involved. In fact, she didn't even know. She had met Wagram, of course, once or twice during the early months of our marriage. I'd told her a bit about my past—or lack of one, rather—and of what Wagram had done for me. She hadn't pried or probed, merely accepted my story as she accepted me. And as I accepted her. For my own part, I never spoke to her of her earlier years. Even though she could remember them, I sensed that there was much unhappiness in that area, and I avoided it; just as I avoided my own earliest memories of lying under that car and screaming my mind away into the echoing night.

The trouble was, I couldn't 26 avoid such recurrent recall completely, not even in Roxie's arms. And so the time came when I went back to Wagram—and even to the womb.

I did a little reading about amnesia, and what I learned bothered me. "There must be something I'm afraid to face, something pretty awful," I told him. "Surely by this time I should have a gradual return of memory. Partial recollection ought to be triggered in, at least. Couldn't you try some more word-association techniques? And what about hypnoanalysis, narcohypnosis, or—"

Wagram waved my suggestions aside. He was never a violent man, always a quiet one, but his mere casualness carried weight.

"I've not found it necessary to discuss my other work here at the clinic, Steve," he told me. "The work which supports all of my research, all of my independent investigations, my staff. You met Dr. Bittner, of course, and Dr. Corelli. But did you know that I have four more internists on the payroll, and three fulltime nurses? Do you realize that at no time are there less than a dozen patients here, plus the others that I see regularly by appointment?

"Well, it's true. This is a big house, Steve. Big, and soundproofed. You've never been on the soundproofed side, have you? And I've no intention of taking you there now. You wouldn't want to meet the screaming people."

"Screaming people?"

Wagram shrugged. "Not a very flattering description, but a most accurate one. You see, that is the chief source of my livelihood here—the screaming people. The so-called incurables, the hopelessly psychotic. I've specialized in their care since I came here to the Coast after the war. I've deliberately taken on the cases which were given up as hopeless; the men and women whose only remaining alternatives are confinement in a public or a private institution for life. To be utterly blunt, they are given a choice including a private institution like this only if they or their families have a great deal of money. I need a great deal of money in order to advance my own therapeutic techniques, and I've had no compunctions about obtaining it from them. Because, in return, I've been able to stop the screaming."

"You've cured the incurables?"

Dr. Wagram shrugged again. "Remember what the doctors decided in your case? You were to die. But neurosurgery—"

"Yes," I admitted. "Neurosurgery. You saved me. But with physical techniques, here in your own operating-room. What can you do for the psychotics?"

"I can do what all the others do," Wagram answered. "I can give them what you're asking me to give you, now. Free association, depth-analysis, narcohypnotic sessions. But these people are beyond the scope of such treatment. Their only hope lies in drastic therapy—new techniques. I have evolved many. The womb, here, is one. Another is my sadomasochistic ampitheatre, where acts of violent aggression can be carried out upon the persons of lifelike, even partially animated mannikins. Sexual repressions can be similarly discharged—but I've no intention of giving a lecture.

“It is enough for me to say that in most instances, something even more extreme is required.

“Here, let me put it this way. I will simplify, even oversimplify. The source of aberration lies in the past. The past lies in the memory-banks. Eliminate the memory-banks and you eliminate the source of aberration. There is no trauma, no guilt, no compulsion, when you remove the past; when you excise it surgically, completely.

“The brain has often been compared to a sponge, and so it is. Squeeze this gray sponge, squeeze it dry of all unpleasant memories of the past, and it can be filled again.

“I’ve learned how to drain the memories, using my own surgical techniques—call it a combination of lobotomy, topectomy and advanced shock-therapy, exercised with sufficient skill to avoid permanent damage to the tissue. There will be papers published some day, when my findings are sufficiently comprehensive, and I assure you that your own case will be much more than a mere footnote. Meanwhile, the work goes on.”

I remember my reaction to Wagram’s words. “So that’s it,” I said. “You actually induce amnesia, deliberately and artificially erase all memory-patterns.”

“Not in your case,” he told me. “It wasn’t necessary, any more than it was necessary during the war when I first began to study and specialize in mnemonic disorders. But I have learned how to duplicate general as well as retrograde amnesia without risk of amentia or physical lesion. And that’s what I’ve done for my screaming people.

“In effect, I reduce them to the prenatal stage, and put them back in the womb. Then, very slowly, with the help of the staff working under my direction and with my prescribed techniques—I allow them to be born again. To become infants, little children; to learn once more how to walk, and feed themselves, and control bodily functions. I teach them to talk, to think, guide them through childhood and adolescence to full maturity. All this, of course, with a careful avoidance of traumatic incident; and naturally, in a comparatively short time. The autonomous nervous system responds quickly, relearning and readapting previous patterns of behavior. In some cases a year or two is necessary for complete reeducation; in others, I've seen miracles accomplished in eight or ten months."

"But don't you get zombies, robots?"

"Not when the process is accompanied by selective memory-restoration. When these people are ready for it, I begin the process of reorientation; that is to say, I feed them data based on their actual past life. With the help of family and friends I can quickly and effectively recreate the sense of continuity based on a factual awareness of previous existence. But without the stress and tensions dramatized by Freud in his concept of Id and Ego and Super-Ego. I give them back their past without fear and guilt, without the screams."

"You couldn't give me back mine."

"No, for I didn't induce the condition, merely corrected the concussion. But it doesn't matter, really, does it? Not as long as you're satisfied with the present."

I agreed with him then, and let the matter drop. And whenever I had problems—daily tension, nightly dreams—I went back to. Wagram and talked it out. When Roxie started taking lessons and private coaching, when she began getting a few-walk-on or one-line bits in TV shows, when I started branching out at the transcription agency, I kept Wagram informed. Somehow our relationship was never on a social plane, but Wagram remained an important part of my existence. He was, in a way, my only link with the mysterious past; and I suppose I kept going there, from time to time, with the hope that sooner or later he could guide me back and help me to fully establish my identity. Always, of course, when I brought the matter up directly, he repeated his dictum. "The past doesn't matter as long as you're satisfied with the present."

And always I'd been able to reconcile myself to this statement. Always, until now.

Until now, when I was writhing and screaming in the womb, remembering last night. After a time I was able to talk rationally about it and he made me go over it again and again and asked many pertinent questions.

"It's beginning to sound a bit like last week's episode," he told me, when at last I emerged from the red chamber and donned my clothes once again. "Remember, you came to me with the story of your dream? Something about firing a rifle on a target-range covered with snow? I told you then what must be happening. Your buried memories, the suppressed content, attempt to break through to the conscious level in symbolic form. All that is necessary is to realize this. Of course, if one likes, one can examine these symbols and arrive at an interpretation. For example, in this dream of yours last night, there's the skeleton, the smothering attempt, the—"

"But last night was different!" I exclaimed. "It wasn't a dream! Look, here's the black velvet case, it was in my jacket-pocket this morning."

"Couldn't it have been there last night as well?" Dr. Wagram leaned back in his chair and stared at me across the desk. "Are you sure it isn't your wife's property?"

"I don't recall seeing her with such a case," I told him. "Besides, you're forgetting the most important thing. That Voice."

"I haven't forgotten, but at the moment this doesn't concern me. What concerns me is what you have forgotten. Frankly, Steve, there must be another explanation as to how you came into possession of this object. There's something you don't want to remember. A limited retrograde amnesic condition has been established; a purposeful occlusion that—"

"Please, don't throw me off with labels. I've got to find out what this is all about. Can't you see it's driving me crazy?"

"I don't like that word, Steve."

"I don't like it, either. I don't like to go to bed and hear strange commands, and have nightmares that seem real. A little more of this and I'll end up like your screaming people."

Wagram leaned forward, pursing his lips. “Steve, I’ll be frank. You may not be too far wrong. I still feel I did an efficient job on you, surgically, but now I’m not so sure I did what was necessary psychically. Perhaps that’s the next step. Maybe I ought to erase the past entirely—erase the dreams, erase the tension, give you a whole fresh start.”

“You mean, to operate again? The way you do on these rich psychos of yours?”

“An operation, as you call it, would be unnecessary. I have certain shock-therapy techniques that would work quickly and easily.”

“To make me forget all this?” I stood up. “But then I’d forget Roxie—”

“You could learn again. The others do.”

“No.”

“I’m not asking for a decision now. Don’t try to make one. Think about it. Discuss it with your wife. Come to think of it, there’s no reason why she should be excluded; this is as much her problem now as it is yours. Perhaps you ought to have confided in her fully before—I might have been mistaken in urging you to keep the whole truth from her. Why don’t we arrange to get together, the three of us, some day next week, and go over the entire matter? I won’t try to deceive you, Steve; this dream of yours disturbs me because of its latent symbolic content.”

“It disturbs me because I still don’t think it was a dream.”

I stood up, brushing past his desk. My arm swung out, dislodging the folded copy of the afternoon newspaper. I stooped, picked it up. My eyes scanned the headlines, halted at a routine little paragraph at the bottom of the front page.

“What are you reading?” Wagram asked.

“Here,” I said, extending the paper and moving towards the door. “You read it. Maybe you’ll find it interesting.”

He took the paper from my hand, but I didn’t wait. I walked out of there, then started to run. Somehow I couldn’t face what would happen when he read what I had just read—the little paragraph about the death, last night, of James P. Hexler, retired industrialist and art-collector, who had been robbed of a fortune in uncut emeralds and smothered with a pillow in his own bed at 100 Azure Drive . . .

Police. I had to go to the police.

I knew that, but this isn't what made me run all the way down to Sunset Strip.

Sooner or later I'd go to them or they'd come to me. Right now, I must see Roxie first. I must see her and tell her what had happened. Roxie would know how to help.

Suddenly I realized the truth. Roxie was more important to me than Dr. Wagram. He had failed me, just now; he hadn't been able to comprehend the facts and so he hadn't been able to help. Roxie had never been given a chance to help. I owed her that. And I owed myself that, too.

Because I couldn't conceive of how or why I'd kill a perfect stranger. And I had to know, before the police stepped in.

So I hailed a cab in front of the Bank of America and gave him the apartment address. And I sat forward on the edge of the seat as we hit the Freeway, hit the afternoon tangle of traffic, veered off to the south, skidded down into the smog once more. That damned black velvet box was still in my jacket—the empty box. Where were the emeralds? Yes, and where was the Voice? For that matter, where was 100 Azure Drive? Surely nowhere near my apartment; but I had walked there last night. Walked there and stolen and killed.

I had no answers. Wagram had no answers. Maybe Roxie had some answers. Roxie could save me—

We pulled up before the apartment and I was out of the cab before it ground to a stop, pushing a bill into the driver's hand and brushing aside the change. Then I was running up the stairs, fumbling in my pocket for the key.

The key—where was it? I searched in my trousers, my jacket. Had I forgotten to take my key this morning? Well, no matter now. If Roxie was home, she'd let me in.

Roxie was home. The door was slightly ajar. I pushed it open, then halted, just in time to avoid stumbling over her overnight bag. It rested right in the doorway. And next to it, on the floor, was her purse.

"Roxie!" I murmured.

There was a faint sound from the bedroom beyond. I crossed the room in three strides.

She was on the bed and he was bending over her, his hands coiled in her long red hair. He had wound her hair about her throat and now he was pulling the ends tight, strangling her in a scarlet noose. Her face was mottled and purple.

His face I couldn't see, didn't wait to see. I jumped him from behind, and pulled him off. And then I tore the heavy bed-lamp from its socket and I smashed his skull, smashed and battered at the top of his head until he slumped to the floor and I could stare down into his unconscious face.

At first I didn't recognize it—hadn't expected to recognize it, of course. And then, beneath the pallor of that contorted countenance a familiar expression emerged. The man had aged, his hair was graying, there was no pan-makeup on the face. But I could still identify it.

"Bucky Dugan," I murmured.

Bucky Dugan. Yes, I remembered him now. He used to be on the network, M.C. of one of those quiz shows, until the scandals broke last year. Then he'd disappeared.

Things began to click into place now. Click-click-click, a tinkling sound, like the rattle of little silver bones jangling in the night-wind.

I stooped and searched his pockets, knowing what I'd find. My key, of course. And the rough objects the size of robins' eggs. They were grimy and encrusted, but as I turned them the light caught a hint of green flame.

Roxie lay back on the bed, breathing stertorously. But she still breathed and that was all I needed to know. I could call the police, now. They'd send an ambulance over, take care of her.

I made the call hastily, and hung up when they asked my name.

It would have been fine if I could have stayed with her until they arrived, but there wasn't time. And it wasn't safe; not with the unconscious man on the floor and that other man—the dead man—discovered out there in the big house on Azure Drive.

So I left, hastily, running down the street until I found another cab. Then I made the driver wait while I located my address-book and found the name I sought.

I gave him a number out on the Strip. Funny that I should be retracing my route again. But then it was all very funny, all very coincidental—until one stopped to think, stopped to realize that there was no coincidence involved at all.

This time we drove back through dusk, and the lights began to blaze up—the enchanted lights of an enchanted city. The wonderful lights of a world of magic, blazing forth from all of those wonderful, magic clip-joints and gay bars and mortuaries which make up the romantic spectacle of Hollywood by night. The vampires would be abroad, now. The bloodsuckers. And there was one bloodsucker in particular whom I was seeking.

We came to the building; one of those two-story layouts divided up into small cubicles where little men spend their days barking into their telephones, where the air is filled with stale cigar-smoke and the endless babble of darling, sweetheart, lover-boy, let's get together for lunch, let's make a deal, let's sign quick before they change their minds.

I didn't know if I'd find him there this late, or if I'd have to seek him out at the Vince Street Derby, or Barney's Beanery, or even Tail o' The Cock. But I was past caring. If I had to track him all over town I'd catch up with him eventually. And when I did, I knew what I was going to do.

As it turned out, he was in his office, and alone. So I merely had to walk in, close the door behind me, march over to the desk, reach down, and grab him by the throat. I squeezed hard, but not too hard. That was the only difficult part, really—remembering that I mustn't kill him. Not yet, anyway. And then I stared down into his crumpled face and said, "All right, Clermer, let's have the straight story. Who paid you to bring Roxie to me in the first place? Who paid you, and how much?"

He talked, then.

It was all bluff and bluster at first, and I had to slap him around a bit before he realized that I meant business. Once he made a break for his desk-drawer, but he never got his hand on the gun. In a way that was all to the good, because I took the gun myself. And after that, everything was much easier.

Only it wasn't easy to hear what he had to tell me. It wasn't easy to hear the truth, even though I expected and anticipated most of what he had to say.

Nothing was easy until I came to leave. Until I marched out of there and started walking north, into the canyon, with the gun cocked and ready in my pocket.

Nothing was easy until I came to Wagram's place.

The night was deeper here in the canyon. The private driveway held a private darkness, and there were no lights in the big house beyond.

The screaming people were asleep, and I had no desire to wake them. Let them slumber in their wombs, their tombs, their dooms. Let them rest, let them rot in the lair of the womb-faker, the tomb-breaker, the doom-maker. Dr. Carl Wagram. I read his name etched in bronze. I saw his name, etched in blood, emblazoned on a bleeding brain.

The door was locked. I didn't care. I knew other ways of entry. Case-entry. Window-entry. Breaking and entering.

There was no Voice to guide me here, but I didn't need one now. I knew how to walk in the dark, how to stalk in the dark, how to simulate the silence of a shadow flitting down the long hall on the soundproofed side of the building.

The soundproofed side—that's where the screaming people were. I could detect the dim light issuing from beneath the door on my left.

I wasn't afraid. I had Clermer's gun. I edged up to the door, turned the knob slowly. The door opened.

The wide room was bathed in twilight from recessed, indirect fixtures set in the walls. And it was lined with low cribs that looked like beds, yet bore a mocking resemblance to still another place of slumber. Eternal slumber. As I gazed down into the cold countenances of the occupants, the resemblance heightened.

These were not beds. They were coffins. And they contained corpses.

There were no screaming people here; the mouths were closed in thin-lipped lines, the faces were slack, the eyes glazed. I saw a dozen coffinlike cubicles; ten were occupied. I glanced at the faces through a tangle of apparatus overhead; then recognized the mundane instruments and installations used in ordinary Intravenous feeding.

They weren't really dead, but merely sleeping. Or in a coma, rather—for my presence did not awaken them. I gazed into their frozen features, then froze myself. Two faces I recognized, two I knew. "Bittner!" I murmured. "Corelli!"

Yes, Dr. Bittner. And Dr. Corelli. Wagram's own assistants. He'd said they helped him with the screaming people, and yet they were lying here with the others. And the others did not scream.

I was the one who wanted to scream, but I held the gun and I held my purpose and I held my course. I moved towards the door at the far side of the room. Wagram's private quarters must be beyond.

Yes, there was light flooding forth from under this door, too. I approached the panel slowly, cautiously. Gently, I eased the door ajar.

Now I could see into the room ahead. Wagram's private study, as I'd suspected. And I could see the back of his head over the top of the big armchair, see the front of his head as he swivelled and turned, see the look in his eyes as he recognized me, see the slackness of his mouth as he goggled at the gun in my hand.

"That's right," I said, softly. "Don't try to get up. In fact, I wouldn't advise you to attempt to move at all."

"Steve—"

"I know it's a surprise. You were expecting Bucky Dugan, weren't you?"

"I—"

"Let me do the talking. There are a few things I'd like to get straight before I call the police." He started to say something, but I waved him into silence. The gun was much better than a magic wand; I could perform some really amazing transformations with that gun. And he knew it, because he slumped back in his chair and listened.

"I've never cared for the usual denouement," I said, softly. "You know the bit—where the murderer holds a gun on the detective and blurts out a complete explanation of his crimes, just before the cops break in and rescue his intended victims. Fortunately, the situation is reversed now. So let me tell it my way. All I want from you is confirmation or correction."

"Steve, you're not well, you need help—"

"I've had your kind of help," I told him. "All I ever want of it And at the time, I was grateful. Grateful that you came along, opportunely, to rescue me and save my life. Now I wonder if I wouldn't have been better off if I'd died out there on the desert. At least I wouldn't have served as your guinea-pig.

"Because that's what I was, wasn't I? You experimented on me, using my genuine amnesia as a base on which to superimpose an artificial personality-pattern. I was the first, wasn't I?"

I waited, waving the gun, until he nodded reluctantly.

"That's what I thought. Once you saw how easily it was possible to control an amnesic, you applied similar techniques with your so-called screaming people. The hopeless cases, whom only wealth saved from permanent public institutionalization; people whose families wanted to avoid publicity and who were willing to consent to anything which might seemingly restore the sanity of their loved ones.

"You had sent me back into the world, and you were able to send them back, when and if you so desired. My memory was lost in the accident; their memories you erased with shock-treatments. Is that the story?"

"Yes." Wagram sighed the word.

I raised the gun. "That's the story," I said, "but not the truth. I'm no neurologist, but I do know that the actual source of memory-patterns has never been definitely located in the human brain. You can't deliberately 'erase' memory, as you claim, without irreparable damage to actual cellular tissue and structure. Many external physical agents can bring about temporary amnesia, partial or complete—but unless there's widespread permanent deterioration, memory returns. You can't do what you claim to have done, physiologically. So your erasure must have been accomplished 'psychologically, instead. In my case, and in the case of all the poor victims of your 'advanced' therapy, you seized upon a temporary lapse in orientation and recall and made it permanent. And there's just one way in which you or anyone else could do this—through suggestion, through hypnosis. And you installed those permanent memory-blocs yourself; did so deliberately."

"All right," Wagram said. "I'll admit that. But there was a reason, I've already explained it to you. By suppressing the memories, I could suppress the sources of psychosis and prevent any recurrence of aberration. That was the theory, the basis of my techniques—"

"Perhaps it was, originally. But then you found that your hypnotherapy, administered to stunned and literally infantile personalities, gave you complete and utter control over your patients. You could actually order their present and future existences as you willed. And the temptation was too great, wasn’t it? You began to think about ways of using that power. Of what it would be like to send supposedly cured patients back into the world who were actually under your eternal command. You could install a series of hypnotic controls, insure just the reactions you desired. Oh, it wasn’t quite that simple, I realize that; it wasn’t just a matter of sitting at some sort of psychic switchboard and pressing buttons at will, or being able to hold all the tangled strings and making the puppets dance. You needed other help, and you got it.”

“Clermer told you this?” Wagram murmured.

“He told me enough so that I can guess the rest. I know about last night, for example. You were planning to take a big step forward, weren’t you? If I’d succeeded as you intended, then you’d set up other similar tasks for the rest of your screaming people. You thought you’d found a way of committing the so-called perfect crime.

“Somehow you learned of Hexler’s emeralds. Perhaps through some relative who might have been a patient of yours. You made it your business to gain access to his home, to ‘case the joint’ and familiarize yourself with the physical layout and with his personal habits. Then you sent me there, to kill him and to steal the stones. But something went wrong.

“It took you a while to figure out what had happened. Today, when I showed up here at noon, you realized what must have occurred. So while you kept me occupied and we talked, you got the key to my apartment. While I was in that womb of yours, you gave the key to Bucky Dugan. He was one of your patients, one of your screaming people—had been, ever since he cracked up after the quiz-show mess. You went into that charming little morgue of yours, where you keep your wonderful cures in hypnotic trance, and you fed Bucky Dugan full of subliminal suggestion, then sent him out to kill. And again, something went wrong, because I showed up in time to forestall him. She isn’t dead, Wagram.”

He stood up then. His eyes never left the muzzle of the gun, but he stood up anyway. "The police—she'll talk—"

"It doesn't matter. I'm going to talk, too."

Wagram shook his head. "No. You're wrong. You won't talk." He took a step forward. "You won't talk, and you won't shoot me, either. Because you can't, you know." My finger tightened on the trigger. "I wouldn't risk it if I were you," I muttered.

"There's no risk involved." He was just a grotesque, bald-headed little fat man and there was nothing imposing, nothing menacing, about his appearance.

But all at once I wasn't seeing him any more. I was hearing him. I was listening to his voice, as it changed—as it became the Voice.

"Yes. You were right, Steve. I do use hypnotic controls. I have used them to suppress your latent memories. I have used them to install commands. And you obeyed. Remember last night, Steve? You obeyed me then. Just as you obey me now. Because you must obey. You know that, don't you? You must always obey. Unless you listen to me, you'll go back. Back to the pain, forever. Do you understand? Back to the pain, forever. I can do that, you know. I can send you there forever—send you to the time when you were crushed under the car, screaming your life away. You don't want to Scream again, do you, Steve? You don't want to scream always and always, the way you feel like screaming now . . . it's more than anyone can bear, isn't it, the agony inside your skull . . . you're lying under the car, you can't move, you can't possibly move or get away from the pain . . . it's crushing you, Steve, you've got to make it stop . . ."

And it was crushing me, and I couldn't see Wagram any more. I couldn't see the room, because it was dark here on the desert and I was trapped, trapped under two tons of steel, and the pain was all around me and I wanted to scream, had to scream.

"Don't," said the Voice. "There's another way. The only way. Just hold out your hand. There, hold it out. Give me the gun, Steve. You don't need the gun, do you? That's right . . . just give me the gun. It's the gun that is hurting you. Once you get rid of it you won't feel the pain. There will be no more pain. Just darkness . . . darkness and peace. You will rest then. Rest and forget. Forget that any of this ever happened. It was just a bad dream. A bad dream. Give me the gun—"

And I was out there in the darkness on the desert, but a million miles away was the end of my hand, and I was holding it out to him and he was taking the gun and I could feel the pain flowing down my arm (how slowly the pain flows when it has a million miles to go) and into the gun that he was taking and in a moment I would be free and the pain would be gone and the Voice would be gone and there would be nothing but the rapture of release.

The Voice told me that, I believed the Voice, I obeyed the Voice, and then—the Voice stopped.

The Voice stopped, and I opened my eyes.

I was back in Wagram's study and I was staring at him wondering what had happened to the Voice.

Wagram stood there, the gun dangling between his fingers. He let it fall and raised his hand to his throat, fumbling at the shiny object which quivered there in the space between his wide collar and his pudgy chin.

The light glittered on the length of the vibrating knife-blade. It glittered on the redness which gathered and gushed forth from the spot where the tip had penetrated his veined neck.

He took a half-step forward and opened his mouth, but no Voice came forth—only a thin trickle of pinkish foam. He stared at the blade of the scalpel lodged in his throat, then fell and lay silent. Silent and forever still.

I turned. Roxie stood in the doorway.

"Just in time," she whispered. "I must have come to right after you left. I knew you'd head straight for here, so I followed, before the police arrived. I found the scalpel out there, in the other room, where those creatures are sleeping. And I heard you and Wagram talking, heard what he told you there at the last. Oh, Steve, I'm so glad I got here before he—"

She started forward but I ignored her. I stooped and picked up the gun. "I'm not glad," I said, softly. "I'm sorry. Very sorry. You should have kept running, Roxie. Even without the emeralds, you should have kept running while you had the chance."

"Steve—"

"No, don't come any closer." I had the gun now, held it steadily. "You see, there's just one thing wrong with your reasoning. I didn't head straight for here after I left the apartment. I made a stop first, out on the Strip. I saw your friend Clermer."

Drained white, the pallor of her face was indescribably lovely when framed by that long red hair.

"Or should I say Wagram's friend Clermer?" I continued. "He must have been Wagram's friend, first. Because it was Wagram who came to him, originally, and asked him to introduce you to me."

"No, that's not true! I don't know what Clermer told you, but he lied!"

I shook my head. "I'm willing to believe him," I answered. "Because it all fits."

My voice softened. "I think I understand, Roxie. I can see how it was. You were just one of those good-looking women who never quite managed to make the grade. The breaks hadn't come your way, and you were getting just a little panicky about the future. Maybe you'd have to choose between marrying some bartender or taking the B-girl route. Then Wagram came along with his proposition. Clermer was to introduce you to me, you'd make your play, we'd get married. That would give Wagram what he needed to continue his experiments—a go-between, a liaison agent, someone who could help him to keep control. In return, he'd cut you in on his future profits. Because he told you his plans, didn't he, Roxie? He told you that he intended to use me as a sort of zombie, in robbery and murder. And you agreed."

“But it didn’t work out that way,” Roxie murmured. “I loved you, Steve.”

“Yes. You loved me, and you loved living in a crummy little apartment and taking-cheap bit parts when you could get them. But all the while you loved money more. And Wagram kept building me up, waiting for the right proposition to come along. When he planned this Hexler affair he thought he had it in the bag. Only that’s when you got smart.”

Roxie closed her eyes. “No, Steve, no. Clermer didn’t tell you this.”

“Of course, he didn’t, not this part. I had to figure it out for myself. But it’s perfectly obvious, isn’t it? There were a couple of things even Wagram didn’t know about your past. That you worked a season or two with a carney, for example. Long enough to learn how to throw knives—as Wagram found out, just now. More important, my guess is that you probably got acquainted with some mentalist; well enough acquainted so that you understood the scope of Wagram’s plans for me and realized they might work.

“It was a simple enough idea. Wagram planted the entire pattern of post-hypnotic suggestion with me when I visited him last week and arranged for you to give me a prearranged signal while I slept which would set the whole series of commands in motion as a sort of dream in which a Voice directed me.

“But even Wagram wasn’t fool enough to believe that a dazed somnambulist could get away with a detailed crime. You had to get there first, didn’t you? Last night, when you were sure I was asleep, you went to Hexler’s. That’s why the window was already open, that’s why the lock on the window-seat had already been forced, that’s why the emeralds were already stolen. And that’s why Hexler was already dead when I arrived. You strangled him with his pillow. I merely repeated the gesture with a corpse.”

“That’s insane—”

“But it just might have worked, mightn’t it? You came back, then gave the prearranged signal which activated Wagram’s pattern of suggestion over me. So that I’d retrace your footsteps, leave telltale fingerprints, retain a memory which would later convince me that I’d been guilty of the crime. The rest of it I can figure out, too. Wagram expected me to come running to him today, with the story. And he’d be very sympathetic, but finally he’d agree to let me go to the police. That’s when you’d step in to testify about my inexplicable absence. Everything would come out then; everything except the present whereabouts of the emeralds—which you were already to have concealed, and turn over to Wagram once I was safely incarcerated and the heat was off. It was a doubly-perfect crime, wasn’t it, Roxie?

“Only you wanted to make it triply-perfect. By crossing up Wagram, taking the emeralds yourself, and making a run for it. Mexico, I suppose.

“But when I came to Wagram, something I said or did seemed to have aroused his suspicions. Maybe you were supposed to have phoned him, and didn’t. Anyway, he figured things out. And he stole my key, gave it to Dugan, sent Dugan to kill you. It was all right if I discovered your body—that would merely implicate me further, when Wagram informed the police he had Hexler’s killer. Maybe I was to be accused of your death, too. In any event, Wagram would get rid of me, of you, and of any suspicion of complicity.

“Except, of course, that I arrived before Dugan finished the job. And went to Clermer. And came here.” I shook my head. “Why didn’t you keep on running, Roxie? Why did you come back?”

She stared into my eyes. “To save your life, Steve. Wagram had the gun. In another minute he’d have killed you.”

“I know.”

“Maybe it’s true, Steve, maybe everything you said is true. And maybe there were other things to come. What would you say if I told you that Carl Wagram confided in me? What if I told you that he was in love with me himself, that he offered me a full share in his future? If this experimental venture succeeded, he wasn't going to stop there. He had plans for his patients, Steve, big plans. Don't forget, some of them were wealthy and important, and all of them had influential connections. He could send them back to their homes, control them through his post-hypnotic suggestions and pseudomemories and plant observers at their sides, too. He'd recruit his own staff of nurses and attendants for the job.

"And it wasn't murder and robbery he had in mind—there were bigger things. Some of these people of his had access to estates, trust-funds, controlling interests in banks, insurance companies. There'd be ways of making millions, in the end, without risk or bloodshed involved.

"I could have shared that, Steve. But instead, when I came here tonight and picked up that scalpel, I killed him. And saved you."

"Because you knew it was too late, then. If he killed me there'd be an investigation and both he and you would eventually be implicated. So you got rid of him instead, hoping that I'd take pity on you and let you save your own neck."

"I—"

"Don't lie to me, Roxie. Not now."

She couldn't meet my gaze any more. And the flush rose to cover the pallor.

"All right, Steve. It's true. I thought maybe you'd let me go."

I sighed and put the gun in my pocket.

"You're a smart girl, Roxie."

"Ohh—then you mean—?"

I turned away and faced the desk, staring down at the phone. "I'll give you ten minutes. Just ten minutes. Then I'll have to make the call."

She didn't say anything and I didn't look at her, but I knew that she'd opened the door and backed out of the room, retracing her steps, running down between the coffin-like rows where the screaming people slept like vampires in their native earth.

And I stood there in the soundproofed silence of the room and my heart beat a requiem and the watch on my wrist brought me ten minutes closer to my own death.

Then I called the police.

It didn’t take them long to come—perhaps five minutes more, so that it was just fifteen minutes in all since Roxie had departed.

Only she hadn’t departed, and fifteen minutes was quite long enough.

I should have thought about that a little more.

I should have thought about what might have happened when Dr. Carl Wagram died; Dr. Carl Wagram, whose personal control over the psychotic psyches of his patients plunged them into trance, so that they slept in the room beyond. I should have wondered if, perhaps, that control might end when Wagram’s own life ended.

And I should have remembered that the rooms were completely and utterly soundproof . . .

But the police came, and they chose to arrive by the entrance on this side of the house, and by the time I told a portion of my story and opened the door through which Roxie had made her escape, it was too late.

I could only stare into the room beyond and listen to the screaming people—the screaming people who had awakened when Wagram died, awakened in all their ravening madness, and waited there when Roxie had retreated into their midst.

I could only stare at what was still in their midst, there on the floor—what had once been Roxie and was now only a tom and tattered mass over which the screaming people fought and clawed and bit and tore.

And the sound was deafening, so that the captain of detectives had to shout at me as I pushed him away and entered the room.

“Don’t, man!” he cried. “Where do you think you’re going? What’s the matter with you?”

There was only one answer left to me now, of course, and I gave it to him.

I opened my mouth.

And began to scream—

THE END

The Hungry Eye

Wouldn't you think a beat joint was the last place to find an ancient alien horror? But through the smoke, the gin and jazz, terror heralded the unutterable shining of . . .

THERE'S an old Chicago saying which covers it—if you stand on the corner of State and Madison Street long enough, you'll see everyone you know in the world pass by. A seeming exaggeration, but that's what they say.

I'd been in Chicago for quite a while now, but I'd never put the matter to a test, and I had no intention of trying it today. As far as that goes, I wasn't even standing on the corner; I was halfway down the block, making for the subway entrance, but that's when I saw him. Just a flash of the profile, with the broken nose unmistakably outlined against a store-window—yet even after five years it was enough for instantaneous recognition. One doesn't forget the face of an only brother, though heaven knows I'd tried during the years apart.

For a moment I was tempted to go on without speaking. But there was something about the way he hurried along, head bent, which triggered a response. Before I knew it, the words were out of my mouth.

"George," I called. "George, it's me."

I could swear to the look of panic on his face, and it wasn't that he was horrified by my grammar, either. He turned, stared, recognized me, and put his hand to his mouth. And then he ran. He ran down State Street like a man possessed.

Of course that isn't the way I described his actions to myself at the time. Nobody uses phrases like "a man possessed" any more. "Possessed" by what? There are no demons in the Twentieth Century, we all realize that. There are no demons, no devils, no evil spirits. We live in an enlightened age, in a sane, matter-of-fact world of gas chambers, human incineration plants, wholesale massacres, scientific torture-devices and hydrogen bombs. But everything has a perfectly logical explanation, and no man's cruelty or inhumanity to his fellows is based on demoniac possession. There is no place in this modern world for ogres or bogey-men. We are well aware that we deal with nothing more alarming than sadists, psychopaths, paranoiacs, schizophrenics, manic-depressives, necrophiles, zooerasts, pyromaniacs and other deviates and border-line neurotics whose combined total is probably less than one-third of the entire population.

So my brother George, whatever his problem, was obviously not "possessed." He was just, in popular parlance, a weirdo. And if he ran off that way it was because he was merely sick, sick, sick.

"Sick, sick, sick." For a moment I thought of following him, but the press of the crowd was too great. Besides, why should I bother? I hadn't seen the man for over five years, and when he'd left then I'd been glad to be rid of him. It was obvious, whatever his present problem might be, that he didn't want to see me now. I was surprised to run across him in Chicago—we'd parted in Boston. Chances were, in a city area of four million, that I wouldn't encounter him again; if he wanted to seek me out, he could do so easily enough. He'd find my name in the papers, in the little ads on the amusement page. Let him come down to the Club and watch my act.

No sense in worrying about him and his troubles, not right now. Better to think about that "sick, sick, sick" business. Maybe I ought to work up some more bits for the act.

I was doing a stand-up routine at the Club every night. The Club was on North Clark, just a sucker-trap like hundreds of other joints all over the country, and my routine was like hundreds of other acts. The Mort Sahl scene, dig? Every week you read The Reporter magazine and then you make with the memorized ad-libs about the squares and all like that there. You've got Nixon jokes and Sputnik jokes and General Motors jokes and progressive jazz jokes and Zsa Zsa Gabor jokes and G.I. jokes and Eisenhower golf jokes and Togetherness jokes and sports-car jokes and addict jokes and television jokes and if the crowd is hip you even have a few Zen jokes. Just the old off-Beatnik routine, but that's what they're going for this season. And most of all, of course, you have sick jokes. The time is long gone when Will Rogers could get up and milk laughs by talking about visiting Congress. Today every comic talks about visiting his psychiatrist.

Actually, I'd never visited a headshrinker, but maybe should have. Because I hated this routine of mine. And I hated the audience—the oh-so-sophisticated, oh-so-selfconscious, self-assured, nervous, nonconformist in-group of enlightened, superior free souls enchained in the irresponsible necessity of satisfying their own selfish desires. Said desires being to drink, dope and debauch while avoiding any consequences of their actions; in a word, the same desires which might conceivably be found in a gang of truck-drivers. The only difference being in favor of the truck-drivers; they at least gratified them without rationalizations. They didn't expect anyone to write books proclaiming that their antisocial activities were really the spiritual expression of an inner sensitivity searching for the truth. If a truck-driver got drunk and picked up a girl and sponged off her and then deserted her on the road, that was that. But a Beatnik, or the thousands upon thousands of pseudo-Beatniks who hid behind beards these days, insisted that he was On the Road. And he liked to do his drinking and make his pickups and get his kicks, man, in crummy joints featuring comics such as myself—who flattered his stunted ego by making funnies about squares.

Oh, I hated it, and no mistake. But it was a living. I got two bills a week out of it, and besides now I had Lucy.

We'd been married a little over four months now, and lived in an apartment not far from the Club. Yes, it was an apartment, an old-fashioned apartment with Kroehler furniture and there were Audobon print reproductions on the walls. It wasn't a "pad" where you sat on the floor and played bongos, ducking your head whenever you stood up so that you wouldn't be brained by the sharp edges of one of those damned mobiles.

Lucy was no Beatnik type, and that's why I loved her. She had been taking postgrad work at U. of C. when I met her, and she had a job in a law office in the Loop now; when she came home she cooked dinner in an apron instead of hopping around opening a can of beans while wearing a dirty leotard.

Right now I was anxious to get home to her. Riding the subway I gradually forgot about brother George. He was one of them, one of the Beatniks. Of course, he'd been born a few years too early to call himself a member of the Beat Generation. He wasn't lucky enough to be around when the self-justification labels were passed out In his time, people like George were identified, quite simply, as selfish and untrustworthy. If they lied and stole and cheated and ran up bad debts and goofed off on jobs and beat it out of town when some girl's parents raised a stink, they acquired bad reputations. And if you loved them, you tried to help them. You did your best to pull them out of jams and you did your best to talk a little sense into them, and then when nothing seemed to work, you heaved a sigh of mingled regret and relief when they finally took off for good.

I had. And I heaved another sigh now and turned my thoughts to Lucy. She'd be home now, waiting for me.

And she was. She came into my arms, there at the door, and I forgot everything; the stupid moralizing and self-righteousness and the worries beneath them. There was only this warmth and this richness and this response. Until she stepped back and handed me the newspaper.

"Here, darling," she said. "Read this."

This was a single-column story on the front page, and my eyes moved over it hastily. It was Lucy's habit to call my attention to items in the paper which might inspire a gag or two for my act, but I wasn't getting any particular sparks from this one.

A murder had been committed this morning in the basement of the old Harvey residence, out on the South Side. The late Chandler Harvey was a well-to-do collector of oriental art who had willed his acquisitions to the Chicago Art Institute. Upon being notified of the settlement of the estate, the Institute had dispatched two guards to catalogue and pack the collection under the supervision of orientologist Wilmer Shotwell. While waiting for Shotwell's arrival, the two men had entered the basement of the Harvey home where the collection was assembled. It was here, at approximately 12:15 P.M. that Shotwell discovered the body of one of them, Raymond Brice, 41, of 2319 Sunview Avenue. He had apparently been killed by a blow on the head from a heavy stone figurine. Police were seeking the other guard, George Larson, 33, of—

My brother, George.

Lucy stared at me. "Then I was right," she murmured.

"Yes."

"Of course, that's not such an unusual name. It could be another George Larson."

I sighed. "It could be. But it isn't."

"What makes you so certain?"

"Because I saw him, less than an hour ago. He was downtown, on State Street, and when I recognized him and called out, he ran."

"Oh, Dave, what are you going to do?"

I shrugged. “What can I do? I don’t know where he is now—certainly not at that fleabag hotel address listed in the paper. Maybe he got out of town. I hope so.”

“In spite of all he did to you?” I’d told Lucy about George, of course.

“Yes. That’s gone and forgotten. Besides, I’m not sure he’s guilty.”

“But the paper says—”

“I know what the paper says, and what the police say. They find a body, George is gone, and they jump to conclusions. But George is my brother. I know him pretty well. He’s a bum and a moocher, and I wouldn’t trust him with a wallet or a woman. But I don’t buy him as a murderer—he hasn’t got it in him to kill. There’s no violence in George.”

“How do you know?” Lucy put her hands on my shoulders. “How do you know what it takes to make a killer?”

“I don’t really. It’s just that I can’t imagine George pulling a stunt like that.”

“You’re really fond of him, aren’t you, in spite of everything?”

I crumpled the newspaper. “Damn it, if he’d only stopped when I called him, let me help him!”

“You’re upset,” Lucy said. “Maybe you ought to call the Club, tell them you can’t appear tonight.”

I shook my head. “What good would that do? Until we get more facts, we might as well forget about it. We aren’t listed in the phone-book yet so there’s no chance of George seeking us out here. And I doubt if the police or anyone else knows that he’s my brother. So you go ahead to your evening class, and I’ll go to the Club. To coin an expression, the show must go on.”

And it went on, at the Club, around ten. I was standing there holding the floor-mike when I saw George come in. He was still wearing the same suit he'd worn downtown during the afternoon, but his collar was open and his tie was gone. His hair hung over his forehead. He was drunk.

No, it wasn't the open collar and fallen hair bit that made me so certain. It was the way he slumped down at a deuce-table in the far corner and started talking to this pink panda.

That's right; he carried a pink panda, the kind you win at an amusement park. The kind you win, perhaps, but not I. I wouldn't be caught dead at an amusement park. And maybe that had been George's idea. He didn't want to be caught, dead or alive, and what better way to disappear than in the midst of a crowd? But he was still nervous, and he started to drink, and when he got enough liquor under his belt he realized he needed help. So he remembered seeing my name in the Club ads and he came here, to me.

And I came to him, as soon as I'd cut the show. Came to the corner where he sat mumbling to this damned pink panda. An idiotic thing to do—or was it? He looked like just another drunk and perhaps it was a clever move, using a pink panda for protective coloration. One thing I had to give George; drunk or sober, he was always clever, I could vouch for that.

Only he didn't look clever now. He looked scared.

"Davie-boy! It's good to see you."

I sat down. "You didn't think so this afternoon, on State Street."

"I was in a hurry."

"I know. I read the papers."

"But you don't understand—"

"Damned right I don't."

"I've got to talk to you, alone. Dave, there's something I've got to tell you, I'm going to need your help. I've never been in a spot like this before."

"You're talking about the guard?"

He glanced around, then bent forward. "No, it isn't that. The guard's not important. There's something else. Something worse. Something—"

"Hold it," I said. "We can't talk here, and I won't be able to leave now. I cut the last show at twelve; after that the band takes over for the late crowd. Stick around until then and we'll go somewhere together."

"But I can't wait that long." He grabbed my arm. "Dave, I mustn't be alone. Don't you see? Unless I talk to somebody pretty soon I'll flip—"

"Talk to your friend here," I said, poking my finger at the pink panda. "Have another drink. But wait here. I'll get back as soon as possible."

His eyes went blank, as blank as the brown buttons in the panda's head. And he stared at the ridiculous doll, stared at it long after I left the table. He hadn't lied; he was ready to flip. To snap his cap, climb the walls, or whatever phrase you choose to disguise the grim reality. There are so many charming, picturesque little phrases dealing with that subject today—because there are so many charming, picturesque cases of acute psychosis.

But then I was up in front of the mike again, talking about psychosis myself, talking about Flipville and stopping in at your friendly neighborhood analyst, three couches—no waiting. And the crowd loved it. They loved it because they could all pretend they were laughing at the other fellow; they were all right. Sure they were all right—the chronic lushes, the double-gaited ones and the lizzies and the barroom brawlers and the girls on tea and the boys on horse. They were intellectuals, they were iconoclasts, they were artists. In order to be truly creative, in order to dig Life the most, you had to get your kicks.

Like Sarah, for example.

I saw her out of the corner of my eye, coming in from the bar. Big Sarah, in the toreador pants and the sweatshirt; both garments bulging in all the right places. That was the story of Sarah's life—she was always bulging in the right places. She wore dangling copper earrings to match the color of her hair, and I had no doubt but that she'd made them herself. Because Sarah was an artist and she enjoyed making things. Including ugly scenes and handsome men. Sometimes, when she was a little high, even the men could be ugly. I knew quite a bit about Sarah, because she was one of the regulars at the Club. She was one of those who laughed the loudest at all the sick jokes, but I happened to know she'd spent some time on the psychiatrist's couch herself—and quit only when she couldn't persuade him to join her there.

But Sarah was an artist and she had an artist's eye. Right now it might be a trifle bloodshot, but it seemed to have spotted that pink panda. Because as I watched, she wandered over to my brother George and started talking. By the time I'd finished the routine I was on, she'd sat down next to him. During the course of my next bit the waitress came over with drinks. Sarah was giving him the big treatment now.

Well, maybe it was all for the best. At least she'd keep George company until I could join him again. She knew how to laugh it up, and that was just what he needed now to last out the evening. But I wished both of them were a bit more sober. The waitress was already back at the table with more drinks—doubles, this time.

I wanted to trim my act, but the crowd was with me and off to one side I could see Paul, the booker. He was grinning and I grinned back. I needed Paul. He was the guy who could pull me out of this trap—get me a better spot, maybe even downtown. So this was no time to beg off. I had to keep going.

But Sarah and George kept going, too. I watched the waitress approach again. They were toasting the panda, now. Sarah held it on her lap. She said something to George and laughed.

Then the crowd was laughing, and I went into my finale. The TV commercial business, and the horror movie jazz. That's the big sophisticated boffola, you know—kidding the horror movies. Only to make it really sharp, you throw in a few references to The Lonely Crowd and Lolita.

I bowed off.

I bowed off and started for George's table—or what had been George's table. But George was gone now. He, and Sarah and the pink panda had vanished. It didn't take a correspondence-course in detective work to figure out where they must be. Sarah had a studio down the street. Just the place for a ménage à trois. Maybe she was queer for pandas.

If I could have left then, I'd have made it my business to find out. But I couldn't leave; there was another show to do in just forty minutes. The last show. After that I could go. George would still be there, if Sarah had her way. And she generally did. George was in no shape to offer much resistance.

Perhaps it was for the best; at least he'd be out of public scrutiny. But I wasn't, not until the final show was over. And in order to prepare for it, I needed a drink.

I stepped over to the bar, looking around for Paul. The booker was standing down at the end, near the door, talking to a tall, gray-haired man who had just come in. I nodded at him and he nodded back. Then he turned to his companion and said something. I thought he'd break away, and was surprised to see that the gray-haired man moved in my direction instead. He paused behind me.

"Mr. Larson—"

"Yes?"

"I am Dr. Shotwell."

Shotwell. Where had I heard that name before? Then I remembered—the newspaper story. Wilmer Shotwell, the orientologist in charge of the Harvey collection. My brother and the other guard had been waiting for him when the murder occurred. So he must know George. And he'd found me. Did he realize George had been here? Had Paul noticed me talking to him?

I'd have to gamble on that. In a case like this, attack is usually the best defense. So I turned to Shotwell and nodded.

"Yes, I read your name in the news story tonight. Have you found my brother yet?"

"I was hoping you'd give me an answer to the same question, Mr. Larson."

"My brother and I have been out of touch with one another for the past five years. It wasn't until today that I knew he was in Chicago." I paused, but not long enough for him to ask any questions. Instead, I shot one at him. "How did you know he was my brother?"

"I did some checking. It seems he gave your name as a reference when he applied for the position of temporary guard at the Institute several months ago."

If Shotwell had checked, that meant the police would check too. Maybe it was just as well that George had gone off with Sarah. I'd avoid a lot of explanations this way.

"He never informed me about this," I said. "I'm afraid I can't help you."

"That isn't the reason I'm here," Dr. Shotwell answered. "I wanted to warn you."

"About George? He isn't dangerous. In fact, no matter what the newspapers say, I can't believe he killed that man."

"I can. And it's quite likely that he will kill again."

"But why? Just because he may have had a fight with his fellow-guard and struck him in a moment of rage—"

Dr. Shotwell shook his head. "That's what the police believe. I know they are wrong, but I made no effort to correct them. It's better that they aren't aware of the facts."

"Which are—?"

"Mr. Larson, I knew the late Chandler Harvey very well. He was an insatiable collector of objets d' art and curiosa. He bought at auctions, he bought from dealers, he purchased through agents, he spent a fortune acquiring rarities. As an orientologist I helped catalogue only a small part of his treasure-trove; for that's what it was, what it came to represent in his own mind. Collecting can become a form of monomania, you know, particularly in the case of a wealthy man who reaches the point where he doesn't even know what he has obtained any more. This was certainly true in Harvey's situation. He literally did not know the extent of his own possessions. Pottery, sculptures, bas-reliefs, jewels from all over the world and out of it."

"Out of it?"

Shotwell leaned forward. "Do you know anything about meteorites?"

"A little."

"Well, I needn't lecture. Let's just say that I have reason to believe that there are many strange, as yet unclassified phenomena concerning these particles from outer space. There are australites, for example, which seem to fall recurrently in certain areas of the Earth's surface, almost as though they were sent. Or if they were seeking—"

"Seeking? You talk as if they were alive."

"Is it so impossible to believe that there are other life forms besides the animal and the vegetable in the universe? Is mineral life so alien a concept? What is the difference between life and existence? What laws govern its patterns? How can we recognize life when we see it? There are living creatures whose skeletons grow outside their bodies, there is the mystery of reincarnation and metamorphosis leading from larva to butterfly. What causes the regeneration of a fingernail, how do you explain the growth of a single hair on your own body, what is the common denominator of a blade of grass and a Giant Redwood?" Shotwell paused and smiled self-consciously. "But I said I wouldn't deliver a lecture, didn't I? And I won't. All I must tell you is that I think amongst Chandler Harvey's collection of rarities was an unusual meteorite—an ancient, jewellike object which, in a certain sense, is alive. And I believe your brother must have found it today."

"Are you trying to tell me he mistook it for a jewel, was caught trying to steal it by the other guard, and killed him?"

"Perhaps."

"Then why come to me? Why not inform the police?"

"Because they wouldn't believe me. And they wouldn't take the proper precautions with the meteorite if they recovered it."

"Precautions?"

Shotwell sighed. “Have you heard about precious stones which seemed to carry a curse, to bring death and violence to their owners or whoever came in prolonged contact with them? Have you any knowledge of temple idols before whose jewelled eyes a bloody sacrifice is made? Have you ever wondered why certain infamous mass-murderers carried so-called ‘lucky stones’ upon their persons?”

I stared at him. “You mean to say you believe this meteorite possesses some intelligence which influences men to kill? But why?”

“Some living entities subsist on air, some on sunlight, some on flesh. Some require water—and some need blood.” Shotwell grimaced. “I don’t know very much, really. I have been able to trace this particular fragment back a mere fifty years. At that time it appeared in St. Petersburg, as the property of one Gregorovitch, the Little Gray Brother. History knows him as Rasputin. The meteorite had already been artificially faceted and polished then, but it may not have been when he acquired it, during his years of exile in Siberia. There have been great recurrent meteor showers in that area, you know. It is said that Rasputin used various jewels as hypnotic agents—”

I stood up. “Really, Dr. Shotwell, I don’t see what you have to gain by all this.”

“It’s not a question of gain. I have only one purpose in seeing you. If your brother seeks you out, try and secure that meteorite. Don’t turn it over to the authorities; notify me immediately. Here is my card.”

Somebody tapped me on the shoulder. It was Lew Kirby, the leader of the combo at the Club. “Two minutes ‘til showtime, Pops,” he said. I nodded at him.

“Got to run along now,” I told Shotwell. “You heard the man.”

“Yes, but if anything happens—”

“Okay. I’ll get in touch with you.” And I moved away. The old brushoff. That’s the only way to handle the weirdos, and Shotwell was a weirdo from way back. I only wished he’d stayed there. Him and his living meteorites and out-of-this-world life forms.

The trouble was, he hadn't stayed there, in his own little private world of fantasy. And I couldn't brush off what he'd told me. Even though he went right out, and I went right on to do the act, the whole crazy business kept nagging at me.

What was he really trying to say? That strange entities may exist in outer space and occasionally succeed in reaching Earth—that they need blood for nourishment and influence men to provide it—that such an entity became a part of the Harvey collection—that my brother stumbled across it today and killed a guard and stole it.

None of this made any sense. Besides, George hadn't really shed any blood; he'd conked that other guard on the head with a statue and run off. More likely this thing was a jewel, he'd seen it and gotten a case of sticky fingers, the guard saw him put the snatch on it and interfered, and George panicked and let him have it with the stone figurine. In which case perhaps Shotwell was spinning this wild yarn deliberately. He knew I'd never repeat such nonsense to anyone else, but at the same time he was giving me the message. George had a jewel, and Shotwell probably wanted it for himself. I was supposed to play stooge; get the thing away from George and give it to Shotwell. No wonder he hadn't hollered copper—if the jewel was valuable, but no one else knew it had been in the collection, he could latch onto it for keeps.

That made a lot more sense to me. That's the kind of thing which could happen in my little world—the world of the Club, where everybody is out for just two things; loot and kicks. And there are no mysteries, only the psychoses and neuroses which arise when people are thwarted in their search for loot and kicks.

Well, right now they were spending their loot at the little tables so that I'd stand up there and provide them with a few vicarious kicks. So I did. I gave them my monologue, gave them the hip line of you-and-I-know-all-the-answers patter, with every gag reassuring them by inference that they were smart and sure and superior in a world of stupid conformists.

Oh, it was all so simple! The squares looked down on the Beatniks and the Beatniks looked down on the squares, and I looked down on them all because I was really kidding them both, I had the real message. By keeping one foot in either world I was free of both. And there were no other worlds.

That was the only trouble. There were no other worlds, no worlds where this business of George and the meteorite fitted in. He had killed somebody, but why? George wasn't a murderer. He was my brother and he was in a jam, stolen jewel or no. Right now he was drunk, and shacked up with the whackiest nympho I'd ever seen. And pretty soon the cops would do what Shotwell had done; they'd find me, and start asking questions. If George happened to wander back while they were around, or when I had some law tailing me, it would be curtains.

And it was curtains, finally, for the act. I bowed off and begged off, and headed out of the Club. I knew where I was going now, where I had to go. Sarah's studio was just down the street. I'd find George, give him the word. Ask him to set me straight on this whole mess. If he was still looped, I'd see that he sobered up, got in shape to travel. But above all, I must get him out of there, get him away from that man-eating female whose artistic efforts extended to canvas and mattress alike. And if she gave me any trouble—

But she didn't give me any trouble.

The downstairs hallway was open, as it always was, day or night. And the light, as usual, was burned out in the stairwell. On the fourth landing I could see the dim illumination seeping from under the studio door. That door was never locked, either.

I suppose I could have knocked. It would have been the gentlemanly thing to do, under the circumstances. Right now, though, the circumstances were such as to make me forget I was a gentleman.

The circumstances were that it was past midnight, and the hallway was dark, and I was afraid when I came creeping up those stairs. I was afraid because here in the dark it was so hard to remember about fantasies and hallucinations and affects and all the learned labels by which we seek to explain and expunge our secret dreads. And it was so easy to accept the atavistic memory and menace of myth—of alien life burrowing upwards from inner Earth or swooping down from outer stars, of life that feeds upon us, fastens upon us to eat and drink with myriad, monstrous mouths—

So I didn't knock. I walked right into the studio. And Sarah didn't give me any trouble. She just stood there in front of the big easel and continued painting.

She had been painting for some little time now, apparently, and I doubt if she even realized I was in the room. I doubt if she realized anyone was in the room. Perhaps she might never realize the presence of another person again. No, it wasn't that she was drunk and it wasn't that she was in a state of shock. Her movements were the rigid and jerky ones of incipient catatonia (how easily the phrase comes, and how little it really explains!) and her eyes were fixed in glassy concentration upon the canvas.

She was painting the pink panda, of course, but she hadn't bothered to use it as a direct model. Her panda was huge, a hastily blocked-in figure covering the entire area of her canvas, and its outlines were grotesquely distorted. It wasn't cubism or surrealism or anything abstract. She'd merely added and altered, so that the panda was now a misshapen monster with a single, blazing eye; a grotesque mutant spawned of a teddy-bear and a Cyclops. And it was no longer a pink panda. It was red, and it was ropy, and thick globs of pigment had already congealed in dark masses.

Occasionally she bent forward to the sofa beside her to dip her brushes, and I glanced at her palette.

Her palette was the body of my brother George, who lay sprawled out on the couch, his limp arms still hugging the pink panda to his breast. From breast to crotch he'd been ripped completely open by her palette-knife, and she was dipping her brush in his wound, dipping her brush in blood and entrails as she painted her monster from life. From his life—

I could have screamed. I could have screamed, and struck her, and run for help. Except that now I knew there was no help. George was dead, and she was possessed. Not psychotic, but possessed. Driven, compelled to do what she must do; shocked beyond sanity by killing him, the subconscious rationalization merged with catharsis and she returned to her art. She was atoning for the crime by painting a symbolic portrait of the criminal.

So I made no outcry, because I realized now that what Shotwell had hinted must be true. There are more things in Heaven and Earth—

There are more things coming to Earth, out of Heaven or some inconceivable alien hell. George had stumbled across one of them, and killed. He brought it to her, and she killed in turn. And it would go on, and on, unless I acted in time.

I acted. I walked over to the corpse and took the pink panda in my arms. She didn't hear me, didn't see me. She was painting the creature's mouth now. The hungry mouth that gaped beneath the stare of the hungry eye.

I picked up the panda and then I turned and ran out of the studio. The stairs thumped beneath me, and the panda thumped against my chest. It thumped and thumped, I could hear it, feel it throbbing there all the way home. There wasn't far to go. It was quite late, now, and the streets were deserted. Anything can happen in deserted streets at night, you know, even in a great city. A vampire can poke his head out of a manhole. A bloated corpse can rise from the fog-wreathed water of the river. A shower of blazing life can fall from the outer stars—

And a pink panda, a silly pink panda from an amusement park, can sound its hideous heartbeat like a devil's drum.

I could only hope that Lucy wouldn't hear it when I let myself into the apartment. I could only hope that she would be asleep by now, long home from her evening class and too weary to wait up for me. She usually went to bed without waiting. I prayed she had tonight. Then I could call Shotwell and wait for him to arrive. Maybe I could even give him what he wanted without Lucy knowing. It would be best if she didn't know, if she'd never know.

Luck was with me.

Lucy had retired, leaving the light on in the kitchen. She'd eaten a snack before going to bed, and the leftovers of her midnight lunch were still on the table. I pushed the plate and cup and silverware aside and put the pink panda down.

Now that I wasn't holding it close any longer, I wasn't conscious of the thumping. It was just a toy once more; a foolish, harmless toy. And that, of course, was all it had ever been. There was no malignity about it, no Cyclopean essence. George had won it at the amusement park and carried it along with him as a drunken whim. One ear was a bit battered, and the side of the head was torn—

Torn? It had been cut.

George had cut it, and not because of intoxicated impulse. He'd cut it and carried it along with him, and no wonder it thumped, because the meteorite was inside. That's where he'd hidden it away. And he'd carried it to the studio and Sarah was aware of it, and then—

Then, what?

Had it happened the way Shotwell said it happened? Had the mere presence of the stone been enough to influence a susceptible, already unbalanced psyche?

I didn't know. I didn't care. The one thing now was to get out Shotwell's card, call him, let him come over and take the damned thing away. The damned thing that had already been linked with two deaths today alone, and God knows how many more through the years. If Shotwell wasn't as crazy as the rest. As crazy as Sarah was, as crazy as George had been.

But George wasn't crazy. And I wasn't, either. There are no monsters. A meteorite is just a piece of metal. It can be stuffed into the soft skull of a fuzzy pink panda, and it can be drawn out very easily.

You can feel it in your hand, because it throbs. It isn't cold and it isn't warm—it just pulses. It pulses there in your open palm and you stare down at it.

And it stares back.

It stares back, because it's an eye.

What had Shotwell said—that sometime, somewhere, somebody had faceted and polished it until it resembled a jewel? He had been wrong. It hadn't been artificially cut at all, and it didn't resemble a jewel. It resembled an eye. It was an eye.

You could find such an eye in the forehead of an ancient idol. And you could easily imagine it set in the head of a Cyclops. But staring at it now, I didn't have to imagine anything. I didn't have to imagine, because I saw.

I gazed into the eye and I saw everything . . .

The Arctic plain was barren of snow with the coming of spring. Stalagmitic cairns dotted the bleak surface; great rock-masses that seemed imbedded in the earth, but which might have fallen from the stars. There was no life here; no life as we know it, under that brooding sky.

And then life came. The bearded elders of the tribe advanced across the plain in slow processional, bearing the grease-dipped torches. Before them capered the angekok, the shaman. He carried the girl in his arms.

She did not struggle, for she had been drugged and lay limp, nude and insensible. The shaman placed her upon the flat outcropping ledge of a cairn, and the drums thundered all around him. This was the chosen one, the maiden sacrifice of spring. She would lie here, her body bared to the savagery of the sullen sky, until night came. And with the coming of night, the dark brothers would venture forth to feast. The wolves of darkness would come to devour that which was their due, and then seek their lairs for a season. Thus spring would come safely to the wilderness, for the eaters of life would be appeased by this sacrifice.

So spoke the drums. And so spoke the shaman. And then the tribesmen shambled away, and their torches died in the distance. The body on the altar lay lifeless as the black maw of the horizon slowly swallowed the sun.

And then the thunder came again, but not from the drums. The sky shook, and a renewed radiance illumined the firmament. The maiden stirred restlessly, awoke. She sat up, stared about her. Her eyes widened for there, in the shadows beyond the cairn, she saw the skulkers, the waiting ones. The wolves had come. They snarled at the sky and edged closer. The thunder boomed.

Suddenly they turned; turned and ran, howling. And the ruddy radiance cast blood upon their backs, for a red rain descended.

The maiden rose from the ledge and slipped down, shivering. The earth was shaking all around her, and the cairns tilted crazily, bobbing and weaving in the eery light. The light was coming from the sky—falling from the sky!

She turned to flee, but the light pursued. And suddenly it coalesced, condensed into a single, concentrated blaze that soared and swept and swooped between the cairns like a single great eye. An eye that pursued her. An eye that wove a web of light about her nakedness, an eye that settled at her feet so that she halted and stooped down and picked it up, only to drop it with a shriek of mingled pain and horror as the heat seared the flesh of her palms.

But still she stared at it, squatted and stared. And as the thunder waned and the light faded and the night came, she continued to stare.

She stared until the eye cooled and she did pick it up and hold it to her breast; an eye that was alive and staring between the two blind eyes of her nipples. And she walked across the barren plain, walked in darkness until she came to the place where her people stayed and slept about their dying fires.

She stared down at the eye and then she picked up the stone knife and she walked among her people and she slew. The knife rose and fell, rose and fell, and they awoke and screamed. But when they saw her eyes, when they saw the third eye she carried, they did not resist, did not attempt escape. She slew until her knife was red to the hilt, until the arm which wielded it was bathed in blood. And then the shaman bowed down before her and the elders worshipped also, for they knew she was the bride of a god. Thereafter it was she who gave in sacrifice and she who wore the eye in an amulet woven to hang between her breasts . . .

In time she died, but the eye lived on. And it moved on. I saw the Tatars come and raid, and the eye moved southward with them on their return march, in the saddlebag of a chieftain. He spent hours staring at it before a battle or a raid, and then he slew and slew . . .

And a Mongol took it from the Tatar, and it found its way to India, and for a time it was indeed the eye of a goddess—Kali, the Dark Mother, whose phansigars slew with the silken cord . . .

And a Moslem wrested it from the temple, and a Seljuk adventurer took it from the Moslem, and a soldier of Napoleon found it in the plunder from the field of Aboukir. He returned to Marseilles, and for years thereafter Marseilles was haunted by a mass-murderer who roamed abroad at midnight, slitting throats with a bayonet . . .

The police of the last Louis found it during the Commune, and it passed from hand to hand. A Prussian held it for a time (there were a series of brutal slayings in Prague) and a seaman carried it to London where it fell into the possession of an eccentric gentleman who was suddenly impelled to carry on a bloody private crusade against ladies of the evening . . .

And to Russia it returned again, to Holy Mother Russia and Holy Father Rasputin. Staring into its depths, the monk induced visions, in himself and in others who became his victims . . .

The Bolsheviki looter who found it went berserk. The curio-dealer in St. Petersburg sold it to a Greek merchant and then hung himself. The Greek merchant lost it when he went on trial for murder. Chandler Harvey's agent bought it when the government fell and a corrupt official sold a roomful of art treasures, sight unseen, to the highest bidder. It was never unpacked until this morning, when my brother George found it, misplaced in a carton containing mountings of Coptic coins. And the guard saw him pocket it, and he picked up a figurine standing on the table beside him and he crushed the skull of the guard . . .

And he put it inside the panda at the amusement park and carried it with him. There was a great confusion in the mind of my brother George. He couldn't understand why he had killed. He hadn't meant to kill. Sure, he saw this hunk of jewelry and he figured it was valuable, who knows? You could get a few bucks for a thing like this, and nobody'd ever miss it. So he put it in his pocket and when this character, this Ray Brice, spotted him, he got panicky and started swinging. Only that damned thing was lying on the floor, it had dropped out of his pocket, and it kept staring up at him and he stared back and the next thing you know he was lifting the figurine and smashing it down on Ray Brice's head . . .

I knew what my brother had thought I knew, because the eye knew. It knew what all of them had thought; the naked virgin, the tallow-faced Tatar, the bearded Mongol, the dark priests of Kali, the Mameluke who died at Aboukir, the fiend who gloated in the night of Whitechapel, the monk who strangled his little white doves in orgies at St. Petersburg.

And I knew what drunken Sarah had thought, what she had sensed when she brought George to her studio. What her unbalanced, undisciplined, uncanny artistic intuition had focussed upon without even the necessity of seeing—its presence in the panda was enough to set her off. "Kiss me, George.” And one arm behind his neck, so, and the other arm free, the hand free to grasp the palette-knife and bring it up, and the redness and the gushing and then the shock, the trauma of the deed accomplished and the realization, and the fugue into denial of reality and catharsis combined, the blind painting of the murder-beast . . .

That’s what it wanted. That’s why it had come from the stars, come to feed. To feed and to feast. Shotwell was right; there are other forms of life, other ways of life. And this entity needed nourishment. Sarah had used a knife to bring blood, but George had used a blunt instrument and others had used the cord, the noose, their bare hands. The instrument did not matter, because blood did not matter. It wasn’t blood the creature wanted, it wasn’t even killing. It fed on something else—on the released emotion of the killer. That’s what it needed, that’s why it sought life in death. It ate emotion.

I stared down at it and it stared up at me, and we both knew.

We knew what was right and what was wrong, and the answer lies in being. Being and becoming. To be is the only purpose, and to become more the only goal. One becomes more by destroying lesser being and incorporating itself in one’s own essence. One must devour the sensation of others, add it to one’s awareness and capacity. It is a feast without end, life without end.

To seek emotion in sexuality is a snare and a delusion, for one wastes one’s own substance in the attempt; just as one eats himself in attempting to heighten sensation through drugs or drink. So the Beatniks are fools, and their “kicks” merely the convulsive spasms of rigor mortis in a stiffening corpse. And the squares are fools too, because they shun sensation and fear its effects.

And I was doubly a fool and doubly damned because I tried to live so as to make the best of both possible worlds. Not knowing, until now, that there are more than two possible worlds. There are inconceivable worlds beyond worlds beyond the stars, worlds of sensation beyond sensation which I could seek and share.

I'd sensed those worlds when I'd seen what the eye had beheld. Now I knew why some men killed—not because they were fanatics, not because they were sadists, not because they were deranged. They killed because of the hunger which could be sensed and sated, the hunger that never ceased. And while they fed that hunger, they shook the stars. Psychosis, neurosis—meaningless labels, more insane than that which they attempt so inadequately to describe. All words were meaningless. Dig? Crazy? Kicks? Man? Cool?

The eye could dig its way into your brain.

The eye was crazy.

The eye was kicks.

Man? What is man? You can be greater than man when you share the sensation of a greater being, a greater awareness from a greater world.

Cool. The eye was cool in my hand. It throbbed because it was alive. Alive and staring at me.

Why did it stare?

To tell me these things.

To tell me to help it.

To tell me to help myself.

To share with me everything that it was, and could become.

The eye stared up at me. Stared hungrily. That was it. The eye was hungry. It would always be hungry, and I would always be hungry, but if I took it away with me now there would be years of feasting.

And that was the thing to do. The eye and I would go away together. Away from the stupid world of squares and the equally stupid world of Beatniks.

Now I knew how they all must have felt—the famed and feared killers of the past.

And I turned to go. That was my sole intention, merely to go.

I didn’t expect to find Lucy standing there. I could scarcely see her, actually, because the eyes were all around me, the ring of hungry eyes.

I couldn’t really see her any more than I could really see the bread-knife on the table.

All I could see was the eye.

And all I could do was what must be done.

I reached for Lucy.

I reached for the knife.

And I fed the hungry eye—

THE END

Show Biz

If you take this story seriously . . .

FLORIAN AND CARTER STOOD AT THE rail of the yacht, staring out over the harbor. The bay was a bowl of moonlight in which a black dot bobbed.

"Here he comes now," said Florian. "You go below and keep out of sight."

"Sure it wouldn't be safer if I stuck around?" Carter asked. "You know how these crackpots are. I don't like this cloak-and-dagger routine, the way he insisted on coming out alone at night—"

"I'll handle him," Florian said. "Just run along and leave everything to me."

Carter left. Florian watched the rowboat approach, tossed out a line as it heaved to, and waited while its occupant clambered up the rope ladder to the deck.

The newcomer was a squat, gray-haired man, wearing heavy bifocals and carrying a worn leather briefcase.

"Good evening," said Florian. "You're Professor—"

"Please," murmured the visitor. "No names."

Florian shrugged. "As you wish. But we're quite alone, I assure you. I sent the crew ashore for the night, just as you insisted when you phoned to set up this appointment."

“I know all this may seem melodramatic to you,” the professor told him. “But when I’ve explained, you’ll understand the need for absolute secrecy.” He cleared his throat. “I told them at the school that I was taking a leave of absence. Nobody knows I’m here. Nobody must ever know.”

“You have my word,” Florian said. “Now, shall we go into the cabin and get down to business?”

He led the way. The interior of the cabin resembled an executive’s office, complete with intercom, teletype, and a battery of phones on the big steel desk. Florian slid into a seat behind the desk and waved the professor to a leather lounge chair. “Drink?” he offered.

“Thank you, no.” The professor smiled bleakly. “After spending nearly six months trying to set up a meeting with you, I’m impatient to proceed.” He unzipped his briefcase. “It’s an ironic paradox that the head of the largest public-relations organization in the country has no time to see the public. But I assure you this interview will be important—to you, to myself, to the entire nation.”

The professor pulled a bulky manuscript from his briefcase and placed it on the edge of the desk.

“Here it is,” he said.

Florian frowned. “A book?”

“That’s what it started out to be,” the professor answered. “When I sat down to write, three years ago, I intended to produce a text on political science. And then the idea came to me.”

Florian started to reach for the manuscript, but the professor shook his head. “Don’t touch it,” he said. “It isn’t a book now—it’s a bomb.”

“You mean you’ve developed a formula for some secret weapon?”

“In a way. Actually it’s neither new nor secret—but by carrying existing methods to their logical conclusion, I’ve created what might well be called a weapon. Of course my field is political science—”

“And mine is public relations,” Florian told him. “What has all this to do with me?”

The professor leaned forward. “How would you like to run this country?” he asked softly. “How would you like—to own the world?”

“Really, now—”

The professor tapped his manuscript with a blunt forefinger. “Here’s the blueprint,” he said. “The perfect combination of political science and applied public relations that will do the job.”

Florian sat back. “I’m afraid I’m not too impressed,” he murmured. “After all, I’ve read a few books myself. The Hidden Persuaders. The Lonely Crowd. It isn’t exactly news to me that voters can be manipulated by advertising and mass psychological techniques. In fact, our organization has been active in political campaigns behind the scenes for some years now. I know a little something about how to sell a candidate as if he were a piece of merchandise.”

The professor nodded. “We’ve come a long way,” he said. “Less than a hundred years ago Abraham Lincoln sat in his room at the home of Judge Wills in a dusty little Pennsylvania town, on the evening before the dedication ceremonies of a soldiers’ cemetery, working with a pencil on the final draft of the Gettysburg Address. Today our candidates and holders of political offices work with a staff of consultants—ghost writers, gag writers, idea men to feed them material; psychologists to mold their personalities into ideal father images for the masses; advertising agencies to devise their slogans and conduct their campaigns with television spot announcements in place of speeches; press secretaries to control or even write their public statements once they take office.”

“I know all that,” Florian said.

“And you probably know, too, that the old-fashioned political campaign is a thing of the past. There’s nothing spontaneous about the rallies or the handshaking tours any more—every movement is planned and rehearsed. Presidential conventions are staged like Broadway shows. TV appearances require the services of a producer, a voice coach, camera and lighting experts, makeup artists, and little men with teleprompters.”

Florian yawned. “So what?” he said. “Everyone knows how candidates are selected nowadays. Take a man with a clean record, a good safe middle-of-the-road attitude, and then package and sell him to the consumer with tested techniques. You can teach him how to smile and how to talk. Hell, that’s been done by public-relations outfits all over the country ever since television came in. And they use everything from soft sell for the liberals to pure corn for the yokels, complete with hillbilly bands and dancing girls.” He lit a cigar. “What you’re trying to tell me is that political science is dead and show biz has taken over. Is that it?”

“That’s what gave me the idea,” the professor said. “When I began to study just these things you’ve mentioned—how the people from the entertainment world have gradually infiltrated politics as advisors, producers, technicians; how they’ve tried to train our politicians and officeholders to behave like actors. And it occurred to me then—why not use actors?” Florian sat up. He put his cigar in the ashtray. “What’s that again?”

“I said, why not use actors? You said yourself that almost any man who starts with a clean record and a noncommittal attitude can be built into a political figure by means of present-day psychological techniques. The trick is to teach him to speak, to handle himself properly when on public display. So why waste time with tired old men or egotistical prima donnas who can’t cope with their roles? If politics is show business, why not put the right actors into the parts to begin with?”

The professor stood up. He began to pace the floor, and Florian followed him with his eyes.

“Think of the possibilities,” the professor went on tensely. “No more hit-or-miss campaigning. You cast men for public offices just the way you’d cast them for a show. It’s just the matter of building the proper psychological image for any given locality. Prefabricate the right character and select the type of actor who fits the role—the Courageous Leader, the Elder Statesman, the Champion of Minority Groups, the Man from the Prairie, the Fighting D.A., the Boy Wonder.”

Florian's eyes narrowed. "Is this what you've written about?"

The professor nodded. "I told you I had a blueprint," he said. "It's all down in detail—analysis and methodology. You scout the country for likely prospects. Of course it will cost money, and most of the preliminary work will have to be conducted in the utmost secrecy—but then, the big political organizations are used to that. The men who control them would be willing to put up the finances if we could guarantee success. And they'd be willing to wait too. Naturally we couldn't expect to take over the key offices in the nation overnight. We'd be starting from scratch, with unknowns. But the point is, we'd have a tremendous advantage: our unknowns would be real actors. They'd look the part, sound as convincing as big-time commercial announcers. We could bring them up the ladder fast. Aldermen, judges, then members of the state legislatures, then on to governorships, the House of Representatives, the Senate, the important appointive offices, the Cabinet, even the Presidency itself—oh, it might take fifteen years before we had a working majority in all the right places, but think of what power we'd wield then! And I tell you, the time is ripe for just such a move. I can feel it coming—it's inevitable! The public is already more than half sold on just this type of candidate, synthetically created. We can give them the real thing and take over the country!"

The professor sank back into his chair. "Well?" he said.

Florian shook his head. "You're crazy. Absolutely stark, staring mad." He gestured at the manuscript. "It that's what you've been writing about, I advise you to burn this."

The professor snatched the bulky sheaf and shoved it into his briefcase. "All right," he muttered. "It you don't see it, I'm sure somebody else will. There are other public-relations outfits, you know. Maybe they're not quite as big or quite as important, but I assure you any one of them could be or will be if they listen to my proposition."

"I take it, then, that you intend to present this idea elsewhere?"

"Naturally. It may take another six months to get a hearing, but I'm willing to spend the time. Because I believe in this idea. I believe that anyone with the vision and enterprise to carry out my methods can rule this nation and eventually rule the world."

Florian sighed. "Nothing I can possibly say would dissuade you? You're sure of that?"

"Absolutely sure."

The professor started to rise—but he never made it. Florian opened a desk drawer, pulled out a small revolver, and shot the professor right through the center of his forehead.

Carter came running in. "Oh, my God!" he muttered. "You did it!"

"Don't panic," said Florian. "We'll put the body in the boat and tow it outside the harbor. Then we'll sink the body with weights and turn the boat adrift. It will look like an accident—if anyone ever finds out. He assured me no one knew he was coming here, so we won't be implicated."

"It's risky," Carter murmured.

"Of course. But there was no choice."

"He knew?"

Florian nodded. "Yes, he'd even written a book about how to do it—figured it pretty accurately too. It was his idea that a public-relations outfit, with well-heeled backing, could turn a gang of professional actors from unknowns into key political figures in just about fifteen years. And he'd hit on most of the methods too. So you see, I had no choice." Florian grimaced and pointed at the revolver. "It was either a matter of using that or of telling him you and I got the same idea and started working on it a few years ago." Florian glanced at his watch. "Which reminds me, there should be a call coming in from Washington any minute now. Maybe I'd better stick around. You can handle the body alone, can't you?"

Carter made a face. "I suppose so. But tell me, why do I always get stuck with the dirty work?"

Florian smiled at him. "That's show biz," he said.

As we started to say, if you take this story seriously, you ought to go out and end it all—before it's too late . . .

The Gloating Place

Susan was so anxious to get to the gloating place that she almost ran down the slope.

"Gloating place," of course, was only her name for it; actually the spot was a small ravine at the far end of the park where she could sit without being noticed or disturbed. As far as she was concerned, it had always been her gloating place and it always would be. And after all, she thought, what's in a name? Since last week the kids at school had started calling her "Susie," and even Lieutenant Palmer called her "Sue." But she was still Susan really. Always was and always would be, particularly when she could manage to hide away all by herself here in the gloating place.

Sometimes Susan had come here to cry. Sometimes she had come here just to sit and think—not think, really, but to sort of dream. That's when the ravine really became a gloating place, because it was there that she could kind of let herself go and imagine the way things would be if If she wasn't just that dumpy little Susan Harper, and if she didn't have all those awful pimples, and if Tom Reynolds would only like her instead of Marjorie and invite her to the prom. Yes, and if Mom and Dad were only out of the way (suppose they were both going someplace, on a vacation, say, and the plane crashed, and then it wouldn't even hurt very much; they'd probably never even feel anything) and she had all the insurance money and could do whatever she wanted with nobody to stop her, ever.

Susan didn't think about such things all the time but just when she was really down in the dumps and everything was a drag. After all, she had a right to think about something, didn't she? Something besides do this and do that, which was all she ever heard at home or at school; something besides the fact that she really came to the gloating place because she had nowhere else to go. Because she was alone and nobody ever paid any attention to her.

To tell the truth, she had to admit there'd never been anything to actually gloat about—never anything real, that is—until last week.

But since then everything had changed. Changed so swiftly that this was her first chance to come here and snatch a moment alone.

She hadn't been alone for a single moment since a week ago Friday when she'd come tearing into the house, screaming about the man in the mask who grabbed her over in the vacant lot behind the old Austin place.

First there was Mom and then there was Dad and then there were the police and this nice, red-haired Lieutenant Palmer. And there was the matron and that Dr. Kleinhaus who examined her—that part wasn't so nice, really, and besides, hadn't she explained that the man didn't really attack her, because she managed to break away? But the rest of it was all perfect; the way the lieutenant talked to her, so polite and embarrassed, sort of, and the way the reporters came in, and the photographers who took her picture just in time for the Sunday paper.

Oh, it had been a real gasser, and on Monday things were even better. Because all the kids started to make up to her, and even the stuck-up pigs like Marjorie came around with a lot of lovey-dovey talk to get on the good side of her, just so she'd give out with the real lowdown. Of course, their folks had been calling up Mom all weekend long, and they wanted to hear all about it too. And Miss Billings excused her from all her English exams for the week, and Mr. Ryder said she was looking pale and if she wanted to be excused and just go to the infirmary and lie down for a while . . .

It had been just about perfect all week long. Mom and Dad treating her so nice, and not even saying a word about homework or dishes or anything like that, and everybody making a fuss over her, and Lieutenant Palmer stopping by just about every evening in a shiny new squad car to report that they hadn't found anything yet but they were still working on it, the whole department. Of course, he kept asking a lot of stupid questions, but they were all about the same thing, so the only thing she had to do was give him the same answers.

Then on Wednesday he'd come for her special, right after school, and he took her and Mom downtown in the squad car, with the siren going all the way, and then she sat in the dark and watched the line-up.

That was the dreamiest-creamiest bit of all—a real line-up, just like on television, with all these horrible-looking creeps walking across the platform and blinking under these terrible bright lights. And all of them just about scared spitless in case she'd holler out and identify them. Some of them were pretty hard characters, too—real apes. You didn't have to be a doctor to figure out that they weren't quite right in the head. So one of them could be the kind who'd put on a black mask and a pair of canvas gloves and hide behind the billboards in a vacant lot to wait for some teenage girl to come along.

All she had to do was make up her mind and sing out. Because they had been picked up and booked on suspicion and probably most of them didn't have any alibis for late Friday afternoon anyway. And when it came to a showdown, it would be her word against the word of whoever she picked, and the police were on her side. They'd probably even beat a confession out of one of these apes, make him admit that he'd grabbed her around the neck, made those bruises, torn her dress, and tried to get her down until she kicked him with her knee and tore away and ran. They'd take him out to the vacant lot, to the place she'd showed them where the grass was all trampled down, and make him reenact the crime; show how he'd held her at first so she couldn't even scream. It would be very easy.

But it wouldn't be very smart. Because there was always a chance that the one she picked did have an alibi. And there might be a trial and she'd have to testify in court, and some of these defense attorneys were pretty tough cookies themselves, according to television. Besides, what would she really gain? She was getting all the benefits she wanted right now—and not identifying anyone would probably keep up the excitement even longer.

So Susan kept her mouth shut and finally they let her go home. She could hardly wait to see the follow-up story in the Thursday-night paper; she guessed it would be a big one.

The trouble was she hadn't counted on anything else happening, like that big smash-up over on Highway Nine—three cars wrecked and two people killed, with five more in the hospital. That got all the space, and there was just one stinking little paragraph about the line-up, way back on page seven.

To make it worse, one of the cars in the crash had carried a couple of kids from school: George Hicks, who wasn't even scratched, and his sister Martha, who went to the hospital with a broken jaw and a fractured hip. So on Friday everybody wanted to talk about the accident, and they were all hanging around George or going out to buy sympathy cards and get-well greetings for that pig of a Martha. Nobody, but nobody, even bothered to ask Susan about the line-up.

Still, Lieutenant Palmer said they'd continue their investigation and there might be a better chance next time. If the worst came to the worst, she could take a chance and identify some body. After all, she'd been real careful to say that she didn't see the man too clearly there in the twilight and the shadows, and the description she had given was pretty general. With the black mask and the canvas gloves it was hard to tell how a person really looked.

It was hard to tell how a person really looked anyway. Susan stopped gloating long enough to stare at herself. She hadn't brought a mirror, but she didn't need one. There was a little creek running along the bottom of the ravine, and she could walk over to the edge and stare down at her reflection in the brown, muddy water.

In the past, when she'd done so, she hadn't liked what she'd seen. The fat, foreshortened body, the plump, pimply face, the hair the color of the brown, muddy water—that's the way she always looked to herself.

That's the way she'd always looked to herself before. But now . . .

Now Susan gazed down at the fat, foreshortened body, the plump, pimply face, the hair the color of the brown, muddy water.

She hadn’t changed.

Nothing had changed.

It came to her, and she didn’t want it to come, but it was there and she had to face it, just as she had to face that nasty, runny reflection of herself. She was still the same. And so was everything else. The investigation would die out. The kids were already excited about something new. Mom and Dad would forget the whole thing and go back to nagging at her all over again, like they always had. If they did anything different, it would just be to keep harping away at her about coming home early and staying inside nights. Why, she’d even had to sneak off to come here after school!

In the long run she hadn’t gained a thing. Maybe even lost out a little, if they kept tabs on her and wouldn’t let her go out evenings. Not that she ever had anyplace to go.

Susan shook her head. She’d forgotten about it before, when she was gloating, but she wasn’t gloating any more. One of the big reasons, the very biggest reason she had for all this happening, was to get Tom Reynolds to notice her. To get him to talk to her, maybe even take her out, instead of always going with Marjorie.

Well, he hadn’t so much as said one word to her. And the prom was only three weeks away, and this afternoon she’d heard Marjorie talking to Phyllis Lister about her new formal and how she hoped Tom would like it.

Tom would like it, of course. How could he help but like it, even if it was just an old burlap bag, as long as Marjorie was wearing it? Marjorie was tall and slim, except in those places, and her hair was like the kind the models have in the home-permanent ads, and she had real white skin, particularly around her shoulders and neck. . . .

It was no use trying to pretend. No matter what she did, Tom Reynolds was going to keep on being in love with Marjorie. And he was going to take her to the prom in three weeks, and she’d wear her formal, and probably they’d do all kinds of smooching in the car afterward, and he might even kiss her shoulders and neck. . . .

Why did she keep coming back to Marjorie’s shoulders and neck?

Then Susan remembered about the man in the mask, the man who wore the canvas gloves and tried to grab her around the neck.

Suppose—

No.

But just suppose—

Susan's heart began to pound so hard she had to sit down. And then the whole thing came to her, and she kept shaking her head, but it kept right on coming. When she closed her eyes she could even see pictures of it, just the way it could happen, if only she planned it right. The way it would happen. The way it was going to happen. . . .

Susan had to wait a whole week before it did. And then, of course, they came for her again, just as she knew they would, and took her down to headquarters to see Lieutenant Palmer.

She knew that this was going to be the worst part, and the only thing that helped was that she could cry. It would be natural to cry under the circumstances or even to have hysterics. Even a cop, even Lieutenant Palmer, wasn't going to ask too many questions if you were having hysterics all over the place.

So all she actually had to do was say that no, she hadn't seen Marjorie since they left school yesterday, and no, Marjorie had never told her where she was going on Friday night, and no, she'd never seen Marjorie with any strange man. And, of course, she said what Mom had already told the lieutenant—that on Friday night, at the time of the murder, she had been upstairs in her own room playing records and studying her homework.

Lieutenant Palmer didn't ask any more questions. Anyone could see he was just about ready to have hysterics himself. But he did say a couple of things that interested Susan. Like, just before he let Mom take her home, "I guess I owe you an apology, young lady."

"What do you mean?" Susan asked.

"Well, to tell the truth, I was beginning to have a few doubts about your story."

Susan took a deep breath, but she had to ask the question. "You mean, you thought maybe I'd made the whole thing up?"

"No, not that. At least, not exactly. But we ran down so many false leads, and your description was so vague—I had an idea that perhaps you might have, well, exaggerated things just a trifle." Lieutenant Palmer was actually blushing. "You see, we've run into cases like this before, where some kid—girl, that is—may come to us with a story about being molested. And sometimes it turns out that a boy just tried to pick her up, and she got excited, lost her head, you might say, and made a big production out of it. Something like your description of the mask and gloves. That's probably what really started me wondering, you know. It's not exactly commonplace to find an attacker wearing such things."

"But didn't you find one of the gloves? I mean, out in the alley behind the garage, where Marjorie—" Susan started to sob again; it wasn't hard.

Lieutenant Palmer nodded. "Yes, we did. A canvas glove, left hand. Lab is running tests on it right now, but after that we're going to ask you to try and identify it."

"Then you think maybe—maybe it's the same one?" Susan wiped her eyes with her handkerchief and looked at him.

"It's too early to say that. All we know now is that the girl was strangled but not—" Lieutenant Palmer stopped short, and he was blushing again.

Susan decided to sob once more, but not too hard, in case he meant to say anything else.

And he did. "That's the worst feature of a case like this," he said, speaking so softly that it was almost as though he were talking to himself. "The way these things seem to run in cycles. Almost as if one crime brings on another."

"I don't understand."

"Well, do you remember the line-up, Sue?"

That was her, "Sue." She wanted to smile but just nodded. "Yes, I remember."

"There were some pretty offbeat characters we rounded up for you to look at. Apparently none of them was the actual criminal—but almost any one of them could have been. I mean, on the basis of their records, the majority of those men are capable of committing such a crime. Several of them have psychiatric case histories which show that they're potential murderers. Unfortunately we haven't got the legal machinery to deal with potential killers. But we know about them. And we know, from experience, that sometimes a slaying like this stirs them up. Just reading a sensational newspaper account is often enough to set one of them off—get him to the point where he decides to emulate the attacker. It's happened before, in other cities.

"I just hope to God the papers don't play this up too big." Lieutenant Palmer sighed. "But I suppose they will. Anyway, Sue, I want you to promise me one thing—don't talk to the reporters any more than you have to. You follow me?"

"Yes, I follow you. But about the murder, Lieutenant. Don't you have any idea who—"

She never got a chance to finish her question because the chief of police came in and said something about the Sheriff's Department wanting information for the inquest. So Lieutenant Palmer told her that was all and he'd keep in touch with her, and then she and Mom went home.

That was Saturday, and now it was Tuesday and Susan's first and only chance to get away. There had been reporters, and then the excitement at school, and she was getting twice the attention she had before. You'd think that they'd pay more attention to Marjorie—except, of course, that Marjorie was dead and she was alive. Yes, that was the big difference, wasn't it? Marjorie was dead and she was alive. Even Tom Reynolds had to realize that. They'd even questioned him, for a little while, hadn't they? But it was all over, all the bad part, and now perhaps he'd notice her.

Oh, it would take time, and it wasn't just going to happen. Susan would have to figure out a way of making it happen. But she could do it. She could do anything, she knew that now. Now that Marjorie was dead.

The only thing was, she wanted to be alone. Even at home, in her own room, Mom and Dad kept fussing over her. She had to be careful to watch her voice and her expression and everything else.

So Tuesday afternoon, after school, she sneaked off for the gloating place. There was really something to gloat about now. Only first of all she had to think.

She came down the slope of the ravine and sprawled there in the slanting shadows that hid her face, even from herself. That was the best way, if you really wanted to think. To think about whether you'd really done everything right. There was the business of finding the old canvas gloves in the trash bin down the alley where somebody had thrown them. That had been smart, not to buy new gloves, in case they could ever check up, but to snoop around on the chance of turning up some old ones. Getting hold of them had been a lucky break. All the rest of it wasn't a matter of luck, though, but of careful planning. Phoning Marjorie to sneak out to go to the show but not to tell her folks—that was part of it. Nobody traced calls on a dial phone, and nobody had heard her. Setting up the records was another good bit; Dad was gone and Mom was lying down with a headache in her bedroom on the first floor. Sure, she might have come upstairs unexpectedly after Susan had climbed out of the window and left the long-plays on the phonograph, but that was one of the risks you had to take. And so was getting through the alley without running into anybody. The point is, it had worked out. She never needed to use any alibis—and if she had, she would just have told the almost truth about sneaking off on a date with Marjorie to go to the show. That was bad, but they couldn't hang her for it, could they?

They couldn't hang her for anything now. Because they hadn't really found out a thing. Not about the dirty old gloves, or the way they'd come up around the back of Marjorie's long white neck as she came tiptoeing out into the alley in back of the garage. Not about how the gloves had cut off Marjorie's wind, so she couldn't make a sound, or how the fingers of the gloves had pressed and pressed and squeezed and squeezed until there was no Marjorie any more, just a big, boneless pig doll that was no good to Tom Reynolds or to anybody. Because it was dead, and Susan was alive.

Susan was gloating now. She admitted it. And all at once she wondered about it, just for a moment. Wondered because she wasn't really sorry at all, wasn't really afraid. You'd think a person would be just a little bit sorry or scared; at least, a part of them would be. Unless doing it had changed her somehow.

Had she changed?

Susan knew she wanted to look at her reflection in the water again. Maybe it would tell her something. She stood up, squinting in the late-afternoon twilight. For a moment she hesitated, just standing there and thinking about something Lieutenant Palmer had said. She didn't want to think about it, because of what it might mean—but she had to.

It was what he told her, there at the last, about offbeat characters. About some people being capable of committing murder because they were crazy. And when they read about such things in the papers it set them off.

Of course, he'd been talking about men and about Marjorie's case. But before then there'd been her own case. And she'd read about herself. Wasn't that what gave her the idea of killing Marjorie in the first place? So couldn't it mean that maybe she was one of those creepy characters, like those awful men? And that the reason she couldn't feel any grief or pity or fear was because she was—

No! She wasn't crazy. She was Susan. She was Susan, alive, and Marjorie was dead. And all she had to do was look at her own reflection in the water to prove it.

Susan looked at her own reflection, and then everything was all right. Her face was just as muddy and brown as ever, but it was her face. She hadn't changed. And that meant Lieutenant Palmer was the crazy one, with all his cruddy ideas about how reading about Marjorie’s death could set some other killer off.

Susan smiled down at herself in the water, and then she blinked because the water blurred as a shadow slid across it. The shadow looked like a man’s face, but it was darker at the top. And the face seemed to be right in back of her own. Susan peered at the dark part, then opened her mouth.

She had just enough time to recognize the dark part as a mask but not enough time to scream, because it was then that the canvas gloves closed over her throat.

The Big Kick

Some people total up their assets in a bankbook, but Judy always used a mirror.

Many men had told her she had a beautiful body, but she liked the mirror’s message better. The mirror could tell her the same thing without panting or pawing or slobbering.

The only trouble was, the mirror had no money. It would never give her a lot of nice clothes, a big car, a fancy apartment. At times Judy caught herself wondering if she really wanted these things, but, after all, what else is there in life?

Then she met Mitch and she found out.

Mitch had a bristling black crewcut, heavy eyebrows, and a tuft of beard on his jutting chin. He didn’t have money for clothes or cars or big apartments, but he didn’t make the usual sweating, wheezy advances, either. He merely took her, with casual brutality, and taught her about kicks.

Maybe it was the casual brutality that did it, but suddenly Judy found a reason for living. And she was living with him. Mitch, who wore a sloppy t-shirt and dirty slacks, whose car was a broken-down ‘51 Chevrolet, and whose apartment was a crummy rear-entrance walk-up he referred to as his “pad.”

It was there that Judy found her kicks.

Mitch taught her the whole beatnik bit, including the vocabulary. At first she thought it was rather silly—she couldn’t think of Mitch as a “real cool Daddy-o”—but gradually some of it began to make sense. Like the way

Mitch whispered, at an intimately appropriate moment, “Baby, I dig you the most.”

Everything moved with Mitch. Pretty soon she was making the scene with all the gone cats and crazy studs he knew up at the university. They’d fall up to somebody’s pad; they’d blow some pot, and it was like wow, man.

Mitch and his crowd didn’t flip for jazz, but he’d come on strong with the bongos. “You don’t mess with the sound,” he told her. “It’s a drag, strictly nowhere. All you need to do is dig the beat. That’s everything—just beat. Now you take like Zen. . . .”

But he’d lose her there; she couldn’t make the intellectual bit. It just didn’t swing. Balling for kicks was enough—why make a federal case out of it? And yet every once in a while Mitch and some of the other characters would get real spooky about meaning and significance and all that jazz.

One night he tried to explain. They were off in a corner at a real crazy bash, with everything rocking. “The most,” Mitch said. “I mean like, here we are holed up in a lousy pad, bunch of chicks and cats, and nobody has any bread, you know? But everything’s with it, everything swings.”

“But don’t you ever worry about the future?” Judy asked.

“This is the future, dig?” Mitch answered. “The whole thing’s a circle, with us in the middle having kicks. Now take like squares, what have they got? The study-and-work-hard pitch, the get-a-steady-job thing, real draggy. And then it’s marry-and-settle-down and buy-on-easy-terms and take-care-of-the-wife-and-kids. So you end up at fifty, doing the coronary bit.”

“Awright awready,” Judy said. “You aren’t going to marry me, and I’m not queer for that wife-and-mother scene myself. But a girl has to think about things, you know? And I don’t have any money, you don’t have a job —”

“So get with it.” Mitch shrugged. “You want some loot, find a live one.”

“You mean some fat old character with a wife and six kids? I should sneak in and out of motels with him for peanuts?” Judy was scornful. “Look, Pops, I don’t need it. I’ve been getting passes from such jerkies for years. All I’d catch is a bad dose of trouble.”

"Figures," Mitch agreed. "But why sweat? You don't even have to bother looking. Just relax and enjoy it. Let it come to you. Like Kenny here."

He jabbed his thumb in the direction of a tall, thin man who stood leaning against the hall doorway, squinting at the smoky room through his hornrims.

"A real creepnik, that one," Mitch said. "Used to be an assistant prof up at the U, but he doesn't have to bust a truss making a living. He's loaded. Phil tells me he popped for three jugs tonight, just to get in. Likes to make the scene, you know? And he's got eyes for you."

Judy stared at the man, then made a face. "Clammy," she said.

"So, clammy. But you could promote. He's what you call the society type. Lots of 'em sucking around, all wanting in. Swishes, eggheads, introverts, like. Too scared for fun and games but just dying to play. All you'd have to be is friendly. The teaser bit."

Judy looked at Kenny again. He blinked shyly at her from across the room.

"Well, I don't know," she murmured.

"What's to lose?" Mitch asked. "You've got it made. I mean, a beautiful chick like you."

That did it, when he called her beautiful. Judy stood up and walked over to Kenny, proud as a queen.

Kenny treated her like a queen.

He was definitely a square, she decided, but kind of nice. He kept getting her drinks and lighting cigarettes and asking if she was comfortable and did she want anything to eat. And he didn't try to touch her or suggest that the two of them sneak off together. He just talked.

"He's going to call me tomorrow," Judy told Mitch later, "for a date. You aren't sore if I go out with him?"

"Look, we set it up this way, right? So live a little!" Mitch grinned. "You want the jealousy bit?" He pulled her down on the bed. "Not from me. This Kenny won't even make a pass. He's just sick."

"He talked real intelligent—"

“Sick, sick, sick,” Mitch repeated. “Let me give you the word. Now you take squares, they’re sick but organized, like. All this jazz about jobs and families and voting the straight ticket—it’s a big habit and they’re hooked, see? But they love it.

“Creeping meatballs like Kenny are worse. They hate the habit but they can’t kick it. They’re the ones always talking it up about the beat generation, always making with the analyzing bit, always hanging around, but too chicken to get with the scene.”

He pulled her closer. “Go ahead and take him! Strictly no problem. Sure, he’s got the hots for you, but he’s too sick to make move one. Too sick for the big kicks. Like this. That’s all there is, baby. This. The big kick. The most.”

“Yes,” Judy echoed. “The most!”

So Judy went out with Kenny, to shows, to nice restaurants, to a concert. He never escorted her to anyone else’s parties, outside of the gang; he didn’t seem to have any friends of his own.

“He’s just lonely,” she told Mitch.

Mitch shrugged. “So he needs company, so let him start paying for it. Now here’s the pitch. . . .”

He instructed her, and Judy obeyed.

She told Kenny the tale about getting some of her things out of hock so she could find a job. Kenny gave her the money.

She mentioned that Mitch’s heap had broken down and the garage insisted on payment before finishing the repairs. Kenny gave her the money for that also.

She came to Kenny with the sad story about the rent, and again he opened his wallet. But this time he opened his mouth too.

“Tell Mitch that’s all,” he said.

They had just ordered dinner at this real fancy joint, and Judy didn’t want to make a scene.

But the tall man didn’t seem to be angry; his dark eyes smiled at her from behind the heavy lenses of his glasses. “Really, now,” he was saying, "didn't you think I knew Mitch set this all up? It was his idea in the first place, wasn't it? Just as it's Phil's idea that I pay for the liquor whenever I'm permitted to attend a party and Jean's idea to invite me to join their friends when they go out to eat because I always pick up the check."

Judy sighed. "But if you know, why do you do such things?"

"Call it an admission fee. Maybe I enjoy watching the show."

"Hey!" The idea hit her then. "You writing a book about us or something?"

Kenny chuckled and shook his head. "Why should I? There's nothing worth writing about. It's the same old story. Thirty years ago people like your friend Mitch called themselves the lost generation, and Hemingway and Scott Fitzgerald were their prophets. Twenty years ago they pretended to be communists, ten years ago existentialists.

"But nothing really changes. Mitch and his kind will always rationalize. Their beat philosophy—what is it but an acrobat's vocabulary of 'jumps' and 'flips' and 'blows' and 'kicks'? An immature in-group's set of catch phrases used to dramatize irresponsibility to others and to themselves."

Judy shook her head. "They're not bums! Mitch is a musician, Phil's an artist, Jean writes poetry—"

"They always did," Kenny told her. "In the Village, the Vieux Carre, the North End. But the real creative talents never stayed in these places very long. They got out. If they didn't conform to social discipline, they developed self-discipline. Mitch's kind never develop anything except self-pity. All this pretense about art is just an excuse to justify freeloading as a way of life."

"At least they're living," Judy said. "They get their kicks. Not like some people who just sit around and talk because they're too sick and too scared to take what they want."

Kenny sighed. "Splashing blobs of paint on canvas and blowing an instrument offkey doesn't make anyone a rebel. And it doesn't take a hero to get drunk on somebody else's liquor and vomit on somebody else's floor.

Kicks! What does a child like Mitch know about the real potentialities of sensation?”

He put his hand on Judy’s wrist; his grip was surprisingly strong. “The difference between Mitch and me is that I know what I want and I’m mature enough to wait for it.”

Judy jerked her wrist away. “You’ll wait a long time,” she said. Then she rose. “I think I’d like to go now.”

After he took her home and left her without a word she experienced misgivings.

“I goofed,” she told Mitch. “I blew the scene.”

Mitch shook his head. “Let him snap his cap. He’ll be back.”

“Think he’s just jealous?”

“Righterooney!” Mitch pulled up his sweatshirt and scratched. “This is a real sicknik. A masochist, like.”

Mitch had to explain to her about masochists.

Judy nodded. “I think maybe that’s it,” she agreed. “But lover, where did you learn all this goop?”

“I dig psychology. And I dig Kenny. All this stuff he handed you about how simple I am, it doesn’t hang me. You peel the banana and what’s left? The same old jazz about morality, right and wrong, good and evil.” He put his arm around Judy’s waist. His hand moved. “Look. Is this right? Is this wrong?”

Judy shuddered. “I don’t know. I don’t care. It’s you and me.”

“Yeah. You and me. The real kick.” He released her. “But I’m not forgetting what we talked about. We need some loot. Like say, if we go out to the Coast next week—”

“The Coast?”

“Frisco. Bill Wallace, cat I know out in Richmond, he’ll line me up a job in a combo. We’ll really have a ball out there. All we do is get Kenny to pay the freight.”

“But I can’t go to him for money to—”

Mitch put his arm around her again. “You don’t go. He comes to you. Want to bet?” He grinned at her. “You don’t ask for dough either. You tell him the straight story, about you and me going away together.”

“He’ll get sore.”

“He’s a masochist, remember? I dig the type. The more you pour it on, the more he loves it. He’ll pop with a going-away present. Old sicknik Kenny.”

“Honey, it wouldn’t be right. I mean, if he’s really sick like you say, then to take him this way—”

Mitch put both arms around her. “Right, wrong, all that jazz, it’s nowhere. Like the man says, beyond good and evil. Nothing matters but this. The big kick.”

“The big kick!” Judy said. “Righterooney!”

And it was righterooney two days later when Kenny called, just as Mitch predicted. So that gave her the courage to do what he ordered and tell Kenny the story. Kenny reacted as if Mitch had written his lines for him—he was a real masochist and no mistake.

Of course Judy thought there might be some mistake when he said goodbye to her without mentioning a present, and when she saw Mitch she was worried.

“He didn’t pop,” she told him. “I said we were leaving tomorrow afternoon, and all he did was smile and wish me luck. He didn’t even kiss me. . . .”

“Wait,” said Mitch. “Just wait!”

The next morning the package came in the mail. Judy was so excited that she let Mitch open it up. His hands were steady until he unwrapped the box and removed the cover. Then he started to shake.

“Christerooney!” he said. “Dig this!”

It was a diamond bracelet—and a big one.

“Mitch, look at it. It can’t be real—”

“It’s real, all right. See, the tag’s still on it. From Orfitt’s. They don’t sell phony ice, not in that joint. Why, I’ll bet it’s worth five grand, maybe ten!”

Judy started to fasten the bracelet around her left wrist, but Mitch took it away from her. “What’s with you?” he asked. “We got no time. Enough of this lovemaking.”

“But—”

“Look, here’s the bit. I’ll fall right over to Orfitt’s. No, they won’t go for any jazz about returning it, but they’ll give out with what it cost. Then we head uptown and hock it. But I want some idea of what we can get, dig?”

“Oh, honey, it’s so lovely—”

Mitch grabbed her by the ponytail. “We can yak about it on the trip out. We leave for the Coast this afternoon, remember? And this pays our way.” Judy didn’t say anything.

“Okay,” Mitch muttered. “So you keep the bracelet. And you fall up and see old Kenny, just like he figures you will, after I’m gone. Real cozy like, you and that sicknik and the ice, the togetherness bit. Me, I’m off to the Coast for kicks.”

Judy gripped his arm. “No, Mitch. I don’t want the bracelet. Take me with you. We’ll hock it, just like you say.”

So they went down to Orfitt’s in the heap. But first Mitch got into some decent threads—he had this one blue suit and he wore a white shirt and a tie too. “You don’t blow into an uptown layout like Orfitt’s looking beat,” he told her. “And another thing—I want you to stay outside, so the word never gets back to Kenny about you asking questions about the ice. Maybe he buys a lot of stuff in there. Let me handle the scene. I’ll make like a real square.”

They parked right in front, and Judy sat waiting while Mitch marched into the store. She could see him through the window, playing it cool when the clerk came up. She could see him talking to the clerk, pulling the bracelet out of his pocket. She watched the clerk examine it.

And then she saw the clerk signal the manager, and both of them jabbering at Mitch, and he was shaking his head and trying to shut them up. Then he slammed his fist down on the counter and started to walk away, but the manager grabbed him, and all of a sudden a third character in some kind of guard's uniform came up and hung onto Mitch's arm. The clerk was pressing a buzzer, some kind of alarm thing, and the other two held him tight, and then Judy could hear the sirens down the street.

So she started up the motor and cut out of there.

The car was all loaded for the trip, but she couldn't leave town. She had no money, and besides, Mitch was in trouble. Judy drove back to his pad, and by the time she arrived she figured out what had happened.

It was getting dark already, but she had no difficulty in recognizing the tall man who leaned against the downstairs stoop in the shadows. And because she had the deal straight in her own mind now she didn't make a scene. Instead, she just nodded at him when she got out of the car and allowed him to follow her up the stairs.

She stooped and unlocked the door, beckoned to him to enter.

"You don't act very surprised to see me," Kenny said.

Judy shrugged.

"Which means you've probably realized what happened," he said. "In which case this won't surprise you either." He stepped over to the door and locked it. The key flashed in the gloom and disappeared into his pocket.

"You think you're pretty smart, don't you?" Judy said. "Stealing that bracelet because you knew Mitch would go back to Orfitt's and try to find out what it was worth and they'd recognize it."

"Smart enough," Kenny said. "At least Mitch fell for it. I imagine he'll get at least two years in which to meditate on his stupidity. Or cupidity." Kenny smiled shyly at her across the dim room. "Cupidity—under the circumstances, that's very good!"

"I can go to the police. I can explain," Judy said.

Kenny nodded. "Yes. But I doubt if they'll believe you. After all, the car is full of your luggage. You were ready to leave. And you don't have any friends here in town, not any real friends, who might serve as character witnesses. That's the trouble with beatniks, you know—you lack roots. You can drop out of sight overnight and nobody will ever know or care—"

"Skip the sermon," Judy murmured. "You don't have to give me a hard time. I know the bit now. If I'm nice to you you'll get Mitch off the hook." She began to fumble with the buttons of her blouse. "So I'm nice."

Kenny walked over to her and put a restraining hand on her shoulder. "Don't misunderstand," he said gently. "I didn't go to all the trouble of arranging this meeting just to force you to be nice, as you insist on calling it. I'm sorry to disappoint you, but I'm not interested in that sort of thing. Any more than I'm interested in the fate of a stupid animal like Mitch. Let him rot in jail—there's nothing you can do now to get him out."

"Animal?" Judy's voice trembled. "Why, you lousy masochist!"

Kenny seemed puzzled. "What on earth do you mean, dear child?"

"You know what I mean. Mitch told me what you are. Like now, you won't even touch me. This isn't what you want, is it? This isn't how you get your kicks—"

"But I am touching you!" Kenny caressed her shoulder softly with his left hand. "It's true I don't get my kicks this way, as Mitch would say. But he was wrong about my being a masochist. Actually, you know, I'm a sadist."

Judy opened her mouth to ask what a sadist was, but Kenny put his hand over it. And then he bent her back over the sofa, bent her back in the darkness.

She couldn't scream and she couldn't move. He held her there, and Judy could only stare as he pulled out the knife and showed her the big kick.

The Last Plea

Do you despise rock 'n' roll? Do you think Elvis is a hound dog? Do you understand the words of any popular song? Here, tor the first time, the whole ghastly plot is revealed, the Conspiracy of Cacophony traced to its Cosmic Lair.

THERE was nothing supernatural about the way Clay Clinton got his start. That part comes later.

In the beginning, there was only Luther Snodgrass, of Crump Creek, Texas.

Nobody paid much attention to Luther Snodgrass at first, including his own mother. She took one look at the squalling brat when he was born, then dumped him in the railway ditch next to the water-tower. Within five hours she took the next freight out of town and vanished into Oblivion (Olda.).

All she bequeathed the infant was his name, scribbled with the stub end of a pencil on the inside of a Sterno label. She christened him with a note pinned to half a pair of panties which she ripped down the middle and wound around his spindle-shanks as he lay cradled in an old orange-crate.

Her message was brief and to the point, if any.

> To Whoom It may Consern: Pleese somebody take care of my babey boy his name is Luther Snodgrass after his father the no good sunabich he run out on me in Waco.
> Hoping You Are The Same,

—Joyleen Crutt

A gandy-dancer named Hank Peavey found Luther—and his letter of introduction to a waiting world—within a matter of minutes after the freight pulled out. He called the sheriff and the sheriff took the baby to the County Hospital, and the County Hospital (after a few desultory efforts to locate either Joyleen Crutt or the no good sunabich she had honored with the paternity of her offspring) passed the infant on to the County Orphanage at Crump Creek.

Luther Snodgrass did a lot of howling when he was a baby, but nobody can lay credit to discovering him then.

In due time he grew up to attend grammar school, where he pledged allegiance to the American flag, broke three windows, learned how to read (Goofball Comics) and write ("Old Ladey Krantz Has Dirtey Pints") and do elementary sums ("Cigarettes—28. Muscatel—594 a fifth").

At the age of sixteen he completed his formal education and his informal education simultaneously—the latter through the kind offices of a young lady named Luletta Switzel. Unfortunately for Luther Snodgrass, Miss Switzel was her father's pride and joy; rivalled in his affections only by the 12-gauge shotgun that he subsequently pointed in Luther's direction.

Luther got out of range in a manner apparently traditional to his family; he hopped the next rattler.

What he did in El Paso we'll probably never know. What he did in Fort Worth was thirty days for vagrancy.

During the next two years it almost seemed as if the young man were destined to become a writer. At least, he underwent what is apparently the customary apprenticeship for that career—he was a dishwasher in a restaurant, a house-to-house salesman, a fry-cook, and a merchant seaman. Actually, however, he flunked out on this last requirement. Luther Snodgrass never really went to sea; he merely did some work as an itinerant stevedore on the banana boats moored at the docks in New Orleans.

It was there, presumably, that he picked up his talent for the guitar (along with something else which he was fortunately able to get rid of after a few visits to the Public Health Clinic). But the musical affliction persisted; probably some of the local roustabouts encouraged him. He even managed to obtain possession of his own instrument—fortunately, nobody asked to examine the dice during the game—and before long he was playing and passing the hat in the French Quarter. The Vieux Carre Association takes a dim view of such activities on Bourbon Street, but he managed to get into a few dives on Decauter and Chartres. He developed a popular repertoire, including such authentic folk-classics as The Harlot of Jerusalem, Christopher Columbo, and that plaintive ballad, The Ring-Dang-Doo.

The few connoisseurs of folk music who heard him agreed unanimously that Josh White in his prime had never sounded anything like that. Luther Snodgrass was already beginning to develop his distinctive wriggling style; he learned that it was better to writhe and keep moving so as to avoid any missiles aimed his way by listeners who didn't appreciate his talent.

It was during this period that Opportunity knocked on young Luther's door. That chance of a life-time appeared.

To be exact, it wasn't really his door, but that of Miss Evangeline LaTour, who resided in the Quarter as a young art student (the art being pickpocketing and the old badger-game). And it wasn't really Opportunity knocking, but a gentleman named Jefferson Davis Fink, renowned throughout the sunny Southland as the progenitor, proprietor and sole purveyor of Finkola.

Who has not heard of ola—that antidote for asthma, banisher of bunions, cure for catarrh, destroyer of dandruff, eradicator of eczema; indeed, of all the alphabetically-arranged ailments the flesh is heir to, including such obscure sub-Masonian-and-Dixonian-Line afflictions as the running trots, the galloping consumption and the creeping miseries?

If there are any amongst you who remain in ignorance of this amazing new scientific discovery, it is not because of any failing on the part of Jefferson Davis Fink. He has spared neither pain nor expense in his effort to spread the glad tidings of miraculous healing properties throughout the length and breadth of Dixie. Wherever five watts join together in the conspiracy known as a southern radio station, the Finkola jingles jangle forth. Wherever a tall pine or a majestic cypress looms along the highway, a Finkola billboard obscures it. Wherever the sweet scent of magnolias mingles upon the soft and balmy breeze, it mingles with the joyfully-drawn breath of a Finfcola user (37 alcohol, by volume).

“Yeass, honey-chile,” said Jefferson Davis Fink to Miss Evangeline LaTour, as he skilfully diverted her caressing fingertips from the neighborhood of his watch-chain, “Ah reckon they ain’t hardly nobody nohow who don’t guzzle the stuff.”

“My aunt Minnie, she used it for a poultice, time she had them boils,” Miss LaTour volunteered, eyeing her companions gen-oo-ine 5-carat (slightly yellowish) diamond ring.

“Sure, sugah,” Mr. Fink agreed. “It cures ’most anything, up to and including mastitis. And I hear tell it makes a mighty refreshin’ douche, too. Mighty refreshin’.” Then, “Great bolls o’ cotton, what’s that?”

That proved to be Luther Snodgrass, returning unexpectedly early from his nightly rounds and roundelays. The sight of the tall, gangling youth who confronted them menacingly, armed with a guitar, served to both annoy and affright Miss LaTour.

“Gah dam’,” she exclaimed, with girlish petulance. “Ah tole you to knock, afore you come bargin’ in heah that-away.”

“Who is this?” inquired Jefferson Davis Fink, sitting up and reaching for his vest.

“Mah nevvoo,” Miss LaTour explained. “He’s like mah proto jay.”

“Proto jay? What-all is he a proto jay of?”

“Well, he plays tar. Ah been soht of boa’din’ him heah whilst he studies up on it.”

Noting the look of skepticism on Mr. Fink’s face, she turned to Luther and waggled a coy cuticle. “You-all play suthin’ foe Mistah Fink, hear?”

Luther heard. And Mr. Fink, whether he was thus inclined or not, heard also.

“Purty?” Miss LaTour inquired.

The least that gallantry demanded was a nod. Mr. Fink gave it, and thus precipitated another selection. Luther was all set to launch into a third, when Mr. Fink held up his hand.

The sight of the diamond silenced the young man.

“You right talented, boy,” he declared. “Right talented. Evah think of goin’ into the show bizness?”

“Show bizness?” Luther’s eyes rivalled the diamond. “Ah been aimin’ fer it.”

Jefferson Davis Fink cleared his throat, or at least a portion thereof which was not occupied by plug tobacco. “Well, reckon you done hit the mark, son. So happens Ah’m readyin’ anothuh exstrava-ganza. Yessiree, anothuh big Finkola Fun Festival is ’bout ready to hit the road.”

“Do tell!” Luther’s reply was academic; actually it was scarcely necessary to tell him anything about the famous Finkola productions. Every year a truckload of top talent trouped through the turpentine swamps and bayous, and into the big tent swarmed every man, woman and wood-colt who possessed the ola label which entitled the bearer to admission. It was all part of Mr. Fink’s advertising campaign, and he spared no expense in mounting his entertainments; raiding every cultural Mecca from Grossinger’s to Las Vegas in his quest for top talent. And now—

“Boy, Ah’m gonna give you a chance. Yesiree, that’s exactly what Ah’m gonna do! You’re gonna work for me!”

“You mean, play mah pittar in the show? How about that?”

“Wonderful!” Evangeline LaTour beamed fondly on Luther and still more fondly on Jefferson Davis Fink. “Ah do appreciate this. Truly Ah do.”

“Think nothin’ of it. Always ready to encuh-ge talent when Ah see it.” Mr. Fink patted Miss LaTour on the thigh in a fatherly fashion and turned to Luther Snodgrass. “Repoht to mah office at the factory tomorrow mohn’in’.”

“Yes, suh!”

“Meanwhile, kindly git to hell out’n heah.”

“Yes, suh!”

Thus, as every biographer knows, Luther Snodgrass made his professional debut for Finkola the following week, in the thriving metropolis of Ague, Louisiana.

What every biographer doesn’t know—or carefully neglects to mention—is that the young musician laid a bomb.

A liberal swig of Finkola has a tendency to deaden the hearing (indeed, there are some authorities who claim that steady indulgence will eventually deaden the indulger to a point where his only further use for Finkola will be as embalming-fluid) and the good people of Ague had sampled enough of the nostrum before Luther appeared so that they were more or less inured to the actual sound of his singing and playing.

However, their olfactory powers remained acute, and before Luther had finished his first number, several of the spectators were glancing under the wooden seats in an effort to detect the whereabouts of a sick polecat.

Some of the men in the audience considered slipping out quietly and summoning an emergency meeting of the Klan.

Jefferson Davis Fink, astute showman that he was, got the message. And right after the first show, he delivered it to Luther Snodgrass.

“Out, boy,” he said. “You finished.”

“Finished? But Mistah Fink, suh—”

“Don’ you-all Mistah Fink suh me, hear? Git!”

“Ah thought Ah sounded purty good out theah tonight.”

“Good foh what? Lookee heah, boy, Ah’m sellin’ medicine to make folks feel bright an’ sassy. Then you come on, a membah of mah own company, an’ you sound like a hog with it’s ham caught in a bob-wire fence. Call that smart advertisin’ ? No, son, you gotta go.”

“Please, give me anothuh chance.”

“Sorry. Powerful sorry.”

“But you-all cain’t leave me stranded heah. Got no grit-money, got nothin’—”

“Heah.” Jefferson Davis Fink held out a five-dollar-bill and a bottle of Finkola. “This ought to see you back to town. You-all can drink the bottle on the bus. Compliments of the house.”

And that was all Luther Snodgrass could get out of him.

In the end he tnidged away, guitar in one hand, grip in the other. But the bus station was closed, and there would be no transportation available until ten o’clock the next morning, so Luther didn’t go Greyhound.

He picked at his grits and some iguana gumbo in Ague’s sole culinary establishment; meanwhile squandering another fifty cents in the jukebox to play the latest recordings by Elvis Presley, Jerry Lee Lewis and The Platters.

“Ah kin sing evah-bit as good as they,” he muttered. “Louder, even!”

The thought—as well as the sounds—understandably depressed him. So much so that after he left the restaurant he spent his remaining capital for a bottle of something called Old Poontang—A Blend: 85% Neutral Spirits, 15% Hostile Spirits. It was something like that, anyway; he didn’t bother to read the label. And he didn’t bother to delay in consuming the contents. By the time he’d finished, Luther made up his mind to hitch-hike back to New Orleans. He took the road to the Crescent City, but it was very dark outside, and somehow he seemed to have missed his way.

The next thing he remembered was wandering down a bayou byway which led deeper and deeper into the swamps. The night was black as pitch and even smelled that way; tarry bubbles oozed from the swamp as Luther trod a path never used even by day, and then only by Voodoo conjure-men. A mist crept out of the trees, and Luther shivered. He emptied the bottle and tossed it away, then stumbled on.

"Ah'm purely lost," he complained, sitting down on an old log and fishing out the other bottle, containing Finkola. He uncorked and attacked it, and before long, it was attacking him.

Perhaps the Finkola was to blame. I'm not going to attempt to sway your opinion. You'll have to decide for yourself. At any rate, nothing happened to Luther Snodgrass until he began to drink the stuff.

"Lost!" he sighed. "Nowhere, U.S.A.!"

It suddenly occurred to him that he was addressing his complaints to an exceedingly large alligator which had crawled up out of the bubbling blackness and was perched on the log beside him.

Luther put his arm around the alligator's neck.

"Whassa matter, ole buddy-buddy?" he asked the saurian. "Y'all look purty green around the gills. What you need is a slurp of Finkola." He extended the bottle. "Mebbe it'll help you to git rid o' them warts, too!"

The alligator shook its head politely.

"Party-pooper!" muttered Luther, bitterly. He took another swig. His mood changed. "Ah don't blame you. Nobuddy wants to drink with me. Nobuddy wants to heah me sing an' play. Nobuddy loves me. Ah jus' ain't appreciated, nohow. Why for is evvy-buddy agin us artists?"

The alligator shrugged.

"What's Elvis got that Ah ain't got?" Luther demanded. "How come folks make such a fuss ovah a square piano-player like this heah Albert Schweitzer?"

The alligator started to squirm off the log.

“Don’ leave me!” Luther wailed. “Ah craves sympathy. You see befo’ you a beat-down cat. Ah’s sick of tryin’ the ha’hd way. A man gits fed up, you know? Right now, Ah’d sell mah soul fo’ a little ole hunk of prosperity.”

The alligator edged away.

“Git me out’n this swamp,” Luther implored, clutching vainly at the departing reptile and falling backwards off the log into the muddy ooze. “Take me to your Leader!”

That’s what the man said.

Of course, it was only a current phrase; a commonplace expression, like the one about selling one’s soul. And naturally, the alligator was only an alligator.

You can interpret it that way if you like. On the other hand, you may choose to believe otherwise.

In either case, all I can do is offer the facts in the matter.

Which were, and are, as follows. Luther fell off the log into the mud. When he sat up again the alligator had disappeared—but there, sitting on the stump-end of the fallen tree, was another presence. It seemed to be a man; at least its face was slightly less green and slightly less warty than the alligator’s had been.

Luther stared up at the stranger.

“Evenin’,” he murmured.

“Good evening, son,” the stranger replied. “What seems to be the difficulty?”

“Ah fell.”

“Hmm, so I perceive. Well, you’re not the only one. I’ve had some previous acquaintance with the fallen.” The stranger smiled benignly. “It behooves us, if you’ll pardon the expression, to take consolation at times likes these in that glorious motto—‘The South shall rise again!’ And now, if you’ll permit me to assist you—”

He extended a hand and hauled young Luther up to a seat beside him on the log. Luther blinked at him and beheld his benefactor. The stranger was a plump, white-haired gentleman wearing a hammer-tail coat and a modest five-gallon hat.

"Who mought you be?" Luther inquired.

"I might be Judge Harmer," the stranger told him.

"Judge?"

"An honorary title, of course," his companion assured him. "But I'm a real Harmer, of that you may be sure. Come from a long line of Harmers. Certainly you are familiar with the name?"

"Reckon not," Luther answered. "Ah'm a stranger in these parts. Luther Snodgrass, at yo' service."

"Pleased to meet you." Judge Harmer's eyes twinkled. "But speaking of service, I perceive you have a bottle—"

"He'p yo'self," Luther urged, extending the Judge Harmer reached for the bottle, read the label, then hastily drew his hand away. "No, thank you," he muttered. "On second thought—"

"But it's only Finkola—"

"I assure you I'm perfectly familiar with the concoction," Judge Harmer replied. "And so again I say, no, thanks."

"You talk awful funny."

"Just plain English."

"Yeah, what I mean. Y'all sound like—pardon the expression—a Yankee." Luther gazed suspiciously at his new acquaintance. "If'n you ain't a real judge, then what are you, anyhow?"

"Call me a talent scout, if you like."

"A talent scout? You mean like for shows and all?" Judge Harmer nodded. "Come now!" Luther stood up. "What-all would a talent scout be doin' out heah in this little ole swamp?"

"Why, looking for talent, of course."

"In a bayou—at midnight?"

“I was informed that there might be a possibility of an informal get-together in these purlieus,” the judge explained.

“Who-all would hold a sociable in a place like this?” Luther’s eyes narrowed. “Hold on—you-all ain’t talkin’ about one of them Voodoo meetin’s, are you?”

The judge shrugged. “I believe I’ve heard the term used in that connection, yes.”

“But what kind of talent can you git out’n a bunch of conjure men and hexers?”

“Oh, you’d be surprised.” The judge smiled. “I understand they sing and dance at such ceremonies. And of course, there are always drummers. There’s a great demand for drummers up North, you know. Give a man a set of bongoes instead of a drum and clap a beret on his head and you’ve got a good non-union Beatnik.”

“Nevah figgered it that way befo’,” Luther admitted.

“But I fear I was mistaken,” the judge continued, consulting his pocket-watch.

Luther couldn’t imagine how he could possibly see it in the darkness, but apparently the green and glittering eyes searched out successfully. “Here it is, past midnight, and no meeting in evidence.” He sighed. “I don’t know what’s come over folks nowadays, really I don’t! Used to be an average of three meetings a week, regular as clockwork, and a human sacrifice on Sundays. Now everybody stays home and watches Oral Roberts on television.” He sighed again. “Apparently I’m wasting my time.”

“Hold on!” Luther said. “If it’s talent you’re after, mebbe Ah’m your boy. If’n Ah kin find mah git-tar—”

He stooped and fumbled in the mud at his feet until he located the battered instrument. Raising it, he brushed his fingers lightly across the strings, then turned the guitar and shook it vigorously.

"Dern that toad!" he muttered, then brightened. "Happens that Ah'm a entetainer mah-self. You-all care for an audition?"

"Be delighted." The judge settled himself on the log and Luther, without further preamble, launched into the rendition of a popular ditty entitled The Hang Down

Your Head Tom Dooley Cha-Cha-Cha.

Several alligators back in the swamp joined in the second chorus, and Luther finished with a brisk obligato which caromed off his left tonsil.

"Well?" he inquired. "What do you think?"

"I think I'll have a drink after all," said the judge, hastily reaching for the Finkola bottle.

"You didn't like mah singin' ?"

"I never said that," his audience replied. "In fact, I was merely about to propose a toast."

"What about mah playin' ?"

"I never heard anything to equal it." The judge took a deep gulp.

"Mebbe you-all'd like to give me a job?"

"My dear boy, I'm no impresario!"

"Is that like an imp, mebbe?"

"In a way." The judge smiled. "Actually, an impresario is a bit worse—he's a man who puts on theatrical performances. Well, as I say, I'm not one of those. I'm merely a sort of talent scout. I only find talent."

"An agent, like?"

"Ah, yes. That would be closer to the truth. I'm an agent."

"Then you could sign me up?"

"Well—"

"Mebbe you ain't convinced. Mebbe Ah ought to sing agin—"

"No!" the judge exclaimed, hurriedly. "No, that won't be necessary at all. I'm quite willing to sign you right now."

"Ten per cent, ain't it?"

"A hundred per cent, if you like."

“That’s moughty generous,” Luther grinned. “One o’ them long-term contracks?”

“Lifetime,” the judge assured him. “Better still, in perpetuity.”

“Ah was kinda hopin’ we could sign right heah.”

“Good enough.” The judge produced a document—not from his pocket, not from his sleeve, but from somewhere around his person. “Errr—I seem to have mislaid my fountain-pen. But this twig will do. And for ink, let’s just prick your finger, here.”

“Nothin’ doin’ !” Luther drew himself proudly erect. “Ah suspicioned you-all was the Devil right along.”

“But I’m not the Devil, I swear it—merely an agent!” The judge’s tones were unctuous. “Son, this is your big chance. Don’t toss it away because of a technicality!”

“Well, Ah ain’t signin’ anythin’ in mah blood.” Luther frowned determinedly, then brightened. “Lookee heah, how’s about me signin’ in some of this Fi

“Hmmm—I don’t know—it seems highly irregular—”

“Ain’t nothin’ irregular about it!” Luther protested. “Ah done heah the raddio announcer tell just the opposite. He say there ain’t nothin’ like Finkola for keepin’ you regular.”

“I’d prefer blood,” the judge murmured.

“You-all want me or don’t you?” Luther was solemn. “Ah tell you, friend, it ain’t every day you git a chance to heah a talent like mine. You better not pass it by.”

The judge sighed. “That’s right,” he said.

“So what you say?”

The judge sighed again. “Oh, very well. Sign in Finkola. After what you’ve already drunk from the bottle, I’m sure your blood is probably ninety per cent Finkola anyway. So there’s not much difference.”

"You-all want this formal?" Luther inquired. "If so, Ah'll make a capital X."

"Can't you write?" The judge frowned. "Not even your own name?"

"Course Ah kin! It's the spellin' Ah ain't so sure of." Luther scrawled his X on the document, then reached for the bottle.

"We got us a deal," he said. "Mought as well kill this now."

Apparently the Finkola had the same idea, because shortly after swallowing it, Luther gazed at his newfound agent with a contented grin, rolled up his eyes and heels, and passed out.

When he came to, he was in Noiseville, U.S.A.

Now the actual name of the town may be Nashville, or Chattanooga, or even Memphis. All three communities have at times proclaimed—and loudly—their right to be called the music capitals of America.

Call it rock-'n-roll, call it country music, call it hillbilly style, call it something which can't be printed in these pages—the fact remains that these three cities are responsible for more popular entertainment, decibel for decibel, and dollar for dollar, than any other metropolises since Sodom and Gomorrah.

And it was in one of them that Luther Snodgrass awoke.

"Where am Ah?" he wailed. "Does it matter?" replied Judge Harmer.

"Matter? Ah'll say it does! Must've been drunk as a skunk! Ah do declare, Ah don't even remember mah own name."

"It's Clay Clinton," the judge told him.

"Clay Clinton?" The young man blinked suspiciously. "You sure it ain't Luther Snodgrass?"

"Not after last night it isn't. Don't you remember? You auditioned for me, I signed you up as my client?"

"Yeah, reckon so."

"Well, as your agent, I'm taking over your career. And the first thing I'm doing is changing your name. Luther Snodgrass—that's no good for theater marquees. Takes too many lights. And it's too long for TV credit-cards. You're Clay Clinton."

"Ah'm goin' on television?"

"Eventually. After you've had your vocal lessons."

"Ah don't need none. Ah sing okay."

"I'm not referring to singing. You're going to learn English."

"But who kin unnerstan' Elvis or Jerry Lee Lewis—?"

"I'm not referring to the way you deliver the so-called lyrics of your so-called songs.

It's just that when you talk, it helps to be intelligible."

"You gonna ruin mah style."

"Trust me. From now on you're Clay Clinton, and you're my boy."

"He's my boy!"

For the first time Luther heard the strange voice.

He raised his head (he was lying in bed in Room 666 of the Flabbee Arms Hotel at the time) and instantly regretted his effort. It made his skull ache with a hangover, and worse than that, it afforded him a glimpse of the speaker.

A dear little white-haired old lady stood at the judge's side, smiling lovingly at Luther from behind the neck of a gin-bottle. She gazed at him with tender, bloodshot eyes.

"Son," said the judge. "I want you to meet your mother."

"Mother?" Luther sat up. "Not really?"

"Don't ever let me catch you talking like that again," the judge cautioned him. "From now on, you're Clay Clinton, like I said. And this is your dear mother."

"But—"

"It's time, son, that you learned the Facts of Life. Every young popular singing star has a mother, whom he worships and adores. Not only is it good for reams of publicity, but it can also help to take the heat off if—perish forbid!—he happens to get tangled up with one of those chorus girls in Las Vegas. You understand?"

Luther nodded. “So you hired me a mother, is that it?”

He stared at the little old lady. “Where’d she park her broomstick?”

“If you must know, it’s on the roof,” the little old lady told him. “My cat is watching it. She’s queer for phallic symbols.”

“Then you are a witch?” Luther swung his legs over the side of the bed. “Ah was only kiddin’—Ah nevah dreamed—”

“Here, where are you going?” the judge demanded.

“Away!” Luther fumbled for his jeans. “Ah don’t aim to mess with no witches—”

“We have a contract,” Judge Harmer reminded him. “Besides, she’s not a practicing witch. She’s retired.”

“That’s right, buster,” cackled the old woman. “The judge hired me right out of the Old Spook’s Home.”

“But Ah don’t need no super-type-natural Mamma.”

“No. But you do need an English instructor. And that’s something your new mother can do for you. She can teach you how to speak properly. Besides, I want someone around here to keep an eye on you while I’m away.”

“You goin’ somewheres?”

“Of course. I’m an agent. You’re not my only client, you know. I’ve got people in New York, Miami, Hollywood, who need my help. But ask your mother. She can tell you.”

And in the days that followed, she did.

Mother proved to be an apt instructor. During the next few weeks, the new Clay Clinton stayed in his room with her and she patiently taught him the rudiments of grammar and pronunciation. Using such standard texts as Down-beat and Variety, he gradually enlarged his vocabulary.

The judge appeared three weeks later.

"Well?" he inquired. "How is it going?"

"Crazy, man!" Luther informed him. "Mom falls up to the pad here, making the scene with the English bit every day, and I'm coming on strong. I mean, it's like a gasser, Dad. You dig?"

The judge beamed. "My boy, I'm proud of you!" he declared. "All that vulgar Southern accent has disappeared—now anyone can understand what you're saying. Son, I do believe you're almost ready."

"Almost? Like I'm the most, Daddy-O." Luther paced the floor. "I'm with it, Pops. Solid."

"Not so fast. First we'll have to work on your musical education."

"What's with the music, Clyde? I make with my pipes, I belt it out and they flip. I mean like they'll love it."

The judge shook his head. "You need polish. That's another thing Mother is here to teach you." He turned to the little old lady. "Let him study for another couple of weeks," he commanded. "With the "The cat? Which cat?"

"My black cat," Mother told him. "She's got just the right vibrato for a popular singer these days. Real fishshaped tones."

So for two weeks, Luther listened to the cat. The cat didn't always feel like howling, but mother belted it regularly with her broomstick and belted herself with the gin-bottle as Luther listened and learned.

When the judge returned he was properly impressed. Luther did a number for him.

"Wonderful," Judge Harmer exclaimed. "Why, you can't hardly tell him and the cat apart!"

"He's a good boy," mother declared. "You know, Judge, I had my doubts when you took me out of straight sorcery and made me get into show biz. I thought you were like putting me down. But this is the greatest! Sticking pins into wax figures, all that jazz—it's funky compared to working with live talent. And Avhen I think of all the harm I can do—"

She cackled and tackled her gin.

"Never mind that now," the judge cautioned, with a warning look in Luther's direction. "We're going to put the finishing touches on his education now. I think we’re ready for Eddie.”

“Eddie?” Luther echoed. “Who’s he?”

“Eddie Puss, at your service—blowing cool and plenty nervous!” A dapper little bald-headed man bounded into the room. “Ah, Mother, good to see you! Share some skin!” He shook hands enthusiastically. “Same old fascinating witch, eh? Have broom, will travel. Righterooni?”

“This is Eddie Puss,” the judge said. “He writes songs.”

“Not my real name, of course,” the little man said, grinning at Luther. “They slapped the handle on me because I write a lot of Mother numbers. Eddie Puss, like in the complex and all that jazz, dig? Also, because I’m quite a cat.”

“But I don’t need a songwriter,” Luther objected, in his newfound English. “I’m the most.”

“Everybody needs songwriters in this business,” the judge told him. “How do you suppose a hit singer operates these days? They all have to write their own numbers in order to get into the Top Ten. And that’s where people like Eddie come in handy. They can do the coaching. Teach you the ropes.” He turned to the little man. “How about it—what do you think?”

“Well, I don’t know.” Eddie Puss surveyed Luther with a calculating eye. “He’s almost too old, don’t you think? I mean, what we need like is young blood. Most big hits, they’re written by kids still in high school. Freshmen are best. Me, I’ve even worked with seniors, but it’s hard.”

“He’s really very childish,” the judge reassured him. “I want you to try.”

“I can’t promise anything—”

“You wouldn’t be going back on our agreement, would you?” The judge was suave. “Remember what you were when I met you? Justa frustrated lyric-writer. All you ever were able to do was those four-line poems on the walls of public—”

“Never mind!” Eddie Puss shuddered. “I appreciate what you’ve done, and like I say, I’ll try.”

“Then get busy,” the judge muttered. “I want this boy in shape for his debut in two weeks. Teach him the popular song business.”

So Luther learned the popular song business from yet another teacher.

“Really nothing to it,” Eddie reassured him, during the course of their daily lessons. “It’s as simple as NBC. All you got to remember is that there are only two kinds of pop hits today. One of ’em is about a couple of high school kids in love, and the other makes even less sense. The main thing is, you have to remember to include certain phrases in each lyric.”

“Such as?”

“Well, we got what we call key-words. You know ’em.”

“You mean like heart, and tears, and embrace?”

“Crazy, man! Only you never use ’em that way. You make with the phrase. So it comes out, this heart of mine, and these tears in my eyes, and your fond embrace. Whatever you do, never change a single word. Here’s the rest of the list—dig it, because it’s all you’re gonna need to write dozens of songs. The touch of your lips. They don’t understand. I hold your charms. Each thrilling moment. Of love divine.” He paused. “And one thing more. The most important bit. Every couple of lines, you got to throw in the word, baby.”

Mother was crying. “I always was one to snap my cap over poetry.”

Luther himself was equally impressed.

“See how easy it is?” Eddie remarked. “With me helping you on lyrics and the cat here giving you the tunes, we can’t miss.”

And they didn’t.

Two weeks later, to the day, Judge Harmer appeared in the hotel room.

“Everything in readiness?” he demanded. Mother and Eddie Puss beamed proudly and the cat purred at Luther and nodded.

“Prepare to dig your wig, Big Daddy,” Luther said, picking up his guitar. “We’ve got a smasheroo.”

And he launched into the world premiere of the number now universally known as, If I Had To Do It All Over Again, I'd Do It Over You.

For a moment after the last note sickened and died away there was an impressive silence in the little room.

Then the telephone jingled and Judge Harmer picked it up.

"Yes," he said. "Yes, I understand. Right away."

He replaced the phone in its cradle and turned to the gathering with a smile of relief.

"Management is getting complaints on the noise," he said, happily. "We're being evicted."

"Then it registered," Eddie Puss muttered.

"It must have. Come on, let's get started."

"Where are we going?" Luther was puzzled.

"To New York, of course. For your debut. I understand that Hank Corrupta is replacing Terry Coma at the Club Sandwich on Saturday."

"Corrupta? He's with that rival outfit, MCA, isn't he?" Eddie demanded.

"Right. We got to get rid of him. And we will." Judge Harmer grinned. "What he doesn't know is that our boy here will be replacing him."

"But how—?" Luther murmured.

"You'll see." The judge turned. "Start packing, we're off to the big city."

Mother started for the window.

"Where are you going?" the judge demanded.

"I was just after my broomstick—"

"We're traveling by TWA this time," he told her. "Never mind the expense. Besides, I'll need your services en route."

"What do you want me to do?"

"Get three pounds of wax—no, two will do, Corrupta's pretty skinny. Make me a poppet. And then—"

"With the pins, eh? Give him the old stab-and-jab routine?" Mother cackled.

“No, he wouldn’t even feel the needle. He’d just think it was a fast fix. I’ve got a better idea.” And the judge whispered something in her ear.

She cackled again.

And she continued to cackle on the plane, as she sat beside Luther and moulded a wax figurine which took on an eery resemblance to Hank Corrupta.

“Why, it’s amazing!” Luther marveled. “Where did you ever learn to model like that?”

“In my younger days I used to work for Disney,” the crone confided. “I was a stand-in for The Reluctant Dray on. I picked up a lot of techniques from his artists.”

“Well, it’s certainly a remarkable job,” the young man said. “Even those hands are perfect.”

“They have to be,” the old woman said. “Because of this.” She began to mumble over the mannikin and then, suddenly, she reached out and squeezed the waxen right hand.

“You—you crushed it!” Luther exclaimed.

“Natch. And I just got you a job!” she predicted.

Luther didn’t believe it.

Not until he arrived in New York and Judge Harmer showed him the announcement in Ed Sullivan’s column. Hank Corrupta would not be opening at the Club Sandwich on Saturday night after all.

“Lost his voice?” Luther wondered, aloud.

“Worse than that,” the judge declared, smugly. “Read what it says. He can’t sing because he hurt his hand and he won’t be able to snap his fingers!”

“But I still don’t see—”

“Leave everything to me. I’m going down to the Club Sandwich right now and talk to the boys about putting you on.”

“You have connections?”

“In this business, you’ve got to have connections. Why, the Musician’s Union and I are just like that.” He held up two fingers, then drew them across his throat.

Luther shivered.

He was still shivering after the judge had left.

“What’s the matter, boy?” asked Eddie Puss. “What gives?”

“I’m scared,” Luther confessed.

“What’s to be scared of? You’re all set. You’ve let your sideburns grow, you haven’t combed your hair in a month, and if you shiver like that on stage tonight nobody can tell you from Elvis himself.”

“It’s not that. It’s like I never really believed what the judge said before. And I never thought mother was a real witch—”

“Wise up, buster,” the old woman said. “How do you think anyone gets ahead in show business these days? It sure enough ain’t talent.”

“You mean it’s all the result of magic?”

“What do you think? You’ve watched television, haven’t you? How else could half of those ham-bones get on in the first place?”

“But I’ve always thought—”

“Never mind what you thought. This is it, pal. This is the big time!”

And it was.

That evening, at ten o’clock, Luther Snodgrass, alias Clay Clinton, stepped up to the microphone of the Club Sandwich and brandished the gold guitar which Judge Harmer had slipped into his surprised fingers just before his number was announced. And he killed the people.

“I did it!” Luther marveled, at the impromptu party following his performance. “I really sent them!” He laughed happily and nudged Eddie Puss in the ribs. “And it was me, singing and playing up there. That’s what they dug the most—me. Nobody hoodooed them into applauding. And to think I almost fell for that line about witchcraft!”

“Yeah,” said Eddie.

"You were ribbing me, weren't you? I mean, you're just a lyric-writer. The judge is a smart agent, but he's only human. Mother gets stoned and thinks she's a witch, but that's for the birds. I see it now—you were all in it together, a real swinging combo, feeding me that jazz so I'd keep up my confidence."

"Yeah," said mother.

"But from now on, we're straight up and flying right. I get the message—you can level with me. Because I'm not scared any more. I know I can punch over a number. So let's forget all that Creepville jazz."

"Yeah," said the cat . . .

And Luther Snodgrass forgot witchcraft from then on. In a little while he almost forgot his own name. Because he was Clay Clinton now, and there wasn't time to think about anything else.

Judge Harmer kept him busy.

First of all, there was the recording bit.

"Records," the judge told him. "That's where the big loot is made. I'm going to get you into every juke-box in the country."

"But I'm not even signed with a recording outfit," Luther protested.

"Who needs it?" Eddie Puss demanded. "What we do is, we set up our own wax-works. That way we don't just collect the royalties—we get profit on distribution, the whole package."

"But how can we be sure the records will become popular? How can we get them spinning?"

"Through the dee-jays," Eddie told him. "They can make you or break you."

"Can Judge Harmer get the disc-jockeys to play our waffles?"

Eddie Puss smiled grimly. "Believe me," he said, "some of his best friends are disc-jockeys. When it comes to going after a fast buck, he doesn't care who he associates with or how low he stoops!"

And so Clay Clinton’s gold guitar was matched by his growing collection of gold records. Remember his clever modern adaptation of great classical favorites—Rock-n-Roll Of Ages and When The Rock-n-Roll Is Called Up Yonder and all the rest? Or would you rather forget?

The point is, the public didn’t forget. It never had a chance to do so. Clay Clinton was on every radio show. Clay Clinton was in every juke-box. Clay Clinton moved from the Club Sandwich to top spots in Chicago, Detroit, St. Louis, Miami. Clay Clinton appeared in theaters and auditoriums. Clay Clinton guested for his fan-clubs. Clay Clinton did his act on the U.S.A. Grandstand television show, and two fourteen-year-old girls tore off his pink shoelaces for souvenirs.

He acquired a wardrobe of sixty suits and a fleet of nine Cadillac convertibles, and eventually reached such heights of success that he was seriously thinking about going to a psychiatrist.

But he just didn’t have the time. There was never any time, any more.

Eddie Puss had long since dropped out of sight. “You don’t need him,” the judge decided. “From now on, you plug standard tunes. Besides, I’ve got other assignments for him to handle.”

That was something Luther had learned; he was indeed far from the only client Judge Harmer dealt with. It seemed, in his travels through the enchanted realms of show business, that the judge had connections everywhere. Although he specialized in teenage talent, it almost appeared as though teen-agers had taken over the bulk of the entertainment outlets in the country. Between rock-’p-roll singers and progressive jazz combos, they dominated the musical end, and there was little else.

“Of course, there’s the movies to be considered,” the judge said, thoughtfully. “I’ve got something working for me out there.”

“You mean you’re active in Hollywood too?” Luther marveled.

“Why not? Who do you think is responsible for all those pictures about juvenile delinquents? If it wasn’t for the how-to-do-it movies, the average kid wouldn’t know how to handle a switch-blade or smoke a reefer.”

“You’re kidding, of course,” Luther said.

“And then there’s the monster-movies,” the judge went on. “That’s a pretty important department. You know the kind—I Was A Teen-Age Supreme Court Justice, and Invasion of the Giant Spirochetes? I’ve been promoting them pretty heavily, and with fine results. Ten years ago there was a lot of silly talk about motion-picture audiences with a mental age of twelve. Well, we’ve made a lot of progress since then. I think we’ve got it down to around seven. Of course, this doesn’t include western fans or Mickey Spillane addicts, or the people who think a girl is hiding her talent if she wears a brassiere. If we included them, we’d have the index of intelligence down to about five years of age.”

“I doubt it,” Luther mused. “Well, I can dream, can’t I?” the judge retorted.

“Look here,” said Luther. “You aren’t serious, are you? You don’t really want to put out all this crud? I mean, in my spare time between shows, I’ve been doing quite a bit of reading on my own—”

“Reading?” The judge raised his eyebrows. “Mother had strict orders to keep you on Billboard and Mad Comics.”

“Mother isn’t around much,” Luther confessed. “When all this loot started pouring in she came to me and hinted about retiring. Said it wasn’t so much her idea as it was the cat’s. It seems like the cat had always wanted to settle down in a little vine-covered cottage and raise mice for a hobby. And for twenty thousand dollars, mother found just the place—not exactly a cottage, but a lovely old liquor store. She said that with all that wine and stuff around she wouldn’t need any vines. So I bought it for her, and she cut out.”

“Leaving you to read, eh?” The judge frowned.

“Well, like why not? I mean, I dig education the most. I figure education is one of the best forms of learning, particularly if you want to know something. And like that there.”

“It’s corrupting your taste, son. Pretty soon it will affect your art.”

"I meant to flip my lip about that, too." Luther sighed.

"You know, sometimes I wonder if all this singing I do is really the living end. I get to thinking it's cornball. Now you take this character Boris Pasternak and what he says about the artistic conscience bit—"

"Look." Judge Harmer put his hand on Luther's shoulder. "You're a singer. I'm your agent. I made you. I have further plans. Your only job is to carry them out."

"But why? I'm making plenty of money now. I could retire on royalties. And you've got other clients, a lot of them."

"It isn't a question of money. It's a question of ethics."

"Ethics?"

"Sure, what else have we been talking about? Ethics—I want to degrade them. I won't rest until the whole world is rocking and rolling."

"But why?"

"Because it's my duty, that's why. Just as it's mother's duty to be a respectable, practicing witch instead of running off to lush it up in a liquor store. Not that I have anything against lushes, understand—they're quite acceptable, in a way. But the major task comes first. To corrupt, and to destroy."

Luther grinned. "So you're back to that old line again," he said. "Trying to scare me with that phoney superstition talk. Well, it won't work. I've come a long way since you met me in the swamp."

"And you can go right back there if you aren't careful," the judge retorted. "Very well, I have no intention of convincing you that I'm an emissary of infernal powers. Just let me say this, though—when you argue against bad taste, you're arguing against your own bread and butter, to say nothing of the necessities of life, such as caviar and champagne. Forget all this nonsense about self-improvement."

"But I don't want to forget—"

"Then remember this. You and I have a contract. And according to the terms, I'm entitled to plan your itinerary. From now on I'll see to it that you're so busy you won't have time to read or moon around with a lot of egghead ideas, either."

The judge stood up. "Start packing," he said. "I'm taking you right to the Home Office." He frowned grimly.

Luther gulped. "Now, look here," he said. "Don't put me down."

"Put you down? That's a good one." Judge Harmer chuckled gutturally.

"It isn't that I believe you, or anything," Luther quavered. "But you keep talking about the Home Office. I understand that the climate in Hell is pretty bad."

The judge laughed again. "Who said anything about Hell? Where I'm taking you, the climate is even worse. This is the twentieth century, son, and we move with the times. Our Home Office is in Hollywood!"

Luther Snodgrass was in Hollywood for exactly three days when he met Mary Jane Hawkins. He happened to be sitting in the outer office of Judge Harmer's agency office on Vermont when the girl walked in.

He watched the little blonde request an interview from the receptionist, and saw her receive the usual brush-off—the don't-call-us-we'll-call-you routine. He noted how her shoulders sagged, and noted too how other salient portions of her anatomy remained fascinatingly firm.

Then she turned away, and saw him sitting there, and something happened.

It was hate at first sight. "Clay Clinton!" the girl exclaimed. "Aaargh!"

"What?" said Luther, rising to his feet.

"Aaargh!" the little blonde repeated. "Also pfaugh!"

"I don't dig you, chick." Mary Jane moved closer and peered up at him. "You are Clay Clinton, aren't you?"

"Well—like yes, I guess so."

"Then blecchhh," she told him. "To say nothing of bracchhh. And, if you'll pardon the expression, pfui!"

"Now wait a minute, doll. Listen to me—"

"I have listened to you," Mary Jane told him. "Which is precisely what I mean when I say—"

"Let's not go through that routine again," Luther said, hastily. "It hurts me to hear such sounds coming out of a lush thrush like you."

"You're a fine one to talk," the girl retorted. "What about the sounds you make?"

"Are you knocking my singing?" Luther demanded.

"Singing!" She sighed dismally. "That's what you call it, eh?"

"Well, I may not be the greatest," Luther admitted, "but it's a living. I mean, I got nine Cadillacs, and—"

"Sure. You've got nine Cadillacs. And meanwhile, a girl like me can't even get an audition from an agent. That's because I have a trained voice and all the public wants to hear nowadays is a lot of screeching. You and your kind are responsible for that."

"Now don't make a federal case out of it," Luther murmured. "Don't hang me, judge!"

"I wish I could. I happen to love music, and when I think of what you've done to ruin singing in this country, I could just scream."

"In what key?"

"Now you're making fun of me." Mary Jane stamped her foot petulantly, and it was Luther who screamed, because she came down on his toes.

"Ohh—I'm sorry—I didn't mean to lose my temper—"

"That's all right," Luther told her.

"I apologize for being so rude."

"You only told the truth."

"What?" She stared at him.

"I know I can't sing," Luther said.

"But—"

“Let me explain.” He smiled at her. “Kind of a long story, so I won’t do a stand-up routine. How about lunch?”

Cadillac Number Seven (the pink one, with the purple upholstery) happened to be on the parking lot outside, and he drove her to the Derby. And it was there that he told her the story.

“I can’t believe it,” she murmured, shaking her head slowly.

“This is Truthville, U.S.A.,” Luther insisted.

“But it’s fantastic!” Mary Jane wrinkled her forehead. “It’s absurd to think of the Devil trying to take over the entertainment and television industry in this town! Besides, he wouldn’t have a chance, as long as Desi Arnaz is around.”

“I didn’t go for the bundle myself, really,” Luther confessed. “Not until Judge Harmer brought me out here and I dug what went on around his office. In the past couple of days I’ve seen him do business with half the weirdies in show biz.”

He described some of the no-talent he’d met—the orchestra leaders who couldn’t read music and their musicians who couldn’t play a note as written—the offbeat young actors from the torn-shirt schools of drama who seemed to have a madness in their Method—the dancers whose movements depended less on choreography than on the tightness of their underwear.

“All right,” Mary Jane conceded. “I know a lot of these people are bad. But that doesn’t mean they’re part of some organized conspiracy. Aren’t you exaggerating just a trifle?”

Luther shook his head earnestly. “Has to be a plot,” he insisted. “How else would all those idiot M.C.s get jobs on those daytime give-away shows? Where do all the loudmouthed announcers come from with their pitches for pile remedies?”

“But surely it’s not the Devil’s work?”

"Oh, no?" Luther stared at her triumphantly. "Who do you think invented the singing commercial?"

"Well—"

The girl was weakening. "You heard how I got into this racket," Luther continued. "Judge Harmer admitted he was an agent, didn't he? He laid it on me about how he was out to ruin the public's taste. It figures."

"Yes, it figures." Mary Jane nodded at him. "You're a nice person, Clay. I misjudged you."

"Call me Luther," he begged.

"All right—Luther. I'm ashamed of the way I acted when we met. Now that you've told me your story, I think I'm beginning to understand the situation. And I'd like to help you."

"You can't help me," Luther said. "I never knew until recently that I was no good, and that the reason I was hired was just because I was so terrible. But it's too late to do anything about that now. I'm under contract."

"Contracts can be broken."

"This one is in perpetuity." Luther smiled and shrugged. "When the judge told me that, I thought he was talking about a place. Since then I've done a little reading, you know? I'm up on all this longhair talk."

"Like paranoid delusions, for example?"

"Huh?"

"Like sick-sick-sick," the girl explained, patiently. "Rationalizing your sudden success into a diabolical conspiracy."

"Stop making like a square," Luther begged her. "All I know is, I've got a contract. I'm hooked."

"You really believe this?"

"If I don't, may I drop dead and work for Lawrence Welk."

Mary Jane bit her lip. "Please—watch your language."

"I'm sorry."

"I'm sorry, too." She gazed at him for a long moment. "Well, if there something to what you say, then maybe there's a way out."

"Like what?"

"Perhaps you need to be exorcised."

"I get all the exercise I need at the hotel swimming-pool."

"Not exercise—exorcise. That means to cast out demons."

"You mean there's a way to get rid of the Devil?"

"I wouldn't know. But I do know there are a lot of psychic mediums in this town. Some of them claim to be able to communicate with spirits. Suppose you went to one and presented your problem? Maybe something could be done."

"But I wouldn't know where to find a cat like that."

"Let's try the Yellow Pages."

And sure enough, in one of the five phone-books of Greater Los Angeles, they discovered Dunn.

Medium Dunn turned out to be a little old man who operated a spiritualist parlor on Fairfax, above one of those used-clothing shops which specialized in selling the discarded costumes of motion picture stars. There was a big sale on leopard-skin trusses left over from an old Tarzan movie in the downstairs section, but up above all was quiet.

Little Mr. Dunn listened to Luther's story in silence and seemed not at all surprised at his client's revelations.

"Do you think you can help him?" Mary Jane asked.

"I'm not sure." The little old man cupped his hand to his ear. "Who did you say it was held your contract?"

"Judge Harmer. At least, that's what he calls himself."

"Judge Harmer." The cupped hand trembled perceptibly. "I was afraid I'd heard the name."

"Then you know him?"

"Yes. He's got quite a reputation in certain circles."

"Could you exorcise his influence?"

Medium Dunn shook his head slowly. "Judge Harmer is mighty big in this town," he said. "Mighty big. He's got quite a large and dependent following.”

“Then there’s nothing you can do?”

“I didn’t say that.” Medium Dunn peered out of the window at the pink Cadillac. “For a reasonable offering—say a thousand dollars—I can put you in touch with certain parties who have the power to negotiate. Mind you, I couldn’t help you break the contract; I can’t promise that. All I can do is open the way for a meeting.”

“A conference?”

“You might call it that.”

“When? Where?”

“Now. And right here. If you happen to have the thousand on you. Or are you one of those people who never carry more than fifty dollars in cash?”

“I never signed for those ads,” Luther told him, pulling out an alligator billfold and prying open its jaws. “Here’s the loot.”

Medium Dunn glanced at the girl. “I’m going to ask you to step outside and wait,” he said.

Mary Jane departed for the reception room and settled down with a bundle of old psychic magazines. She buried her nose in a copy of The Saturday Evening Ghost and kept it there, even when the smell of burning sulphur issued from behind the closed doors. She could hear the scraping of chalk on the floor and the sound of an eery chant. Then there was silence.

Inside the darkened room, Luther Snodgrass lay on a couch. He too could smell the sulphur, hear the chalk tracing a curious geometrical figure which resembled nothing so much as a pentagram with two pairs of pants. And then he listened to the chanting. His eyes closed, and the chanting rose to a faint and faroff wail. The smoke rose around him in the darkness. And then—

And then he was rising, not to walk but to swoop through space. He was rising, or was he falling? He didn’t know, because all at once there were no directions any more; no up, no down. But Luther moved, moved through blackness into deeper night. And there was a circle of light which moved with him, supporting his substance until he stood silently before the shadows.

Behind the shadows were stars, and he realized then that he must be in outer space.

"I'm way out," he said.

The shadows stirred. Stirred and blurred. Blurred and brightened.

Now he could see the enormous outlines of the crouching figures, stare into the gigantic eyes which held all emptiness. There were two figures, four eyes. He faced them, puzzlement overriding panic.

"Two?" he muttered to himself. "I always thought there was only one—"

"There is one," came the reply. "But he is not here. We are but judges."

"Judges? What do I need with a judge?"

"You wish to discuss a contract, is that not so?"

"Yes."

"Then it is a matter of law, and judges are required."

"I never thought of it that way."

"We will hear your plea."

"Well—"

"Proceed. There is no to waste. The Devil will find work for idle hands to do." Two pairs of gigantic hands reached towards Luther's neck, and he retreated hastily to the center of the circle of light.

"I get the message," he said, shuddering. "But it's really just a simple bit. You see, there's this deal I have on with Judge Harmer, if you happen to know him—"

"We know him. He is our brother."

"Ullp! Your brother, eh?" Luther hesitated, then plunged on. "Well, we had this little agreement, dig? Only now I want out. That's all there is to it. I want out."

"You signed a contract?"

“Uh—yes.”

“Then you are committed. There is no legal way to free yourself of obligation unless he releases you.”

“But couldn’t you persuade him?”

“Why should we?”

“Can’t I buy my way out?”

“With what?”

“Money. Loot. Moola. Look, I’m loaded. I’ve got nine Cadillacs—”

“What do we want with your Cadillacs? We do not run a used-car lot. Although, naturally, we do business with many used-car dealers.” There was faint amusement in the booming voice, but none in Luther’s quivering whisper.

“But there must be some way I can lick this thing. If you don’t want money, what do you want?”

There was a long pause until the voices came again.

“We do not buy.”

“We do not sell.”

“But at times we trade.”

“Trade what?”

“An eye for an eye. A tooth for a tooth.”

“I didn’t sell any eyes or teeth.”

“We know what you sold “

“So shall toe say—a soul for a soul?”

“Another soul in exchange for mine? But whose—”

“There is a girl. One who trusts you.”

“Now, hold it—”

“If you were to take her to Judge Harmer, she would go willingly enough. You would tell her you were mistaken about him, that it was all a delusion on your part. You would say that you were using your influence to secure her an opportunity. It could be arranged for the judge to offer her a contract. Once she signs, you are released.”

“That would be a fair exchange.”

“Like hell it would! Nothing doing!”

“Then your plea is dismissed.”

“But—”

“Go.”

The huge hands reached forth. And the voices boomed. “A final teaming. Do not attempt to evade your contract. This time you have come to us. But next time we can come to you.”

The hands swooped down and Luther moved. He blurred his way through darkness and then he was falling into the endless emptiness beyond the stars. Falling back on the couch in the little room. Yes, he was there once more, and awake. He could smell the sulphur.

Only it wasn’t sulphur, now. It was something else. Something like brimstone—“How’d you make out?” Medium Dunn inquired.

Luther blinked and sat up. “You mean you don’t know?” he asked. “You didn’t see them, or hear them?”

“I noted nothing,” the little old man said. “You appeared to be in a deep trance. Quite similar to that of a hypnotic subject.” He brightened. “I happen to be a competent hypnotist, too,” he continued. “In case you are ever in need of such services—”

“Never mind,” Luther said, rising.

“I am adept at Reichian psychotherapy,” Dunn said. “Orgone treatments day or night, by appointment.”

“Not interested.”

“Tea leaf readings?” Medium Dunn grasped his arm as he hastened towards the door. “How about a high colonic—?”

“Let’s get out of here,” Luther gasped, pulling Mary Jane to her feet and leading her over to the stairway.

“You might stop downstairs,” Medium Dunn called hopefully. “Tell them I sent you and get a ten per cent discount. I understand they have something special in Jayne Mansfield’s old bras—”

The smog was reddening into sunset as they reached the street. Luther opened the door of the Caddy and helped the girl to enter.

“How did it go?” she asked. “What happened?”

“Wait,” he said. “I don’t want to talk here.”

They drove in silence up through the hills. In spite of what the TV comics say, it is possible to find a certain serenity in the darkness on Mulholland Drive. And it was there, gazing down across the neon nonentity that is the city, that Luther told Mary Jane of his experience.

“Or was it a dream?” he concluded. “I don’t know.”

“In any case, you protected me.” the girl said. “I’m proud of you.”

“I’m not proud,” Luther answered. “I’m scared. If it was just a cooky dream, then I’m flipping. And if it happens to be real, well—”

“Forget it,” Mary Jane commanded.

“How?”

She showed him. Nice girl or no, Mulholland Drive has a magic all its own. And as she entered his arms, Luther murmured, “Don’t worry, baby. I won’t let anybody hurt you. And I’m going to get out of this deal, wait and see—”

Suddenly he froze. For there was no need to wait and see. He was seeing, right now.

He was seeing the neon lights blotted out, obscured by the huge talons which descended from the sky, shoving aside the stars as they scrabbled towards him.

“Honey, what’s the matter?” Mary Jane whimpered.

The claws came closer. Luther shuddered.

“They’re here,” he whispered. “They’re watching. They know they can’t have you—and they won’t let me touch you, either.”

“You’re imagining these things,” the girl reassured him. “I don’t see anything.”

“I do.”

“Look.” She sat upright, faced him, grasped his hands.

"You're not well. You ought to get out of here, go away from all this. I'll come with you."

"But—"

"Let me take care of you. I want to."

"We'd be poor." Luther glanced up at the sky nervously.

"Who cares?"

"But you don't know what a raunchy character I was when I was poor. Strictly a no-goodnik. Anything for kicks. I was willing to sell my soul—"

"You're not like that any more. We'd get along, I'm sure we would."

"No." Luther was watching something outside the car. He didn't look at her.

"You don't love me, is that it?"

He looked at her then. "Of course I do. Can't you understand? I want to go. But they won't let me. They have a contract. They have plans for me. Me and my lousy voice."

"All right." Mary Jane turned away. "I guess I do understand, after all. There's no need to hand me a line about how you hate what you're doing, or dream up any more stories about the Devil. I can take a hint. When it comes to a choice between me and nine Cadillacs—"

"It's not that at all," he protested. "There isn't a Cadillac made that can compare with you. Why, I'd trade them all in for just one—"

"I'm not an automobile dealer," she sniffed. "Just take me home, please."

"But—"

"Please," she repeated, kicking him politely in the shins.

Luther drove her home in silence.

And all the way, the shadowy hands followed him across the sky, and somewhere between the stars the eyes blazed down . . .

Judge Harmer was waiting for him beside the swimming pool at the Beverly Hills Hotel.

“Where have you been, son?” he demanded. “What have you been up to?”

“I—” Luther hesitated, gulping.

“Don’t tell me, I already know.” Harmer raised a pudgy hand and smiled. “Well, it doesn’t matter. I’m sure you’ve learned your lesson. Now we can just let bygones be bygones and get down to business.”

“Business?”

The judge nodded. “I didn’t bring you out here for a rest cure,” he said. “Though speaking for myself, I could certainly use a black sabbatical. It’s time to go to work. I’ve just been talking to the Boss.”

“The Boss?”

“Who else? He’s out here, too. Just got in from Las Vegas. And he’s a little worried about the opposition.”

“What opposition?”

“There are certain signs of good taste creeping into the field, and he doesn’t like it. You know, things like Playhouse 90, some of those Sunday egghead shows. And movies are improving, too. We’ve got to hit, and hit hard. That’s where you come in. At midnight, Monday, in my office. He wants to meet you then.”

“Supposing I refuse?”

Judge Harmer glanced up at the sky.

“Nice clear weather we’re having. I’d hate to see a storm come up over the week end.”

Luther sighed. “What does he have in mind for me?”

“First of all, we’re lining up a regular television show for you. A full thirty-nine-week series, every hour staged like a spectacular. You know the bit—lots of guest stars for you to insult and call by their first names, plenty of novelty acts with chimpanzees. You’ve seen those dance-numbers they stage where three creeps in tights come out and swish around the singer? Well, money is no object—we’re going to hire six creeps for your show!

Already lined up a sponsor; he's one of the biggest laxative manufacturers in the business. We're going to have singing commercials, too. Remember all these cigarette programs where big burly guys go around puffing on cigarettes as soon as they've finished wrestling an alligator or jumping from a plane without a parachute? The ones where everybody has a tattoo on the back of his hand? Well, the sponsor came up with a great gimmick. Our guys are going to be tattooed on—hey, what's the matter, son?"

Luther groaned.

"Sounds like hard work, eh? Don't worry. You'll have writers. The best. We'll hire five of 'em just to turn out adlibs for you. The same guys who make up all the jokes about how Ed Sullivan looks like an undertaker, or an undertaker's customer. And that's not all."

"More, yet?"

"Certainly! Boss wants you to make a movie. He's doing the script himself. It's called I Was A Teen-Age Plucker For The—

"No!" Luther gasped. "No, not that!"

The judge glanced at the sky again and gestured with his cigar. Something brushed Luther's cheek, and a gigantic shadow blurred past him. There was a great splash in the swimming pool and the water suddenly began to steam.

"Hold it," Judge Harmer said, grasping Luther's collar. "I'd hate to see you fall into that pool. Looks to me like it's full of crocodiles, too—you see?"

Luther took one glance, then turned away. "Monday at midnight, you said?" His voice was dull.

"Right! In my office, remember. That gives you the whole week-end to rest up." Harmer nodded briskly and stepped away. "Well, if you'll excuse me, I have an engagement at Forest Lawn."

"At this hour?"

"The young lady prefers it." Judge Harmer chuckled. "Perhaps you'd care to join us? I'm sure we could dig up a date for you."

Luther shook his head and ran down the path towards his guest-house.

"See you Monday night, then," the judge called.

"Meanwhile, take care of your voice. We're counting on you."

Luther took care of his voice. He used it immediately, to call Mary Jane.

"I'm sorry," he said, over the phone. "I know you're making with the mad bit at me, and this is no time to bother you. But I'm really in trouble, and I've got to talk to someone. Unless you can help me—"

"I'll be right over," said Mary Jane Hawkins.

"Good." Luther glanced out of the window. "I was hoping you'd say that. Somehow, I don't care to go out at night myself. Not right now."

"Stay where you are. I understand."

She came over, just as she promised, and Luther told her the story.

And then, I think, is when Mary Jane came up with her idea. I say I think, but I'm not sure.

You see, I hadn't made the scene yet. In fact, I hadn't even met Luther Snodgrass.

I didn't meet him until Monday night.

That's when he walked into Judge Harmer's office and saw me, sitting all alone behind the big desk.

He stared at me as I checked my watch. It was midnight, right on the head.

His eyes bulged. "You're the boss?" he murmured.

"You?"

I smiled. "Why not?"

"But—"

"What did you expect, a long red tail?" I laughed and brushed the cigarette ashes from my sports-jacket.

"You're just a man, aren't you?" He was utterly deflated. "And here, all along, I've been thinking—"

"I know what you've been thinking." I shrugged. "That's what comes of too much reading, my boy. You've been digging the Faust bit, haven't you?

And Damn Yankees, and Will Success Spoil Rock Hunter? and all that jazz. You've got the idea that anyone can sell his soul for talent. Let's face it, you're not talented."

Luther nodded at me. "That's right. But the way I had it figured out, from what Judge Harmer told me, the Devil wasn't interested in real talent. He just wanted to corrupt everyone's taste, spoil their standards. From then on, he would find it easier to influence their morals. It was all a gigantic plot, and it sounded pretty logical to me. I mean, if the Devil were around today, he'd naturally go into the advertising business, and television, and public relations—"

"Please!" I raised my hand. "I grant you it all sounds logical. And if I were the Devil, I just might encourage people to produce shows like Damn Yankees and the rest, simply to be subtle and put the idea into folks' heads that it's possible to cook up a deal. But I'm not the Devil, as you can plainly see."

"Then Judge Harmer is crazy?"

"Like a fox," I told him. "The judge knows what he's doing. He's lined up a great career for you out here. You're going to come on strong. And that's what I want to talk to you about tonight. First, the television series—"

"You really are serious about this? Even though you know I'm lousy?"

"Let the great American Public be the ones to decide." I stared at him. "I see you brought your guitar. Good. There's a new number I want you to try—the theme-song for the show." I reached into my desk and brought forth a sheaf of sheet music. "Here it is. Brand new tune, be up there in the Top Ten three weeks after you introduce it. Great title, too. Strontium-90 Daddy, Don't You Fall Out On Me!"

He took the music and held it awkwardly.

"Prop it against the book-ends here and let's give it a try," I said. "Just run through it cold. I don't expect a finished performance—all I want is a general idea."

Luther Snodgrass nodded and raised his guitar. Then he smiled at me, cleared his throat, and began.

I got a finished performance.

And I do mean finished.

Standing there in my office, Luther Snodgrass sang as he'd never sung before—he sang good.

I couldn't believe my ears.

Out of his mouth came the pear-shaped tones of a trained vocalist. He sounded like a concert artist, and he played the guitar like Segovia.

"There." He put down the guitar. "How'd you like that?"

I didn't answer. I couldn't, for a moment. Then I whispered, "Try something else. Let me hear your old number—If I Had To Do It All Over Again—"

So he sang that. And it sounded, so help me, wonderful. He was even pronouncing the words so you could understand them.

"Try another," I muttered.

He did a third selection. It was even better. I didn't wait for him to finish but made him stop in mid-chorus.

"What's happened?" I demanded. "What's come over you? Why don't you sing the way you always do?"

"Always did," he corrected. "I can't sing that way any more. I've been trained."

"By whom?" I snarled, bitterly. Wait until I get my hands on—"

"Mary Jane taught me," Luther said, happily. "Over the week end. From now on, I'm going to be a real singer."

"But how could you change in just one week end? And why can't you change back again?"

"Because she didn't teach me alone." Luther was positively grinning now. "She remembered something Dunn had mentioned."

"Medium Dunn?"

"That's the cat. He said he was also a hypnotist. So she took me to him, and he put me under hypnosis while she coached me. Planted subconscious suggestion, you see? Now I couldn't sing the way I used to, even if I wanted to—"

"Which you don't," I grated, savagely. "Because you know blessed well that with this new voice I can't possibly use you any more. That I'll have to release you from your contract."

"I only did it because I thought you were the Devil," Luther explained. "I just wanted to save my soul."

"You and your square soul! As far as I'm concerned, you can take it and —"

"Then you won't be needing me any longer?"

"Who needs you?" I swivelled away from him. "Look, I'm a businessman. I'm in the entertainment field and what I want is mediocrity. Fortunately, there's plenty of it around, just as awful as you were, too. I can get myself another boy. So run along. Go back to your Mary Jane. Marry her, settle down, raise six kids and the payments for the mortgage. Sweat out the rest of your days in some lousy factory, rendering chicken-fat."

"Thanks." Luther smiled. "No hard feelings, then?" He moved towards the door, then halted. "Wait until I explain to Mary Jane!" he said. "You know, I almost had convinced you were the Devil, too? I really believed the whole deal about how you had organized to ruin the world with rock-'n-roll and like that. Thanks for relieving my mind."

"Get lost," I said.

Luther Snodgrass went out. Out of the door, out of my hair. I reached up and touched my hair as Judge Harmer came in.

"Well?" he asked.

"You must have heard his voice," I told him. "I can't use anything like that. Send in this new kid—this Randy Studd."

Judge Harmer hesitated.

“You mean you let Luther Snodgrass go? Just like that?”

“Why not? He’s got everything figured out. I’m only a no-talent scout, in business for my wealth. No problem.”

Judge Harmer nodded and made his exit.

I continued to touch my hair, brushing my hand over my head carefully, so as not to muss my toupee.

That toupee cost $2,000, but it’s worth it.

It hides the horns . . .

THE END

The Man Who Knew Women

Before he left his motel room, Luis Manuel took a good look in the mirror. He wanted to make sure that Lou Manning was there.

His reflection reassured him. Lou Manning was very much present.

Actually, Luis Manuel was allergic to mirrors. He didn't like the sight of himself—a little, balding, swarthy man with a graying mustache and ill-fitting false teeth made by a prison dentist.

But Lou Manning was something to look at. He was at least two inches taller than Luis, thanks to the elevator shoes. The cheap choppers had long since been replaced by gleaming platework, and the bald forehead completely concealed with a curly brown hairpiece. A pair of scissors and a bit of dye transformed the straggly gray mustache into a black and virile symbol of masculinity.

Luis smiled and adjusted his silk tie. He admired his new tropical gabardine suit, his open-weave shirt, his oversize zircon ring. He didn't take pride in them for their own sake—it was the effect they created. The effect of Lou Manning. He was proud of the way Lou Manning looked, and proud of what Lou Manning could do.

In the past month, Lou Manning had done a lot. He had written all those letters to the Romance Club and carefully scanned the replies. He had selected Bessie Carmody as a likely prospect and given her a real snow job. To such good effect that before the month was up, he was out of the snow of Boston and down here in the warmth of Daytona Beach.

And the past week had seen even greater progress. Once he found out that Bessie Carmody really was a childless widow with an $8,000 bank account, Lou Manning really went to work on her. The old bat (she was fifty-three, just a trifle older than Luis Manuel) was flattered at the attentions of dashing, debonair Lou. And she was tired of working as a clerk at one of the Boardwalk motels. The idea of marrying a wealthy promoter was irresistible.

Lou Manning shrugged at his image. He was a promoter, all right, but he wasn't wealthy—yet. That's why he was promoting; he could use that $8,000 in a hurry. He'd gambled his last few hundred dollars to come down here, invest in a new outfit, and pitch a little woo at fat, foolish Bessie Carmody.

Well, the gamble had paid off. Before the week was out the marriage would go through.

So Lou Manning had every reason to be proud of himself. He knew how to handle women. It was like being an actor, he often rationalized. That's what he really was; an actor who played the role of Lou Manning.

This was quite a rationalization, for most people would consider Lou Manning a bad actor, in the slang sense of the term. He didn't play his part for applause, and although he had several captive audiences in the past, they all seemed to have disappeared.

But there was no need to worry about that now. Lou Manning picked up the corsage and the box of candy. Another eight bucks shot—but what the hell, he was shooting for eight thousand bucks. It was a good investment. Bessie, Carmody would be pleased with the corsage and her fat jowls would quiver over the candy.

And that's the way it worked out. When Lou left his shabby little motel and walked over to the lobby of the big $60-a-day establishment on the ocean side of the Boardwalk, Bessie was waiting for him. She did coo over the corsage and she did quiver over the candy, and it was all Lou could do to keep from laughing as he watched the plump, overdressed, middle-aged widow simpering girlishly and fluttering her eyelashes.

He planned, now, to take her out for dinner and a few drinks. That would cost him another twenty bucks or so, but it would be money spent for a purpose. He'd soften her up, make a date to get the marriage license tomorrow, and discuss where to spend their honeymoon. Lou had it all planned.

But there was one thing he hadn't planned on. When he kissed her on the forehead and said, "Well, shall we go now?" Bessie shook her head.

"Just a minute, dear," she told him. "I've got company. He'll be down right away."

"He?"

"Oh, here he comes now."

And sure enough, this character came walking down the stairs—this little thin, dried-up baldheaded guy with the rimless glasses and the pasty white complexion. He was wearing a light gray suit and a loud purple shirt—a real creep outfit. Lou Manning didn't like his looks and he didn't like his actions. He went right up to Bessie, smiled, and kissed her on the mouth. Lou wanted to clobber him.

Instead, he waited for the introduction.

It came. Bessie simpered and said, "Dear, I have a surprise for you. This is my brother, Bert Jackson."

This was a surprise, all right. She'd never mentioned a brother before. And what in hell was he doing here?

Lou didn't have to ask the question, because Bert Jackson was already supplying the answer.

"Take five," he said, holding out his hand. It was cold and small and soft, like a dead sardine. But he pumped Lou's arm up and down, and his voice was loud and hearty. "The kid wrote me about you last week," he said. "Told me you were going to make an honest woman out of her, so I didn't bother to bring my shotgun. So I figured I'd lay off for a week and take a run down here to get acquainted. After all, she's the only family I've got."

"You're not married, eh?" Lou asked.

"No, but I'm all for it. Marriage is a great institution—no family should be without it." Bert Jackson uttered a barking laugh and dug Lou in the ribs. "That's an old Cantor gag," he said.

Bessie smiled indulgently at her brother. “Bert used to be in vaudeville years ago,” she explained. “He was one of the best—”

“What do you mean, used to be?” Bert demanded. “I’m still working the same routine, only now they call it television. Of course, mainly I play club dates these days. My agent keeps me booked solid, and it’s sure a lot better than the old five-a-day. Or even the two-a-day.”

Bessie took her brother’s arm. “I hope you didn’t give up a good job just to run down here.”

“You know I always head south at least once a year for a change and a rest,” Bert Jackson said. He grinned at Lou. “The bellboys get the change and the bookies get the rest.”

Lou kept the forced smile in place. This fink and his corny chatter—was he going to be hanging around now?

Apparently so, because Bessie was saying, “I thought Bert could join us tonight for dinner.”

There was nothing else to do but go along with the gag; go along with the gagster. And that’s the way it worked out. Lou had planned to eat at a Chinese place with a bar attached, and he took them there. But the rest of his plans—including lining up the trip to the license bureau tomorrow—went by the board. He had no chance to talk to Bessie alone. In fact, he scarcely got a chance to talk at all. Bert Jackson took over in that department.

A few drinks put him in a reminiscent mood. Bessie herself had never been in what Bert Jackson insisted on calling “show biz” but apparently she’d followed her brother’s career, because he addressed himself mainly to her.

“Remember when I got my first big break on Orpheum time? Those were the days. Lou Holtz was doing a single in blackface; they were still imitating Tinney, you know. Only a few comics who didn’t work that old heckling routine with the orchestra leader. Old Herb Williams used to sock the leader over the head with a baseball bat. He had another great sight gag —got himself a gimmick axe and hit the leader with that instead. But it backfired on him—looked too gruesome, see? So he had to cut it out."

Lou listened and wondered how it would be if he could hit Bert Jackson over the head with an axe. He wouldn't bother to use a fake one, either, if he had the chance. But all he could do was sit and smile.

"Of course, for my money the real comics were the ones who didn't force the laugh. Bert Wheeler and the apple-eating bit, and old Raymond Hitchcock in his baggy streetclothes with the hair hanging down in his eyes. I'll bet Will Rogers copied that getup from him. I was on a bill with Will once in Scranton, when he was still doing the rope act. He tried to teach it to Fred Stone. There was an all-round trouper for you, that Stone! Reminds me of Joe Cook, another guy who could do anything. Of course they all got into musical comedy or legit in the Twenties. I was only a kid, and by the time things started breaking for me, vaude was on its last legs. Oh, we had good people working—Fred Sanborn and his xylophone, Fanny and Kitty Watson, old Johnny Burke and his rookie monologue, Senator Murphy, and even some of the flash acts like Kellerman and the Gus Edwards gang. But you could see the end coming—"

Lou wished he could see the end coming. But he had to sit there and be polite, nodding at the mention of names that meant nothing to him. What did he know about Cross and Dunn or Savoy and Brennan or Jones and Hare? And what did her care about Lowe, Hite and Stanley or Willie West and McGinty or Herman Timberg, Jr.?

The more he drank, the more the little man talked. And Lou found himself drinking just in order to keep going. There came a time when he was grateful for that. Because somehow the conversation had shifted from vaudeville and gotten around to Lou Manning—what he'd done in the old days, where he'd come from, what he did for a living now.

Only it wasn't a case of "somehow"; Lou suddenly realized that Bert Jackson had deliberately led up to this. Quite a clever little operator, this old-time vaudevillian! On the other hand, since when was a two-a-day ham any match for a professional actor? And Lou Manning considered himself to be just that. Oh, he didn't give his performances on the legitimate stage—but in his own field, the illegitimate theatre, he was supreme. He knew how to build up a characterization, all right.

And he built one now. He parried all the questions Bert Jackson could throw at him. The drinks gave him confidence, and so did Bessie's plump hand resting on his wrist as he talked. He smiled at the little baldheaded brother and poured it on. He talked about his mining interests out west, and about his poor dead wife Florence, and about his hopes for the future.

The orphan from the Orpheum circuit ate it all up. How did he know that the closest Lou ever came to mining out west was a stretch on the rockpile, or that he never had a wife named Florence? There'd been one named Mae, and one named Ellen, and one named Dorinda, but never a Florence. And as to those hopes for the future—Lou carefully omitted all mention of the eight grand.

It worked all right. Walking home after leaving brother and sister at their motel, Lou congratulated himself. Until he remembered that he hadn't managed to talk to Bessie in private or discuss their plans. Bert Jackson had seen to that. All he had was a vague promise to see her tomorrow, after work.

Lou figured he had to do something about it, so he called her the next morning and arranged for a private get-together. To his surprise, Bessie offered no objections. In fact, she didn't even mention her brother.

That came later. It came when they met in the evening and sat on a bench overlooking the Boardwalk, watching the waves roll in. Lou had his arm around her and he was talking about the marriage license when he felt her stiffen. He knew enough about women to realize something was wrong.

"What's the matter, honey?" he asked. "You aren't getting cold feet, are you?

"No." Bessie stared out at the water. "It's just that—well, maybe we're rushing things a little."

"How can you say that? Only two days ago you were all set. You told me yourself how tired you were of living alone."

"I know. But I didn't have any choice, then."

"Don't tell me somebody else has come along to beat my time?"

Bessie giggled, but her heart wasn't in it. "Oh, nothing like that! It's just Bert."

"Bert? What about Bert?"

"Well—" She shifted uneasily, then faced him. "Bert says I should come and live with him. Says he's thinking of settling down in a place of his own, doing a little local TV work and maybe just playing the Borscht Circuit in summer. And he'd like me to keep house for him. It'll be just like being married, only—" Bessie hesitated, but Lou picked it right up.

"Only what?" he demanded.

"Nothing."

"Nothing, my eye!" Lou put his hand on her arm. "Bert doesn't want you to marry me, does he? I could tell that last night. He's got something against me.

"Oh, no!" Bessie's denial was emphatic. "He was very honest about that, dear—he hasn't got a single, solitary thing against you. It's just that he feels we haven't known each other long enough. He has an idea you're sort of rushing me into this."

Lou laughed. "I'm rushing you into this? What about him? He hasn't seen you for years and all at once he pops up down here and within twenty-four hours he's trying to promote you for a free housekeeper." Lou hesitated, then decided to take the risk. "And I'll bet he even suggested you go in with him and help pay for the house."

From the expression on Bessie's fat face, Lou knew his hunch had paid off. He bored in. "Sure," he said. "It's the Big Brother act, isn't it? He wants to protect you. Hah!" Suddenly he made his voice soften. "Don't get me wrong, honey. I'm not trying to knock the guy. But the way he struck me, from seeing him last night, is that Bert's not the type who'll ever really settle down. He never got married, did he? He's used to moving around, spending his money as fast as he earns it, and I'll bet he likes to take a little drink every now and then, too. I know these actors, honey—they're always out for a good time and a lot of laughs. But Bert isn't getting any younger, is he? And all of a sudden he realizes maybe it would be nice to have a home of his own and somebody to look after him."

"What's wrong about that?" Bessie demanded.

"Nothing. For Bert, it's perfect. But he's thinking about himself. And I'm thinking about you."

Lou's voice got even softer as he slid his arm around Bessie's waist. "You want your own home, don't you?" he said. "The kind of a home you used to have, when Clarence was still alive. Remember, how you told me about it? How nice it was to know that there was somebody to be with you, every night, somebody to love? You're still a young woman, Bessie. You don't need a brother—you need a husband."

It made Lou sick to have to talk this way; almost as sick as it did to put his arm around the old bag. But this was the kind of pitch that paid off. He kept on for quite a while, until Bessie started sobbing.

"You—you do love me, don't you, darling?" she wheezed. "I mean, it isn't just an act of some kind?"

"How can you even imagine such a thing?" Lou whispered. "No—don't answer me. You couldn't imagine it, I know. It would take Bert to think of an idea like that. Tell me the truth, now, Bessie. What other ideas has he been putting in your head?"

Bessie sobbed a little louder. She could scarcely get the words out. "He said he thought you were a—phony. And he said—" The words came in a rushing gurgle. "He said that you wore a toupee."

It sounded so damned funny Lou could scarcely choke back the laugh. On the other hand, it was damned serious, too. Women had the screwiest ideas, sometimes. Lou debated his reply a moment.

"All right," he said. "Your brother is a pretty shrewd observer. I do wear a toupee. But that's nothing to be ashamed of, is it? Is it?"

"N-no."

"But that's as far as it goes, dear. I'm not going to try and defend myself against Bert's suspicions. I don't think I have to. My actions speak for themselves. Have I ever done anything to make you think I'm a phony, as he puts it? Have I ever stepped out of line in any way? Answer me, Bessie—have I?"

"Of course not."

"All I've ever done is make you an honorable offer of marriage. Because I love you, and I want to take care of you. I don't want to see you slaving away in a motel, or spending the rest of your life keeping house for your selfish brother. You deserve a real home; a nice place out on the West Coast, maybe, with one of those Jap maids. Of course, we'll probably want to do a lot of traveling—Mexico, Hawaii, places like that—"

Lou poured it on now, and she took it all in; she wanted to take it all in. She didn't care about the lousy toupee any more. He could have told her he had a wooden leg and a truss and she'd still buy the deal. So he put the deal to her now.

"No sense starting any family argument," he said. "I don't want to see you quarreling with your brother. And that's just the way it's going to be, if you go back and tell him what I said. Nothing's liable to make him change his mind. He'll have to see for himself that things are different. We'll just write him a postcard from Miami Beach."

"Miami Beach?"

"Sure. Isn't that a nice place for a honeymoon?" Lou squeezed her close. "I had the plans all made before Bert showed up—even wired for reservations. I figured we'd get married Saturday and take off right away. Spend a couple of weeks just lying around in the sun—maybe fly over to Nassau for a while, if you like." He squeezed harder. "But now I've got an even better idea. You and I aren't going to get married at all. We're going to elope—tomorrow."

"Elope?"

"That's right, honey. You aren't going to go through any big scene with that brother of yours."

"But I'd have to give notice—there's a million and one things to do."

“Never mind. I want you to go back to your place and pack up, now. We’ll take the morning plane out.” Lou smiled at her. “From now on, this is my show.”

The rest was easy. There wasn’t even any hitch about the money; Bessie was the one who suggested she go down and draw it out of the bank before they took off.

Lou stuck close to her all the way. Once she’d gotten out of the motel without her brother seeing her, his troubles were over.

The following afternoon they were in Miami. Bessie had a fresh corsage and Lou had the eight grand in a cashier’s check nestling in his wallet. Right after they were married Bessie wanted him to open a joint account.

Lou knew his women, all right. He played it very straight. He never touched Bessie, never made a suggestion. They took their tests, waited, and went in the following week for a civil ceremony.

Apparently Bert Jackson hadn’t been able to figure out their destination, because he never followed them. Lou took the precaution of registering under a phony name, but just the same he sweated it out until the marriage was performed. He didn’t want that wise little creep to stick his nose in and queer the pitch.

After the ring was on Bessie’s finger he allowed her to send two wires. One went to the motel in Daytona and the other to her brother’s regular address in Newark, just in case he’d returned home.

A few days later, he even let Bessie sit down and write a long letter to Bert Jackson at the Newark address, telling him how happy she was and inviting him to pay them a visit when they got established in a place of their own.

Again Lou sweated, worrying about the off-chance of having the guy suddenly show up to spoil the honeymoon. But he must have decided he was licked, because he didn’t answer and he didn’t appear.

So the honeymoon wasn’t spoiled, after all.

It was nice to put up at a swanky joint, eat at the best places, and do the town at night. Of course, steering this old tub around was no picnic, but Lou knew how to handle her. He kept pouring drinks and it worked. Bessie wasn’t used to liquor, but she got so she liked it. Lou tried to keep her stoned at night and he saw to it that she attracted attention when he dragged her back to the hotel. This all cost dough, but it was necessary. Every day was eating farther into that eight grand, and yet he had to stall for time.

He waited until well into the second week before he sat down and sent off his own letter to Bert Jackson. It was a little masterpiece—it ought to be, because he rewrote it four times, one morning while Bessie slept off a hangover. Let bygones be bygones, forgive and forget, we’re all one family now—that sort of thing. And then the plant, just a touch, about how Bessie was very happy but she had to take things a little easy on account of the old ticker.

That was enough for Bert, Lou figured. The next step was to spread the word around. Whenever Bessie slept late, he made a point of showing up in the lobby downstairs. He told the maids and room service not to disturb his wife, because she wasn’t well.

Once, as a master stroke, he even managed to give her the needle. During the course of a particularly bad hangover he convinced her that she should see the house physician.

He was a young squirt who didn’t know his stethoscope from second base. All he did was examine her and give her a couple of pills. But his visit gave Lou a chance to take him aside privately and put on the old act.

“I don’t know what to think, Doc,” he said. “It scares me, sometimes. We’re just married, you know—and I never realized that she—well—” He allowed his voice to trail off in embarrassment. “Don’t you have some kind of pills that sort of take away the craving?”

The house physician gave him some advice on how to keep Bessie away from the sauce and even promised to come back again and talk to her about it when she felt better.

Lou thanked him, and then he went to work.

He got the digitalis at a drugstore way out in the sticks. As a matter of fact, he didn’t get it; Luis Manuel got it. Luis Manuel, the baldheaded little guy, wearing big hornrims and driving a rented car.

But it was Lou Manning who arranged for the Saturday night binge at the nitery down the street.

And it was Lou Manning who brought Bessie back to the hotel, stewed to the eyeballs, and poured her a nightcap when she got to bed.

It was Lou Manning who gave her the digitalis, got rid of the bottle, cleaned and refilled the glass, and saw that she put her own fingerprints all over it again. It was Lou Manning who ran the shower to cover up the sound of her groans.

Bessie didn’t have to do anything but die.

When she stopped threshing around and her eyeballs rolled up and the gasping ceased, he knew it was safe to call the house physician.

There were no problems.

He told his story about the sudden attack, and the death certificate read “cardiac collapse during acute gastroenteritis.” Everybody was very sorry, and the cemetery lot was easy to buy, and nobody came to the funeral to comment on the cheap casket or the lack of flowers. That’s because, in his grief and confusion, Lou forgot to wire Bert Jackson until the day before the funeral. So Bert couldn’t possibly have made it down there in time.

But those things happen and must be forgiven. And it was perfectly understandable that the stricken husband wouldn’t stay at the hotel any longer. If Bert Jackson did show up later, they could explain it to him.

As for Lou Manning, he didn’t wait around. The day after Bessie was planted he checked out. Fortunately, he’d never quite managed to open a joint account, and he had over seven thousand of Bessie’s money in cash. He bought himself a ticket to San Juan.

He figured he deserved a little vacation.

There was a girl named Encarnacion and there was a thing called a Silver Punch and there was a gambling casino. Lou Manning didn't quite know where to place the blame. All he knew was that a month later he was back in New York with less than a grand left in his pocket.

He'd blown the wad. It was a damned fool thing to have done, but there it was.

But easy come, easy go. And there always plenty more where that came from.

Lou checked into a small East Side hotel, went around to a cheap printer and got some letterheads made up, and batted out another inquiry to the Romance Club. He enclosed the usual fee.

After that, there was nothing else to do but wait.

It took several weeks for the first replies to come in, and at first nothing looked good. Some Polack waitress out in Montana with two kids—a dame in Chicago who claimed she owned a big estate but who wrote on cheap stationery which gave her away immediately as a phony. Lou Manning could smell a phony a thousand miles away.

So he sweated it out, cutting down his expenses to eighty bucks a week. Sooner or later the right one would come along. He'd been through this before. There was nothing to worry about, because when the right one came, he'd handle her. Lou knew women.

Sure enough, he got a break.

The break's name was Mrs. Amy Goodrich.

She said she was forty-one and sent a picture to prove it, but that meant nothing. Usually they cut about fifteen years off their ages and used an old snapshot. Lou Manning didn't care about that, one way or another.

What interested him was the eight-unit apartment building left to her by her late husband. It was too much for her to handle alone; she had no relatives and few close friends. That's why she had written to the Romance Club, she told him in her second letter. It made her feel just a wee bit foolish and ashamed, but she needed a friend.

Lou Manning liked her letters. They were neatly typed and the grammar was good but not too good—which was perfect, because you had to watch out for the brainy types. Lou liked her setup, too. There was just one thing wrong with the deal, though.

Mrs. Amy Goodrich lived in Miami Beach.

Normally, he'd have arranged to rush right down, but this was a special problem. Miami Beach was entirely too close to Miami.

So he tried to work the angles. He wrote, assuring her that he was the friendly type. And it just so happened that he had some experience in property management and real estate. As soon as he disposed of his own holdings in New York, he was going to California. Right now he couldn't possibly get away until the deal was cleaned up. But why didn't she try to sell her place and fly into town for a visit so that they could get better acquainted?

Of course he didn't lay it on the line cold like that, and he didn't crowd all his suggestions in at once. There was plenty of padding and sweet-talk in between, and he managed to stretch his proposal over four letters. He built up a very convincing picture of himself as a well-to-do widower, and he was really in there pitching at the end. He had to, because he was down to a little over six hundred dollars.

But Amy Goodrich wouldn't buy—or, rather, she wouldn't sell. Lou realized, too late, that he'd outsmarted himself.

If he had experience in handling property (she wrote) then why didn't he come down and pay her a visit? Maybe he could help handle the deal and get a better price. Or perhaps he might decide it would be a good idea to keep the apartments, which really brought high rentals in season. She was telling him these things assuming that she could trust him and that he was serious about his intentions. Of course, there was only one way to find out and that was to get acquainted personally. His letters sounded charming, but a lonely woman has to be sure of things before she entrusts her future to a stranger. She hoped they'd be compatible, because she didn't want to spend the rest of her life alone. And she was relieved to find out that he was fairly well-off too. That's what had kept her away from the men she met in Miami Beach—they all seemed to be broke and out after her money. Couldn't he just take a week off for a flying visit?

Lou Manning thought it over. He weighed the possible risks, and found them negligible. He inspected his bankroll. That was negligible, too.

Then he sent the wire and took off for Miami Beach.

Fortunately, the season was over and he was able to get a decent break at a nice hotel. A week there would be all he could possibly afford, but a week might be long enough. It had to be long enough.

The minute he got into his room he phoned Mrs. Goodrich at the number she'd given him in her last letter. Somebody answered—sounded like the maid—and said Mrs. Goodrich was out at the real estate office, but she'd left word for him to meet her if he called. She'd be in the dining room of the Savoy, at one. Did he know where the Savoy was, in Miami?

Lou knew where the Savoy was, all right. Less than three blocks away from the hotel where he'd stayed with Bessie.

But what the hell. He couldn't turn chicken. Besides, there wasn't any possible risk. Bessie was dead and buried and forgotten. And Mrs. Goodrich was spending the morning at the real estate office. Did that mean she'd changed her mind and was planning to sell her property and surprise him?

He had to find out.

So Lou Manning put on a blue shirt and a red tie and inspected his black mustache in the mirror. Then he rented himself a nice, shiny convertible and drove into Miami. A lot depended on making a good first impression. As he rode along he began to plan his opening remarks. By the time he entered the lobby of the Savoy he was all ready to go to work on Amy Goodrich. He glanced at his watch. One o'clock on the head. She'd be waiting for him in the dining room.

He started across the lobby toward the dining room entrance, but he never got that far. Midway in his progress he bumped into somebody, muttered, "Excuse me" and started to brush past. But a hand on his arm detained him.

Lou turned around and stared at Bert Jackson.

The little baldheaded man blinked up at him and smiled. “Here you are,” he said. “I’ve been trying to locate you for over a month now, but they said you left town. How about that, my friend?”

“I—I was sick,” Lou told him. “It was a shock and everything. Doctor told me to get away for a rest.”

“Which doctor?” Bert Jackson asked. “The house physician?”

Lou stiffened. What did the creep mean, making a crack like that?

But Bert Jackson was smiling, and Lou remembered to relax. Of course her brother would talk to the house physician when he came down here. Naturally, he’d ask for details. There was nothing out of line. Jackson sounded friendly enough.

“How about a drink?” he was saying. “We ought to have a talk.”

For a moment Lou was tempted to brush him off, then thought better of it. He had to find out what Bert Jackson knew and he couldn’t afford to make him suspicious by running away. Amy Goodrich would wait. Lucky for him he’d met Bert while he was still alone.

So Lou nodded and they went into the bar and took a booth and talked.

There was no need to ask any leading questions, because the little man went right ahead and told his story. He had been pretty upset when Bessie had run off with Lou that way in Daytona Beach, but when she wrote and assured him of her happiness he got over it. He’d received the letter in Newark, where he was working a few club bookings with the old act. Funny thing, he’d run into one of the Six Brown Brothers—did Lou by any chance happen to remember them?

Lou didn’t remember the Six Brown Brothers, and he wasn’t interested. He prodded Bert Jackson to continue.

“I was out of town when your wire came,” Bert said, “and when I got back I knew the funeral must have been held already. But I called the hotel. You must have known I would—why didn’t you stick around?”

“I was too upset,” Lou answered. “Like I told you. I had to get away.”

“You should have left a forwarding address.”

"I didn't know where I'd be. I meant to write you again when I got settled down. Just arrived in town today." He paused, wondering whether or not to ask the question. But he had to.

"How come you're here?"

Bert Jackson shrugged. "Got myself a booking. Three weeks, maybe four. I've been in town a week already."

That sounded logical. Lou decided it was safe for him to turn on the grief. A nice little act—bereaved husband describes his wife's last hours to her brother.

But Bert was sparing him the trouble. "Naturally, I did a little checking up," he was saying. "I talked to the people at the hotel, and to the doctor you called in for Bessie. But I didn't find out until today that you'd gone to San Juan."

Lou took a big gulp of his drink. All at once he felt very cold.

"Nice place to rest up," Bert continued. "And even if you had a shock, there was Bessie's money to cushion it for you."

"Bessie's money? But she didn't have—"

"Eight thousand dollars," Bert Jackson said, nodding. "Oh, I knew all about her bank account, my friend. And so did you. You came down here with Bessie and her eight thousand dollars. Now Bessie is gone, and I suppose the money is gone, too."

"What business is that of yours?"

"I'm not concerned with the money. It's Bessie I'm thinking about." Bert Jackson wasn't smiling now. He leaned forward, one slim white hand tapping the table. "What really happened to my sister? Tell me."

"But you know what happened. She had this attack—"

Bert sighed. "Never mind. I didn't think you'd really level with me, anyway."

"I am leveling with you! What do you want me to tell you?"

"Just the truth. Did she really have a heart attack, Lou? Or—"

Lou took a deep breath. "Look here, I don't have to sit here and take this kind of stuff from you. You say you talked to the people at the hotel. You talked to her doctor. They'll back me up."

Bert Jackson sighed again. "Yes. They already have. As far as the record goes, you're clean. And being her husband, I suppose you're entitled to the money, too. But I know what you were up to, Lou. Romancing a fat, foolish middle-aged woman, giving her the big rush act—"

Lou Manning knew that the crisis was over. Bert didn't really have a leg to stand on; he'd just admitted as much. So he could relax and go into his pitch again.

"You've got me all wrong, Bert. I loved her, and she loved me. She was happy, but you wouldn't understand that. You're a bachelor—you don't know anything about women—"

Now what in hell had he said wrong? It must have been something, because Bert Jackson wasn't reacting properly.

The little man was laughing.

It wasn't a mirthful laugh, but it was genuine. Bert Jackson's shoulders shook. He stood up and gazed down at Lou, and there was no mistaking the hatred that shone in his eyes. But he laughed.

"All right," he said. "All right, Lou. Have it your way."

Then he was gone.

Lou sat there and finished his drink. He had a lot of thinking to do. The creep suspected him. He'd snooped around and gotten nowhere. That was plain enough, because there'd been no threat of calling in the law. But Bert suspected him and he was an enemy. And why had he laughed? Lou had told him the truth—at least about the way Bessie had felt. She did love him, she was happy with him, until the end. Why had Bert laughed?

Lou Manning didn't know. All he knew what that he must work fast. Sew up Amy Goodrich and get out of town, quickly, before Bert could get hold of him again. Then he'd be safe. That was the ticket—get hold of Mrs. Goodrich right now.

He glanced at his watch. Almost quarter to two. He practically ran out into the lobby and across the dining room entrance. His eyes scanned the faces of the late diners. Young couples, old couples, three or four singles, male. No solitary middle-aged woman in sight. He asked the headwaiter if he'd seen a woman sitting alone, asked if there was anyone who'd left a message for Lou Manning.

The headwaiter shook his head.

Lou went outside, got his car, and drove back to Miami Beach and the hotel. He phoned Mrs. Goodrich from his room. This time there was no answer at all.

Something had gone wrong. Damn that little creep!

Lou hadn't eaten lunch, but he wasn't hungry. He was scared. Looking into the mirror he had to admit the truth. He was losing the old grip. He could see Lou Manning's face in the glass, but Luis Manuel showed through. And Luis Manuel, underneath the toupee and the hair-dye, was scared spitless.

This would have to be different. Maybe meeting Bert Jackson had been a blessing in disguise—a warning. He couldn't handle any more women the way he'd handled Bessie. And maybe there shouldn't be any more women. Just this Amy Goodrich.

He took out her picture and stared at it again. Suppose she was only forty-one, like she said. And she had a fair-sized hunk of dough. Wasn't that enough? Couldn't he make an honest try for once, if she turned out to be halfway decent? Why not marry her and really settle down? Life could be quiet and peaceful. No more disguises, no more writing to the Romance Club, no more skulking around and narrow escapes. Yes, and no more crazy flings like that trip to San Juan, either. Well, he was willing to call it quits. He might as well face the facts. He wasn't getting any younger. If he could swing it with Amy Goodrich, that would be good enough for him. He'd hit it off with her all right—after all, he knew how to make a woman happy.

Twice more he called her number, and twice more he listened to the unanswered ring. The loneliest sound in the world.

Just sitting around like that gave him the jitters worse than ever, so finally he called room service and had the boy bring up a pint of rye. All he needed was one or two drinks to steady his nerves. He had to have steady nerves from now on in. So he could handle this woman right.

But what had happened to her? Where was she? Why hadn't she showed up at lunch? What was going on at the real estate office?

Maybe there'd been an accident. Maybe something crazy had come up. There were all sorts of ways to foul the details in a deal like this. But the deal couldn't get fouled up. He was counting on it. It had to go through.

The drinks only made him feel worse. All at once Lou noticed the room was getting dark. He'd been sitting here for hours. Maybe he'd better not wait around. Maybe he'd better give up and get out of town while the getting was good—before that little fink got some new ideas.

Lou scowled. Why should he be afraid of a broken-down vaudeville ham? But the little man had laughed at him. Maybe he was off his rocker. Lou knew the feeling. He was getting close to going off his rocker himself.

Well, one more phone call. Just one more. If Amy Goodrich wasn't home by now he might as well kiss her off for good.

He was just getting ready to pick up the telephone when it rang. It made him jump about a foot and his voice wasn't any steadier then his hand when he finally answered.

"Hello?"

"Hello—is this Mr. Manning—Lou? This is Amy Goodrich."

A warm contralto voice, slightly slurred.

"Yes. What happened? We were to meet for lunch."

"I know. I'm sorry about that. I'll explain everything when I see you. So much has happened—"

"Good. Where are you now?"

"Why, I'm right downstairs in the lobby. I thought we might go out for dinner, maybe have a little drink first to celebrate—"

Lou grinned. He recognized the slur in her voice now. Why, the dame was half-crocked! He hesitated another moment, then decided to chance it. "Why not come on up here for your drink?" he asked. "I happen to have the makings."

“Well, I don’t know,” Amy Goodrich giggled. “You think it would be all right?”

“Of course. You come right up. I’m in five-seventeen.”

She hung up and Lou got to work. He switched on the side lamp, straightened the room, fetched clean glasses and scrabbled around in the dregs of the ice bucket. Then he checked his face in the mirror. By the time he heard the knock on the door everything was ready.

Amy Goodrich stood there, swaying slightly, and blinking in the light.

Lou Manning smiled at her, and his smile was genuine—because she was genuine, too. Small, slender, her wavy brown hair gathered in a pug, and just like her photograph. Her carefully made-up face betrayed no wrinkles, and she couldn’t have been any older than she claimed. Lou wasn’t exactly the type to fall for the old love-at-first-sight gag, but he liked her at first sight. No doubt about that.

And when she came in, flopped into a chair without ceremony, accepted a drink with a smile and leaned back, he made a sudden decision. He’d play this one straight.

“It all happened so suddenly I don’t exactly know how to begin,” she was saying. “And then I’ve had three cocktails and this drink—” She giggled and held out her empty glass. Lou refilled it quickly.

“Anyway, I got the call this morning. From the real estate people. Remember, I told you I hadn’t made any plans to sell? Well, I hadn’t. But this agency knew about the apartments and they phoned today to say they had a client who was interested in just that kind of property. They wanted me to come down right away. So I went, and left a message for you—”

Lou nodded. “I got it,” he said.

“I’m dreadfully sorry I had to break our luncheon engagement,” Amy Goodrich said. “But they had the client right there in the office and he insisted on taking me out and talking things over. It went on for quite a long time. Finally, though, I had to say yes.”

“Yes to what?” Lou asked.

“Why, to selling the place, of course. You know what he paid me? Two-fifty. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in cash!”

“You mean you—?”

“Oh, I don’t have the money yet. But I will before the week is out. I’ve got the option payment and all that’s left is the title search and making out the final papers.” She beamed up at him. “I guess I’m entitled to a little celebration, aren’t I?”

Lou took her hand. It was warm and soft. He wasn’t at all sure about that love-at-first-sight business being a gag now. Ever since he’d heard about the money he’d felt a genuine stirring of emotion. Money had always been an aphrodisiac to Lou. Just like liquor is an aphrodisiac to some women, for instance.

Holding her hand that way, the idea hit him. Why not? He had to work fast, didn’t he? And the best way to do that was to cut out all the preliminaries. What he wanted to do was to sew up the deal, sew her up, and get out of town before there was any possibility of trouble with Bert Jackson.

This was a heaven-sent opportunity. Here was Amy Goodrich, already a little bit stiff. Another drink or two, she’d be a pushover. The whole thing would be a pushover. Besides, she wouldn’t be hard to take. Lou knew women, and this one was desirable. He thought back, with a shudder, to all the old bats he’d known—fat, repulsive old creatures like Bessie. But Amy Goodrich was something different. She was warm and soft. And she wasn’t a prude.

She giggled up at him now and pointed at the empty bottle on the table. “I’ve got another surprise for you,” she said. “Maybe you’ll be shocked. But I was hoping you’d ask me up when I called, and I didn’t know if you’d have any liquor in your room, and I wanted to celebrate. So I bought this and put it in my purse.”

Sure enough, she hauled out a pint of bourbon. The seal had been broken, but it was more than three-quarters full.

Lou grinned at her and accepted the bottle. He poured two stiff ones. He could stand another jolt, and it would just about take care of her.

"I'm glad you thought to bring it," he said. "And don't worry about shocking me. You'll find out I like a drink now and then. You'll find out I like a lot of the good things in life. And might I say that you're definitely one of them?"

He raised his glass. "To our better acquaintance," he said. The bourbon tasted much stronger than the rye—it burned as it went down. But he emptied it at a gulp, hoping she'd follow suit. Then, in a few minutes, he'd make a few passes. She'd never know what hit her until it was too late to resist. Tomorrow they could apply for a license—let's see now, they could be married just about the time the money for the apartment building came through.

He started to move toward her, then noticed that she hadn't taken a drink. As he watched, she set the glass down on the bureau next to the chair.

"But you were talking about getting acquainted," she said. "Tell me something about yourself."

Lou smiled. "What do you want to know?" he began. "You've read my letters. I'm like you are. One of the lonely ones. Looking for companionship, someone I can trust, someone who understands me—"

"What's the matter?" She stood up now, staring at him. Lou bit his lip. How could she tell? He had felt the sudden cramp as he was speaking, but thought he'd concealed it. Now it came on again, worse than before. He knew he had turned pale, knew he was sweating. All at once he had to sit down on the bed. He smiled weakly.

"I'm all right," he said. The pain bored in again, stronger.

She nodded and moved closer. "Then tell me some more," she said. "About understanding. Didn't Bessie understand you?"

"Bessie?" The pain flared up again, but he ignored it. "What do you know about Bessie?"

"Everything. You married her less than two months ago, didn't you? And you took her money—"

Lou fell back on the bed. He was trying to sit up, trying to get up, but the pain pressed him down. It was a huge stone, crushing his stomach. A pointed stone that ripped and tore. And her words were ripping and tearing, worse than the pain.

"You fed her the digitalis in a drink, didn't you? Of course, nobody can prove it. They found it there when they exhumed the body, but there's no way of making certain she didn't take an overdose for herself, because of her heart. Of course, Bessie really didn't have heart trouble, did she? But you spread the word around, and now that she's dead it's just your word against a lot of suspicions. Even if you went to trial, they wouldn't have a chance at a conviction."

The pain was rising in his chest now, rising in his throat. He wanted to vomit it out, just as he was vomiting out the words.

"So Bert told you," he wheezed. "You're a friend of Bert Jackson's. He put you up to this, didn't he? He must have seen Bessie's letters from the Romance Club and figured out I'd write them again. So he hired you as bait for me. Is that it? Go ahead—tell me the rest."

"What's there to tell?" Amy Goodrich was still smiling. "You can probably figure it out. Bert ordered the body exhumed for an autopsy—a brother has the right, you know. And he checked up on you, all the way back. Then he went to the police. But the trouble is, he had no proof. No proof at all. He wasn't even sure you'd blown the money until he met you today. Then he decided to go ahead with it."

"Go ahead with what?" Everything was blurring, but Lou gritted his teeth and forced himself to sit up. He had to hear the rest. "Go ahead with what?" he gasped.

"Why—this." Amy Goodrich pointed at the bottle of bourbon. "He wasn't going to let you get away with murder. An eye for an eye, you know. So now you've taken the digitalis too, and in a few minutes—"

"Digitalis?"

"Why not? It worked on Bessie. It will work on you. Nobody saw me come up to your room. Nobody knows about the two of us. Nobody ever will. You were drinking, you had a little spell, your heart gave out. There's a house physician in this hotel, too. He'll write out the death certificate."

"No—"

The pain was blinding. Lou tried to stand up. He tried to stand up. He tried three times, then doubled over on the bed, sobbing.

"Don't let me die—I don't want to die—get a doctor—quick—"

"Too late for that. But I've got an antidote."

"Antidote? Where is it?"

"Right here."

She was fishing in her purse again, and he could see, dimly, that she was holding a small vial in her hand.

"Give it to me—"

"Not until you confess."

"All right. I confess. I did it. Now, give it to me—"

"That isn't enough. There has to be a witness. I'll call the police."

"You can't do that."

She shrugged. "All right. Have it your way." She walked across the room.

Pain came in continuous waves now. He could just about see her, just about talk. "Where are you going?"

"To turn on the shower. In a while you'll start screaming."

"Wait—"

She had to wait, because it hit him so hard then he couldn't get the words out for a minute.

"All right. Call the cops. I'll tell—"

And she called them, and they came, and he told. He nearly passed out, twice, and they slapped his face to bring him around, but he told.

Then at the end he managed to wheeze out the rest. The dirty slut thought she'd fixed his goose, but she'd forgotten that he could pay her back.

"Don't let her get away with anything," he finished. "She's as guilty as I am. Trying to kill me with digitalis. It's in that bottle, over there." Then his voice cracked. "And now, for God's sake, give me the antidote!"

Amy Goodrich looked at the cops and shook her head.

"There is no antidote," she said.

"But there has to be—you promised—"

"There is no digitalis in the whiskey, either. All I slipped you was a Mickey Finn. That's right, the old Mickey. You're going to be sick as hell in another five minutes, and then you'll pass out. But that's all right. They'll take care of you fine when you wake up again. You're going to be right in shape for the trial."

One of the cops helped Lou get to the bathroom. Amy was right; he was very sick indeed. When he got back they were waiting to take him downstairs.

"I'm afraid we'll have to ask you to come along too," the cop said. "We'll need a complete explanation of all this, Mrs. Goodrich."

"Whatever you say," she answered.

Lou stared at her. She was a fine figure of a woman. For a moment he felt a twinge of regret and somehow it was worse than the physical pain. If only she had been content to let things ride! They could have been happy together. He knew that he could have been happy with a woman like her. But she had to turn out to be a dirty double-crosser, a friend of Bert's.

Suddenly she turned to Lou and began to laugh, and sick as he was, he recognized the sound.

"All right," she said, softly. "I'm sorry. But I had to do it this way. A long shot, but I figured it was the only chance. And it worked." She nodded at Lou soberly. "And I couldn't help laughing when I thought about it this noon." Slowly, Mrs. Goodrich removed the brown wig and revealed the bald head beneath. And the laughter came again. "Telling me you knew all about women and I didn't. Me, Bert Jackson—one of the best female impersonators in the business!"

Night School

You find them on the sidestreets of every large city, and you wonder, sometimes, how the proprietors manage to make a living.

There's a basement entrance, usually, and a dimly-lighted window with used books emblazoned on it in speckled lettering. Almost always you'll encounter a rack just beside the doorway, surmounted by a crudely-lettered sign: your choice—100. Inevitably the rack contains at least six standard titles—Three Weeks, The Green Hat, Helen's Babies, Black Oxen, If Winter Comes, and Speaking of Operations.

Nobody ever buys them, even for a dime, and nobody ever seems to pay the exorbitant prices for those copies of Fantazius Mallare, The Golden Ass or Tertium Organum which you're bound to find inside the shop. You may suspect that the proprietor dispenses other treats to bibliophiles from under the counter—eager students of geography might be able to obtain Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer, and a keen nose could detect the spicy scent of The Perfumed Garden—but even so, sales must be slow. And you wonder, once again, how the proprietors can keep going over the long years.

It was to just such a shop that a young man came, in early evening. His name was Abel, and there was nothing remarkable about him except the slightly furtive air with which he scurried down the steps and into the darkened store.

He frowned as he entered, as though bewildered by his surroundings. It was as though the very commonplace appearance of the establishment confused him or disappointed him in some way. And when the proprietor emerged from a dusty counter at the rear of the store, young Mr. Abel's expression as much as said, "I must have made a mistake."

The proprietor himself was a standard edition, slightly soiled by Time; he had the appearance of being thumbed, discarded, and put away on a shelf to gather dust unheeded and unheeding of the passage of years. He was short and stooped, as most of them are; his wispy hair and scraggly mustache were of no particular color, and the eyes behind his spectacles might have been milky marbles.

His voice, when it came, was a toneless murmur. "What can I do for you?"

Young Mr. Abel hesitated. Again he frowned, and for a moment it was a tossup as to whether he'd ask for a copy of Jurgen, reply with the standard, "Just looking around, thank you," or merely turn and walk out of the store.

But there seemed to be something more than just bewilderment behind the frown, and after a hesitant pause it emerged as a determined ring when he spoke.

"I'm looking for instructions," he said. "A rather special course, and I'll need some rather special books."

The marbles rolled behind the spectacles and the proprietor bowed his head. "Titles?"

"Three," came the answer. "The first is, Introduction to Murder. The second is, Death on the Installment Plan. And the last, The Price Is Right."

The proprietor looked up. The milky marbles had been replaced by a pair of black, piercing eyes.

"An unusual assortment," he muttered. "But perhaps I can help you. By the way, who recommended me?"

"One who said you would ask that question, and that I would know better than to answer."

The bookseller nodded. "We'd best go in back, then. Wait a moment until I lock up." He fumbled with the door, then clawed at the lightswitch. The young man followed him along darkened aisles until they came to the room at the rear of the shop.

It was bright and comfortable there, and rather remarkably well-furnished.

"Sit down," said the proprietor. "Now, then, your name?"

"Abel. Charles Abel."

"Abel, is it? Dear me!" The older man chuckled. "Then I suppose you might call me Mr. Cain."

The young man's frown disappeared. "Then this is the place," he exclaimed. "You are the right man!"

Mr. Cain shrugged. "Have you the money?" he asked.

"Here it is. A thousand in cash, all small bills."

Mr. Cain accepted the sum and counted it carefully. Then he looked up and nodded. "I'm the right man," he murmured. "Now, about those instructions you're seeking. Just who is it that you wish to kill?"

Almost a week had passed since young Abel's first visit to the bookstore. He had returned every night, appearing punctually at nine o'clock. There was no question of tardiness, for he was an eager pupil. And there was so much to learn.

To his delight, he found Mr. Cain an able instructor. He told him as much, thinking he was delivering a compliment. But the older man merely grimaced wryly. "You know what they say," he commented. "Them as can't, teach."

"You mean you've never murdered anyone yourself?"

Mr. Cain assumed an expression of embarrassment. "I suffer from haemophobia. Most unfortunate. The sight of blood so distresses me that I can't even bear to set out traps for the mice which infest this place. They literally eat away my profits."

"But the bookstore is only a front, really. This is your real business, isn't it?"

"Yes. I am a teacher, by profession."

Young Mr. Abel grinned. “Sorry, but I can’t help it. Just strikes me funny to think of you sitting back here and planning the perfect crime.”

“And just what’s so funny about that, young man?” The bookseller rose. “If you knew how bad things were in the trade, you’d understand. A man has to make a living.”

“You said, ‘in the trade.’ Does that mean you’re not the only one? Do other secondhand booksellers—”

“That’s no concern of yours,” Mr. Cain answered, hastily. “I’m the one who asks the questions around here. And I should be getting more answers. You’ve been studying for a week now, and you still haven’t told me whom you intend to murder. It’s about time we got down to cases. I’m a busy man, I have other clients who need help.”

The young man shook his head. “I intend to tell you, once I’m really convinced,” he apologized. “It’s just that I must be sure you can teach me how to commit the perfect crime.”

“Perfect crime? No trick to that at all,” Mr. Cain snapped. “I told you I’d never actually killed a man myself, and that’s true. But I’ve been what you might call an accessory, hundreds of times. And I assure you, each instance was a perfect crime. You know what the statistics are on murder? Fifty-five percent of all murders go unsolved. Fifty-five percent, just think of that! No trial, not even a suspect, in over half of all the slayings committed each year. It’s not an accident. A lot of the killers had help. Expert instruction. The kind I offer you. Remember that Black Dahlia case, out on the West Coast?”

“Did you plan that?”

“For one of my pupils, yes.” Mr. Cain smiled with shy pride. “That’s merely a sample of what I can come up with, when I get a bit of cooperation from a student who’s willing to learn.”

Young Abel lit a cigarette. “How do I know you’re not just filling me full of nonsense? That particular killing looked pretty senseless to me.”

Mr. Cain bit his lip. “That’s just the point,” he insisted. “Haven’t you been listening to what I’ve told you all week? Let’s go through it once again, briefly. What are the reasons for murder? Quickly, now."

"Well, there are three, you said. First, necessity."

"Such as?"

"Oh, mercy killings, and cases where money is involved, or when somebody wants to get rid of a marriage partner but has scruples about divorce."

"Good. And the second reason?"

"Anger. Jealousy. Rivalry. That sort of thing."

"The third?"

"Just plain battiness, isn't it? Purely for kicks."

"Impurely for kicks," Mr. Cain corrected. "The third category is out, as far as I'm concerned. I won't take on a psychopath as a student. Can't trust them to follow instructions, for one thing."

"But the Black Dahlia case looked like the work of a psychopath."

"Now you're beginning to see the light," Mr. Cain assured him. "Of course it did. It was planned that way."

"Planned?"

"I told you before that over half the murders in this country are never solved. Why? Because the clues which lead the authorities to most murderers have nothing to do with the actual modus operandi of the crimes. About twenty years ago there was a fad for detective books featuring involved, elaborate methods of destruction. I ought to know; the shelves up front are filled with 'em. Fantastic murder plots—people using poisoned darts, daggers made out of icicles, rigging up locked-room plots, using phonograph records of their voices for alibis. All that's ridiculous. If you use ordinary common sense and aren't seen by somebody who can go running to the police as an informer or witness, there's no trick to getting away with murder. Provided, of course, you take sensible precautions about fingerprints, bloodstains, and kindergarten stuff like that.

"The police don't apprehend the killer today because of his methods. What leads them to the culprit are his motives. And that's just what the unlucky forty-five percent who get caught are apt to forget about. In cases of necessity, the law is always on the lookout for someone who benefits from the death; an heir, an unhappily-married man or woman, a business rival. In cases of anger or jealousy, it's equally easy to spot the culprit." He paused. "Let me assure you, there was a genuine motive behind every murder I've ever helped plan. But I always plan them so that there is no appearance of motive. In a word, each killing looks like the work of a maniac."

"So that's the secret!"

"Didn't the person who sent you to me infer as much?" Mr. Cain demanded. "Or don't you know the details of his success story?"

"He did," young Abel admitted. "And I do know the details. He recommended you very highly. It's just that it didn't seem to make sense to me, before."

"And now it does? Good! Very well, then, don't you think it's about time you confided in me? Exactly what do you have in mind?"

Mr. Abel hesitated no longer.

"I want to kill the man who recommended you," he said.

"One of my former pupils? But my dear boy, that's hardly ethical—"

"Put your mind at ease. I won't tell you his name. You'll never know, so your conscience will remain at rest."

"Do you have some sort of personal grudge against him, is that it?"

"I do. Again, it's not necessary for me to burden you with the details. All you have to know is that he doesn't suspect me of hating him. So already we have a perfect setup, according to your definition. Nobody would ever connect me with the crime, because apparently I have no motive. Now, all I require from you is a method. Something that will make the actual killing look like the work of a criminal psychopath."

"Hmmmm." Mr. Cain rose and paced the floor. "It sounds simple enough, if you're telling me the truth."

"Scout's honor."

"Well, if you put it that way—" Mr. Cain paused. "I suppose it would be too simple for you to just corner him alone somewhere, strangle him, and then walk away? Sometimes the very simplicity of a slaying is the most baffling element. A blow on the head in a dark alley, and the police are stymied."

"Please, sir," said Mr. Abel, softly. "Such advice is hardly worth a thousand dollars in cash, tax-free."

"I could get you some poison, now—"

"What's psychopathic about poison? Really, after all that buildup, I expected something a bit more gaudy."

"Gaudy, is it?" Mr. Cain halted, and his eyes brightened. "Here's one which may appeal to you, my boy. It's an oldie, of course, but it hasn't been done to death in recent years. I call it the Dead Litter Office."

"Dead Letter Office?"

"Litter." He smiled down at his pupil. "In order to carry it out, one must make sure of just three conditions."

"What are they?"

"First, that the killer can lure the victim to a secluded spot and there dispose of him. Again, despite your objections, I must strongly recommend a blow on the head or plain strangulation. Of course, it's assumed that pain will be taken to remove the usual evidences of the crime and dispose of the murder weapon, if any. Do you think you can handle that part of the job?"

"Quite easily."

"Good. The second condition is that the killer has an automobile."

"I've got a car, yes."

"Thirdly, and most important—the killer must not be under regular surveillance. That is to say, he should be able to move about freely, perhaps leave town for several days without anyone wondering about his absence."

"I live alone, and I'm on vacation from work all next week."

"Perfect! Then I think we can arrange the perfect psychopathic crime. The Dead Litter Office is bound to throw the police off the scent. They'll be so interested in the method that the question of motive will be completely forgotten."

"But just what do I do?"

"Can't you see it yet? You kill your victim in a simple fashion, as I suggest. Then, with the aid of a butcher knife or a cleaver, you dismember the body. I'd say the natural division, based on my previous experience in such matters, would be lower legs, thighs, split pelvis, ditto torso, lower arms, upper arms, and head. A total of thirteen pieces in all. Unlucky number, but then I trust you're not unduly superstitious."

"No. Just curious. What do I do with the—fragments?"

"Why, bundle them up, of course. Into thirteen separate packages. You'll need some of that plastic sacking used for home freezers, some heavy brown paper, and butcher's twine. Be sure you have plenty of twine! Once your packages are wrapped and ready, you merely address them, put on some stamps, and pop them into the mailboxes for parcel post."

"But thirteen heavy packages—"

"That's why I asked you if you had a car, and a few days to spare. You don't mail them all from one location. You drive around, to a dozen different cities. Get yourself a map and find out just how far you can travel in, say, four days. It would be smart to choose apparently unrelated locations, so the police can't establish a pattern, or a central point. I'll help you plan these details later. Part of the service, you know. Also, you must be sure of buying your stamps in advance—a roll of threes, I'd suggest, since nobody will notice them."

"But who do I address the packages to?"

"Pick the names at random from the phone books of the towns you visit. Or—here's a touch—send them to thirteen morticians, one in each community. That might mislead the police entirely. They'll go looking for people with grudges against undertakers, or hunt up necrophiles. Anyway, they'll be sure the job was done by a psychopath. Once the papers get hold of it and blow the story up, you can be sure that the trail will be lost in a maze of lurid sensationalism. Mad fiends, that sort of thing." Mr. Cain bent his head. "How does that sound to you, eh? Gaudy enough for your taste?"

"Yes. But are you quite sure there'll be no hitches?"

“Not if we plan thoroughly. Of course you must make sure of the elementary precautions, whereby you lure your victim to the proper spot. And you’ll have to arrange for disposal of your—ah—utensils. Best to steal them in the first place, from some cutlery store. Afterwards, drop them over a bridge somewhere out of town. But we can take these details step by step as we come to them. First of all, we’ve got to get rid of fingerprints. Would you care to do it now or wait until your vacation? Come to think of it, tonight is Friday. If you don’t work Saturday, we might just as well have it over with right away. Then you’ll heal enough over the weekend.”

“What are you talking about?”

“Acid, my boy. A little preparation of my own. Takes off the whorls so they can’t trace your prints. Of course it takes off the skin, too, but that can’t be helped. And I’m afraid I’ve no anaesthetic available. Still, this room is fairly soundproof, and if you scream a little, nobody will notice.”

“Acid? Scream? Really, now—” Young Abel shrank back.

Mr. Cain ignored him as he walked to a cabinet and extracted a bottle, a basin, and a beaker. He did things with all three until he was peering benevolently at his pupil from behind a rising cloud of acrid fumes.

“Come along,” he murmured. “This may hurt a bit, but I guarantee it will prove mild, as compared to the anguish of electrocution. If you’ll pardon the jest, the electric chair is apt to inspire a deep-seated aversion. . . .”

Over a week passed from the time Mr. Abel left the bookshop with bandaged, gloved fingers, and the moment of his abrupt reappearance one evening.

It was quite late, and he had to rattle the outer door of the store for several moments before Mr. Cain shuffled up and admitted him.

He led the young man to the back room through the darkness, gazing curiously at the satchel he carried, but saying nothing until at last the two were seated in the quiet confines of the rear chamber.

Then inquisitiveness overcame the proprietor. “What happened to you?” he asked. “You never came back for final instructions. I was worried—”

Young Abel smiled. “You needn’t have concerned yourself. I found your suggestions adequate for their purpose. The whole affair was a complete success.”

“You—you did it? But when? I mean, there were no headlines in the papers, nothing—”

“I thought things over. Your first suggestion, about simply strangling the victim, made sense. Of course my fingers were a bit sore, but there were no complications. The killing itself, in a dark alley, was presumed to be the work of a common mugger as I believe they’re called. It scarcely rated a paragraph in the paper; no wonder you overlooked it. Here, see for yourself.”

Abel passed over a clipping, and the older man read it quickly. He looked up, nodding. “Young Driscoll, eh? But I thought you weren’t going to tell me the name.”

“It hardly matters, does it? He was the man who sent me to you, and he was a former—uh—pupil of yours.”

“Yes. A jealousy case. Some rival had stolen his fiancee. Oddly enough, he didn’t hate the man. He wanted to kill the girl. She was living with his rival, and we had to go to some pains to conceal his motive for the slaying. Finally, we worked out an angle to make it look like the work of a psychotic. We used the Mad Bomber approach, as I recall, but decided on a bus instead of a plane. The trick was to plant the bomb, not in her luggage, which might lead to examining the motives, but in the suitcase of a GI who was going back to camp after a leave. We located such a party just in time and did the job—I won’t bore you with details. Anyway, the device worked.”

Abel nodded. “Yes. Four killed, three injured. The girl died, all right.”

“You have an excellent memory. That was over two years ago.” Mr. Cain paused. “Or did he tell you?”

“He told me nothing. I merely guessed. You see, I happened to be his rival. The girl he killed was my girl.”

“Oh, I see. No wonder you wanted to eliminate him. Well, now you have your revenge.”

“Yes.”

“And all’s well that ends well.”

“But it isn’t ended.”

“Oh, no?”

Mr. Abel opened his satchel. “You see, as you yourself explained it to me, you were an accessory. You helped plot the crime. And so—” He took out a large knife and a small cleaver.

“Now, wait,” Mr. Cain quavered. “You can’t get away with this!”

“You said this place is virtually soundproof. Nobody will hear the screams, particularly if I knock you over the head first.” Abel blocked the doorway and made a tentative swipe with the cleaver, which swished in an eminently satisfactory manner.

“But I appeal to you—not as your intended victim, but as your teacher, your superior in experience! The plan I gave you wouldn’t succeed in my case.”

“Why not? I have plenty of time to make the trip. You see, I lied to you. I’ve two weeks of vacation, not just one.”

“Even so, you’ll be found out. Someone, somewhere, must know you’ve been visiting me here night after night. And when I disappear—”

“You won’t disappear. At least, not permanently. As far as anyone knows, you’ll just go on vacation for about a week. I’m the one who’s disappearing.”

“Where?”

“Right back here, into the bookshop. I’m disappearing behind a hair-dye, a stooped walk, a scraggly mustache, and a pair of spectacles.”

“You’ll take my place? Permanently?”

“Why not? I can learn to imitate your voice, copy your handwriting. The rest of your little tricks I’ll pick up along the way. Along with your future clients, I suppose. You’ve got to admit that anyone who can figure out such a scheme has talent as an instructor. Besides, as I am about to demonstrate, I have one practical advantage over you—I'm not squeamish about the sight of blood."

"No, you can't—you are a psychopath!"

"All killers must be. And teachers, too."

"But—"

The cleaver cut short his answer.

It was a pity that Mr. Abel's former instructor was not around to take pedagogical pride in the way he carried out every step of the plan. Since part of the plan consisted of Mr. Abel becoming Mr. Cain, he even went so far as to adopt all his little mannerisms, including the penchant for bad puns. Inside of each package that he prepared for mailing he included a special bookwrapper. His title choices included The Anatomy of Melancholy, The Naked and the Dead, and The Heart of the Matter. For the dismembered torso, naturally, he reserved A Farewell to Arms.

He realized, of course, that it was a bit of a risk, but even a psychopath is entitled to a bit of harmless spoofing. Particularly when he intends, as the new Mr. Cain intended, to carry out the rest of his schedule in painstaking sobriety and then return and settle down to a humdrum life of teaching.

And that, of course, is the way it worked out. His mission completed, he came back to the bookshop and retired behind the glasses and the hair-dye. After a bit, he mastered the pattern of existence. And after a little longer, new pupils came. The used bookstore continued in business.

You find them on the sidestreets of every large city, and you wonder, sometimes, how the proprietors manage to make a living. . . .

CHAPTER 1

THE swallow was scarcely more than a fledgling. It had flown up from Sanjancapistrano, and now it was approaching the Laguna Dome.

No Shelley hailed its blithe spirit as the bird spiralled slowly down towards the community nestled between the ocean and the hills. The swallow noted, without comprehension, the hilltop houses and the oxygenerators on the peaks. It circled lower, over the scholasticity, the industricity, the consumarkets and the outlying farmareas, all powered by the atomic plant from distant Longbeach.

None of this interested the swallow. It was searching for something else —something it had not seen during the long flight between Sanjancapistrano and here.

Life.

That's what the swallow was looking for. Some sign of life, of sentience. Avian, animal, even human life would suffice: the swallow was lost in a great loneliness. Ever since leaving its nest it had been alone, and only instinctual hunger had sent it on the long, solitary flight in search of fellow-beings. The bird had flown over empty ocean and equally empty land—flown emptily, endlessly, impelled by a need to seek out a living thing from the vast wastes of sand and rock.

The swallow had seen other cities en route, or their remains: skeleton cities, corpse-cities, and bits of disarticulated white bone that had once been connected into roads. But there had been no life.

And now life was at hand. Five thousand feet below, the bird caught glimpses of movement in the city streets. The living creatures were alien—what did the swallow know of humans?—but they were undoubtedly alive. And life called out to life, in wild welcome.

The swallow glided down, circling to dive. Fortunately, it hesitated before actually diving. Thus it was that only its wings struck the plexide transparency of the Dome.

The invisible barrier did not reflect; it merely rejected. The swallow pecked at it vainly, but nothing happened. The Dome remained, inviolate.

So the swallow rose, spiralled again, and descended at a distance. Once more the Dome deflected it. The bird could see life passing below, oblivious to every frantic effort at entry. Time after time the swallow circled and swooped, but wherever it went the Dome was there.

Finally dusk came. The bird, exhausted, circled in the radioactive air, then turned its three eyes to the southern sunset and fluttered away.

It couldn't get inside the Dome.

On the other hand, those inside the Dome couldn't get out . . .

CHAPTER 2

INSIDE the Dome, in one of the hilltop houses, Graham waited. Palms perspiring, the dark-haired young man adjusted his glasses and then reached for the controls.

He stared into the blackness of the room before him, then blinked at the sudden light. His companion coughed nervously.

Suddenly the plain came into view—the sweeping stretch of sunlit sand beside the sea. Far in the distance a black dot moved. Swiftly it approached, transforming as it neared into the familiar combination of a manicycle and rider.

The manicycle was a standard model, complete with smasher before and rakers behind, but its rider was not garbed for combat. Instead he wore the conventional black uniform and crashhelmet, without covering armor. Through the plexide bubble his features were plainly visible as he ground to a halt and dismounted. And it was then that both Graham and his companion could note, upon closer scrutiny, that he was she—an attractive young blonde.

"Switch," Graham murmured.

His companion grunted.

Boots scuffing sand, the uniformed blonde reached into the saddle-pouch and withdrew a pennant which she staked upright in the center of the plain. She stood there for a moment, then raised her right arm in a signal before returning to the manicycle. Mounting the machine once more, she waited.

Now attention moved again to the far horizon. Two dots this time, approaching still more rapidly than the manicycle had moved.

Within a matter of moments, the dots were rushing into the foreground, easily recognizable for what they were.

The enclosed, armored vehicle with the eight-foot spikes jutting from the bumper was obviously a Cad. And the lowslung open job with the battering-rod extending along the side of the hood was just as obviously a Jag.

Behind the controls of each were the drivers, in full armor.

The young man in the Jag smiled and waved at the Cad driver, who scowled in return. Then both of them glanced at the girl as she signalled.

Side by side the two cars rolled abreast of the pennant in the sand, clicking fenders in the ceremonial gesture. Then the Jag backed away and the Cad turned, backing in reverse. When each car was a hundred yards away from the pennant marker, the girl raised her right arm again.

And so the duel began.

The Cad thundered down the sand, shifting from third to fourth in a matter of seconds as it sought its prey. Six thousand pounds of armored might thrust forward, impelling the spikes toward the oncoming Jag.

The smaller car made no effort to swerve. It too came on at top speed, moving so swiftly it almost blurred. Suddenly its driver switched controls, moving the Jag out in a growing arc. At the same time the battering-rod telescoped past the hood as the extension went into play, and smashed the left fender of the Cad as the two cars passed one another with only inches separating them.

"Tournament style," Graham whispered. "Watch, now!"

Both cars wheeled and returned, scarcely slackening speed. Again the Cad hurtled forward, again the Jag dodged. But this time the driver of the Cad had anticipated the feint.

He countered with a side-swipe and the spikes on his hood dug squarely into the side of the Jag, almost rolling it over. The driver of the Jag huddled to one side as the righthand door came off, armor and all.

Not giving him time to recover. the Cad halted just ahead and quickly reversed. And now the rippers on the rear-fenders went into play, heading for the vulnerable hood of the floundering Jag. Just in time the driver switched on the exhaust-discharge, and lost himself, squid-fashion, in a murky cloud.

The Cad backed into the cloud, seeking its prey blindly. But the Jag swooped to one side, then described a quick arc. The Cad came out of the cloud, still in reverse, its driver blinded by the smoke. And the Jag was ready. It drove forward, hitting the Cad squarely in the side. At the same time the battering-rod swung around on a moveable extension and struck the windshield, ploughing through until it sheared the top off the heavier machine in a single vicious sideswipe.

The Cad's driver sat there in the arrested vehicle, bowing as if in appreciation. It was a grotesque bow, because the same blow that struck windshield and top had sheared off the top of his skull.

The driver of the Jag grinned and glanced at the girl. There was no need to formally acknowledge the victory—already she had removed her crashhelmet and was divesting herself of the black uniform. Still grinning, the Jag driver stepped out of his vehicle, ready to claim his reward. Now was the time to—

“Turn that bombed thing off!”

Graham glanced at his companion, then shrugged and reached for the switch. The scene faded away, the two screens rose and retracted into the ceiling, and the normal flow of fluorescence returned to the projection room.

“Sorry,” Graham murmured. “I know it’s hard to get the full effect without the sensories. The tracks are still in processing, and they’re beauties—particularly the audio and the olfac. But I thought you could at least get some idea from the video.”

“I got an idea, all right, sweetheart.” The other man rose from the posture-chair, his checkered robe fluttering in indignant accompaniment to his waving arms. “Great Godfrey—who authorized this?”

“It’s my treatment,” Graham told him. “Knocked it out in my spare time, and it cost next to nothing, so don’t worry.”

“I don’t give a bomb about time and cost, lover-boy,” said the man in the checkered robe. “What I want to know is why you did it in the first place. Trying to give a break to that blonde saddle-partner or something?”

“Please, Zank,” Graham answered. “I scarcely know the girl. That wasn’t my intention at all. It’s just that I’ve always wanted to try my hand at a Realie for a change.”

“Realie!” Zank was so excited he removed his checker-framed glasses. “How often I got to tell you we got a Realie Department already in operation?”

“I know. But I thought this might be a bit different—”

“Different! I’ll say it’s different! You think we’d ever release something showing a duel? You know better!”

“But people do duel, you know. At least, the Technos do. I tried to make it look authentic. Everything about it is true.”

"Darling!" Zank used the traditional phrase sneeringly. "Since when has truth got anything to do with Realies?" He wiped his glistening forehead with a checkered sleeve. "Realies are for Public Information. You know that."

"But why can't we do something different once in a while? Maybe just for a selected audience?"

"Because that's not our job." Zank shook his head. "Listen, Graham. Let me remind you that you're writing for the Space Opera Division. You've got one job, and that's to please your immediate superior—me. And if you want to please me, you'll stick to one plot—Bern meets Fern. That's all."

"I know," Graham sighed. "Only I get sick of it, doing the same old thing again and again. Telling the same old story. Space-travel is dangerous. Other worlds are filled with danger and evil. And so forth."

"And so on," Zank added. "You forget, it serves a purpose. Violence is outlawed here on Earth. We can't show killings and torture and antisocial aggression. So we switch to other planets, transfer the aggressive tendencies from men to the Bug-Eyed Monster. And at the same time, punch home the idea that it's better not to meddle with space-flight. What's the matter, sweetheart, don't tell me you've forgotten the basics?"

"How could I forget?" Graham replied. "That's all I've been hearing since I went to work. Space Operas are an important-adjunct of social conditioning. The hero must be dark, the heroine must be blonde, the monster must be green and the plot must be—"

This time it was a look rather than a word from Zank that halted him. The little producer smiled at him oddly.

"What's that again, lover?" he murmured. "Do my ears deceive me or are you sounding off like one of those lousy radical politicians? Where'd you pick up that kind of talk, anyway—you got ancestors in the GOP, maybe?"

In spite of himself, Graham paled. Biting his lip, he forced his features into a placating smile.

“Sorry,” he said. “Guess I’m a little bit tired.”

But Zank continued to grin.

“What from?” he asked. “Reading books, perhaps?”

Graham shook his head hastily. “You know better than that, Zank,” he protested. “Why, I’ve never even seen a book. Not a real one, that is. Of course, you understand we Talents have access to microfilms. But the stuff is all selected and approved. I’m not political, Zank, not at all. How could I be cleared for a job like this if anyone thought so?”

Zank’s grin relaxed a trifle. He sat down again. Abruptly his voice softened. “How old are you, Graham?”

“Twenty-five.”

“And you’ve been with Space Opera for four years, that right?”

“Four years this August.”

“Hmmm.” Zank clasped his hands together and wriggled his fingers. “I’m forty-four, myself. Got just six years left before I’m Socially Secured. You’d think if anyone wanted to play rebel, I’d be a logical candidate. Not a youngster like you, with half your active life still ahead.”

“Half an active life? Twenty-five more years of writing about technicolor tentacles reaching for three-dimensional bosoms?” Graham frowned. “I’m a Talent, Zank. You don’t understand what that means, do you? It means I want to express myself.”

“I do understand, darling.” There was no sarcasm in the producer’s voice now. “I’m half-Talent myself, on my mother’s side. You didn’t know that, did you? Well, it’s true. She was in Sadies, big operator in the designing department back East. Plastic stuff—like those old-time what-do-you-call-‘em, sculptors, I guess. Did some pretty important things, too. I understand she was the first one to come out with the bleeding dummy models. By the time I was born she was in charge of the whole Eastern Division. And then she got ideas.”

Zank paused and wiped his forehead again. “Of course all this is hearsay, because I never saw her—my father was a Techno, and it was just a one-year mating arrangement. But I heard about it from him later. He’d sort of kept track of my mother afterwards, when she went in for free-lance matings. For a while there I guess she changed mates about once a week, but that didn’t help. She was headed the wrong way. She wanted some variety in her work, too. Had the same ideas about Realies you seem to be taking up now, only in her case of course she was working with dummies instead of emotion-pictures. Finally she by-passed authorization and installed some new models in the Sadies at Nework. Psychos.”

Graham sat up straight. “Psychos?”

“You heard me. Psychos, robes and all, complete with scream-tracks. Claimed the best way for customers to work off aggression would be to carve up facsimiles of Authority.” Zank sighed. “Naturally, they quashed that idea in a hurry.”

“What happened to your mother?”

Zank sighed again, and shrugged. “What could happen?” he said. “They sent her back to the Womb.”

“I’m—I’m sorry.”

“Well, don’t be. Be glad, instead. Glad I told you, gave you an example. Because that’s what happens to Talents who decide they’ve got to express themselves. They think they’re heading in a new direction, but they always end up in the same place. Back to the Womb. You don’t want that to happen, do you, sweetheart?”

“No.” Graham repressed a shudder. Suddenly he reached over and patted his superior on the shoulder. “Look, Zank, I’m sorry about all this. I had no right to experiment. And no reason to talk the way I did. I’m just a bit tired, that’s all.”

“Maybe you need a rest.” Zank stared at him. “How long since you’ve been to a Psycho for a checkup?”

“There’s nothing wrong with me, really there isn’t,” Graham aid, hastily. “I’ll snap out of it. All I need is a little hard work to get back into the old routine. Matter of fact, I've been readying a script you're going to like this one has a real switch, an invisible Bern, you can only see it when it drinks blood and the blood brings its outline into view—"

"Great idea," Zank said. "You can tell me all about it when you come back."

"Back? But I'm not going anywhere."

"Oh yes you are." The producer smiled. "I've made up my mind. What you need to pick you up right now is a good week of relaxation. I'm authorizing you for an immediate Fornivacation." He delved into the folds of his checkered robe and pulled out a small black photoviewer. "Got just the partner for you, too. See this blonde here? 3-D doesn't do her justice; you need 4-D for that. Her name's Wanda. You're going to like her."

CHAPTER 3

IT WAS difficult not to like Wanda. She was every bit as blonde and beautiful as Zank had claimed.

Graham told her so, the very first night in his apartment.

"I can't understand why you aren't in emotion pictures," he confessed.

"As a Beni?" She smiled up at him.

"You know what I mean."

"I like this better."

Graham frowned. "Really? All these strange men, week after week—"

"Don't be so medieval, darling. There's nothing strange about men, actually. Of course you're different."

Now it was Graham's turn to smile. "Do they teach you what to say in school?"

"They taught me everything in school. It might interest you to know I have my Mistress's Degree in Erotology. Want to see my diploma?"

"Quite unnecessary. I'm well satisfied with your credentials."

“Then why are you sitting so far away from me?” the girl demanded. “Did I do something wrong? Didn’t you like the dinner I ordered?”

“Certainly. You order dinner perfectly.” Graham regarded her gravely. “You’re perfect, all anyone could reasonably ask for. But maybe I’m not the reasonable type.”

“Well, why didn’t you say so? Do you want to beat me? Are you a fetichist? Would you like to—”

“No, nothing of the sort. It’s just that I think I’d rather talk.”

“Talk?” Wanda’s eyes flickered momentarily, then opened wider. “Have you had a checkup lately?”

Graham shook his head. “Zank asked me that, this afternoon. Everybody asks, the moment they recognize a departure from the standard response-patterns. Why?”

“Well, isn’t that what checkups are for, lover? I mean, we can depend on the Psychos to help us adjust.”

“Bomb the Psychos!”

Wanda’s mouth was an oval of astonishment.

“Don’t look shocked,” Graham said. “You forget that I’m a Talent. I’ve only been oriented, not conditioned. To me a Psycho is just another man, not a Father-Image.”

“But surely you don’t question the benefits of adjustment?”

“Of course I do. That’s part of a Talent’s job—to question. We’re brought up that way. Everybody else gets hypnotherapy from birth, but not the Talents. We’re not supposed to have any checks on creative imagination. We’re allowed to doubt if we want to.”

“What is there to doubt?”

Graham sighed. “You’ve been conditioned, you wouldn’t understand. It’s just that I see things differently.”

“For instance?”

The young man stared at her. “Well, you, for example. I sit here looking at you across the room and where most men would see something perfectly normal—a beautiful naked girl wearing glasses—I don’t have the usual response. I keep wondering why you don’t take the glasses off, or at least wear contact lenses.”

“Contact lenses?”

“I learned about them on the microfilms. They were used in the past. Don’t be afraid—Talents are encouraged to scan, you know.”

“But everybody wears glasses, always. Everybody is myopic.”

“Perhaps. The Psychos claim that’s so, and nobody has ever questioned it, any more than they question the need for universal infant-appendectomy. But I wonder if it isn’t all part of the pattern of making everyone look alike, dress alike, think alike. Giving everybody his little scar, his little ocular badge. Conditioning the child to seeking security from the Psychos. Once you accept the knife, accept the visual aid, you’re well on the way to accepting anything they impose on you. You don’t question what the Psychos do and you don’t question what you see through the glasses they’ve given you to wear.”

“You sound disturbed.”

“I am disturbed.” Graham laughed, “That’s why Zank gave me this Fornivacation, remember?”

“Yes. And you’re not going to spend it sitting in a posture-chair discussing glasses, either.” Wanda rose and went over to the accommodation-shelf. She found her kit, fumbled in it, then turned and extended a pill.

“Here, take this,” she commanded.

“What is it?”

“Libidose, of course.”

“But I don’t want—”

She looked at him, genuine pleading in her eyes. He forced a smile as he gazed down at her. “Guess I’m thoughtless to upset you like this.” He reached for the pill, then hesitated. “If I swallow this, will you do something for me?”

“Anything.”

“Will you take off your glasses?”

Wanda nodded and her hand moved to her eyes. “Better?”

“Much better.”

“But wait—you didn’t take your pill.”

“Now I don’t need a pill.”

There was no more talk of pills, or anything else, the remainder of the evening. And the next day Graham was quiet and obliging. After the breakfast order came up on the dispenser they took the vator down to the level beneath the hilltop and Graham piloted his ‘copter to the beach area.

Here they undressed and for a few hours relaxed in the filtered water pumped from the subterranea of what had once been the ocean’s floor—before the Dome’s installation.

Far out on the horizon, beyond the rounded transparency of the Dome, they could see the actual ocean, with its tumbling waves. If they listened closely they could almost hear the roar of the gray fury.

“Ever been out of the Dome?” Graham asked.

“Of course. It’s my job to travel.”

“I mean, on your own.”

“Don’t be ridiculous.” Wanda’s eyes narrowed. “Have you?”

Graham shook his head. “No, but I’ve often wondered. What would it be like, for example, to take an old-fashioned boat and go sailing off on that ocean out there?”

“I’ve sailed,” Wanda confessed. “Just in a jetsub, of course. I went out on a Fornivacation with a very important man, to the Island.”

“What Island?”

“Up north a ways. You can see it on a clear day—Catatonia Island. It’s a Psycho resort, off Longbeach.”

"But that's Domed too, I suppose?"

"Certainly. Isn't everyplace?"

"Not from what I've heard. There can't be more than three thousand Domes in the entire continent. That leaves millions of square miles open all over the world. What would it be like to get out there, breathe unfiltered air, feel unfiltered sunlight?"

"Are you forgetting the radioactivity?" Wanda asked.

"How could I forget it? Don't we get an Official Geiger Count every day?"

"They say in another generation it may be safe to abandon the Domes."

"They say." Graham stood up, brushing the sand from his body. "They say, and they report, and we take their word for it. But I've scanned plenty of radiation data. And it's my belief we could open the Domes right now. Next time you jet off on a trip, take a look at the countryside before you're launched. It looks green and clean enough to me. My father told me that years ago."

"Your father!" Wanda rose and put her hand on his shoulder. "You knew him?"

"Of course. Didn't I say we Talents had a different kind of training? He lived with me until he was Socially Secured, four years ago. I was never put in a Big Family Unit like the rest of you."

He gestured and his movement indicated the figures on the beach area around them—the dozens of lolling and reclining figures, individual in their nudity but identical in their eyeglass badges, their closecropped hair, their youthfulness.

"Let's get out of here," Graham said.

Wanda shrugged, nodded, rose. They walked toward the 'copter.

"Is your father the one who gave you all these ideas?" she asked.

"Perhaps. He was a great Talent, Wanda. Perhaps the greatest here on the Coast. Ever hear of Lewis?"

“Lewis? The one who worked with the Technos to perfect the double screen for solid-view illusion?”

Graham raised an eyebrow. “Where did you pick that up?”

“Oh, I spent a week with a high-ranking Techno once, up near Sanfran. He told me all about it. So Lewis was your father?”

“Was and is. I still hear from him on the vox-box hookup once a week.”

“Do you ever talk to him about your opinions?”

“I used to.” Graham ushered Wanda into the ‘copter, set the controls, and ascended to speed-zone. “But he’s changed since he went South. He never should have been Socially Secured in the first place. They promised to reclassify him as a Techno because of his work on the double screen. That’s what he wanted. Then something happened, I don’t know what, and he wouldn’t tell me. He got his Greetings and was assigned to a place called Gulfport.”

“That’s one of the best, I hear. Beautiful country down there,” Wanda murmured.

“Too beautiful, maybe. It did something to him. He doesn’t sound like the same man. Whenever I say something, he tells me to see Warner—that’s the Psycho Supervisor for our Talent Section, in Space Opera.”

“Good man.”

“You know about him, too?”

“Heard of him.”

Graham glanced at her as they landed at the foot of the hill. They took the vator up into the building. “But why are you so interested in my problems, all of a sudden?”

“Because I’m interested in you.”

“That’s very flattering.” Graham grinned. As they entered his apartment Wanda took his hand and guided him across the living room.

“Where are you going?” he asked.

“In there.”

Graham shook his head and drew back.

“What’s the matter?” Wanda asked. “Another mood?”

“I feel like thinking.”

Wanda pouted. “Thinking!

Talking! What you need is some relaxation.” She brightened. “Maybe we ought to go out tonight. There’s something special at the Playdium. Middleweight championship slashing match. Sounds exciting.”

“I never got any euphoria out of watching two people cut each other up with sabres.”

“How about some culture, then? The symph’s in town. With that new Talent, Kovac. They’re playing his Psychiatric Suite and the Melancholia and Fugue.”

“Quit trying to entertain me, Wanda. I’m worried.”

“What about?”

“I got a funny idea, back there on the beach.” He walked across the room and opened the wall service-slot. “I’m going to see if I can clear an emergency vox-box hookup with my father.”

“What on earth for?”

Graham paused. “I’m not sure if I ought to talk to you about these things.”

“Please, go on. I want to hear. I’m interested.”

“Why?”

“You ought to know the answer to that, after last night.”

“You mean you’re—serious?”

“I took off my glasses for you, didn’t I?” The girl moved dose to him. “Tell me. Why do you want to call your father?”

He gazed down at her and there was pain in his eyes, and speculation. “It just occurred to me there might be an explanation of why he sounds different. Maybe they didn’t leave him alone when he got down there. Maybe the Psychos did a laundry job on him. Even a prefrontal or a topectomy?”

“But that’s absurd!”

“Is it? Look, Wanda, I seldom get outside or meet anyone except Talents like myself. I don’t think ordinary workers are permitted anything like these weekly vox-box hookups—why should they, when their parents mean nothing to them anyway? But here in this building, there are plenty of other Talents, all with the same arrangement. Once a week they’re permitted to call their fathers or their mothers in the South.

“I’ve never really thought about it before, but now that the idea hits me, I remember remarks my Talent friends have made, about their parents sounding different to them. And I remember some of those parents—my father’s friends—before they were Socially Secured in the South. A lot of them seemed to share his views, talk the way he did. And yet now the reports I get of their conversations are just like mine. Everyone is happy, everyone is contented, everyone is adjusted.”

“Why not?” Wanda asked. “They’re Socially Secured. No more problems, just peace and plenty. Who wouldn’t relax?”

“My father wouldn’t. He faced his problems, taught me to face mine. He’d never urge me to conform this way. I think he’s been worked over, and I intend to find out why.”

Wanda tossed her head. “You’re wrong, Graham. It does not make sense.”

“Nothing makes sense lately. But there must be a reason. Maybe everybody gets a laundry-job when they’re Socially Secured, just to keep them in line. Maybe my father was double-crossed, sent South just to get him out of the way. All his talk about giving up the Domes, abandoning hypnotherapy conditioning for everyone—it might have been considered dangerous. But he wasn’t subversive, he just believed in freedom for the individual.” Graham nodded to himself. “I’m going to arrange this call and ask some straight questions, try to get some straight answers. For that matter, I think I’ll pass the word along to some of my friends here in the building. Carson, Davis, Loeb. Maybe they can do the same thing when they call. We could pool our information, figure things out.”

Wanda’s fingers dug into his arm. “Are you sure you know what you’re doing?” she asked. “You don’t want to start any trouble.”

“If my theory is correct, the trouble’s already started. And I intend to stop it.”

“Graham, think a moment. You shouldn’t go ahead without competent advice. Why not see Warner, your Psycho, first?”

“Sure. And have him tell me to relax, forget it? The way my father does, during our vox-box sessions? The way you’re doing now?” He paused. “That’s pretty funny, you know—you telling me to relax, when all the while you’re digging into my arm clear through to the bone.”

“All right,” Wanda murmured, but she didn’t release her grip. “So I’m concerned about you. I admit it. I don’t want you to get mixed up in anything, I don’t want you to be hurt.” She raised her voice and the tempo of her speech quickened. “Suppose you are right, Graham? “Suppose your father was laundered, and all the rest of them? Is that so terrible? He’s happy, isn’t he? Everyone’s happy. Everyone who has the sense to conform, to adjust, to stop asking questions that only lead to doubt and torment. Look, Graham, I’m begging you—for your sake, for my sake—let things alone! I won’t turn in a report—”

She stopped short and her hand fell away.

Graham stared at her. “Report?” he sighed. “I might have guessed, the way you’ve been talking lately. Quite a change from that simple little take-another-pill routine. You were planted here with me, weren’t you? It’s all part of the routine, isn’t it?”

“Yes. I’m with Intelligence. Zank was worried about you and he wanted to check.”

“I suppose you’ve been recording?”

“No, Graham. I swear it! I haven’t, and I won’t. You aren’t just a case to me. You haven’t been, not since—”

“Well? Since when?”

“Since you asked me to take off my glasses.”

She came into his arms and she was all softness and warmth, and in her flesh he sensed surrender.

“Graham, don’t you understand what we can have together? It doesn’t happen very often any more, and I never believed it would ever happen to me. But it did, and I don’t want to lose it. I don’t want to lose you.”

Graham stared down at the girl-face, the woman-face, the utterly ageless countenance. She might have been -twenty, or thirty, or forty—it was hard to tell because of the makeup. And her words might be true, or part-true, or false: he couldn’t tell that either. All he could do was listen as she went on.

“Listen, darling. I have important connections. More important than you think. I can arrange it so that you won’t have to be troubled any more. We could go away together. Even outside the Domes if you like. There’s so much you don’t know about, so many wonderful possibilities for the two of us. We can have some of this freedom you seem to want so badly. Just as long as you don’t ask questions. Just as long as you take what’s given to you freely and without reservation.”

“Something for nothing?” Graham murmured gently. “Is that what you offer me? Or nothing for something?”

“Does it really matter?” She pressed close and her eyes said no and her lips said no and then her body said yes, yes, yes.

Graham released her and stepped back.

“I’d be a bombed fool to turn down an offer like that,” he said.

“Then you’ll forget about the call?”

He smiled. “Trouble is,” he continued, “I am a bombed fool.” And moved away.

“Where are you going?”

“To arrange for my call. I still think my father’s in trouble.”

Wanda shook her head. “Maybe he is and maybe he isn’t,” she told him. “But one thing is definite. You’re in trouble, now. No, stay where you are.”

Her hand sought her shoulder-kit, and emerged from it in a quick gesture. Graham halted as he caught the gleam of a stunner.

“You’re turning me in, eh?”

“Yes, but not for punishment. You’re still worth saving, darling, and I intend to save you in spite of yourself. And for myself.”

Holding the stunner, she motioned him back, then moved toward the wall service-slot. “It’s my turn to make an emergency call,” she said.

“To Warner?”

“No.” The eyes behind the glasses glinted in determination. “I told you I had important connections, didn’t I? So I’m taking you right to the top, Graham.

I’m going to turn you over to Sigmond himself, in Hollywood.”

CHAPTER 4

WANDA held the stunner on him while she made the call. She held the stunner on him afterwards, while they took the vator down to the level. She held the stunner on him as she flashed her idento to one of the ‘coptercab pilots and arranged for immediate launching from Laguna Dome to Hollywood.

The pilot took them to the jet, and again Wanda used her idento to good effect.

Graham began to believe that part about her important connections. It was quite a remarkable thing to arrange for a special jetfiight—just the two of them in the huge ship. But Wanda had no trouble doing it. Each step was smoother than the last.

She had no trouble with Graham, either, because the stunner was always ready. Graham respected the stunner. It couldn’t kill him, but the excruciating pain preceding paralysis and unconsciousness was something he urgently wished to avoid. And he knew she’d use it.

So he sat there silently during the flight, not even gazing down at the countryside as they launched. Usually he was fascinated by the movement through the hatchway leading out of the Dome, the thrill of propulsion, and the view of the alien land beneath. Now he preferred to sort his thoughts and impressions, unpleasant though the task might be.

And it was unpleasant.

Despite his talk of freedom and his contempt for conformity, Graham realized he'd always had a great measure of security and unconsciously relied upon it.

Ever since his father had arranged for his job in Space Opera Division, five years ago, Graham had held an assured place in his world—the little microcosm of the Talent Building in Leguna Dome. He'd been assigned his own apartment, his own Techno staff and crew of assistants. He had his work to rely on.

The departure of his father was a shock, but in a sense Zank took his father's place as mentor and authority. Graham had sensed discontent, inner turmoil, but always he had expressed it against the comfortable counterpoint of security—security in his job, his status, his environment.

Now his job was in jeopardy. Zank obviously had lost his trust in him. The very least that could happen would be a demotion—possibly even a laundry-job, if the Psychos started to probe deeply.

And they would probe deeply, no doubt about it. Graham had heard of Sigmond; who hadn't? He was the Head Shrinker himself, chief of the entire Psycho Division on Coast. Wanda was taking him directly to the top.

Why?

That in turn raised still other disturbing questions. There was only one obvious answer. Somehow, Graham had stumbled on the truth—his father, the parents of other Talents, perhaps all parents who had been Socially Secured, were being given laundry-jobs. And for a yet unknown reason. Whatever it was, Graham had a pretty definite idea it wouldn't be a pleasant one.

And just what was he going to do about it?

That was the most bothersome question of all. What could he do about it? Graham suddenly realized that for all his vaunted intellectual freedom, he was powerless. He'd been trained only to question, not to act upon his questioning. He had experience in exercising his doubts, but there were times when it was more important to exercise his muscles. And he had no training, no experience here.

He couldn't jump Wanda with her stunner. How could he hope to struggle against Sigmond and his staff?

As they descended, off-jet, into the great Hollywood Dome, she offered him a temporary reprieve.

"I'm taking you straight to Psychocenter," she said. "But you won't see Sigmond immediately. He's tied up in a very important top-level."

Graham nodded but remained silent. He was silent all during the 'copter trip across Hollywood, but now he permitted himself to observe their progress.

They passed over the suburb area of Angeles and headed into the capital itself. Here was the emotion-picture plant of TV. Yes, there the production headquarters of NB-See networks. He recognized the cluster of buildings familiarly known as Microcity, from which emanated all the microfilms sent for educational purposes to Big Family Units throughout the country. The ground levels of Angeles had been swarming with workers moving from consumer areas to industricity locations between shifts, and above them the 'copters of the Technos and Chiefs whirled restlessly. Here in Hollywood the ground levels were deserted, save for an occasional Jag or Caddy whizzing along a speedway as it bore some dignitary to a top level meeting. And the few 'copters in evidence moved only from one landing-spot to another as Talents went their necessary ways.

For Hollywood was the Home-Dome of the leaders, the planners, the shapers of destiny in these, the Ideal States of America.

Graham found the spire of the Intelligentsium, and near it the huge Technoquarters, dominated by its roof symbol of a giant T-square. Then he felt the ‘copter descend and recognized directly beneath him the broad, flat landing-platform of the Psychocenter itself.

He waited until the ‘copter settled and the pilot opened the doors. Wanda motioned toward him with the hand holding the stunner.

“You first,” she said. “We’re expected.”

“So I see.” Graham tried to smile as he watched the two white-robed men approaching their ‘copter from the far side of the huge roof.

Wanda flashed her idento at them and murmured something. The two men nodded in unison. One of them was short and thin, the other tall and portly. Both wore the pince-nez of their rank and profession.

“Graham,” said the short man. “Would you step this way, please?”

There wasn’t much choice. Graham glanced around hesitantly as if to confirm the fact. He could jump off the edge of the roof, of course, but—

“Please,” Wanda said, putting the stunner back into her shoulder-kit. “Don’t be stubborn, darling. They won’t harm you, I promise. It’s just a routine checkup. Sigmond is interested in you, and I made him promise not to do anything drastic.”

“That’s correct,” said the short, thin man. “You can see we’re not armed. This isn’t coercion.”

Graham nodded, but edged back. The pilot had left the ‘copter and was walking across the roof toward an exit-vator. There were several other ‘copters in anchor-slots lining the edge of the roof, but the area about them was deserted, except for a few mechanics a considerable distance away.

Graham watched Wanda and the two men and calculated his chances. If he could just move back to the door of the ‘copter, get into it and take off before they could stop him—

“For your information, the pilot locked the panel before he left.” The tall, stout man’s voice cut his thread of thought suddenly. “So there’s no use trying what you have in mind. You see, Graham, we anticipate.”

His voice carried conviction.

Wanda stepped forward. “Let me talk to him,” she said, over her shoulder, then faced Graham once more. “Be patient, lover, and try to understand. You’re not officially in custody—I wouldn’t risk calling you ‘lover’ in front of them if you were, now would I?” She came up to him. “See Sigmond when he’s ready, and cooperate. I’ll visit you before the night is over.” Kissing his forehead, she whispered, “Don’t make trouble. I can only protect you within limits.”

Graham nodded and squared his shoulders as she stepped back and walked away. He waited until she had disappeared inside the nearest exitvator.

“All right,” he said. “I’m ready.”

“Then follow me,” said the short man. He began walking across the rooftop. His tall companion fell into step beside Graham.

“That’s better,” the big man smiled. “By the way, we haven’t introduced ourselves, have we?” He nodded in the direction of the short figure ahead. “That’s Rankin,” he said. “And I’m West.”

Somewhat to his surprise, Graham noted that the big man was extending his hand in greeting. The familiar gesture evoked the familiar response. Almost before he knew what he was doing, Graham found himself extending his own hand.

Their palms met, and the man named West began to pump his arm up and down enthusiastically. His grip was strong, and Graham started to draw away as his skin encountered an unexpected abrasive substance that pricked him.

Suddenly a sharp tingling ran up his arm.

He pulled his hand free, shaking it as the pain rose to his elbow, then to his shoulder. At the same time he gazed at West’s palm and saw the tiny needle cradled there.

“Tricked me,” he said. Or started to say. For his mouth was suddenly numb, just as his arm was numb, and his shoulders and chest. And his legs were melting, his brain was melting.

He noted, with rapidly glazing eyes, that the short man was now standing behind him, ready to catch him when he fell—as he was falling—right now —

And the roof was spinning, the sky beneath the Dome was spinning, and the voices were spinning all around him.

"That's better," the short man was saying. "Now he's all set for a trip to the Womb."

Graham couldn't be sure he heard it right. The darkness was rushing up much too suddenly, and it filled his ears as well as his eyes. Maybe the short man hadn't said, "Womb." Maybe he'd said, "tomb."

Graham tried to shrug before he fell, as the realization came to him.

Womb or tomb, it wouldn't matter either way, now.

CHAPTER 5

IN THE great Twenty-First-Century-Vox Studios, in the citistate of Hollywood, the top level proceedings began slowly.

Sigmond squirmed uncomfortably in his seat, wishing he was in a posture-chair. But of course there were no posture-chairs here in the Conference Suite.

It was a whim on the part of Archer, His MGMinence. The tall, thin, hawk-faced man at the head of the table had deliberately chosen to surround himself with the quaint decor of olden times, including all the appurtenances of a medieval "executive suite." In the past, in the days of actual "executive suites," the presidents and chairmen of boards held similar affectations—they indulged themselves in Victorian panelling and Currier and Ives prints in their sanctums.

Sigmund recognized the pattern: the need of authority to bolster its position with symbols of continuity—to hint discreetly that nothing had changed or would ever change, and that the man at the head of the table belonged there by hereditary right and would always remain in that spot.

It pleased Sigmond to realize that Archer felt such basic insecurity, but at the same time he could do with a bit more comfort.

And it annoyed him not a little to see Archer affecting the speech mannerisms and even the dress of another era. Really, the "business suit" he wore belonged at a masquerade—it looked positively grotesque here, when the man was surrounded by the priestly white of his fellow-Psychos, the service blue of the Technobility, and the khaki of the Brass. Even Archer's rimless eyeglasses were an anachronism in this collection of costly and ornate frames.

He looked ineffectual and ill at ease now as he rapped for order with an old-fashioned gavel, and his voice was soft and hesitant.

"Let us dispense with formalities," he was saying. "We are gathered here to consider a question of basic policy. That question has been raised, and will be presented now, by our good friend, Dean."

He gazed down the table and Sigmond searched the row of faces across from him until he located the little sandy-haired man in charge of the Egghead division.

Sigmond was surprised to hear that Dean was raising an issue. He knew him only as a quiet, efficient worker in his special field—which, as the name implied, was that of education. Somebody on Sigmond's staff must have a complete dossiere on Dean's background as a matter of course, but there had never been any reason for Sigmond himself to check on him.

Now the little man was on his feet, clearing his throat and running one hand nervously through his hair.

"Your MGMinence, fellow workers. I have recently been in consultation with various officials in both the Techno and the Intelligence divisions. I questioned them deliberately in order to verify certain conclusions of my own—conclusions based on research in the educational field. As you know, it is my duty to work with facts. And the facts available to me recently lead to inevitable validation. I've gathered all the data and testimony and placed it in the hands of His MGMinence before asking permission to speak here this afternoon. And here is what the facts tell us."

Dean paused.

Just what are you driving at? Sigmond wondered.

He found out in a moment. "The facts tell us that we've done a good job in the past. In less than three generations, Planned Society has done away with disease, poverty, war, personal insecurity. We have eliminated competitive economy, political and religious strife. We have exploded once and for all the pernicious old fallacy that you can't change human nature. We have changed it, and for the better.

"As an Egghead I teach the young, the future workers of the Ideal States of America, to appreciate their good fortune. I teach them that all our wants and needs are cared for by a regular system of interchange between three thousand Domes, without the use of currency, or the oldstyle profit-motive which led only to friction and unrest. Our population of thirty millions is assured of food, clothing, shelter, medical and psychiatric assistance as part of the Standard Allotment. Recreation and luxuries can be earned by making a good personal adjustment to working and living conditions. Every worker over the age of fifty is Socially Secured, and the average life-expectancy has risen to one hundred years. So far, so good. I've no quarrel with it. But in view of the facts now at our disposal, we must move further. Have we gone as far as we can go? Is what we have done good enough? I say the answer is 'no' !"

They were listening to Dean now, all of them. His voice was flat and uninspired, but it had been a long time since the word "no" had been uttered in the presence of His MGMinence.

"The time has come when it is safe to abandon the Domes. Vast areas outside have been tested and found to be thoroughly decontaminated. There is no longer a need to depend on special farm areas or hydroponic installations. The entire continent is again ready for human habitation."

Dean's final sentences were almost drowned out in the excited buzzing which arose from both sides of the table. He hesitated, then went on.

"This is not my opinion. I repeat, it's authenticated information, coming directly from Schwartz himself."

Eyes turned now to regard the plump, swarthy Techno Chief at the other end of the table.

"Well, Schwartz?" Dean challenged. "Is what I say here the truth?"

Schwartz nodded indifferently. "Our Geiger Count for the past three years is well below minimum, on the basis of eighteen thousand separate checks. Field surveys and readings bear this out. His MGMinence is in possession of this data."

The buzzing rose again, and Dean's voice quelled it.

"That's not all," he proclaimed. "There are other factors. Our production-rate, for example. Even now, inside the Domes, we have ample living-space and provision for a population of fifty millions instead of thirty. Once we leave the Domes there's no reason why we can't double or triple this figure—don't forget that a hundred years ago this country supported almost a hundred and eighty million people. True, Ormsbee?"

Sigmond saw his Medic colleague nod emphatically.

"Therefore," Dean continued hastily, "I advocate the immediate revision of our policy toward the Socially Secured. Even without leaving the Domes we can raise the age-level from fifty to sixty. We can remove checks upon population entirely. We can, when we abandon the Domes, eliminate a great portion of our conditioning techniques, including hypnotherapy. Let us move forward once more, confidently and aggressively, into a new era of freedom—"

This time the little man was not interrupted by a buzz, but by a roar. Half a dozen white-clad figures fluttered to their feet, but it was the khaki-clad Hix, Chief of Brass, whose shattering bellow claimed attention.

"What are you driving at?" he demanded. "Next thing you'll have us repealing the Declaration of Dependence!"

The blasphemy shocked them into silence. And Dean took advantage of it to reply.

"Yes," he said, softly. "This will come too, in time." He peered earnestly at the faces around him. "We have founded a Planned Society, and all has gone well. So well that we've become overly complacent. We've unconsciously come to accept the status quo as a fixed and eternal norm. But the world changes. Physical conditions change. And we must change with them in order to survive. Unless we are willing to move forward we shall inevitably go backward.

"It is not easy for us to consider giving up certain rights and privileges we now enjoy as directors of this social order. But I say to you that we must. A glance at history is sufficient to remind us of this fact. Unless we take steps, we shall find ourselves going the way of all leaders who refused to recognize the need of change in the past. The kings, emperors, knights, nobles, industrial despots, rugged individualists. All of them vanished, whether they ruled by the divine right of kings or the power of the almighty dollar. Let's not make the same mistake of opposing progress. I say, open the Domes at once."

Dean sat down suddenly, so suddenly that his audience was unprepared for it. There was no buzzing; merely a silence in which each man sought to read the reaction of his fellows.

Sigmond alone was impassive. So he dropped his C-bomb, he thought. Whoever would have expected it, and from him, of all people? Better check on his background immediately.

Then he dismissed the thought. Right now he wanted to consider what would happen next. Surely Archer must be prepared to answer this heresy.

And yes, now his MGMinence was rising to his feet. It would be interesting to see how his counter-strategy evolved.

"Gentlemen," he began. "Pm sure we have all given serious consideration to what our good friend Dean has said here. I can assure you that he has indeed given me a complete file of reports from various departments which back up his findings."

Archer paused, and Sigmond waited for him to continue with anticipatory relish. He recognized the gambit now—disarm your opponent by conceding something, then move in for the kill.

"However," Archer droned, "I feel that some of you are not entirely convinced. Perhaps you recall an ancient proverb that figures don't lie, but liars can figure.

"If such is the case, then allow me to go on record personally in assuring you that Dean speaks the truth. The Domes can be opened up tomorrow, and dispensed with entirely. We can increase the population indefinitely without harm to our economy. We can not only raise the age-level of the Socially Secured, but abandon the entire program. We can, in short order, do away with the Declaration of Dependence and return to a form of government and economy similar to that which existed in the past. Dean's statements and his conclusions are, in my opinion, entirely correct."

What's this? Sigmond asked himself. Unconditional surrender? Senile dementia, more likely.

"Before we put the matter to a vote," Archer was saying, "there's just one more thing we might consider. Planned Society is more than a political or economic concept. It is based upon the principle of psychiatric supervision. For that reason, I suggest we get an opinion from the one man best qualified to give us a sane, objective reaction—our Psycho Chief himself. Sigmond, what have you to say?"

Plenty, Sigmond thought as he arose. I underestimated you, Archer. You know what you're doing. You let Dean stick his neck out and now you're letting me stick mine out. You won't betray yourself by taking sides—but you'll be there, ready to back the winner. No wonder you've always been Your MGMinence. And if I want to remain Psycho Chief, I'd better see that I win.

The tall Psycho Chief stood there staring down at Dean for a long moment, and when he began to speak his voice was gentle.

"His MGMinence is right, you know," he said, softly. "You have given us facts and a partial conclusion. But no conclusion is correct unless it takes into account a clinical diagnosis of the situation.

"You've studied your history, Dean. When you remind us of the old days, a hundred years ago, you're speaking of a time when psychiatry was only a small and somewhat suspect branch of what was then called organized medicine. Its practitioners numbered less than seven thousand throughout the country, and its authority was limited to a purely advisory capacity. Those were evil days, Dean, in the time of the Big Neurosis, before the wars.

"Then came the Big Trauma, and the picture changed. The Big Trauma, when the bombs fell. And psychiatry rose in general esteem. It was useful to the Brass of that day in dealing with the armed forces. It was useful in Intelligence work. Psychiatrists were called upon to counsel the leaders of industry and business and government, but still without official status or great power. On the individual level, psychiatry dealt only with those confined in institutions or those few who could afford to command private treatment. But respect for its opinions and techniques grew.

"The Big Trauma continued. The enemy population of the world virtually vanished. Radiation and disease ravaged the earth, and we here at home were not immune to fallout, famine and frenzy.

"Government, as we knew it then, vanished in the panic and peril of the times. There was no voice of authority remaining. Brass of that day had won a victory—but at a hideous price in lives and security. Brass was discredited. Economic leaders were suspect because they had 'led us into war' and 'profited' by it. The so-called 'politicians' and 'religious leaders' had shown themselves unable to prevent panic and privation. The country was disorganized; no civil or military authority was able to restore order.

"And yet salvation was at hand. For by this time the so-called authorities had learned to rely upon psychiatrists for guidance in every crisis. The generals, business moguls, scientists, industrialists and intellectuals who looked to psychiatry for a solution of both personal and public problems now instinctively turned to them for leadership. And since psychiatrists now held key positions in military and civil life, there was less difficulty than might be expected. They knew how to influence public opinion, how to bring about the desired reactions on the part of the masses."

Sigmond paused. He allowed his voice to deepen and gather strength. "But we all know what happened," he said. "Meanwell and Stolz were appointed, with broad temporary powers, by what was then the Congress of the United States. They convened the first Clinic and formulated the Declaration of Dependence. The Brass was behind them when, in a surprise move, they dissolved the very Congress that had given them free rein.

They had control of the primitive TV-radio facilities as they directed the Brass in restoring order. They cooperated with the engineers and the scientists—whom we now refer to as Technos—in erecting the first Domes and installing oxygenerator equipment.

"At first the workers were uncooperative, as might be expected. But once the Domes went up, once they realized they could be admitted and gain protection against fallout and disease, their attitudes changed.

"There was opposition from the forces of politics and religion, but they had no weapons and no alternative plans—nor could they combat radioactivity with empty phrases. We had the Domes. And we had the plan. The plan of Planned Society.

"Slowly we evolved the present pattern, creating the top-level leadership divisions of Psychos, Technos, Brass and Intelligence. It wasn't 'government' in the old-fashioned meaning of the term—it was a delicate neurosurgical operation on the body politic.

"And there's no need to tell you that the operation was a success. In three generations we have witnessed the triumph of psyche over soma, thanks to the introduction of new methods of therapy. As you know, we have analyzed the causes of social disorder—pinpointed the aggressive instincts which lead to atomo-biological war on a broad scale or frustration and discontent on the part of the individual. Through the ages, men sought to thwart, stifle or deny the very presence of these instinctual drives. The leaders have always lied in the past. They told men that they were all created equal—that they were brothers who must turn the other cheek. They preached peace without attempting to harness the basic forces, internal and external, which lead only to continuing conflict.

"Our therapy took other forms, Dean. Instead of denying the basic drives, we have chosen to satiate them through surrogates. There has been a redefinition of the nature of reality. Sound Psycho principles govern every aspect of life here in the Domes. And the Domes themselves are admirable microcosms, in which we can experiment in our search for social stability and adjustment.

"Our experiment has been successful. That you have already admitted. And why? Because the very physical nature of the Domes lends itself to control That's the secret of our way of life, Dean—control. Control leading to adjustment. Adjustment leading to security.

"Suppose we have reached a time when we can give up the Domes without physical danger. What do we stand to gain? We're not overcrowded now. The standard of living surpasses anything known in history. There's no need for more room.

"Population-wise, what possible end can be served by the spawning of additional millions? Again, what do we stand to gain by such a move?"

Sigmond stared at Archer, trying to read that timid, tired face—a face which he now recognized was only a façade.

"That's a question I cannot answer, a question you have not answered. What do we stand to gain by this?" He wheeled now and levelled a finger at Dean. "There is however, one question I can and must answer. A question we all must consider. What do we have to lose?

“The moment we open up the Domes, we lose the whole basic pattern of our success. We lose control.

“Disperse the population over a wide area, and see how quickly a wide difference in living patterns due to varied climate and geography will lead to a resumption of all the old rivalries—North against South, farm against city, and all the rest.

“Eliminate the program for the Socially Secured and you’ll set up again the patterns of hatred which split old-fashioned society into two secretly warring camps—the struggle between Youth and Old Age.

“Do away with hypnotherapy conditioning and the Big Family Unit will disappear. Before you know it, we’ll be back to the old style family situation; the very source of inner conflict and tension.

“We couldn’t hope to combat these things, gentlemen. All our facilities for education and opinion-moulding—TV, emotion-pictures, information-screening—couldn’t hope to function efficiently amidst a dispersed population. Even in the days of the Big Neurosis, when mass psychology was just a primitive tool in the hands of amateurs called ‘advertising men’, there was a name for a group such as ours. It was called a ‘captive audience’. We can’t afford to lose them.

“Lose them, and we lose our lives. Turn them loose and they’ll turn against us, in the name of freedom. Freedom! Freedom from our surrogates means only freedom to kill, to destroy.”

Sigmond paused and sighed. “Perhaps you think I speak as I do out of selfishness, out of fear for my own safety and yours. That is not the case. I would gladly make any sacrifice—even the sacrifice of my life—if I thought it would truly serve the greater good. But I am a Psycho. I have devoted my existence to the study of humanity. And I know that Mankind is not yet ready to move ahead without psychiatric control. He will use his freedom not only against us but against himself.

“What Dean here is really proposing is to turn back the tide of history. He is asking us to revert to the days of the Big Psychosis, the time of anarchy.

"Gentlemen, it is up to you to make a choice. But remember—if you choose to abandon the Domes, abandon the sound system of control we have so carefully set up, you are choosing the inevitable consequences of that decision. You are choosing a return to the old competitive economy, a return to religion and politics and yes, even monogamy! You are choosing war. You are choosing so-called individual freedom at the expense of mass aberration."

Sigmond sat down. His own words had moved him more strongly than he realized—for he had spoken out of the uttermost depths of his inmost conviction. Now he found himself oddly empty and depleted.

In an effort to shake himself out of the mood, he forced his attention away from the present scene. He refused to permit himself to listen to Dean's hesitant rebuttal, or to observe the reaction of his audience here in the room. Instead he directed his attention to a totally different problem.

As Archer rose and called for a vote on the question, Sigmond concentrated on the problem of the young Talent whom Wanda had brought in for processing just before the meeting began. It was just a routine checkup, probably, but Wanda was a pretty shrewd operator and there might be something worth investigating here. If she thought it was important, he'd better not take any chances. Well, the boys were working on it right now, and it wouldn't take long to get a scenario into filming. He could assemble the film and study it right after this meeting ended. Wanda seemed insistent that he handle this Talent's problem personally.

And now, what was this interruption? Sigmond jerked back to awareness. Ah, yes, the vote. The question. Archer was calling for a show of hands.

"All those in favor of—"

Sigmond felt excitement ripple up his spine as he peered around the room. How many hands would be going up?

Dean's, of course. And that Medic, Ormsbee, the one who supported him on population-increases. Sigmond made a mental note to look into Ormsbee's background, too.

At the same time he permitted himself to relax. Only two hands in favor.

"All those opposed—"

Sigmond raised his own hand, exulting in spite of himself as he saw his gesture duplicated all around the table.

Of course. The motion was defeated. There was nothing to fear. He could handle Dean and Ormsbee, unless His MGMinence Archer chose to take care of it himself.

He smiled down the table at Archer, as the meeting adjourned. Perhaps it might be wise to say a word to him in private.

No, that could wait. Archer was going to play his game of the impartial observer—why spoil it with a public discussion?

Several of the group, including Techno Chief Schwartz and Brass Chief Hix, came up now to congratulate Sigmond on his speech. He nodded, made the customary acknowledgments, and moved away as quickly as possible.

He left the chamber and returned to ground level prepared to take up his daily duties once more. This Talent matter, now—

Young West was waiting for him in his office.

"What's the report?" he asked. "Do a scenario?"

"All filmed." West tried to keep from smirking, but he was obviously quite pleased with himself. "Rankin's keeping watch over him upstairs—he's still out."

"What's his name, by the way?"

"Graham." West waited, obviously expecting a reaction, and when none came, he added, "Lewis's son."

"Lewis? You don't mean—?"

"Exactly." West was smirking openly, now. "Quite a surprise, isn't it? I think you'll find the film extremely interesting."

Sigmond privately agreed, but he tried to conceal his impatience. “Very well, I’ll look at it if you like.” Then, keeping his voice casual, he asked, “What’s your prognosis?”

West licked his lips. “Of course it’s really not my place to say anything of a prejudicial nature,” he murmured. “But if you ask me, on the basis of what I’ve seen, Graham is just about ready for a little trip back to the Womb.”

CHAPTER 6

FIRST there was the needle and then there was the voice asking questions. First there was his own voice saying “no” and then came the other needle and his own voice saying “yes.”

After that Graham went back down into the darkness, listening to both voices—the strange voice, asking the questions and his own voice (equally strange now) giving the answers.

Then there was this thing on his head, and he was talking into it and the questions came from inside his head, and then another needle pricked and he knew he could stop talking and just think his answers. Not think, really, but visualize. That’s what the voice wanted, that’s what the needle wanted, that’s what the thing on his head wanted. He was supposed to see the answers, make images out of them. And he couldn’t lie. He couldn’t make up answers out of his imagination. He had to use real images. The voice and the needle and the thing on his head wouldn’t let him lie.

Graham didn’t want to lie, anyway. This wasn’t coercion. The thing on his head told him so, or maybe it was the needle, or the voice—it was all very confusing, and it didn’t matter since the three were parts of the same thing. Anyway, he knew he wasn’t being forced into anything. It was just that he had to tell the truth so that he could sleep. They were playing fair with him.

Yes they were, because when he had seen all there was to see, all they wanted to see, they let him sleep. He slept for a long time (minutes, hours, days, weeks, centuries, forever) and when he woke up he felt fine. He could sit up, or even walk if he wanted to. At the moment he was content to sit, because Sigmond was in the room with him.

Sigmond, the Head Shrinker himself. He seemed like a pleasant enough person—a big man, with a pale face and a high forehead. He might have been forty, might have been fifty, or even older. It was hard to say. Of course he wouldn't be Socially Secured at fifty.

The thought jolted Graham out of his present acceptance. Socially Secured. His father. That's why they'd done this to him, given him a laundry-job—

Sigmond was staring at him, and now he reached forward and put his hand on Graham's shoulder.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"You gave me a laundry-job," Graham said.

Sigmond chuckled. "Nonsense, my boy. We don't indulge in such measures here. And I assure you, if we did, you wouldn't be sitting up and ready to take nourishment now, nor for a week. Your stomach couldn't retain food, any more than your mind could retain a thought. There's an old saying which applies to laundry-jobs, you know—'it all comes out in the wash'."

He chuckled again, but Graham interrupted him.

"Then what did you do to me?" he asked.

"Simple script-therapy. We asked for a scenario, and got it. The Ganz method."

"Visualization of mental images transcribed directly on film?"

"You've heard of it, eh?"

"There was talk of adopting it for Talents, in emotion-picture work. I guess it was too personalized, though."

"So I should imagine." Sigmond smiled. "Your own film is very personalized, I might say. Seldom have I seen such introspection."

"You've seen it?"

"Of course. Would you care to?"

"Why are you seeing me? What do you want of me?"

"Nothing but your honest reaction. That's the principle of filmanaiysis, my dear Graham. Project the unconscious so that the conscious can see it. Then let the superego review and criticize. It's really the only efficient form of therapy. I'm hoping some day we can make it available generally, for routine use in checkups. As of now it's a little bit too expensive and complicated for anything except special cases."

"I'm a special case, then?"

"Let's see the film and permit you to decide for yourself." Sigmond rose and beckoned to Graham. "We'll use my office," he said. "I've got everything set up."

Graham was not reluctant to leave the windowless cubicle behind—its bed reminded him vaguely of a hospitalarea. He followed Sigmond down the corridor, noting that the Psycho Chief was carrying a stunner. Sigmond didn't flourish it, nor did he allude to its presence in words. That was completely unnecessary. No need for guards, either! not here in Psychocenter. Graham knew that the very idea of rebellion or escape was ridiculous.

A vator took them down. For some reason Graham had assumed Sigmond's office would be near the top of the huge building. He was surprised to find it on ground-level. He was equally surprised at the modest three-room suite. Guards and office personnel greeted the Psycho Chief deferentially enough, but there was nothing about the furnishings and appointments of the office to indicate Sigmond's important rank.

There were three rooms, and Sigmond led him to the center chamber. Here was the desk, the couch, and the viewer—no other equipment. Graham wondered if the Psycho Chief used filmanalysis exclusively. And if so, why.

The room darkened as Sigmond seated himself at the desk, the film came on, and then Graham found the answer.

Sigmond had told the truth. Filmanalysis was the only efficient method of therapy.

The film itself was crude, just a simple two-dimensional black-and-white job such as Graham himself had never seen except in the ancient clips kept in the Space Opera files for obscure reference purposes. It didn’t even have a sound-track, let alone sensories. And the little projector unreeled it jerkily. But none of this mattered. Graham had never seen anything before which could equal its claim upon his interest.

Because it was his film. It was his mind, his life up there on the screen before him. Here were his thoughts, naked and unveiled, for all to see.

How far back had they taken him? Early childhood! Infancy? Pre-natal? The seething kaleidoscope held few clues. There was a visual blur, the kind of blur seen by the unfocussing eyes of a tiny infant. There was a parade of giant images—of huge hands, grotesquely enlarged faces. There were sudden movements holding inexplicable threats, leading to uncomprehended consequences. And there was Father. Father, holding him. He recognized the face, and at the same time it wasn’t really Father’s face at all; just an idealized countenance that smiled and laughed and beamed.

Graham blinked. It wasn’t himself in the picture either. He was small, yes, but strangely enough his features were those of an adult. An adult’s face on a baby’s body.

“Confused?” Sigmond murmured, from the darkness behind him. “Remember, this is a visualization of the subconscious. No age-differentiation. Very little contact with actual reality. All subjective, has to be interpreted. Notice that the backgrounds are sketchy and the action jumps. That’s because of the way you were questioned, of course—we weren’t after unimportant details. And also because the subconscious imagery is a sort of mental shorthand. The dream-symbols are there, too.”

Graham was oriented, now. He understood why, as his life-pattern unfolded in childhood, the actors often moved against the sketchiest type of scene. A whole room would be symbolized by just a door and a chair—sometimes the door was big, in an instance where the action centered around the need to escape, or leave; sometimes the chair was most important as a refuge or a place of comfort.

He saw himself as a small boy. He recognized incidents, and there were many things he didn't recognize. Interspersing actual events were glimpses of another world; a dream-world, a realm of nightmare. He was engulfed in vast floods of enuresis, he was pursued by the fecal finger of fate, he lost himself in remote fantasies of fear, anger, and—surprisingly enough—infantile lust.

Graham felt his cheeks burn as he watched. His palms grew wet and he stirred in his posture-chair. Was this the way it had been? Were these the secret places of his psyche?

It had to be. There was no other answer, no possible way in which this film could be faked. It was the truth, ripped raw from his inmost self and projected for his outward self to realize.

Adolescence began, and with it a heightening of the sexual element. At the same time the imagery grew subtly more sophisticated in content. Father was reduced to "life-size" proportions, and the various characters in the scenes began to move in response to predictable and recognizable motivations. And yet the growing "realism" in itself formed a background of shocking contrast to the occasional outbursts of fantasy and fugue—the imagined orgies of cruelty and lust, of self-pity, self-abasement, and egomaniac delusions of grandeur. Here was rape, and murder, and suicide, and idiotic euphoria: here was sentiment and sentimentality, oceans of blood and tears and glandular secretion.

Graham shuddered as he watched, yet clung to the intervals of reality—his conversations with his father. He watched himself talk to the older man, and watched the subject-matter of their discussions unfold in a sort of superimposition on the screen. It was a sort of doubleimage taking the place of a spoken or written account of their conversations, and in it he recognized the elements Sigmond must have been seeking.

Indeed, the Psycho Chief admitted as much.

"I want you to watch very closely from this point on," he said. "I think you'll begin to see the emergence of a pattern both of thought and of behavior. It's up to you to determine its significance."

Graham nodded. He felt his cheeks burn once more. This was going to continue, he realized. It would continue, inevitably and inexorably, right up to the present moment. He'd see himself becoming a nonconformist, see himself preaching rebellion, see himself as a cheater, a secret scanner of forbidden microfilms, a secret holdout against authority. He'd see all the fears and frustrations of his later years. Worst of all, he'd see once again the hideous trauma of his father's leaving—see his departure for the ranks of the Socially Secured. He'd see his own loneliness, and virtually reexperience the acute mental crisis which had grown intolerably in recent months—grown to the point where he'd foolishly flouted Zank and made that Realie film. Graham thought of a thousand things he wanted to conceal—not only from Sigmond but from himself as well. He thought of having to watch himself with Wanda the other night. How could he bear it? And how could he bear the knowledge that Sigmond knew, too?

He started to blink, and Sigmond must have guessed it, because he whispered, "Don't close your eyes. You've got to face it. Face yourself as you really are."

I can't, Graham thought. Help me, please help me, stop this, Father—

The buzzer sounded, jerking him back to reality. A vox-box blared.

"Front to Sigmond. Krug here for briefing and orders."

Sigmond clicked a switch. His own voice was low. "Yes. With him immediately."

Behind his back, Graham was conscious that the big man had risen and moved across the room.

"Stay where you are and keep watching," Sigmond said. "I'll only be a few moments."

He crossed to the door and opened it. A flash of light and then the door closed behind him once more. Graham was alone. Alone with the film. It ground on and on but he wasn't watching. He didn't have to watch, now.

He stood up, deliberately turning his back, and faced the projector on Sigmond's desk. In its beam he surveyed the room. No windows. Just the door through which Sigmond had made his exit, and another door leading to the rear office.

It was a waste of time even to think about looking for an avenue of escape. There was no escape, not here. Not any more, after the filmanalysis had been made. Graham acknowledged the fact wryly. He didn't have to see the rest. He knew what it would be—a self-damning portrait of a maladjusted individual. The inevitable sequel would be a laundry-job or perhaps even a trip to the Womb.

Graham nodded absently. His gaze focussed on the desk-top. Something shone in the projector's light. A long, silver cylinder—Sigmond's stunner! He'd left it there when he went out of the room!

Graham moved toward it. His hand grasped quickly. Here, at least, was a weapon.

Holding the stunner in his palm, he walked over to the door, then halted at the sound of Sigmond's voice, faint yet intelligible.

He placed his ear against the panel, and his eye focussed on the tiny sliver of light between door and frame. He could see into the front office.

Sigmond stood there, talking to a short, squat man in a Brass uniform.

"—papers are all in order," Sigmond was saying. "You're in charge of tonight's Jetfleet. Destination, Miami Consumarket.

Six in the lot, total cargo of eighteen hundred. Officers as listed. By the way, you've a new assistant. Name is Mellot. He's to meet you here."

"What happened to Smith?" Krug scowled, and it made his face look older.

"Transferred to Sadies. But Mellot's a capable man. You'll have to break him in, of course, and he doesn't know anything about procedure. He's due to report here now and—"

Graham turned away. He had suddenly remembered the other door here in the office. It led, presumably, through the third room of Sigmond's suite to a corridor beyond.

There would be guards there, of course, and guards all the way to the outer level. But now he had a stunner.

Graham weighed his chances. They were slim, slim as the outline of the stunner in his hand. He glanced once more at the screen. The film was still unreeling; he caught sight of himself in an erotic fantasy and shuddered. Sigmond knew all about him, and as a Psycho he would take the inevitable steps. Anything was better than to await his return and passively submit. If he moved quickly, now—

He moved quickly, but not quickly enough. As he reached the other door it swung open and a khaki-clad man entered the room.

He stood there, surprised, blinking in the dimness. "I must have made a mistake," he murmured. "They told me this would be Sigmond's office."

"It is," Graham quickly assured him.

"Good. Mellot reporting." The tall young man noticed the screen for the first time. "What's this, something special going on?"

"Very special. Would you care to stay and watch?" Without waiting for an answer, Graham raised the stunner and pressed the switch. He aimed at the center of the forehead, above the pineal area.

Mellot froze.

He stood there like an old-fashioned window dummy, and like an old-fashioned window dummy he was divested of his garments.

Graham stripped hastily and donned the khaki uniform. He felt in one pocket for the idento. Mellot was approximately his size and build, and his hair was dark—curly instead of straight, but maybe that wouldn't matter. Graham could only hope. Hope and act.

Mellot was on the floor now, rigid in paralysis. Graham had to take the risk of lowering him, even if bones were broken, in order to remove his trousers and shoes. Mellot's eyes stared up at him glassily—the stunner had done its work well, and even the optic nerve was temporarily paralyzed.

Graham tried to remember the duration of the stunner's effect. Two hours, or was it three? Long enough to get out of here, if he was going to get out at all.

He rose, adjusting his uniform. Now, if he could get past Sigmond in some way and contact Krug—

Once more he approached the other door, just in time to hear Sigmond's voice.

"—try to locate him immediately. I'll step in and check with Front to see if he reported in yet."

Graham bit his lip and stepped back against the wall as the door opened and Sigmond stepped back into the room. The door dosed again, quickly, as the Psycho strove to readjust his vision in the darkness.

"Graham," he called. "Where are you, Graham?"

"Right here."

Sigmond turned, noting the body on the floor for the first time.

"What—"

The stunner flicked on. Sigmond's mouth froze along with the rest of his body. Graham wondered, momentarily, how the autonomous nervous system managed to function in maintaining circulation and respiration in spite of the stunner's effect. Then he dismissed the question: it was certainly not important now.

What was important was to push Sigmond's immobilized body back against the wall, to square his own shoulders, take a deep breath, and open the door.

Graham stepped into the other office and extended his idento with a smile.

"Krug?" he murmured. "Mellot reporting for duty."

The Brass nodded, not bothering to glance at the idento, "How'd you get into Sigmond's office?"

"They gave me directions outside. I came in through the other entrance. He said you were waiting for me here."

"Right." Krug put his hand on the young man's shoulder. "Well, let's be on our way. We're due to leave for Miami in an hour."

CHAPTER 7

BY THE time they arrived at Jetport, the Farewell was in full swing.

The Jets stood alone under the lights of the launching-platforms on the big field, separated from the runways by barricades. The Technos were readying them for takeoff, while Krug checked with them by means of his audio-relay. He stood on the edge of the Administration roof, looking down at the activities of preparation.

But Graham, at his side, had eyes only for the mob behind the barricades. He was watching the Farewell.

The friends of the Socially Secured milled about, singing and shouting their good-byes, shaking hands and extending farewell gifts to the group which stood apart in single file before the gates.

Graham recognized their enthusiasm; realized, too, that it was only a pale shadow of the emotion which suffused the faces of the Socially Secured themselves.

They waited impatiently, garbed in the special dress donned for Departure—the golden robe worn only by those who had been found to be fit and fifty. Most of them had handtrucks to convey their belongings—Graham was surprised at the amount of luggage some of these elderly people were taking with them. His own father had departed virtually empty-handed, except for a few personal microfilm files. But then, his father was a Talent, not a worker. The workers were different. They were great accumulators. People with fantasies of projection, pride of ownership. The Psychos were doing their best to gradually stamp out the viewpoint—they'd outlawed Jags and Caddies for everyone except Technos many years ago, for example. But still the workers clung to material possessions. Some of the Socially Secured would be taking new things into the South, too; there would be fishing-tackle and other unusual items. Graham had heard that in some Resorts they even permitted hunting.

Krug barked something into the audio-relay and the gates opened beneath them. Shouting and waving, the line of Socially Secured moved across the field, escorted by Brass guides. The handtrucks rolled with smooth, electrified precision.

Krug glanced at his assistant and nodded. "Quite a sight, isn't it?" he commented.

Graham nodded. "This is all new to me," he answered. "I've got a lot to learn."

"Well, you might as well enjoy yourself tonight. Next time we make a run, Pm putting you in with the crew, to pick up general procedure. But this trip is just for orientation."

Graham nodded. The talk of "next time" disturbed him. He'd have to make plans quickly. Granted that he'd be able to get away with this before somebody at Psychocenter discovered what had happened and relayed the information here.

He glanced nervously over his shoulder, half-expecting the arrival of a messenger—and guards. But the roof was empty. Maybe he'd be leaving in time. He wished they'd take off now.

"Any questions?" Krug was asking.

Graham blinked. He remembered that he was Mellot now; he had a role to play. The new assistant. What would the new assistant ask at a time like this?

"One thing does surprise me," Graham said, slowly. "They all seem to be so happy. Don't any of them ever have any regrets at leaving here?"

Krug shook his head. "Why should they? What's so wonderful about being an agriculturist or a laborian or an industrician that anyone would be sorry to quit? Oh, they're all adjusted, but think of the benefits they're going to get. Maybe fifty years of taking it easy at government expense, thanks to geriatrics. Isn't that better than the old way they tell us about—when a man had to slave at a job until he was ready to drop, and then be dependent on a small pension or whatever he could manage to lay away?"

"I wasn't thinking of that," Graham persisted. "I was thinking about giving up friends, family ties—"

Krug looked at him sharply, and he realized he'd made a mistake.

"What do you mean, family ties?"

"Well, extended mating-arrangements, for example—"

Krug's glance didn't soften. "Where'd you take training?" he asked.

"Sanmonica, of course." Graham remembered there was a Brass schooling-center there, and hoped it was the right answer.

"Didn't they tell you that all mating-arrangements for workers terminate in the forty-sixth year?"

"Oh, that's right. I'd forgotten."

"Well don't forget. That's important. At forty-six the special conditioning begins. Class-therapy, one night a week. Indoctrination courses for Social Security. They're taught what to expect when they go South. Usually, their jobs are switched around, too, and they're moved to a new living-area, just so old ties can be broken. After a few years, they adapt. And of course they know that once they arrive in the South, they can free-mate all they please. That's one of the reasons they look happy about leaving, now."

Graham nodded. “Don’t they ever allow them to stay with mates? I mean, if both reach the age of fifty at the same time?”

Krug spat over the edge of the roof. “Why should they? Might as well expect them to take their own offspring along. The whole point of conditioning is to eliminate all the dangers of the oldstyle family setup, with ‘romantic love’ and ‘marriage’ and such aberrations. I’m no Psycho, boy, but you know as well as I do what that meant. Why, almost all our troubles in the old days came from the dangers of just that sort of thing. The very roots of psychic disorder stemmed from those family situations—with permanent parents, the Oedipus-complex, sibling rivalry.”

Graham half-listened as he watched the Socially Secured file up the ramps into the waiting Jets. He glanced behind once more. All clear.

Krug noticed his movements. “Anxious to get started? So am I. Let’s go down. We’re on First Jet, of course.” He guided Graham to the vator. On the way down he checked details through his audio-relay. Apparently satisfied, he switched it off as they reached the field and walked through the gates to the waiting Jet in the foreground.

“That’s part of it, of course,” he continued, taking up the thread of the conversation without interruption. “The rest, as you should know, was a matter of the old-time rivalry between youth and age. The family situation only helped to keep it alive: father against son, mother against daughter, younger children against the eldest. And you know what it did to the community. Before Planned Society you saw it everywhere. The young who went out to fight and die resented the old who stayed behind to pick up the profits in safety. It wasn’t until the Psychos came along and hit on the solution of separating the two groups that we got stability. Today all those tensions are gone. We don’t worry about parents or our elders or bigger boys or any of that nonsense. When we’re young, we stay with our own age-group, in a Big Family Unit. We work with our own age-group, leave with our own age-group when we're Socially Secured. There's nothing left behind to cause us any regrets."

Krug cleared his throat. "Of course, I'm just speaking figuratively, you might say. You and I, we don't have to bother. We're exempt from being Socially Secured at fifty or any other age. We can keep on going until we're eighty or ninety, even."

He paused at the foot of the Jet-ramp and placed his hand on Graham's shoulder. "I want you to remember that tonight, because it's important. No matter what you think, just keep on remembering—you'll never be Socially Secured." He shook his head emphatically. "Look at me. I'm sixty-four. Hard to believe, isn't it? But it's true. And I'm good for another twenty years. Just keep in line and the same holds true for you."

A buzzer sounded on his audio-relay and he switched it on. Graham gulped, but the voice was merely reporting the successful boarding of the Jets and clearing with Krug for take-off.

"This way." The Brass led him forward to the cabin. The pilot was already working at the instrument-panel, while the co issued instructions to their passengers in the space behind. Each of the six Jets carried a full complement of three hundred. Huge as they were, Graham couldn't help but feel sorry for the Socially Secured—they must be crowded back in there. Even a two-hour flight would be an ordeal.

Krug, apparently, had no such compunctions. He conferred with pilot and co, then sent a final message to Control through his audio-relay.

Graham sat next to him in the cabin, just behind the pilots' seats before the panel.

"Strap," Krug told him. He indicated a lever at Graham's side. "Seat-chute. Just press in case of emergency. But you know that, of course. It's only that sometimes they forget, on the first trip. Liable to be quite a shock."

Graham smiled. The back of his neck was wet. They'd be taking off in a moment. Taking off. Getting out of here. Heading South, to the Resorts. How far was Miami from Gulfport? Maybe he could shake Krug down there, get to his father. He'd have to plan carefully, but no sense thinking about that now. It all depended on the situation when he arrived. At the moment the important thing was to get away.

And they were leaving.

Leaving with a shudder and with shock, with pulsation and pressure and power—but leaving nonetheless, so that Graham's heart soared with the ship. The launchers propelled them through the opening in the plexide Dome with split-second precision, and then they were clear, and jetting. Lights dimmed, brightened. The ship was on course, at a steady seven hundred.

Krug fumbled at a compartment next to his seat. "Hungry?" he asked.

Graham shook his head.

Krug shrugged and unwrapped a hamsan. He munched thoughtfully. "Better check in," he muttered, reaching for a comm-tube.

Graham held his breath as Krug addressed Control, already sixty miles behind them. But apparently Control had nothing to report. Everything was clear. And if no one had found Sigmond and Mellot by now, chances were that the offices would remain undisturbed until morning. By that time he'd be in Miami, and out of Krug's reach. Just how that would be arranged he didn't know, but a chance would come. It had to.

Graham shifted his strap, patting the pockets of the Brass uniform to see what he could discover. He'd had no time to take inventory. Here was his idento, here was a stunner, here a lumpy packet of what might be emergency rations or pacifiers—for all he knew, it could be Libidose. He had little idea of what constituted standard equipment for Brass assigned to flights like this. And he had little idea what he was supposed to know. The best thing to do would be to keep his mouth shut as much as possible and let Krug do the talking.

Krug seemed amenable to that arrangement. He talked over and around his hamsan.

“Desert country down there,” he said. “Too dark to see, of course.”

“No Domes?”

“We should be over Phoenix, now. Always fly the same route. Then there’s nothing until Dallas. And after that, the Gulf.”

“Gulf?”

“Gulf of Mexico, of course. Which reminds me.” He leaned forward and tapped the co on the shoulder. “Don’t forget to give me the signal,” he said.

The co nodded, then turned back to the panel. He and the pilot carried on a conversation of their own in low tones. Graham scarcely heard it. Another sound overrode; it came from the big passenger-area behind their cabin wall.

“What’s that?” he asked. “Socially Secured. They’re singing.”

And so they were. Graham strained, trying to distinguish the words of the ragged tune. All he could understand was something about high in the sky we fly and life in the sun has just begun.

“Traditional,” Krug commented. “They always sing those things when they leave.”

He fumbled for another hamsan. “Sure you don’t want one?” Graham nodded again. Krug gave him a worried glance. “What’s the matter, stomach upset?”

“No. I’m just not hungry.” That didn’t seem to be the right answer, because Krug continued to stare. “Wait a minute,” he said. “Back there at Jetport, you were asking a lot of questions about the Socially Secured. You made some remark about why they weren’t sorry to leave. Did somebody feed you some classified info?”

“What do you mean?”

“You’ve got some idea about what’s going to happen?”

“No. What is going to happen?”

Krug's eyes were intent upon his face. Apparently he was satisfied with what he saw, because he turned away. "You'll see," he said. Again he leaned forward and spoke to the co. The co nodded briefly.

Krug leaned back in his seat. He reached over to the right wall of the cabin and pressed a button located unobtrusively below the lights. A faint hissing filled the air.

"What's that?" Graham inquired.

"Don't ask questions." Krug reached for a third hamsan.

All at once his voice seemed louder, and Graham realized why. The singing from the big cabin behind had died away. There was only the hissing.

"They've stopped," he murmured.

Krug nodded. "That's right."

"Anything the matter?"

"Nothing at all."

"Maybe we ought to step back and take a look."

"I wouldn't advise it."

"But—"

"Stay strapped. And don't try to open the door. That's an order! If any of the gas ever reached us in here we'd be finished."

"Gas?"

"Don't worry. I'm going to run the ejector now. I think they've had enough." Krug pressed another button, still munching his hamsan. "Only takes a minute to work, only takes another couple of minutes to purify the air again."

Graham felt the urgency rising in him: he knew it was wrong to speak, and yet he had to. "Aren't you going to tell me?" he asked. "Because if you can't, I'll have to guess. The gas—it does something to them, doesn't it? I mean, you're not just knocking them out. You're giving them a laundry-job, isn't that it? Affecting their memories?"

"Right." Krug finished his last bite and wiped his hands. "This stuff affects their memories, you might say. Permanently."

"Per—?"

"Might as well face it. We all have to, our first trip out. Remember the conditioning you got at school? The first time they locked you in with the corpses? That was all done with a purpose, boy. It was necessary, if you're going to be fit for this assignment. Because you're going to see a lot of corpses. To be exact, six hundred every trip."

"You—you killed them?"

Krug nodded.

Something snapped and Graham turned in his seat. He was reaching out when he saw Krug's hand, saw the stunner trained on his throat.

"Easy now," Krug was whispering. "Easy. I know how you feel. I think the bombed system's wrong, myself. I'm in favor of letting the trainees know before they go into flight. But the Psychos don't agree. They want it to come this way; want you to find out only when it's happened."

Graham didn't hear him. He was listening to a voice inside, a voice that screamed I know now. I know about the vox-box. It's a fake. Some impersonator. You killed my father. He died this way, they all die this way, there is no Resort for the Socially Secured anywhere, it's all a lie, the whole system's a lie.

And the stunner was ready, waiting; waiting for him to open his mouth. Because he couldn't open his mouth he opened his pores. For a moment he thought he was going to be sick.

Then Krug gripped his arm. "That's better," he said. "Just relax. Use your common sense and you'll understand that it has to be this way. We're running to capacity right now; how could we possibly support another thirty or forty million of non-productives? Turn them loose for fifty years to live in luxury and idleness? And what would they do—spend half a lifetime playing shuffleboard? This is the best way. Live fully, and die quickly and painlessly in happy anticipation."

"But it's—"

"Cruel? Barbaric? Inhuman?" Krug smiled wryly. "Go ahead, use the words if you like. I won't hold them against you. Felt the same way myself, at first. Guess we all do. It's only when you stop to think things out objectively that you realize what we do is necessary. And for the best." He paused. "You know, they really tried to work out Resorts at first. They actually brought the Socially Secured down here. And the results were murder. Literally murder. Without Psychos to run things, they reverted, went right back to old-style civilization—complete with robbery, violence, even rape. Had to go in and exterminate whole colonies. Then they hit on this system, and there's been no trouble since."

He pointed at the left wall. "See that button? Press it."

Graham hesitated. Krug leaned forward and tapped the co on the shoulder. "Over the Gulf?" he asked. The co nodded.

Krug turned to Graham again. "All right. Press it," he repeated.

"What happens when I press it?"

"Never mind. Do as you're told." His voice carried authority, and so did the pointing stunner.

Graham pressed.

There was a whoosh and a thudding roar from behind. The Jet jerked violently.

"What happened?" Graham asked.

"We just dumped our passengers. Into the Gulf of Mexico."

As Graham started, the hand came down on his arm again. "You did it," Krug reminded him. "You're a part of the system. Might as well get used to it."

Graham turned his face away. He felt his fingers ball into fists. Then Krug was standing up, unstrapped. He put his audio-relay down on the seat.

"Hold it a minute," he said. "I'm going back to check the ship. Make sure everything's closed up again. I won't be gone long."

He edged into a passageway and shut the door.

Graham sat there alone, sat there thinking about what he had done; thinking about those who had just died, and about how his father had died. A whiff of gas and a plunge down into the dark waters—that was the end-result of fifty years of Planned Society. Lies, all lies, with this as the last lie of all. No, it didn't even end here. For Talents, there would be still more lies; the impersonators on the vox-box every week. This task was grim enough, the task of the executioner. But the impersonator's role was even worse. Studying old tapes and life-records, and then deceiving the survivors. Telling them to be happy, to adjust, to take it easy, relax, don't worry—

"Control to Krug."

The voice came from the empty seat beside him. Audio had been activated.

"Control to Krug. Stand by. Acknowledge. Emergency message. Repeat. Acknowledge and stand by for emergency message."

The metallic voice crackled in Graham's ears. Emergency message. That meant only one thing. They'd discovered Sigmond and Mellot. They knew. And they were warning Krug.

Graham glanced behind him. Krug was still in the cabin, but he'd be back in a moment. Could the audio be turned off? No, because the pilots were listening too. It wouldn't help. He'd have to unstrap himself and get out the stunner.

But he couldn't stun the pilots, and if he stunned Krug they'd turn on him. Bomb it, why hadn't he planned things in advance? He ought to have anticipated that his luck wouldn't hold forever. And now there was no answer available, no escape.

Escape.

He started to unstrap and then remembered what Krug had said about the seat. It was an escape-chute. "Just press in emergency."

Well, this was an emergency if he ever saw one. With the audio squawking now, “Acknowledge!” and the sound of the door behind him opening slowly. Krug was coming, Krug was here, he was holding his stunner in one hand.

Graham took a deep breath. His thumb found the button on the side of his seat. It was now or never.

“What are you doing?” Krug began.

The rest of his sentence was drowned in the rush of air. The seat dropped from beneath Graham, and then he was dropping with it, turning over and over as he fell. The darkness was all around, coming up with a rush, and he could see the phosphorescence whirling below.

SNEAK PREVIEW

Graham closed his eyes, then opened them. He’d have to dump the seat-chute before he landed. He was over water, and it would drag him down.

His fingers tugged frantically at the strap, but he was falling too fast, turning too quickly. Over and over and over, and the water rushing up, and the night closing in—

Then Graham screamed. He was still screaming as he followed the dumped dead down into the Gulf of Mexico.

CHAPTER 8

THE world was a woman’s face. It was as small as a pinpoint, it was so huge it blotted out the sky; it wavered and receded, then came forward again only to fade once more.

Graham blinked and gradually the face came into focus and assumed normal proportions. It stared down at him with grave and questioning eyes, and he suddenly became conscious of the fact that he was flat on his back, lying very quietly on something that rocked back and forth, back and forth. The face began to bob again, then steadied once more. He opened his mouth, but before he could speak the woman anticipated.

"It's all right," she told him. "You're on a boat, you know. We pulled you out of the water."

"But—"

"You came down from a Jet, didn't you? In a seat-chute? We saw the flare."

"What flare?"

"Don't you know every seat-chute has a flare attachment?"

Graham shook his head. "I didn't know. This was my first trip."

"What happened? Did something go wrong, was there some emergency? You're Brass, aren't you? I recognized the uniform. If you want me to report—"

"Please, don't. I can't talk now." Graham closed his eyes. Before he did so he caught the woman staring at him. It was an oddly guarded stare, but he seemed to sense surprise in her gaze, and puzzlement. Her voice, when she spoke, was oddly guarded, too.

"Don't try to exert yourself," she said. "Just rest, now. I'll give you a booster." She bent forward and her hand moved towards him. He felt a sudden sting, followed by a tingling, in his left arm. Then he went back into the darkness, but it was a rocking, gentle darkness that soothed his senses.

He slept for a long time. When he awoke he was instantly alert to broad daylight and a brisk breeze. He knew that he was lying on the deck of the small vessel—a primitive craft powered by an ancient petroleum motor. Out of the corner of his eye he stared down into a cabin where two men in nondescript uniforms piloted the boat.

Graham shifted his gaze and blinked. The woman was still seated beside him. Her face was immobile, though the wind had unloosed the auburn torrent of her hair. She too wore the bulky and nonedescript uniform of her male companions; there was no trace of makeup on her countenance and she didn't have glasses. Her face, as she bent forward, bore traces of small blemishes. Graham racked his memory to identify the discolorations. What did they call them? Freckles. That was it, freckles. People used to suffer from such dermatological afflictions in the days when they lived outside the Domes.

Outside the Domes. But he was outside, himself, now. Outside, on the rolling waters, in a small boat—

Graham sat up swiftly. The woman smiled at him.

"Don't be alarmed. You're quite safe, Graham."

He stared at her. "You know my name?"

"Of course. It's our job to keep contact with the Jets. Krug relayed an alert to us. We were looking for you." She paused. "My name is Clare."

Graham nodded at her. You're quite safe, Graham. It was an ironic self-contradiction. If she knew his name, then he wasn't safe. She had captured him, Krug knew where he was, and they both knew who he was. They had found out all about Mellot, now, and Sigmond, too. There was no escape. Or was there? He glanced out at the blue emptiness of the surrounding sea. No escape.

"Don't worry," Clare said. "We'll be reaching the Keys soon."

"The Keys?"

"We're based there, of course. This is only a small part of our duties—when a Jet consignment comes over, we're on hand to patrol the area. Sometimes, when a cargo is—dumped—there are accidents."

Graham raised his eyebrows. Clare glanced away as she continued.

"Every so often there's a slipup. One of the Socially Secured may revive upon reaching the water. That's where we function. We, and the crews of a dozen similar boats, comb the area for such survivors—"

"And kill them?" Graham muttered.

Clare said nothing. She continued to stare out at the water.

"Why didn't you kill me?" he asked. "You said yourself that Krug gave you a report."

"That's the reason," she answered. "He told us to bring you back and await further orders."

Graham shook his head. “But the report must have come in while I was asleep. I seem to recall that when you spoke to me last night, the first time, you said you didn’t know who I was.”

“Correct.”

“Why didn’t you kill me then? In fact, why did you bother to fish me out of the water at all?” There was something both incongruous and unconvincing in her statements, and he tried to formulate it as he spoke. “You say you search for survivors and finish them off. I should think the sea would do the job quite efficiently—or the sharks.”

Clare sighed. “Yes,” she murmured. “There are sharks, everywhere.”

“You haven’t answered my questions.”

“I don’t intend to. You can ask Doc, when we arrive.”

“Doc? Who’s he?”

“He’s in charge.”

“Brass?”

“Psycho.”

Graham stood up. If there were puzzling elements in the situation, her last word resolved it. He was being taken back into custody by the Psychos, and that could mean only one thing. He’d be better off taking his chances with the sharks.

He glanced covertly at the water. Land loomed off on the southern horizon—it was probably one of the Keys. Maybe it was a Psycho center, maybe not. Would it be possible to make a break, swim for it, attempt to hide there? It was worth the risk, in any case. Anything was better than falling into the hands of the Psychos again.

He gazed down into the cabin. The two men seemed entirely preoccupied. No one was watching him except the woman, and she was unarmed. Now was the time. If he could knock her out—

Graham stretched, flexing his arms as if yawning. He felt rested, refreshed, ready for anything. Yes, he could do it. He knew he could. And he had to. Now.

Suddenly he lashed out, his right hand grasping her hair, his left arm closing about her throat. His fingers tightened across her neck and he bent her back, and then—

Her hands locked behind her, closing around the back of his neck. His feet left the deck, and then he was whirling through the air. Before he knew what had happened he was jarred into painful realization as he landed on the hard surface with a thump that knocked the wind out of his lungs.

Clare stood over him stolidly, then tossed her hair back over her shoulders and smiled faintly. “Please don’t try anything like that again,” she said, crisply, “or I’ll have to use force.”

“Force? What do you call that?”

All at once the faint smile blossomed into an unmistakable grin. “Judo,” she explained. “Doc taught me.”

“You must have been a good pupil.” He stirred, and ran his right hand across his bruised shoulders.

“Here, I’ll help you up,” Clare said. “If you’ll promise not to make a break for it.”

“I guess there’s no choice, is there?” Graham allowed her to assist him, taking her hand as she pulled him to his feet. Her clasp was warm and unfemininely firm. He prepared to release his grip but she held him firm and bent her head closer to his own.

“Hold it,” she whispered. “They can see us from below, through the mirror. Pretend you’re dizzy and lean on me. Now listen carefully. I know why you tried to escape, of course. And I suppose I should have told you sooner. You were right when you questioned my motives in saving you. We don’t ordinarily rescue anyone—our job is merely to police and patrol these waters. But Doc has other plans in mind. You’ll just have to trust him, and trust me. Now, will you promise to behave?”

Graham nodded. “Then he’s not really a Psycho?”

“Oh, he’s a Psycho—but there is more to it than that. Wait and see.”

Clare stepped away. “Look,” she said. “We’re coming in!”

The boat chugged along a reef and entered the island harbor. Through the trees bordering the beach Graham caught a glimpse of a cluster of buildings, unprotected by any semblance of a Dome.

Slowly they moved towards a crude wooden dock, and all at once the engines slowed and stilled as they drifted in. One of the men clambered up from the cabin and ran across the deck, vaulting the rail to the dock below. He secured the boat with a rope. His companion left the wheel and spoke to Clare, who nodded.

The two men led the way. Graham and Clare followed, taking a path across the beach which led to a series of stone steps. They ascended, and came to a courtyard fronting a semicircle of steel and concrete structures, all of which seemed to have solid glass window-walls on the side facing the courtyard. Graham recognized the screen arrangements over the glass; visibility would be perfect from within, but it was impossible to see what lay behind from outside here. Architecturally, the buildings would not have been out of place in Hollywood, but this was not surprising; hadn’t Clare said there was a Psycho in charge of the Key? He’d just have to trust her, from now on.

Oddly enough, he did. She was smiling reassuringly now, urging him forward as they approached the outer door. Something buzzed and clicked—electronic protector threshold, Graham realized—and then the door slid open. The two men entered and turned down a corridor to the left. Clare grasped his arm and guided him to the right, through a long hall which resembled a corridor back in Technoquarters. Everything was white and shining—Psychowhite, Psycho-shining.

Clare halted before a doorway. “Don’t worry, now,” she whispered. Her voice was lost in the buzzing and clicking as the electronic guardian acknowledged their presence and activated the lock-mechanisms. The door moved to one side arid they entered the office. A white-gowned figure gazed at them from behind a desk.

"Here we are," Clare said, gaily. "Mission accomplished."

The Psycho stood up, nodding slowly. As his eyes met Graham's, he was conscious of seeing in them the same curious look of shocked recognition he'd noted in Clare's glance. The impression lasted for only an instant and then a veil came down. It wasn't actually a veil, but at the moment Graham was reminded of a lizard he had once seen sunning itself upon a stone; the reptile had seemed to draw a film over its gaze.

There was something remote and reptilian about this little man in the white robe. Suddenly Graham was conscious of a cold tingle of apprehension. He'd felt it before, that other time, when he'd reached out and touched the lizard. The lizard had flicked its tongue suddenly and moved away.

The Psycho flicked his tongue.

"So you're Graham," he murmured. "I'm glad to see you. In fact, we're both glad to see you—aren't we, Krug?"

Graham whirled, suddenly, raising his arm lest Clare try to intercept him. The girl made no movement. And Graham, after turning, halted and stood still Krug stood directly behind him, his eyes levelled on Graham's face and his stunner levelled at his forehead.

"Very glad," Krug said. "Very glad indeed." He smiled at Clare. "But I'm a little surprised, too. I'd have thought this one might have put up more of a struggle. He's disturbed, you know."

Clare nodded. "I took care of that. I persuaded him it was all a trick designed to deceive you. After that he was quite cooperative. I imagine he thought Doc here would save him."

"And so I shall." The Psycho's lizard-tongue licked at thin lips.

Graham faced the girl. "Bomb you! Why didn't you let me go over the side? At least I'd have had a quick death."

"You aren't to die," Clare told him. "Doc gave me my orders."

"And Krug gave me mine," the Psycho said.

"And Sigmond himself instructed me," Krug added. He grinned slowly. "We bear you no malice, Graham. So there will be no punishment. Only an adjustment."

"Adjustment?" Despite himself, Graham could not repress the note of pleading in his voice. "I don't want that. Believe me, I'd rather die—"

"Sigmond knows best," Krug said. "As far as I'm concerned, I'd be only too happy to eliminate you. But Sigmond insisted otherwise. You're a Talent, remember? And Talents are too scarce to be destroyed. Years have been invested in training you, and we can't afford to be cheated of your creative potential. You'll be re-assigned to a project after a proper period of Therapy."

"Therapy? You mean I'm going to be laundered, is that it?"

"We'll leave the matter up to Doc, here. He's in charge." Krug grinned again. "Actually, it's lucky in a way that you bailed out when and where you did—made it all very convenient. Unless Sigmond chose to treat you in Hollywood, chances are we'd have flown you down here anyway as a second choice. Doc gets a lot of special cases, don't you, Doc?"

The lizard-tongue flicked once more from between the smiling, parted lips. "That is correct." Graham paled. "You mean this is a—Womb?"

"Please." The Psycho raised a hand. "Let us not descend to vulgarities, Graham. It is enough for you to know that you are now an inmate of an Insanatorium."

Smiling graciously, he raised his hand in a languid motion and at the same time Graham felt Krug's stunner beam him in the back.

CHAPTER 9

THE room was light and airy.

Graham could glance out of the window at the ocean, or gaze through the door down the long corridor beyond, and there was no sense of confinement—unless, of course, he attempted to open either the window or the door. The glass was quite immovable, and beyond it were the meshed screens.

Food came up at regular intervals through the wall servitor. The furnishings were more than comfortable. In a way, it was as pleasant here as in his own apartment.

When he'd recovered consciousness, he found a fresh supply of clothing laid out for him on the bed, and an ample wardrobe in the wall closet. Somebody had also seen fit to provide him with sigs, and during the second day of his enforced stay he began to indulge in smoking. He'd never tried them before, but of course he knew what they were—oral-erotic tabagistic pacifiers, named in honor of Sigmund Freud, of course, who had smoked cigars in the olden, golden days.

But the biggest novelty lurked in the cupboards, which Graham investigated thoroughly on the second evening of his captivity.

They were filled with books. Actual books, bound and printed by ancient processes; their pages yellowed and crumbling now, but still legible. Quite legible, in fact. Graham thus found one of his wildest fantasies come true—and without further ado, he settled down to an orgy of unbridled reading.

It was all pornography, of course, things he'd heard of vaguely but never seen and not quite believed in; filthy stuff by writers named Asimov and Heinlein and Bradbury which had once been openly peddled under the guise of "science fiction." Despite his initial qualms, Graham found the material quite interesting from the clinical standpoint. After all, hadn't his own work—Space Opera—originally sprung from just such outmoded and obscene sources? That's the way he'd always understood it.

But he could see why these sources had been outlawed. The writing was suggestive in the extreme; consciously permeated with inhibition, repression, compulsion and obvious symbolism. It was unmistakably a product of the unclean mental attitudes of the Twentieth Century, teeming with quaint, old-fashioned, but nevertheless dangerous notions. For example, the idea of space-travel was completely perverted—these writers, while not minimizing the potential dangers, apparently did their best to make the idea sound attractive! They also speculated on time-travel, and all from the standpoint of escapist fantasy. Some of the absurd attempts at prophecy, involving visions of a future peopled by “robots” and “cybernetics machines” were quite ludicrous in the light of actuality, but in other respects Graham could trace the genesis of many concepts practically paralleled in today’s Space Opera. The Bems were here, for example. Yes, as a technician, as a Talent, he had to admit the ancient pornographers deserved credit for their imaginative efforts. It was their viewpoint which was warped and dangerous.

Throughout everything seemed to run absurd fantasies of omnipotence. The “heroes” were supposedly brilliant or at least superior intellects who nevertheless reacted to stress in terms of physical aggression throughout the narratives. They kept coming back for more punishment repeatedly and even when exhausted they seemed capable of one last superhuman effort which resulted in ultimate triumph. It was a monstrous concept of humanity, but Graham found it oddly attractive, in a way. That was the danger, of course; the temptation to identify with such atypicalities. Such a “hero” would never, for example, allow himself to become involved in Graham’s present predicament. He would have easily overcome that girl, Clare, and taken over the boat; sailed for some deserted island and escaped to—

Where?

That was the difference between pornography and reality; there was no escape afforded in the latter. No “underground” of rebels waiting to overthrow authority. No wonder “science fiction” had been repressed and repudiated, along with the rest of the old-fashioned “literature”; entirely too much of it dealt with fantasies of aggression directed against authority. And a great deal seemed to concern criticism of social attitudes and the social order. Of course, as Graham realized, most of the criticism had been perfectly justified; the point was that this form of writing could be employed by almost anyone as a weapon against any form of authority. Therein lay the real danger.

Why had he been allowed access to this material? This disturbed him.

The question remained unanswered. For five full days, Graham saw no one. There was nothing to do but read. And so he read. Day dimmed to darkness and darkness dwindled into dawn, but still he was alone. No figures appeared against the landscape beyond the window, no faces loomed in the corridor past the doorway. The longer he waited, the more apprehensive he became, and the more he took refuge from apprehension in the books. Perhaps that's the way it had happened in the old days, when everybody read. They read because they were afraid; because they couldn't stand the strain of waiting for the bombs to fall. But the ideas that brought the bombs were generated and nurtured by the concepts in the books, and the more they read the more they ripened to aggression and rebellion. It was a vicious cycle—no wonder the Psychos had outlawed all that pornographic trash! Now the world was clean and sane—

And they dumped the Socially Secured in the sea. Was that clean and sane?

Graham was still pondering the answer when Doe paid him a visit.

The Psycho appeared outside the door on the morning of the sixth day and gestured with his hand. The door slid open and the small man entered. Since the gesturing hand held a stunner, Graham made no effort to approach him.

Doc nodded down and smiled, but the lizard-tongue did not appear.

"How are you feeling?" he asked.

"Confused," Graham answered, truthfully. He glanced towards the cupboards. "Reading those books I found—"

"They were placed here for that purpose," Doc said. "I hope you got a few ideas from them."

"But I don't understand. This is a Womb, isn't it? I'm going to be laundered—"

"I was expecting the books to do the job," Doc said. "I thought they might help in reorientation."

"Pornography?"

"It used to be called fantasy," Doc reminded him. "Rut under any label, it's still the best approach to understanding current realities that I know."

"What has an Insanatorium got to do with realities?"

"Not much, in Hollywood or most of the other centers. But down here, we've learned to go our own way. The books have helped us immeasurably, I can assure you. So many of them dealt with tyrannies of the future, and possible rebellions against such tyrannies. No wonder they were banned, labelled pornographic. Anyone reading them would be bound to find certain parallels with the present situation. Didn't you?"

Graham hesitated a moment. Then, "What do I have to lose?" he murmured. "Of course I did."

"Very well," said Doc. "Consider yourself laundered." He slipped the stunner into his jacket and sat down.

"But—"

"I told you we didn't operate the way they would in Hollywood. Sigmond thinks we do, of course, and we try to keep him satisfied. That's why we had to go through with that little comedy the other night, for Krug's benefit. He'll report to Sigmond that you've been captured and will be given the full treatment. That means you're safe here for at least a few more weeks. By that time we'll be ready to act."

"Wait a minute. What are you trying to tell me?"

"Just what you should already have surmised from reading those books. That you're in the hands of the rebels."

"Underground?"

“Why not?” Doc shrugged. “Don’t you think it’s a good idea? You know now that this whole social order is built upon a lie. You saw what happened to the Socially Secured. Isn’t it worthwhile to step in and change things?”

“Yes, but how can you expect to do anything?”

Doc lit a sig. “I’ve been asking that Question for years,” he confessed. “When I came here, to take charge, I was armed with nothing but vague doubts. After I discovered the truth about the Socially Secured, those doubts were crystallized. What Clare told you is partly true. There’s no Brass base in this outlying area, beyond the Domes, and one of my duties as Psycho in charge is to send out boats when the Socially Secured flights come over—to make sure that no one escapes by any freak accident after being dumped.

“Well, I send out the boats, but on rescue missions. We can’t save many; most of them are quite dead before they hit the water. But through the past ten years we’ve managed to bring in and revive over a hundred. Some of them are good recruits.

“Then too, I’m in charge of four other Insanatoriums in this region, in addition to this one here. I’ve managed to pick up some interesting additions to our ranks. There are well over three hundred of us, now.”

Graham blinked. “Three hundred, to deal with His MGMinence, and Sigmond? People like Hix and Ormsbee and Schwartz, and the millions behind them? They control everything from the top—”

Doc raised his hand. “You needn’t tell me. After all, I am a Psycho. I know the setup very well. And as you say, it is controlled most efficiently from the top. Nothing of importance is delegated. This is its greatest strength, and also its greatest weakness. Since the whole system depends upon holding the media of communication and information, all we need do is take over on that level.”

“But how can you expect to do it with three hundred old men and maniacs?”

"They aren't maniacs. Forget the orthodox Psycho definitions of aberration. All the values have been inverted, all the standard psychiatric precepts perverted. Today the Insanatoriums are virtually the last refuge of the sane. If they haven't all been subject to shock-therapy and topectomy and lobotomy, just to dull them into submission. It's been years since psychotherapy has been used as a curative—the principal purpose of all therapy has been merely to destroy rebellion. No, some of our best minds, our most creative minds, are in Insanatoriums. I've utilized their abilities, set up a few laboratories. We aren't quite as helpless as you may imagine."

"You're talking about war, then? You have new weapons to destroy the Domes?" Graham shook his head. "Frankly, I doubt if the end would justify the means."

"I doubted it, too, for many years, when that seemed to be the only way. Lately, other avenues have opened. But I wasn't certain of our plans until you arrived."

"What have I got to do with it?"

"You're quite important," Doc smiled. "In a month or so, you'll be supposedly laundered and fit to return to duty. When the next flight comes down over the Gulf to dump, you'll be able to return with them to Hollywood. That's the way we'll work it—through infiltration. You can handle the matter from the inside—"

Graham shook his head. "Nonsense! You've been reading too much of that pornography. One man against the Galactic Empire, eh?" He stood up. "Look, I'm in sympathy with your ideas. I'd like to see the present order overthrown. But I'm not going to tackle the job. If you don't mind, I intend to help all I can, but from right here."

"Very well," Doc said. "You'll stay. But you'll go."

"I don't understand—"

"I told you we'd managed some rather clever innovations in our laboratory work, with the help of the technicians we recruited. I also told you that you're quite important to the success of this plan. But perhaps the best way to make things utterly clear is through actual demonstration. I asked to have Considine sent up here, and I believe he's waiting outside now."

Doc stepped over to the door. It slid open and he beckoned to a waiting figure outside.

The man stepped into the room.

"This is Considine," Doc said.

Graham heard the name, but he didn't believe him. He kept staring at the smiling stranger before him—the stranger who wasn't a stranger.

"Pretty good job, eh?" Doc asked. "Now are you beginning to understand how we'll work it? Naturally, I expect you to brief Considine here very thoroughly in the weeks to come. He'll have to become completely acquainted with all the necessary data—you must cooperate all along the line. Then, when the time comes, he'll be ready. Once he arrives in Hollywood, he knows what to do. It's your job to see that he can manage to carry out his duties undetected."

Doc smiled and patted him on the shoulder. "No reason why you shouldn't get started right away. From now on, you two will stay together; there's no time for delay. I've no doubt you'll get along well with one another. After all, you have a great deal in common."

Then he made his exit, and left Graham standing there, staring at Considine. What he had said was all too true; they did have a lot in common. The trouble was, Graham couldn't accept the stranger as Considine. The name just didn't fit.

Graham thought of the old books and shuddered.

Call him robot. Call him android.

Whatever he was, however he had been created—feature for feature, the creature named Considine was Graham's identical twin.

CHAPTER 10

I'M NO monster," Considine insisted. "I'm as human as you are. Here, feel my arm. It's flesh, isn't it?"

"But your face—"

"There was a natural resemblance to begin with. A little cosmetological work and some makeup helped. The big job now is to do as good a job on the inside as was done on the exterior. That's where you come in. You're going to have to tell me all about yourself. And about your life in Laguna Dome." Considine smiled. "There's a lot to catch up on—it's been some years since I was Socially Secured."

"Doc rescued you?"

"That's right."

"What did you do—beforehand? Back there?"

"We'll discuss it some other time. Right now, there's too much I've got to find out from you and we haven't got much time. Doc insists that you give me every bit of data you can remember; nothing is too trivial and inconsequential to be important. Names, dates, conversations, experiences you shared with others, details of your daily life and work."

"Think you can remember everything?"

"He'll supply us with a recording device."

"Tape or film?"

"Something new. One of his patients, a man named Lawrence, came up with it. I'll have it brought in. Don't be afraid, now."

Graham wasn't afraid, but he was a bit selfconscious when he saw the hypnotape. Considine set up the apparatus on a table; they took chairs on either side, and then adjusted the head-clamps and electrodes.

"You may find it easier to talk, at first," Considine said. "But just remember, you really don't have to. All that's necessary is that you think, that you remember. It's based on the free-association principle, of course. Electroenceplialographic patterns are set up mechanically; the machine analyzes the rhythms, yours and mine, and then plots a sort of median beam, a common frequency we can both approximate. You'll be on sending, I'll be on receiving, so of course I can't signal any questions. I'll just depend on you transmitting your reveries. If anything needs clarifying or supplementing, I can ask you for additional data after a session."

"But why is it called a hypnotape?" Graham asked. "Isn't it just mechanical thought-transmission?"

"There's a built-in signal, through the electrodes, to focus attention," Considine explained. "The result is definitely a hypnotic state on the part of both sender and receiver. This makes for maximum concentration, maximum ability to absorb impressions and information. But don't worry about being caught in a trance. The device can be set to break connection at any time. To begin with, I believe we ought to limit our sessions to an hour. Later on, when you're more relaxed, we can extend the length of contact if it seems advisable. Now don't worry—the important thing is to use the machine just as it would be used in therapy; for imparting thoughts to the analyst through free fantasy. Let yourself go."

It wasn't quite that simple, Graham told himself. To begin with, he had to accept the notion that such a transference was mechanically possible. Then he remembered how Sigmond had used the Ganz method on him, to make the filmanalysis. That had worked, worked only too well. Graham shuddered as he sank back in his chair, heard the device click on.

The funny part of it was, the device clicked on inside his head. He closed his eyes to concentrate, and felt a stirring beneath his skull. Little waves of horripilation coursed through him, and then an alien rhythm obtruded. It was strong, steady, and oddly soothing. Somewhere outside he could feel himself relaxing. There was no need to open his eyes and look around, no desire to. He could rest just by surrendering to the rhythm, and he wasn't afraid any more.

The rhythm was slow and peaceful, slow and peaceful . . .

And he didn't have to talk, all he had to do was think. Think about anything that came into his head. About Zank, and about Warner. About his friends—Carson, Davis, Loeb. About his father, down in Gulfport, who wasn't really down in Gulfport at all but who had gone down in the Gulf. Down in the Gulf with the Socially Secured, because of Krug and men like Krug, the rats. Men like Archer, his MGMinence. MGMinence. Menace, the Bems in his work . . .

He thought about his work, about his day-to-day routine back there under the Dome. He recalled his conversations with Zank, his talks with Wanda. No feeling of embarrassment now. He could recollect every detail. All the little things, things he had consciously forgotten, fell into place. He even remembered the individual movements of that new Psychiatric Suite; they were Trauma, Cathexis, Catharsis and Adjustment. He thought about the Fornivacation and Wanda's glasses and his last job turned out for Space Opera . . .

Click!

Something shut off in his head, and the session was over. He had a moment of confusion, and then everything was all right once again. There was no self-consciousness, no aftermath of fatigue.

Considine was jubilant. He began talking at once, and now Graham was really startled; out of the mouth of his double poured his own thoughts, his own memories, literally verbatim.

"You see?" Considine exulted. "It really does work. Now, I've got a few points I'd like to ask questions about—"

And he did, thus establishing a routine to which they both adhered during the days and weeks that followed. Aside from the hypnotic influence of the machine, there was something definitely compelling about the very process of self-revelation. By opening his mind and memories to Considine, Graham found that he was in turn becoming acquainted with himself.

Once, when Doc stopped by to check on their progress, he said as much. "This is a wonderful adjunct to psychotherapy," he told him.

"I hope it will be," Doc answered. "If we ever return to genuine therapeutic concepts again. Right now, of course, they use plenty of narcohypnosis and subliminal suggestion, but only for purposes of control."

“How did it all start, anyway?” Graham demanded. But Doc shook his head.

“Can’t go into that now. No time. Later on, perhaps, we’ll have more chance to talk.”

Graham didn’t wait for that opportunity to arise. During the third and final week of their daily sessions, he spoke to Considine about it.

They had reached a point where his double was reasonably satisfied with the progress they’d made; for several days, Considine had ceased using the machine and instead improvised a series of testing-periods, during which Graham fired questions and he supplied the answers.

“I don’t think they’ll ever be able to trip me up now,” Considine said. “I know as much about you as you do yourself.”

“Probably more,” Graham admitted. “I’ve recovered a lot of latent memories. And I’m grateful for them. You know, when Sigmond made his filmanalysis, everything seemed so horrible—the infantile period especially. It’s as though he dredged up only the negative concepts; the fears, the blind aggressions, the feelings of inadequacy and insecurity.”

“That’s all he wanted to find,” Considine suggested. “He edited out the rest. Your feelings about your father, for example.”

“My father.” Graham smiled. “Lewis was a great man. You must have noticed how many of my pleasant recollections center about him.”

“Yes, I did notice,” Considine said, softly. “You miss him, don’t you?”

“Terribly.” Graham stood up, fumbling for a sig. “Oh, I know what such an admission would mean to the average Psycho. But I’m not ashamed. If I could only be half the man my father was—” He faced Considine abruptly. “Why wouldn’t they let me? Why won’t they let anyone develop in the old patterns? How did it all start, when did it change, why?”

Considine pointed upwards, his finger gesturing towards the window and stabbing at the sky.

“Bombs,” he said. “They brought more than physical destruction—they brought psychic destruction, too. The panic resulting from wholesale atomic and biological warfare caught the military and the industrialists unprepared. And the psychiatrists, already culture-heroes and authority-symbols in the 1960s, took over. Actually, they were already in key positions. During the war, they nominally controlled all media of communication—the press, television, motion pictures, radio. Quaint devices, primitive by our standards, but quite effective for “psychological warfare” and completely controlled by government psychologists in charge of censorship and propaganda.

“During the ensuing confusion after the war, they merely retained control, and augmented their positions of authority. As for so-called private industry, by this time almost every executive had his own personal analyst; these men merely pooled their influence and took over smoothly to dictate policy. First they acted in an advisory capacity and then, as more and more so-called ‘bosses’ or ‘big wheels’ cracked under the strain, the therapists moved into open control of business channels. You know something of what followed, I’m sure.

“The Declaration of Dependence abolished old-style political government, and the Psychos set out to establish a ‘sane’ world free of war and individual threats of aggression. Their initial premise seemed sound enough. They pinpointed the sources of tension in the familial situation, romantic love, competitive economics, competitive religion, nationalism. Using fear of technology and physical sciences as potential threats of future war, they developed new concepts based on a therapeutic social order. ‘Sanity’ became equated with ‘adjustment’ and what was that but conformity and obedience to Psycho dictates?

“There wasn’t much attempt to develop psychiatry or psychoanalysis any further. While it had once been freely admitted that mental therapy was still in the experimental stage, it was now postulated that the Science of the Mind was exact and ordained. They freely discarded anything which seemed contradictory or obscure; there was no more experimentation with

ESP or PSI, for example. A lot of the work of Freud, Adler, Jung and the others was ignored or actually suppressed. This wasn't too difficult, because by this time they'd started banning books and distorting the educational process. Narchohypnosis, perfected during the war, was a great aid to power. Birth-conditioning followed. Subliminal perception was freely employed—but I needn't tell you that, I'm sure.

"What gradually evolved was a drugged society. The Domes were built, to protect survivors from radioactivity, and no one hostile to the Psychos was permitted asylum in them. The rebels stayed outside and perished.

"Within the Domes, the new era really began. Atomic power and jet propulsion were developed, hydroponics became a necessary survival-technique, but no free research was permitted in the field of physical sciences. Rocket and space-flight experiments ended, because they were associated with weapons and the threat of destruction. There was an end to 'free enterprise' and communism alike, for the same reason. The surviving population was conditioned to believe they lived in a world without war, murder, suicide or aberration. Here in the Ideal States of America, the worker started out with birth-conditioning for immediate adjustment, lived as a ward of the state in a univercity, graduated to a farmarea or industarea, dwelt in a suburbanilex, visited consumarkets for pleasure, and ended up Socially Secured at fifty."

"Murder," said Graham, softly. "Living a lie and dying a lie."

"Remember they're not villains," Considine answered. "They tried to cope with a real situation as best they knew. The panic after the war created an emergency; someone had to take immediate and decisive action. Military and civil authorities failed, so the medical authorities took over. Building the Domes was a great initial achievement, and a necessity, too. Two-thirds of the entire country, three-quarters of the entire world, was seared by radioactivity. Epidemics wiped out virtually the entire population of Europe, Asia, South America—wherever survivors huddled in masses. The Domes brought physical security. The Psychos imposed a secure social order. They tried to rebuild society along idealistic lines. But they had to work too fast, there wasn't enough to work with.

"Did you know that they did try to establish colonies for the Socially Secured at first, here in the south? But they lacked the necessary manpower, the necessary industrial output to support the project. It was too expensive, so eventually they just set up the present system."

"But why did they have to? Why enforce retirement at fifty? Why not let men live out their natural span?" Graham demanded. "They can open the Domes now. The threat of radioactivity is over. This country could support a larger population."

"I don't know," Considine sighed. "I really don't know. You'll have to ask somebody else."

A few weeks beforehand, this suggestion would have seemed absurd to Graham. But he was no longer a prisoner, now. After his daily sessions with Considine, he found he was free to come and go as he pleased.

Life in the Insanatorium and on the Key was complex. Graham found that Doc hadn't lied: he and his people, here and in the neighboring institutions on adjoining Keys, had set up an elaborate system of experimentation and preparation. Behind the protective regimen of Psycho control, which was maintained solely for the purpose of deceiving visiting Brass, the rebel group was determined and dedicated. Each month the boats went out when the jets went over, and each month Krug or his counterparts paid a courtesy-call or made a perfunctory tour of inspection. There was never anything amiss; during these interludes the patients were kept in confinement, the Psychos and Technos and Egghead personnel went about their accustomed duties. But in between, there were no distinctions and no pretenses of maintaining an Insanatorium—except, of course, when Doc made his regular telereports to headquarters in the East or out in Hollywood.

Doc (whose real name, Graham discovered, was Lee) explained the situation tersely. “It didn’t happen overnight,” he said. “Took years to gradually transform an actual Insanatorium into the present pattern. Had to weed out a lot of the former personnel here. A few we indoctrinated. Others we—eliminated.” He zipped a finger across his throat and smiled, not at all pleasantly. “We’ve had to lie and cheat and steal and smuggle in material for our lab work. Built ’em underground, of course. And for a long time we didn’t have sufficient staff-members to function. But we’ve recruited patients and survivors, as I told you, and for the past few years there’s been no problem.”

“But are you sure no one suspects?”

“Fairly certain. After all, we do effect some ‘cures’ here. That’s a necessary safe-guard, you know—every month or so, we get new patients for treatment. The majority, I’m happy to say, are like yourself; Talents and other nonconformists. Most of them are quite eager to enlist in the cause. The others—” Doc made the zipping gesture again.

“Some of the Talents we retain, as incurables. Others we ‘cure’ and send back to their former posts. So you see, the process of infiltration has already begun. All over the Domes, in various capacities, we have men working and waiting. They each know what to do when the time comes. What we needed, though, was someone like yourself—a man who could get into Hollywood. Being away from that area, our Insanatoriums never got any Talents who were stationed around there. And we need at least one, to work on the top level. He’ll set everything off according to plan.”

“Just what is your plan? I still don’t see—”

“It’s better that you don’t, at the moment. Considine knows what his role will be. We did a good job on him, didn’t we?”

“Remarkable. I still can’t get over the resemblance. For that matter, I don’t understand—”

“Sorry.” Doc’s voice was brusque. “Too busy, now. I’ll explain another time.”

Graham had no doubt that he spoke the truth. Doc was indeed busy. Everyone was very active and busy here.

A trip through the underground laboratory areas convinced him of that much.

Clare took him through. She was spending as much time as possible with him these days—whenever he wasn’t occupied in sessions with Considine, and whenever she could get away from her clerical staff-work as one of Doc’s assistants.

She introduced him to a number of men working on the lab projects, and Graham soon realized that Doc hadn’t lied about their abilities. There were Technos and Talents from Domes throughout the eastern area, and a surprising number of men and women over fifty.

At first Graham found himself uneasy in their presence. Clare noticed, of course, and commented upon it.

“What’s wrong with you?” she asked, after an interview with a gray-haired Techno who had been explaining his work on sensory tracks for a Realie. “You were scarcely civil to that man.”

“I can’t help it,” Graham confessed. “It’s just that I’m not used to being around senile people.”

“Senile? He’s only fifty-six.”

“Nobody’s that old, except on top level. And he seemed so nervous.”

“Nervous? You’d be nervous, too—remember what he’s been through! He was gassed, dropped into the sea, and drowning when our boat picked him up two years ago. He really needed genuine therapy from Doc when he arrived here. But there’s certainly nothing seriously wrong with him now—you seem to have been impressed by what he told you about his work.”

“Of course, I was impressed,” Graham admitted. “The whole setup is impressive. Why, you’ve got a technical staff here that can turn out Realies to compete with anything they do in Hollywood! Just duplicating the necessary equipment must have been a major job—nobody’s allowed to even touch the machinery in the Domes except the Technos directly in charge. Why, I've been a Talent for years and half of the instruments here I was never permitted to see at Laguna."

"The people you call senile are the ones who built them for us," Clare said.

"But why? What's their purpose? Are you making Realies here?"

"Not yet," the girl answered. "When the time comes—"

"Can't you tell me what the plans are?"

Clare shook her head.

She shook it again when Graham, wandering through the underground labyrinth of air-conditioned passages, attempted to enter a doorway at the far end of a remote passage.

"We can't go in there," she explained. "Off limits."

"Off limits? But why?"

"Medical research. Their labs are separated." She smiled and took his hand. "Now, don't ask me what kind of research they're doing, because I'm not allowed to answer that, either. Doc will explain, soon."

Graham got the same evasive answer from Considine, during their next session together.

"That's not my department," he said. "Let Doc tell you. It all ties in with the plan."

"Plan!" Graham scowled. "That's all I hear about—this mysterious 'plan'. How can he expect to take over the Domes and upset the established order from down here? What's he doing, trying to invent some kind of death-ray, some secret weapon out of those old science fiction books? Maybe Doc needs a little therapy himself."

"Perhaps you do," Considine said, gently. "Why don't you go to Doc and ask him?"

In the end, that's just what Graham did.

He confronted the older man in his own office-apartments the following evening.

“Good to see you,” Doc said. “I was just about to suggest we get together for a talk. According to reports received today, the time for action has arrived. And our plans call for—”

“Your plans?” Graham grimaced. “I suppose I was right. You’ve come up with some kind of secret weapon, haven’t you? A secret weapon to destroy the system?”

“Indeed we have,” said Doc. “What is it, anti-gravity? A disintegrator? Are you going to blast the Domes? Remember, I’m a Talent. I know all about Mad Scientists. Oh, I think I’ve already guessed your precious plan. You intend to send Considine back to Laguna in my place, smuggle him into Hollywood from there, and let him blow the whole place to bits. He’ll have the secret weapon, won’t he?”

Doc nodded, smiling. “You’re partially right, of course,” he answered. “We do intend to send Considine back as your substitute, and we do expect him to get to Hollywood—I’m sure Sigmond would insist on a personal interview with a Talent before considering it safe to restore him to active duty. But there won’t be any melodramatic nonsense about blowing the place to bits.”

“I thought you admitted Considine will have the secret weapon?”

“And so he shall,” Doc said. “The only weapon that can possibly destroy the present order.”

“What kind of a weapon is that?”

“Haven’t you discovered that for yourself yet?” Doc smiled again. “The secret weapon is—Youth!”

CHAPTER 11

LET me put it this way,” Doc said. “When psychologists and social scientists attempted to analyze the sources of aggression, back in the old days, they missed the really important one. Probably because they were so closely involved in the pattern themselves that they were unable to realize just how all-encompassing it was. Whatever the reasons, they did miss. They failed to recognize that the basic struggle in old-fashioned society was not that of Capital versus Labor, or Male versus Female, or Civil Authority versus Military Authority, or even Science versus Religion.

“The big clash was simply Youth versus Age.

“It must have started about the same time as psychology-worship, over a hundred years ago. It was largely the work of the old radio-television-motion picture-advertising cliques. Slowly but surely, at first probably by accident and then more and more consciously and deliberately, they created a Youth Cult here in the old United States of America. They made a fetish of adolescence.

“You can see it in their ancient films, their ancient books, their ancient advertisements; the theme is implicit and unmistakable. Nothing worthwhile, according to this premise, ever happened to ‘old people’ or the ‘middle-aged’. All romance, adventure and achievement were the province and prerogative of youth alone. Back in the middle years of the Twentieth Century, everyone wanted, above all else, to ‘look young’. It was an age of crew-cut hair styles, of juvenile slang, of music written for and by adolescents and delivered by adolescents to celebrate adolescent supremacy. Business, industry and the armed forces all solicited youth, but offered little opportunity to any newcomer over the age of forty. It was literally a social crime to be ‘old’ unless one was in a position of wealth and power.

“The few attaining such status were resented by the young people beneath them—indeed, the whole competitive economy worked to increase the friction between youth and age. The elderly poor were resented as an economic burden; the elderly rich were an economic menace. In either case, old age was hated.

“After the War, and the Declaration of Dependence, the same condition prevailed in the new social order. A few powerful oldsters remained safe and secure on top, and the many indigents were doomed to exile and murder. The present disposition of the Socially Secured is merely a logical extension of the attitudes and modes of earlier times—when old people were sentenced to drag out their declining years on state charity or the grudging bounty of their offspring.”

Graham sighed. “I know it’s true,” he said. “But you’d think the Psychos would recognize it. Haven’t they tried to eliminate killing and hatred?”

“You know better than that,” Doc answered. “All they’ve really done is channelize aggressions which might otherwise be directed against their own authority. That’s why we have the Sadies—what are they but psychodrama units where people are permitted to torture and destroy dummies and vent their pent-up aggressions as catharsis? That’s the reason for the Playdiums. Look at your own field—the emotion-picture, and 4D auto-erotic sexaphones! Remember the manicycle duels; merely a natural sequential development of the old automotive days when motorists drove in savage and suppressed hatred of their fellows on the open roads. And what of the sexual outlets—the Fornivacations and the Libidose?

“Of course, even these developments haven’t really solved the situation. The Psychos still had to create the Womb and the Insanatorium to take care of nonconformists and avoid the danger of questioning or open revolt. They think they’re secure now, because they’ve drained off all the rebel elements in the population, but they’re wrong. Top ranks are really weak—it’s a case of too many Chiefs and not enough introverts. And that’s where our opportunity lies. All their control is centered in the channels of communication. If we can commandeer those channels—”

“No,” Doc murmured. “We’re done with deception. All that’s needed is tell the truth. We’ll wait until the next flight comes over; it’s due in just a couple of days now. This time we’ll do more than send out the boats for rescue. The vessels will be equipped for recording. We’ll be taking Realies of everything that happens—we’ll show the actual fate of the Socially Secured. What do you suppose will happen when we beam those Realies out from Hollywood to every screen in the country?"

"But how will you get to Hollywood, how will you gain access to the beaming centers?"

"That part is easy," Doc assured him. "Wait and see." He grinned. "A week from today, if all goes well, we'll be in Hollywood and we'll control the media."

"Just like that, eh?" Graham sighed. "And supposing I believe it's possible, supposing it actually happens—then what? Do you really imagine that just by exposing the murder of the Socially Secured you're going to win over a psychologically-conditioned population? It's too simple to be sound."

"Of course. But I told you we had another weapon. Youth—"

He paused and turned as Clare entered.

"The reports just came," she said. "The Jets are taking off now. They're due over us in three hours!"

"Now? But I was told the flight was scheduled for the end of the week."

"I know. Something must have happened to step up the program."

"Three hours!" Doc shook his head. "We have no time for adequate preparation. I'll have to call a general assembly at once."

"I've already put the message through. We'll meet below in ten minutes." Clare nodded.

"And your detail?"

"The crews will be on the boats, and the equipment mounted and in place."

"Good." Doc rose and beckoned to Graham. "You'll come with me," he said.

And so it was, in the meeting area beneath the Insanatorium, that Graham learned the first steps in what was to come. The entire personnel had assembled, and when he glanced at the earnest faces surrounding him he was conscious of suppressed excitement but no surprise, no consternation. This was expected; this was what everyone had been waiting for.

Doc's briefing was a mere verbal shorthand; they already knew what to do, for everything had been planned and rehearsed.

The boats were going out manned by full technical crews, to record the dumping of the Socially Secured. Every detail had been carefully anticipated, each man had been assigned his set task.

But that was only the first part of the program. After the recordings were made, when the jets prepared to wheel back for their return flight—

"No!" Graham gasped, from his place in the assemblage at Clare's side. "It'll never work! It isn't possible!"

"It must!" Clare whispered, furiously. "Don't you see that it's our one opportunity? That's why you and Considine went through all this. And he's not the only one. Each man selected has been individually briefed and trained. Within a few hours now, we'll be in command."

"I'll believe it when I see it," Graham murmured.

"All right, you can see it," the girl replied. "Come along with me on my boat, if you like."

And he did.

The warning signal sounded, and the meeting dispersed in confusion; an efficient, highly-organized confusion. For Clare hadn't lied—each man and woman had a place and a purpose. Fully a hundred of them manned the dozen tiny vessels that edged out from their mooring-places and into the dark waters of the Gulf. Their movements directed and coordinated by signals from a scanner-system mounted in the lead-ship, they crept away from the shore and fanned out in a broad and sweeping semi-circle some miles distant from the cluster of Keys.

The night was dark and moonless, and a chill breeze played across the foam-crested waves. Standing at Clare's side against the rail, Graham stared out at the roiling water. Sky and sea inundated him in immensity.

For the first time in years—perhaps for the first time in his entire life—he caught a glimpse of true perspective. Once there had been the glory that was Greece, and its galleys had roamed afar, only to vanish beneath the waves. The triremes of mighty Rome had foundered in darkling waters, and in the north the dragon-ships went down to doom. The might of nations—the fleets of France, the armadas of Spain, the galleons of Portugal and the lordly lines of the British man-of-war had vanished in their turn, and so had the proud battleships and the sleek atomic subs of a latter day. For they were only toys and their masters were but children, playing at war and government. They came and vanished, but the waves endured, and the eternal sea claimed them all. Kingdoms and nations drowned, were swallowed up in the sea of history where their passing caused scarcely a ripple.

Graham thought of all the fine words, the fanciful phrases, the facilely-formulated philosophy he had heard in recent weeks. He knew now that it was without meaning or significance. What was meaningful was the devouring sea, what was significant was the engulfing night around him. And as on the sea, so on the land. All through the ages, all over the surface of the earth, men fought their battles—for king and country, for government and religion—a thousand concepts of right and wrong and truth and justice and freedom. It mattered not to the earth who won or who lost, for in the end earth claimed them all. Victor and victim alike went down into dust in the end, and of their boasts and battle-cries, of their creeds and concepts, not an echo remained. And here on the sea, the waters whirled and waited to welcome them in the eternal embrace of oblivion.

There are times when such thoughts come to all men, and when they do there is only one source of surcease; to cling to the flesh as the sole symbol of salvation. And so it was that Graham turned to Clare, and she pressed against him, and in her response was the illusion of the reality he craved.

This is real, he told himself. Forget the philosophies and the psychology, forget all the ologies and isms. Measure life in its moments.

As he held her, savoring her surrender, the odd and alien thought obtruded. He remembered Sigmond's filmanalysis, and his subsequent experiences; he remembered Considine and the hypnotape and the long conversational sessions. Had it all been a form of autoanalysis, in a way? Had he actually learned something about himself, learned to.

establish a viewpoint and an identity distinct from that imposed by pressure and pattern? In the Domes, men didn't consider themselves the pawns of Nature; when they embraced women it was merely to seek sensation for its own sake. Perhaps it was important that all men be given, once again, an opportunity like this—to stand under a sullen sky and consider their own unimportance, to cleave unto the flesh of their own kind in a search for strength as well as for fleeting fulfilment.

If so, then what lay ahead was worth fighting for. Freud and Jung and Reik and Adler would never approve of such immature antism. But they and their followers were not gods—they were men. And the men who came after them had twisted their teachings and distorted their theories into a dogma of deceit. Conditioned civilization was a farce. It was better to be a berserker Viking facing death on a dark sea than an unthinking drone in a Dome whose ironic destiny would be death in the same dark sea—but not death by choice, merely death by decree.

And Clare, like all women in all times, in the arms of all men, opened her eyes and whispered, "What are you thinking about?"

"The future," Graham answered.

"The future?"

"Yes. For the first time, I'm beginning to feel that there is a future."

She opened her mouth to reply, but the answer came from overhead. In throbbing sussuration, the jets droned.

Clare sprang to her feet and hurried below. “The lights!” she cried. The crew members were already at work, and the beams swept across the waters. And now, as the droning from the skies deepened into thunder, the lights flashed forth from every vessel, flaming against the flaring facets of the waves.

Graham stood at the rail and Clare rejoined him there. Now it was merely a matter of waiting.

There was no recording installation or equipment on this little vessel, but Graham knew what must be taking place on some of the other craft. Techno teams were tracking the jets on their course, filming the flight in full sensory range. Lenses and prisms pierced the night, capturing each impression overhead. Now the jets were poised, now the hatches were opening above, and the bodies came hurtling down into doom and darkness.

This was the way; the way to oblivion. But there would be no oblivion, for the recordings registered each instant and incident.

Now some of the boats edged out of the perimeter and into the circle of luminance. Brass in the jets above would not be alarmed; it was the duty of these ships to search the waters for possible survivors. They could not know that the camera crews were filming a documentary of death.

At a command from Clare, their vessel turned and bobbed away from the circle. It was followed by a dozen others.

“But aren’t you going to look for survivors?” Graham asked.

She shook her head. “No time. Let the others do it. We’ll need every man when the jets come in. Doc must be signalling them now.”

“You mean, he wants them to land?”

“Of course. You heard the plan. They’re to pick up the returnees from the Insanatorium and take them back as cured, for reassignment to duty. And when they hear that you’re one of them—”

“Me?”

"Considine, of course. He goes back in your place, remember? And there'll be others. Enough to insure that the films and tracks are smuggled aboard the jets. Enough to infiltrate the Domes, make contact with our people who are already planted there, waiting to act. Next time we'll send more, and the time after that, still more. Six months from now, maybe less, everything will be ready. We can strike, then. But this is the first step—to get some of our people back, to get Considine into Hollywood. He knows who to contact when he gets there—"

Graham attempted to reply, but the vibration overhead was deafening. The jets had been signalled; they were wheeling in for a landing on the Key.

The vessel headed for its harbor.

As they disembarked, Graham started up the path along the side of the mooring-area, but Clare put her hand on his arm.

"Wait here," she said. "You mustn't be seen. Remember, they are coming to escort ex-patients back to their Domes. Some will go to Nework, some to Sanloo—but Considine goes straight to Hollywood. Until he's left, you've got to keep out of sight."

"But don't I even get a chance to say good-bye?" Graham hesitated. "I feel it's important. We've been so close to one another. In a way, it's like losing a part of myself—"

"I know. But it is more important that the plans go through. Now, wait here. I'll come back for you after it's safe."

Clare slipped away and Graham stood alone in the night. He edged into the shadow of the dockside sheds and lit a sig, trying to compose himself. Too much was happening, too quickly. The jets had come, and the plan was operating; he'd found Clare, and now he was going to lose Considine. He'd told the truth about his feelings; it was as though he were losing a part of himself, and a very vital part. Considine was his double, his—what was the word in the fantasy books?—his doppelganger. He had shared so much of his inner being with the other man that a psychic duality of identification had been established. And there was more to it than that; a stronger feeling, a latent content of emotion. More and more, in their weeks together, he had come to realize how closely Considine shared not only his knowledge but his thought-processes. So very frequently he'd found the other man literally anticipating his own words, his own reactions. Now, for some vague reason, he felt impelled to share his latest responses. He wanted to tell Considine about Clare, wanted to talk to him about the events to come. With a shock, he realized that he'd never gotten around to discussing Considine's past life, or his personal problems. And they had never discussed the problem of invading the Domes. There was danger for Considine in days to come, and yet the self-effacing man had never mentioned it. That was the thing which disturbed Graham the most, he realized; Considine had been so completely self-effacing. He had applied himself wholly to the problem of eliminating his own personality and adopting that of Graham. Why was he so dedicated? How could any man make such a sacrifice?

In his preoccupied introversion, Graham had never really given the matter a thought. Now he realized that he had undergone a unique experience with a remarkable man. He wanted to see him again, wanted to tell him so. And there was something else, something even more important, buried just below the threshold of consciousness. Another reason for saying good-bye—

But Clare was right. He must keep out of sight. Most particularly now, because the jets had landed, and the men were coming. Just a few of them, of course; not the entire crews of the six in the fleet—gazing up at the floodlighted area before the Insanatorium buildings he could see a group of about a dozen khaki-clad Brass moving along the walks. Something about the outthrust head of the man in the lead triggered a reaction of recognition, Krug was with them!

Yes, now he could see the profile under the lights. Krug was here, to escort Considine to Hollywood. And if he recognized the deception—

But he wouldn't. Considine had been briefed. He'd play his role perfectly. There was no danger. Or was there?

Graham grimaced. No danger? There were a thousand dangers How could one man, or any group of men, get away with a stunt like this? How could he face Krug, and Sigmond, and Warner, and Zank—people who knew Graham well, who were on the alert to observe the slightest defection from their rigid concept of the norm?

He found himself pacing along the walk after the group had disappeared into the building. He couldn't help it; he couldn't stand still. Oh, he'd kept out of sight. But he had to see, had to know what was happening inside. Doc's office—that's where they all must be. If there was no one in the outer corridors, perhaps he could slip into the adjoining room. Then he could at least hear what was going on. There was no harm in that; there'd be no danger involved.

Nor was there. The corridor was deserted, and he slipped past the closed door unnoticed, his muffled footsteps muted by the sound of voices from within. He gained access to the next room and switched on the light. Tiptoeing over to the connecting door, he stooped to listen.

They were all inside; he could hear them. Must be quite a crowd—a dozen Brass from the jets, plus an equal number of Doc's people. And he could hear Doc, and Krug, and Considine. Or was it himself? Again, a wave of sensation he could not identify swept over him as he heard Considine speaking, speaking levelly and easily, in his voice. The man was a master-mimic.

"—quite fit again," Considine was saying. "I'm sorry to have caused all this disturbance."

"—no need to feel that way." Graham recognized Krug's deeper tones. "Sigmond is most anxious to see you before deciding on a new assignment., Perhaps a change—"

"—learned a number of things. As a Talent—"

Graham pressed his ear against the door. Considine was speaking so softly, so casually, that it was hard to catch more than an occasional phrase. He closed his eyes, concentrating in an effort to hear the rest.

And that, of course, was his mistake. He realized it the moment the hand grasped his shoulder. He hadn't heard the outer door open, hadn't heard the big man cross the room towards him. Now he opened his eyes and stared upwards at the smiling stranger.

He knew that smile, knew that face. Long ago, on a roof in Hollywood, with Wanda, he'd been introduced to the big man. He was one of Sigmond's Medics. "West!" he said.

"That's right, Graham. How nice of you to remember."

"But—"

"Sigmond sent me down to escort you on your return trip. I imagined Krug had already located you. He's next door now, isn't he?"

"Yes—that is—"

"Shall we join him, then? I know he's impatient to see you." Graham nodded, stepping back. If he could jump this man, now, quickly—

West gestured politely with his left hand. And then Graham saw that his right hand held a stunner.

"We might as well use this entrance," West said, still smiling. "After you, Graham."

Graham found the activator-button on the side of the door. His thumb went forward to press it. Then he whirled, and brought up his hand. The thumb dug itself between West's eyes. His other hand went for the windpipe. West reeled back, bringing up the stunner to sweep in a blind arc. Graham's knee lashed out and caught West on the wrist. The stunner clattered to the floor as West fell back against a desk. Then Graham was on top of him, both thumbs gouging into the big man's neck. West threshed and threw him off. Graham stepped back to scoop up the stunner. And then —

The door to the next room opened, and he heard Krug's voice from behind him.

"What's going on here?"

He had the stunner now, but his face was in the light.

“Graham!” Krug was shouting. “What kind of bombed nonsense is this? Two of you—”

Graham turned, raising his weapon. And then something exploded between his fingers. Krug wasn’t using a stunner. He had an old-fashioned gun.

“Look out!”

It was Doc’s voice, and barely discernible in the sudden roar of voices. Graham went back against the wall as somebody shoved Krug from behind. The second shot went wild, but then the gun levelled again. This time he wouldn’t miss. The others stood in the doorway, watching.

“Krug, wait—” Doc was shouting now, but Krug shook his head. He wasn’t waiting. Graham saw the pudgy finger tense against the trigger. And then, emerging from the huddled mass in the doorway, the moving figure of a man. It was Considine.

He flung himself on Krug, grabbing the hand that held the gun, jerking it to one side. Krug turned, and as he did so, Graham bent forward and picked up the stunner again. He levelled it at the thick neck and squeezed with all his strength.

Just as he did so, the gun went off for the last time. Krug jerked and buckled in sudden paralysis—but it was Considine who fell first, with a gaping hole where his heart had been.

Then, for a moment, all dissolved into madness. Graham could hear Doc shouting once more, shouting orders. He was vaguely conscious that all of Doc’s people were armed with stunners, partially aware that Krug’s companions had come here unsuspecting and weaponless. The Brass were falling now, there wasn’t even a struggle; the stunners struck them down like idiotic tenpins. Their bodies slumped along the floor in this office and the one beyond. When it was over, Doc’s group stood above them, poised and ready for command.

But no command came. For Doc was staring at Considine, just as Graham stared. There were sudden, unbidden tears in the eyes of both men.

"He saved my life," Graham whispered.

"I know," Doc nodded. "But that doesn't help us now. He's dead. Lewis is dead."

"Lewis?"

"You never realized, did you?" Doc sighed and turned away.

"Yes, it's true. He was your father."

CHAPTER 12

IT FELL into place, then; everything made sense. The curious look Clare had given him at their first meeting—the way Doc had singled him out for special treatment—Considine's odd gentleness and still odder reticence concerning himself—the way in which Considine had so frequently seemed to know what he was thinking, to know what he knew.

Yes, everything made sense, now, including the uncanny natural resemblance which had been heightened by make-up. And yet nothing made sense. Because Graham's father, Lewis, was still a man of fifty-five and Graham was thirty years younger. Cosmetology alone couldn't account for his youthfulness.

"Youth." It was Doc who explained. "I told you it was our secret weapon. And in one of the laboratories—"

In one of the laboratories, certain renegade Medics had been working with regenerative hormones. Basically, it was a matter of estrogen-cycle control through an injection process. "No, it's not eternal youth," Doc said. "But we have learned a simple, universally-applicable method of retarding the aging process. Of course, in this experimental phase, it's impossible to predict the duration of the effect, but I'm assured that a regular annual or semi-annual injection will not only slow down senile degeneration but bring physical tonus back to the thirty-year level for an indefinite period. There seems to be no reason why the so-called prime of life can't be extended until men are well into their seventies or eighties. The manufacture of synthetic hormone-derivatives is inexpensive; the effects thus far leave no cause for doubt. We've learned how to eliminate the physical symptoms of what we call old age."

"So that's your weapon," Graham mused. "When you took over communication-media in the Domes, you'd do more than just expose what happened to the Socially Secured. You'd reveal the news of this discovery just as you've been telling me. You'd be able to promise everyone a prolongation of youth, of active life."

"Don't you see how they'd respond?" Clare asked him. "Once the facts came out, the Psychos couldn't withstand the pressure. And they'd open the Domes. Oh, Doc planned it all so carefully, and when you arrived it was the final touch. We'd already rescued Lewis, but never dreamed of an opportunity like this—to find his son, and plan a perfect masquerade. That gave us the ideal combination; the weapon, and the man to wield it. We had everything."

"Had!" Doc shook his head. "But he's dead now."

"I'm alive."

They stared at Graham, then, but he didn't wait for them to speak.

"Why not? There was no need to send my father, there never was any need. If only you'd told me first—"

"But you couldn't take his place!"

"Of course, I can."

"Our plans—" Doc sighed. "It took months to formulate this operation, months of planning, of dealing with every possible contingency which might arise. He was to go back, resume his work, make contact with others of our group all over the Dome system, arrange slowly for concerted action. We wouldn't strike for at least another year yet, we couldn't hope to. And now—"

"And now your plans must be changed," Graham murmured. "Because my father is dead, and you have less than an hour. You must let me go."

"An hour?" Clare glanced at him, then straightened. "That's right!" She put her hand on Doc's wrist. "Krug, and West, and the others here—in an hour they'll recover consciousness. What happens then?"

"We'll dump them in the Gulf," Doc told her.

"Yes. But what about the crews on the jets?" Graham asked. "They'll be expecting Krug and his men to return, and bring a party of ex-inmates with them. How long before they come down to investigate? How long before somebody sends in a report to Control down in the Miami Consumarket or back in Hollywood?

I'd say we have just about an hour in which to do it."

"Do what?" Doc muttered.

Graham told him.

It took ten minutes—ten precious minutes. But then the matter was settled, and things moved swiftly. The boats moved swiftly out into the Gulf, and the bodies of Krug and the other Brass whirled whitely in the waves and then disappeared forever. Whirled whitely, because they had been stripped naked. Others were wearing their Khaki uniforms as they marched back to the landing area and boarded the jets. With them went a hundred Insanatorium inmates—ostensibly, they were being escorted to board for the return trip to various Domes. Actually, they and their khaki-clad escorts alike carried stunners. Stunners to beam the sentries on duty before the ships! Stunners to silence the men who received them on board, as the party split up into six units working with swift efficiency. There were minor slipups and several skirmishes, but no major disasters. The ultimate objective was to work their way through the jets compartment by compartment, until reaching the pilot cabins—and the imperative need was to overcome pilot and communications crews before any alarm could be sent.

"We did it!" Clare exulted. "We've got the jets."

"And their crews?" Doc raised his eyebrows questioningly.

"The boats are going out again, all of them," Clare said, her voice dropping. "It's the only way."

“Now for the next step,” Graham said. “You say that you have men here with experience at piloting and handling the com-units. That means we’ll have no trouble making the flight. And there’ll be enough uniforms taken from the crews to go around. That means we’ll be able to get into the Dome at Hollywood. And after that—”

“Yes, after that, then what?” Doc frowned. “It’s a crazy gamble, but I’m willing to concede we might make it that far. If we keep sending signals in to the effect that everything is all right, they may not suspect until we arrive. But where do we go from there?”

“Straight to His MGMinence,” Graham answered. “They won’t expect trouble when we land, so they won’t be prepared to offer any resistance. We can break through without fighting. What happens then depends on just how much we can do during a three-hour flight, You’ve already told me you have people inside the Domes in key positions—I assume you mean men indoctrinated down here who have returned to various Techno jobs in media channels.”

“That’s correct.”

“Well, they’ll have to be contacted at once, as many as possible, while we’re in flight. Meanwhile, there’s the matter of processing those Realies.”

“Masters will be done in another two hours,” Clare informed him. “They’re working in the labs downstairs. At least we’ll have olfac, video and audio.”

“That’s enough. If we can put through a Universal Attention Beam from Hollywood, we can preempt all networks. First the films and then Doc’s speech.”

“But by that time the Brass will be alerted,” Doc told him. “Even if we get that far, even if we live long enough to beam our message, it won’t help. Brass controls all weapons—do you expect the mobs to fight them with their bare hands? Besides, they aren’t conditioned to fight. The bombed fools do what they’re told, and all their lives they have learned to obey Brass and Psycho orders. You can’t turn the Domes into revolutionary centers with an emotion-picture and a few words. Even if they believe it, they won't be able to fight."

"I know," Graham said. "But I wasn't counting on a fight. If His MGMinence issues orders to surrender—"

Doc exploded. "Bomb it, this isn't a pornographic fantasy! You can't hope to play the superman hero, walk into the Home Dome and force the evil mastermind to call for surrender on pain of death. I happen to know Archer. His MGMinence isn't a coward—he'll die rather than give in. Sigmond's loyal, and so is Hix. The most you can hope to gain from all this is panic and civil war for a few hours.

Then the Brass will cut down any rebels—not that it will matter to us. Because by then we'll be finished, too."

"There's a chance," Graham said.

Doc opened his mouth to reply, but it was Clare who interrupted him. "Yes, there's a chance," she echoed. "And we'd better take advantage of it." The girl rose and faced the older man. "We must take advantage of it because it is a chance and we no longer have a choice. The jets are already captured. The crews are dead, you can't bring them back again. What's your alternative to doing as Graham suggests? Do you intend to sit here until they get suspicious back in Hollywood and send down another flight of Brass police ships?"

"But we can't possibly win this way. His MGMinence won't surrender, the mobs won't be able to resist the Brass. I don't understand why Graham persists in blinding himself to the obvious facts. How can he say there's a chance, under the circumstances?" Doc sighed. "I'm not cracking. It's just that I can't see any sense to dying needlessly for a lost cause."

"Can anyone?" Graham asked.

"What's that?"

"Can anyone see any sense to dying needlessly? Oh, I'm not talking about men like His MGMinence, or Sigmond—men who feel dedicated by virtue of their power and position. I'm talking about the rank and file of the Brass, the Technos, the Medics, the Egghead's. Suppose it isn't a matter of their fighting a few rebels roused by our message. Suppose it's a matter of surrender or die?"

"But how could it be?"

"You say you have people planted through previous infiltration, in various Domes. How many?"

"A thousand, perhaps."

"Is that all?"

"They have friends, families. Some of them have made cautious attempts to proselyte. There are allies."

"How many that we can count upon in a situation like this?"

"Four, perhaps five thousand, at most.

"In all the Domes?"

"No. They're concentrated in the major areas, like Nework, Denver, Sanfran."

"That should serve our purpose. If the big centers go, the little ones will have to follow suit. They depend on the others for supplies and material as well as orders."

"I still don't see—"

"Are most of your people Technos?"

"The majority, yes. But not top-ranking. Minor officials, in some cases, and crew workers."

"Free to move about?"

"More or less."

"And you have people planted in corn-centers at media, to take messages? And they can relay orders to these Technos?"

"Yes. The point is, there's no organization, no instructions.

We've never issued a plan. I presume we could get a certain number of messages through safely to various Domes and our people there could relay to the Tech nos. But, if we are able to arrange it, what are you going to tell them? How can a handful operate effectively against Brass?"

"I'll tell you when we're in flight," Graham answered. "No time now. We've got a date with His MGMinence at Twenty-First-Century-Vox."

CHAPTER 13

A MAN named Hoskins was speaking to Sigmond over the corn-system. "Krug reporting," he said, in a surprisingly successful simulation of Krug's deep voice. "Yes . . . all checked and cleared . . . eighty-two rehabilitees returned to seventeen Domes . . . I'm turning in the reports for processing . . . no . . . oh, by the way, I have your Talent with me . . . yes, Graham . . . thought you might want to check him personally before reassignment . . . what? . . . good . . . I'll bring him down . . ."

The circuit broke and Hoskins turned to Graham.

"I'm supposed to bring you in right away," he said. "As soon as we land."

"We can spare you and another man as escorts," Doc told him. "No more. We'll need everyone available just to take over Jetport. And if word gets through to Sigmond and the others before you arrive—"

He didn't complete his sentence. There was no need to say anything more.

Even as he had outlined the sketchy plan of attack and operations, Graham had realized the hopelessness of the task set for them.

Landing was no problem. The familiar ships would be admitted to the Domes without question; it was improbable that anyone in the signal-towers would question the identity of the pilots and navigators whose voices were transmitted in flat, mechanical tones.

But once on the ground at the port, everything depended on luck.

Their people had already donned the uniforms of the dead crew-members; the service blue of the Technobility, the khaki uniforms of the Brass. Almost all of them were armed with stunners and a few had the old-fashioned guns as well. But it would be best not to use them. The trick would be to get clear of the field itself and converge on the Control Area.

It would be nothing short of miraculous if they could capture the Port before someone noticed and put through an alert. But it must be done. From Control they could signal to the Media installations—and pray that their people were ready to act there. Then the selected party must convey the films by jet-cop and get them beamed. By that time, probably, Media units would be besieged, for the alarm would be out.

"And that's why it's up to the other group," Graham had told them. "You know where to go and what to do. Fortunately, your objective is right at the edge of the Jetport area. But there's no question of gaining entry by deception here. You'll have to fight your way. You know the rest."

He paused. "As for myself, I'll get to Sigmond and His MGMinence. Maybe they'll finish me off—but I think they'll listen, first. And if they listen, and the 'casts are beamed, we have a chance. If the rest of you succeed by then."

Doc nodded. "We'll manage," he said. "We have no choice."

Clare turned to Graham, opened her mouth, then closed it. He squeezed her arm gratefully.

"Thanks," he said. "You spared me the 'Take me with you line'. You and the other women will stay here, on the ship. We'll keep the crew aboard here, too. If anything goes wrong, they have orders to take off immediately. Who knows? Some day you may be back."

"With nine women and a crew?" Clare tried to smile.

"We'll do our best to prevent the necessity," Graham answered.

And that was as close to heroics as he ever got.

It was odd, he mused, as the great ship quivered and settled, sinking down slowly and accurately through the opening in the plexide Dome. This was the time for heroism, for all the adjectives-and-adrenalin which accompanied deeds of daring—or was it derring-do?—in the old pornography. But he wasn't sure of the adjectives, and he certainly wasn't aided by any excessive adrenal discharge. All he felt was nervous tension and, beneath it, a sick fear.

Graham had a suspicion that almost all of them felt like this, now. Even Doc, who was quietly motioning towards the opening cabin-compartments, telling Hoskins and his companion, "You get out first, with Graham. Whatever happens, I want you to be on your way. Nobody will question Brass if you requisition a 'copter. We'll wait until you've left."

Doc smiled, but he was nervous, and his outstretched hand was wet.

And Clare's lips, trembling beneath his—which were also trembling.

Heroism, Graham thought. Where are all the noble sentiments now? I don't really want to do this. I want to run. Most of all, I have to go to the bathroom.

It was ridiculous, grotesque; yet, somehow, it reaffirmed reality. From now on all of them would act in fear and trembling, but that didn't matter. The important thing was that they did act. One step at a time, now . . .

And one step at a time, Graham was walking across the huge field. Hoskins and the other man, Rich, flanked him on either side. Brass, on official business, escorting a civilian. Nobody glanced at them. Ground-crews were slowly converging on the constellation of six jets. Graham prayed that they'd take their time. For when they finally reached those jets, entered them, there would be no turning back. Not for them, ever—and not for Graham's people.

"Over here." Hoskins had found his 'copter and his crew. Now he had stepped forward, flashing the idento of the dead Krug. He was speaking casually to a pilot. The pilot nodded. Good. They'd managed, this far.

Rich helped him into his seat. They were taking off, leaving the port. Out of the corner of his eye, Graham noted that some of the ground crewmen were moving up the landing-ramps into the jets.

There were stunners waiting for them, even though the hands which directed them probably trembled in nervous apprehension. Just as Graham was trembling, now.

He forced himself to look ahead, at the hills of Hollywood. Here was the Intelligentsium's silver spire and the familiar T-square of Technoquarters, and there—near the historic site of the first Psycho Headquarters, Forest Laundry—was Microcity.

That's the spot where they'd be 'casting the films. If they managed to get there. Staring at the monumental magnificence of the structures below, Graham felt an added access of anxiety. How could a few ever prevail against so many? The Psycho fortresses seemed impregnable.

The 'copter was descending now, descending upon the flat landing-platform of the new Psychocenter. It settled. The doors opened.

"Wait here," Hoskins snapped to the pilot. "We'll be back in a moment with another passenger."

I doubt that, Graham told himself. But this was no time for doubts. He had all he could do to walk without faltering. Hoskins slipped him a stunner.

Then the white-robed man emerged from the exit-vator. Graham remembered another white-robed man on this same roof; a man named West. He used the stunner almost automatically, and the man fell mechanically. The whole episode seemed unreal, and that removed the fear. Graham was just watching a Realie now, or a filmanalysis in which he was both actor and spectator.

That made it easier. Made it easier to descend with Hoskins and Rich, seek out Sigmond's office, wait until his sec nodded for them to enter.

Sigmond was in a posture chair behind his desk, the light reflecting from his high forehead. His pale face was almost as white as His priestly Psycho robe. He glanced at Graham incuriously, but there was questioning in the gaze he directed at Hoskins and Rich.

"Where is Krug?" he asked.

Rich stepped closer to the desk and smiled. “Where you’ll be,” he murmured, “if you don’t come quietly.”

Sigmond’s eyes focussed on the gun which had suddenly appeared in Rich’s hand, and there was no longer a question in his glance.

“Get up,” Rich said. “Just keep your hands where I can see them.”

Sigmond rose heavily. The light caught the jewelled rims of his pince-nez.

“Your doing,” he muttered, staring at Graham. “I might have known. Paranoid. Go ahead and shoot.”

“Never mind the labels.” Graham was exteriorized; he heard himself talking, but there was no feeling of conscious volition. “If you think we’re here to kill you, then you’re the one with delusions of persecution. We’re taking you to see Archer.”

“His MGMinence? But he’s in Council, there’s a high-level meeting—”

“So much the better. All we want is the pleasure of your company, to insure us getting in to see him.”

“But what’s this all about?”

“You’ll hear the story when we get there. Now, march.” Graham nodded, and Rich stepped behind Sigmond, pressing the gun into the bulk of his back.

“Put it away, now,” Graham told Rich. “But keep him covered.” He turned to Sigmond. “Just wanted you to know it’s there. And it’ll be there, all the way. You’re going to walk out of this office, tell your sec you have an appointment with Archer, and take a ’copter with us. That’s all. One slip on your part—” He hesitated. “Oh, yes, you might remember to smile. If it helps, don’t think of it as a gun pointing at your back. Call it a phallic symbol.”

They went out of the office, went back up to the roof, climbed back into the ’copter, and took off.

“Take us to Twentieth-Century-Vox,” Hoskins said.

And they made it, just like that.

Graham wondered if the others had made it.

Had they managed to take care of the ground crews at the Jet-port? Had they managed to get into the Controls and take over communications without alarms being sent out? Had the second group been able to reach Microcity, invade its precincts, beam the films?

And most important of all, had the third group attained its objective? That was the vital question.

Heroes. There were no heroes in a situation like this. There were only men with sweating palms, full bladders, queasy stomachs. And there were no great objectives; it was all a matter of living from moment to moment—of taking one step at a time without being observed, of using a stunner quickly, before one was used on you, of trying to anticipate what to do next and trying to remember what had to be done next. Only in the aggregate was the task impressive; infiltrating the communications media and beaming the film to every screen, sounding a preempt alert so that all would listen and all would see, holding off any opposition until the film was run and the message delivered. Each man was part of a hastily-organized team and each man's job was small. But the result could be incalculable.

If it worked—

Graham stopped thinking about the big picture. He was back in the little picture, or at least back watching it. The little picture, in which he was entering the halls of Twenty-First-Century-Vox, watching Sigmond at the outer officentry as he smiled and requested immediate audience with His MGMinence.

And now they were being buzzed into the Conference Suite; Sigmond in the lead, Rich and Hoskins right behind him, Graham himself in the rear.

It wasn't a picture any longer.

This was real.

In a moment he'd be face to face with Archer, His MGMinence—

And then he was.

Face to face with saturnine, graying Archer; with Technochief Schwartz, with Medic Ormsbee, with Hix from Brass and with little Dean from the Egghead Division. Everyone of them a hateful symbol.

They were all in a line, confronting him quite silently. This was the moment he'd waited for, the moment to speak.

But Archer spoke first.

"We've been expecting you," said His MGMinence, softly. "You see, we've just watched your little film."

Graham found himself trembling now, but not with fear. There was only exultation. They'd made it, then—they'd, made it, and the film had been cast. Now he had only to tell them the rest, deliver his ultimatum—why, it was all as simple as those Space Operas he'd turned out. Bern meets Fern.

Or was it?

Suddenly he heard the warning wail without, the shrilling of the sirens. That meant general alert. Instinctively, he reached into his jacket for the stunner. He felt reassured as he grasped the handle.

Archer was watching him, but he didn't move. He merely blinked his eyes, once.

And from somewhere behind him, the other stunners flashed. He saw Rich stumble, saw Hoskins fall, and then he was going down into a whirlpool where the sirens shrieked up into screaming silence.

CHAPTER 14

HIS MGMinence nodded at the Brass in the doorway. "Out," he said.

"Aren't you going to finish them off?" Hix asked.

"There'll be plenty of time for that, later," Archer answered. "We'll want to question them first, of course."

"Of course," Hix agreed, hastily. "Right now—"

“Right now your job is to get on top of this. You heard the reports. Apparently there are three areas affected—Jetport, Microcity and—”

“What about the mobs?” It was Schwartz who interrupted. His MGMinence frowned. He wasn’t used to interruptions. Still, this was an emergency. No point in making an issue of it if Schwartz lost his head. The important thing was to keep his own.

“Brass will deal with any trouble that may arise,” he said. “Personally, I don’t anticipate anything except sporadic outbreaks.”

“But everyone saw it—the Socially Secured—those bombed bodies dropping into the water—the traumatic effect—”

“Traumatic effect!” Archer’s voice was scornful. “Leave that to Sigmond. It’s his department.” He stepped forward and confronted the Psycho Chief. “Are you all right?”

“Certainly. But what’s happening?”

“Don’t you know?” Medic Ormsbee took up the thread of the conversation. Quickly, he told Sigmond about the film. Sigmond nodded.

“So they must have taken over Microcity to beam it, eh? I wonder how many of them are involved in this?”

“It doesn’t matter,” muttered little Dean. “The damage is done. That cast went out on preempt. Now everyone knows about the Socially Secured. Everyone knows about the new regenerative formula.”

“Nonsense! There’s no such formula!” Archer was emphatic, then tempered his tones. “But even if there is, it’s not important. What’s important is that we get back into Microcity and beam a few orders on preempt. Tell everyone that we’ve dealt with the trouble-makers. I’ll make a personal appearance—”

“It’s too late.” Dean faced them. “You’ve already heard the orders, on the film-narration. There’s been a call for revolt.”

“Call for revolt!” Hix chuckled. “What do you think, that the mobs will take over with their bare hands? We have all the weapons.”

“But these rebels may be armed.”

“With what? A few handguns and stunners, perhaps? If so, I wish them luck—chances are, they’re running like rats now, trying to get out of Microcity.” Hix glanced at the dark and crackling wallscreen. “I notice nobody is casting any longer.”

“Then what are we waiting for?” Archer stepped forward once again. “Mo time for discussion now, gentlemen. You each know your duties. Let’s roll it.”

“Look!”

Sigmond was staring at the screen. The wall had brightened and now the crackling faded. Suddenly a face appeared before them.

“I know that man—” Sigmond began. And then his voice was drowned in the words from the wall.

“Attention, all Brass,” Doc said. “Attention, all Brass. This is top warning. Repeat, top warning. We have taken over the oxygenerator units. Repeat, we have taken over the oxygenerator units.”

“Mo,” said Hix, softly.

“Mo further supply of oxygen will be released until we receive word of unconditional surrender. Civilian personnel are warned to get off the streets. Within fifteen minutes normal oxygen supply will be depleted below the safety levels. Repeat, top warning. All Brass to surrender immediately—”

“I told you it was too late,” Dean muttered.

Hix slipped out of the room.

“Bomb it, we’ll open the Dome,” Archer said. “Plenty of air outside—”

“You had your chance,” Dean answered. “Besides, you’ve forgotten. Your vents are at Jetport and the rebels hold it.”

“Hix is sending Brass—”

“To suffocate out there?

They’ll be running for shelter right now.”

But Archer wasn’t listening to Dean. He gazed over the top of his balding head as Hix reentered hastily.

"It's true!" Hix said. "They did it. And the corns are jammed—reports from other Domes. Riot conditions in Miami, Nework, Sanfran, Denver—oxygenerators going off in Sanloo, Pitts. Sabotage jobs. Can't contact GHQ. The men turned back from Microcity when this came over. I've got a cordon around the grounds here, but they won't hold. There's a mob outside—"

"They'll suffocate," Ormsbee said. "Give them two hours."

"Of course. But what about ourselves?"

"We'll stay right here," Archer decided. "No danger of suffocation inside for at least twenty-four hours."

"We haven't got twenty-four hours," Schwartz said. "Or even two. That mob's coming in, isn't it, Hix?"

"He's right," Hix answered "Our only chance is to jet out immediately."

"Run for it?" His MGMinence scowled. "Why, you poor, bombed—"

"Shut up!" said Sigmond. "We'd better find a 'copter."

And with that simple sentence. His MGMinence was deposed. His thin, sagging figure was swept up in the flight along the outer corridor as the little wedge of Council-members, Hix in the lead, battled their way to an exit-vator and the rooftop beyond.

Hix had taken the gun from Rich's jacket, and it was Dean who appropriated Graham's stunner. They left the unconscious men behind without a thought—unless a fleeting feeling of gratitude for their weapons. For the weapons alone prevailed in the panic which swept through the halls of Twenty-First-Century-Vox.

If there was anything more needed to indicate the end of an era, the spectacle of the surging throngs in these halls provided it. Brass, Technobility, Medics and Psychos struggled towards the roof. Frantic desperation took precedence over rank, and three times Hix had to use the gun before a path opened.

Finally they reached the roof. Sigmond found three' copters there—all surrounded by knots of struggling men, intent upon escape.

Hix used the gun again, and again. He wasn't in time to save Schwartz or Ormsbee; both were pulled down in the melee. In the end only Dean, Sigmond, Hix and Archer took to the air, with Hix at the controls.

He tossed his empty, useless gun down into the screaming maw of the city below. Out of that maw the siren still wailed, but overriding it was the concerted roar of voices. The mob was abroad.

The mob was swarming into the Intelligentsium, circling around Technoquarters. No Brass opposed its progress. Brass was hiding, Brass was running.

"Bombed idiots had better run, too!" Sigmond sighed. "The Dome is smogging up already. What will happen to them when the monoxide count goes up?"

"What happens to us?" Archer murmured. "Where can we go? We can't get out of the Dome."

"Let's be reasonable," Sigmond counseled. "This is no time to panic. What we need is a place of shelter. Not a private residence—the oxygen supply would be insufficient there. We want a large building, but a deserted one, for safety's sake. A place where we can have a breathing-spell, in every sense of the word. And that place is—"

"Down there!" Surprisingly enough, it was little Dean who spoke.

"Where?"

"To your left. That Sadie."

"A Sadie?"

"Why not? There's a landing-place on the roof."

"He's right. You won't find many people patronizing a Sadie at a time like this," Archer said. "Besides, they're all equipped with corn-systems. We can put some messages through to Domes in other areas. Set us down."

So they were set down, on the roof of the Sadie.

As Archer had predicted, it was deserted. The attendant personnel had fled at the first warning. In the huge central arena a few dozen citizens, drugged with Libidose to a point where the warnings had been either unheard or unheeded, still enjoyed a healthful, therapeutic release from pent-up aggression. Some coupled in semi-seclusion in the small, padded cubicles lining the main hall, and others hacked and flailed at rows of dummies. A small cluster of teen-agers had mounted the gallows to hang a rubbery yet realistic blonde. Down at one end of the arena was the enclosed area of the torture-chambers. Realistic screams emanated from the speaker-system; apparently someone was playing with the racks or the strappado. There were no attendants present to peddle whips or knives, but the customers seemed to have helped themselves.

Ordinarily, Sigmond might have viewed the scene through the glass of the overhead office with a clinical and approving eye. Right now, he and the others were inspecting the comboard.

“Yes, there’s a two-way,” he announced. “Hix, can you send?”

Brass nodded. “Yes, I can operate it.” He seated himself, and Archer and Sigmond peered over his shoulder.

“You can beam into Microcity to announce surrender,” Dean said.

“Surrender?” Hix jerked his head. “Who’s talking about surrender? We’ll beam out for help to other Domes. Get in a fleet of jets. Let those fools asphyxiate the city if they like. Brass will come in with masks and oxygen tanks. We’ll blow Microcity, blast the port.”

“Exactly.” Archer was regaining confidence now. “It may be a good thing. Teach them a lesson, once and for all.”

“That’s right,” Sigmond assented. “Of course, you know this means we can’t go back to a benevolent paternalism in the near future. We’ll have to do a complete psychological about-face, institute complete controls. No more reassurances. The fear-syndrome—”

“I take it then that you’re all in complete agreement, gentlemen,” Dean murmured. “There is to be no thought of surrender?”

“Of course not,” Archer snapped.

"Very well," said Dean.

And pulled out the stunner he had taken from Graham.

He waved it before their faces like a magic wand.

They froze and fell.

That part was easy.

The rest wasn't quite so easy.

Dean was a small man, and the task of dragging the bodies down into the arena, one by one, took most of his strength.

But he managed. He propped them up against the wall, near the cluster of dummy figures who stood in classic costumes of inferiority. Here was the plasticene-faced priest, the ugly man in the old-fashioned gray flannel suit, the obvious political orator with the word Democrat written across his slashed shirt-front and one empty eye-socket gaping as the result of a recent, enthusiastic attack.

Dean was glad to see that a knife-rack stood close by at the end of the wall. He moved the unconscious trio into place; they stood stiffly, limbs rigid in paralysis.

He wondered if they could still see and hear.

Dean could see and hear. And when he retreated once again to the glassed-in overhead office to put through his communication of surrender, he looked and listened.

Gazing down at the floor, Dean noticed a small cluster of patrons assembling. They examined the figures of Archer, Hix and Sigmond with curiousity, commenting amongst themselves.

"Look, Brass!"

"And a Psycho, too. Something new."

"Vo doop, Skidaloop." This comment from the drooling mouth of a woman who had exceeded her Libidosage. "Let's begin. Tear some skin. Come on guys let's get at him."

A big man came up with a handful of knives.

"I hate Brass," he said bitterly. "Big Brass!" He shoved the tip of his knife into the khaki tunic. "Cut his buttons off," he mumbled. "Cut—off—all—his—buttons—just—like—this. And—that's—not—all—"

The knife descended.

"Cri!" yelled a thin man, shrilly. "Somethun' new. Like blood!"

"Ooooh!" This from the woman. "Lemme. Jue'me!" She grabbed a knife, slashing at Sigmond. The Psycho's robe wasn't white any more.

Dean turned away, suddenly sickened but not before he saw the broad blade slice across the jugular of Archer.

Then he was speaking into the com.

"Yes," he said. "It's official. His MGMinence has unconditionally surrendered—"

CHAPTER 15

IT'S NEVER quite that simple," Doc said. "You understand that, don't you, Graham?

"Of course, we won. We found you and Rich and Hoskins in time, and you know what Dean reported concerning Archer and the rest. We're in control, and the oxygenerators are functioning again, and on the face of it we could claim complete victory."

"The Domes are reporting in from all over," Clare added. "We've been feeding them Realies on what happened here."

"But we paid a price for it," Doc continued. "Thousands dead of suffocation in the streets. A third of Nework blasted. Casualties galore all over. And that's only the beginning. The real job is just ahead of us. First, a provisional government. And then, a complete reorientation process. Reeducation, reconditioning—it will take years. You can't expect to take an ordinary citizen, used to beheading dummies in the Sadies and watching men kill one another in the Playdiums, and confer a nebulous 'freedom' on him.

"For that reason we can't disband the existing governmental fabric. We'll have to keep Psychos and Technos and Brass as organizational units, even if we use new personnel to implement new directives. Egghead supervision is even more important. Because in the end, it will all come down to an educational process.

"We're not prepared for a tenth of what we must confront and cope with. We need many months just to mount some kind of over-all plan."

Doc sighed and subsided. "I wish we'd had more time to prepare. This is just the first step."

"I've been thinking about that," Graham admitted. "A first step—and suppose it's in the wrong direction?"

"It could be. Men aren't perfect. Maybe the whole concept of freedom is a dream. But we have a right to dream, a right to try to make those dreams come true in a free society.

"The old-fashioned family unit, the old-fashioned religious ethos act as custodians of those dreams. And the attendant striving, the struggle and the competition; these phenomena are in themselves part of the process of evolution. You can't deny the race the right to progress, however arrived at—it's a biological necessity for survival. Your so-called 'balance' is really stasis. There are going to be mistakes, yes, and misery, too, for many. But the future cannot be denied."

Clare looked at Graham and smiled.

And far overhead . . .

Far overhead, the swallow hovered. It swooped down, then instinctively deflected its flight, but only momentarily. An instant later it sped forward again, dropping downward. There was no longer anything to deflect its course.

Those tiny figures below were only men. And they were dismantling the Dome . . .

THE END

Sabbatical

This was cornball, strictly from Squaresville—the Mad Scientist bit—but dig this cat's pajamas!

(Excerpt from Yardley University Daily Bulletin, April 1, 1925) Professor Herbert Claymore, head of the Physics Department, announced today that he is leaving on a brief sabbatical. During his absence, Professor Claymore's classes will be conducted by Dr. Potter.

IT was quarter past eight Martinis in the little bar across the street and just down the block from Television City. This was subjective time, of course, but then Don Freeman always ran on subjective time, and didn't everybody, when you came right down to it?

Right down to eight Martinis, that is?

Don didn't know, but he was willing to argue the point with all comers.

And the big trouble right now was that there weren't any comers. Apparently Rosalie wasn't going to show up after all, and nobody else in this neon-lighted nothing was worth talking to. In just a little while, Don realized, it was going to get very drunk in here. And he'd wind up talking to the bartender again.

That was bad. But going home would be still worse. Besides, you can't go home again. Thomas Wolfe had said that, and it was a pretty perceptive remark, coming from a guy who hadn't even been married.

Don drained his drink and extended the empty glass. “Alms, for the love of Allah,” he said.

The bartender did his duty.

Somebody nudged Don’s shoulder and stepped on his foot, hard.

“Be my guest,” Don muttered, but moved down to the end of the bar. It was crowded in here—you couldn’t hear yourself drink. Of course, that was the one great advantage, wasn’t it? You also couldn’t hear yourself think. And if you pressed your luck (and your drinks), after a time you couldn’t feel yourself think, either—to think about Rosalie and the house and the job without feeling any pain or any remorse. Or not to think about them at all.

And the time was now, or at least only a Martini or two away. Soon he’d be able to forget that Rosalie was only a two-bit chirp who’d fluttered into his cage hoping to find a perch on one of the agency’s shows. He’d forget about going home, too—going home to Beverly and Pat and Michael. Not that there was anything wrong with them, really. It was just that every second guy his age seemed to be married to a girl named Beverly (or Shirley, or Susan) and they all had two kids named Pat and Michael.

AS for forgetting the job, that was the real bonus deal. Funny how he’d wanted it once—full credit listing as executive producer on Playlights. But now that he was boss man, it was just another headache; fighting the client, fighting the network, fighting the talent and the no-talent they sent him, fighting the hacks who kept on sending him the same three lousy scripts, over and over again.

There was the one about the girl recovering from a nervous breakdown who gets into a bind where she thinks she’s committed a murder—only her doctor uncovers the real killer, and so they get married. There was the one about the pilot or the racer or the gunfighter who loses his nerve until the chips are down, and then he comes through. And there was the one about the young guy who has to choose between crass commercialism or personal integrity, and guess what he does!

Don hated this last script worst of all. Maybe it was because he lived it. And his blonde wife hadn't made the big renunciation speech about preferring financial poverty to spiritual poverty, and he hadn't played the climactic scene where he was supposed to walk out on the boss and turn to honest creative labor.

So now he was a big man, a real live producer and everything, and he was entitled to sit in a noisy bar on his night off and order another Martini.

He held out his glass to the bartender once again. "Cloud Nine," he said.

Again he felt himself being shoved out of the way. Half of Television City was in here tonight—production people, musicians, agency men, even a gaggle of actors in full makeup for night dress rehearsals. If he wanted to, he could find plenty of people to talk to. But what was the use? They were here for the same reason he was here, most of them; they had their own troubles. Some day he'd write a story about the TV industry and its eventual collapse due to internal tensions. The Fall of the House of Ulcer.

But not tonight. Not right now. Because here was the drink, and maybe he'd better find himself a booth in back where he could nurse it without spilling the life-giving fluid all over a twenty-dollar Sulka tie.

Don spotted the empty in back, floated over to it, slid in. He was already seated when he realized the booth wasn't empty. There was an elderly man sitting across from him, nursing a beer.

"Sorry," Don said. "I didn't notice—"

"Quite all right," the elderly man told him. "I don't mind company."

Don eyed him, doing a quick job of type-casting.

THE man was in his late fifties and looked a bit like Parker Fennelly; one of those New England characters. It wasn't a makeup job either, although he was obviously an actor escaped from rehearsal, because he was wearing a costume. He had on a black double-breasted suit with wide lapels; a celluloid collar rode above his white shirt; a string tie twined with the ribbon of his pince-nez.

"The Old Professor, eh?" Don murmured.

The man raised his eyebrows. "But that's remarkable," he said. "How on Earth did you recognize me?"

"Simple." Don tapped his glass. "In vino veritas." He leaned forward. "That's the motto of MGM, you know."

The man looked puzzled.

"Don't mind me," Don told him. "I've just come from my meteorologist and he tells me I'm a little under the weather."

"But you did recognize me—"

"Of course. How could I possibly forget old—old—"

"Herbert Claymore."

"Sure! Herb Claymore, as I live and breed! The last of the big-time spenders! What are you doing here—the Mad Scientist bit?"

The man lifted his beer glass. "Please. Not so loud." He drank slowly, then looked up. "But how could you know? I mean, you must have been a mere child when you saw me. How old are you now, might I ask?"

"Thirty-four," Don told him. "Then it's utterly impossible. You wouldn't even have been born."

"I was born, all right," Don said. "I can show you my navel to prove it."

"You're intoxicated."

"Isn't everybody? What did you come here for?"

"Merely to study."

"Getting up on your lines, eh? Well, don't let me stop you. I'm about ready to go, anyway."

"No, please stay. I was hoping to find someone to talk to. And you intrigue me. I mean, I didn't expect anyone to recognize me."

"Not recognize Herb Claymore, the man who rocked the scientific world with his achievements! They mocked you, ridiculed you, laughed you out of court. But were you discouraged? No! You forged ahead, pushing back the boundaries of discovery past Preparation H, into Preparation I, even Preparation J—"

"Just who are you, sir?"

"Don Freeman is the name. Or as I put it to the young ladies of my acquaintance, Don Freeman, at your service."

"It isn't familiar. And yet you seem to know."

"I do. I do."

"Is it because of my clothing?"

DON nodded. "That Hoover collar would give anybody away."

"Hoover collar?" The man paused. "Ah, yes, Herbert Hoover, the chap who headed Belgian Relief during the War."

"President Hoover," Don corrected.

"Is he?"

"Not any more. But back in 1929—"

"Sorry. That was after my time."

"After?"

"Four years. I left in '25."

"Did you now? And what else is new?"

"Why, everything! I just arrived, and I must confess the changes are more startling than I'd anticipated. The very ground on which the university stood is now occupied by this television installation, and—"

"Come off it, Claymore. You're laying a bomb."

"I beg your pardon?"

"Very unfunny. We are not amused."

"I assure you, I'm quite serious." Don focused on him briefly.

"This isn't a rib? You aren't a fugitive from the Guild?"

"I am not a fugitive in any sense of the word, sir. I am a visitor."

"You, Herbert Claymore, came here in a time machine from the year 1925?"

"In a manner of speaking, yes." Don sighed slowly. "Then I, Don Freeman, need another drink. In a manner of speaking, God, yes!"

He waved to the bartender. "The same?" the bartender inquired.

“No. Switch me to a Miltown Special.” He peered at his companion. “How about you?”

“What is a Miltown Special?”

“Well—”

“Come on. I’ll bet you couldn’t get one back where you came from. Why, they still had Prohibition, didn’t they?”

“Indeed, yes.” Claymore looked up at the bartender. “The same.” The bartender left “No kidding,” Don muttered. “From 1925, eh? Just like that.”

“Not ‘just like that,’ as you put it. I spent eighteen years perfecting the modus operandi. Steinmetz and Edison gave me the courtesy of a hearing, but nobody else was interested in my work.”

“Not even Einstein?”

“You refer to Albert Einstein, the German mathematician? I never met the gentleman. You see, I haven’t traveled abroad.”

THE bartender set their drinks before them and Don signed the tab.

“You’re serious about this gag, huh?” said Don. “Time traveling. What a ball! Why’d you come here, of all places?”

“I thought the university was still in existence,” Claymore explained. “Now I learn it disappeared during the—ah—Depression, I believe they called it.”

“Depression. I’m an authority on Depressions, particularly my own,” Don said. “Depressions, ruts, graves. Deep stuff.”

“But this seems a wonderful era.”

“Is it? Look, I’ll swap you even. You stay here, I go back to 1925. As long as we’re kicking the routine around for laughs, I mean.”

“It wouldn’t be fair,” Claymore told him. “That was a barbaric era.”

“I can see you haven’t read the papers,” Don answered. “Maybe they don’t have newsboys at the asylum.”

"Sir, I must ask you to—"

"All right, no offense. But anyone who likes the way things are today must be crazy. Just look at the situation—cold war, union scandals, fallout, conformity, space race, alphabet bombs, why Johnny can't read, security, censorship, anti-segregation troubles. It's murder!"

"I fail to see that it's any worse than what I left behind me," said Claymore. "In 1925 we had the Bolshevik menace, the Teapot Dome scandal, and bootlegging. As for censorship—what about Prohibition? What about this law down in Tennessee forbidding the teaching of evolution in the schools? Anti-segregation troubles? Haven't you heard about lynching? And as for murder, our papers are full of Al Capone."

"Aw right awready," Don said. "So let's play the flip side. Have you been around long enough to notice rock-'n'-roll, Presley, the tail-fin cars, the lousy ads, the crummy movies? Will Success Spoil Frankenstein's Monster —now I ask you!"

Claymore sipped his drink. "I've heard your rock-'n'-roll, as you call it, and your Mr. Presley. But have you ever heard voh-doh-dee-oh-doh songs, or Yes, We Have No Bananas? Have you ever tried to drive a Model T over a corduroy road during a rainstorm? Do your advertising tycoons ever ask the immortal question, Why Wear a Truss? And as for motion pictures, I submit the epic productions starring Mae Murray, Gilda Gray, and the cast-of-ten-thousand dramas of Cecil B. de Mille." He smiled. "At least you enjoy the benefit of modern technology."

"Sure. Air-conditioning, television, supermarkets, automatic washers. Also guided missiles, and the deadliest weapon of all, the income tax."

"Which we also had."

DON drank around his olive. "So it's a Mexican standoff. But let's consider the really important things. Like the crowded housing conditions that ruin our metropolitan areas, and the gray flannel strait jackets we wear, and the women we love—those big-busted, women we love—those big-busted, bleached-blonde, bird-brained beauties."

"Very well." Claymore smiled. "I'll match today's housing with 1925 tenements. Did you know that only half of the homes boasted bathtubs, and less than half had inside plumbing? I needn't say anything about our atrociously uncomfortable furniture. And as for clothing, I needn't say anything about that, either. Just look at what I'm wearing as compared to your garments."

"Never mind the small talk," Don interrupted. "Let's get back to fundamentals. Namely, sex."

"All right. You paint a rather alluring picture of the feminine ideal. In its place I offer you the Flapper—thin, flat-chested, neurotically shrill and neurotically slangy, gin-drinking, affected—"

"Okay, I get the message," Don cut in. "But as long as we're playing the game, why do we have to limit ourselves to my today and your yesterday? If both the past and the present are so intolerable, why can't we hop into your merry not-so-Oldsmobile and take a joyride into the future?"

"I did," Claymore said.

"What?"

"I said I did." He drained his glass. "This is my second stop, you might say. My first was to a time approximately thirty-five years from now."

"Why didn't you stay there? Don't tell me things were just as bad?"

"Judge for yourself. No Communist scare any more."

"Perfect!"

"It's the Conservatives they're afraid of. Consies, they call them. Advocates of go-slowism in government and business and international relations. Things need to be done. They must be done. Result—suppression of free speech, general censorship, spy hunts. Then there's the plutonium scandal to consider, and the sub-teen delinquency problem, and the druglegging. I don't think I'll mention their popular songs, or what has happened to entertainment media. Dimensional TV can be pretty overwhelming, and of course advertising has kept pace. As for comfort—you'd never imagine the rigors and distress of a rocket flight to the Moon."

"And the women?" asked Don hopefully.

CLAYMORE made an ellipse with his hands. "Lovely. Average weight, two hundred pounds. They're known as Queen-sized dolls. Quite aggressive, of course, as is only natural under a matriarchy. As you can perhaps detect even from the trends of today, they control virtually all of the corporations and business enterprises, together with entertainment media and government."

"Then what's the answer?" Don protested. "You mean you can't beat the game? You can't get away from it, wherever you go?"

"You can't get away from yourself," Claymore declared. "That's the only answer I've learned. How you live, in any age, is up to you. The adjustments you make with your own environment."

"But that's corny," said Don. "You mean horse feathers?" Claymore retorted.

Don nodded. "I suppose you intend to go back to 1925 and take up just where you left off?"

"Why not? I've learned what I wanted to learn. And if you have problems, I advise you to do the same. Accept reality."

"That's a lot of—" Don hesitated. Suddenly he banged on the table. "No, it isn't! You're right, by God! Accept reality, that's the answer. Now, look. You claim you actually came here in a time machine. Do you understand what this means? Why, it's a multi-mill ion-dollar proposition from word one!" He hunched forward. "Look, let's you and I get together, equal partnership. I'll handle the whole deal, do all the spadework. In two weeks we'll blast everything else off the map. I can get you the biggest publicity campaign you ever heard of—spreads in every newspaper and magazine in the country, your choice of network time. The advertising tieup is so sweet, I don't even have to talk about it. Man from the past here today—in person!

You'll hit all the big shows! Lawrence Welk, Steve Allen, Person to Person. What an endorsement job you can do on products! Shove you out next to a 1925 icebox and let you compare it with a new freezer, let you stand up there and break a few lousy Caruso records after you listen to the latest Fats Domino album. Get the pitch? And we'll ghost a daily column for you, the homespun philosophy bit. You're going to be big, bigger than Godfrey ever was at his peak, bigger than—"

"Sorry." Claymore stood up. "I meant what I said. I'm going back where I belong."

"Now wait a minute! This kind of opportunity only comes once in a lifetime. And there's no time like the present—"

"For you, perhaps. For me, there's no time like the past."

"But you said yourself it stinks."

"I can adjust. And that's what I'm telling you now—adjust to your own time, your own circumstances." Don shook his head, gazing into his empty glass. When he looked up again, Claymore was gone.

If he'd ever been there.

Hell, maybe it was just the drinkie.

SURE, it was the drinkie. Time travel was wacky. And so was the cornball philosophy. Make the best of things as they are. In other words, his subconscious was telling him to forget Rosalie, forget the rat race, go home to the little woman and the kids. A real lousy script ending. Well, he wouldn't buy it.

He didn't have to buy it. He could sell it

Sure. That was the answer. Little old subconscious working away all the time, still alive and breathing through a snorkel-tube under the ten Martinis. It had just given him a great plot. Make a fine show.

There's this old pappy-guy from the past, see? He invents this time machine gizmo and comes to the present day. At first he likes it and becomes a big celebrity, but after a while he gets so he can't stand all the phony routines. Finally they're going to put him on television, to make a big speech to the nation—sort of a Will Rogers bit—and a bunch of politicians have him in a bind to endorse their lousy candidate. Only he gets up and double-crosses them by denouncing the whole act. Tells the people to return to the old rugged individualism, the homely virtues, all that jazz.

Why, it was a natural, that's what it was! A natural!

Don fumbled around in his pocket for his notebook. Better get this down quick before he forgot. Tomorrow he could give it to a couple of the staff boys. All they'd have to do would be to run it through the typewriter—maybe he'd give them a third of the deal, but he'd keep the writing credit.

No Time Like The Present. A great title. A great idea. And a great little thought, too.

A man has to make the best of what he's got.

Don started to scribble. He knew where he was and what he was doing, and right now he wouldn't trade places with anyone in the world. Anywhere, any time.

(Excerpt from Yardley University Daily Bulletin, April 5, 1925) Professor Herbert Claymore, head of the Physics Department, resumed his duties today after a brief sabbatical.

The Funnel of God

If came upon them like a galactic tornado—swirling, swallowing, a funnel of madness, a funnel of hate, a funnel of eternity. . . .

WHEN Harvey Wolf was seven, he met the Black Skelm.

Now "skelm" means rascal, and at his age, Harvey knew nothing of duplicity and the ways of men, so he was not afraid. Nor did the man's skin repel him, for Harvey was ignorant of apartheid.

The Basutos on his father's place called him baas, but he did not feel that he was their master. Even Jong Kurt, his father's foreman, treated the men of color without contempt. Harvey came to know the Bechuanas, the Kaffirs, the Fingos and the Swazis far better than the Roinecks, which was their name for Englishmen.

Harvey knew his own father was a Roineck, who owned this place, but that was virtually the extent of his knowledge. His father never visited him; he spent all his time at the Cape, and had ever since Harvey's mother died when he was born. Harvey had been left in care of Jong Kurt and of his wife, whom Harvey learned to call Mama.

"Poor little one," Mama said. "But you are free and happy with us, so gued geroeg."

And Harvey was happy. Mama made him of rawhide, and he roamed at will over the karroo beyond the drift where the gushed. As he grew older, lie sought the krantz above the valley where he made his home, and soon he was climbing the great berg which towered over all.

Here he found the wild orchids of the upland plateaus, plucked as he wriggled his way through the mimosa, the thornbush and the hartekoal trees where the perched and preened and peered for prey.

Harvey came to know the beasts of the mountain and the plain—the aard-wolf and the inyala, the oribi and the duiker, the springbok and the kudu. He watched the tall secretary-bird and the waddling kori bustard, and traced the flight of bats from out of the hidden caves on the berg above. From time to time he encountered snakes; the cobra di capello, the puff adder, and the dreaded mamba.

But nothing that loped or trotted or flew or crawled ever harmed him. He grew bolder and started to explore the caves high upon the faraway berg.

That was when Mama warned him about the Black Skelm.

“He is an evil man who eats children,” Mama said. “The caves are full of their bones, for on such a diet one lives forever. You are to stay away from the berg.”

“But Kassie goes to the berg at night,” Harvey protested. “And Jorl, and Swarte.”

“They are black and ignorant,” Mama told him. “They seek the Black Skelm for charms and potions. The wicked old man should be in prison. I have told Jong Kurt time and again to take the dogs to the berg and hunt him out. But he is too slim, that one, to be easily captured. They say he sleeps in the caves with the bats, who warn him when strangers approach.”

“I would like to see such a man,” Harvey decided.

“You are to stay away from the berg, mind?”

And Mama shook him, and he promised, but Harvey did not mind.

One hot morning he toiled across the karroo, slipping out unobserved from the deserted, heat-baked house, and made his way painfully up the krantz. The aasvogels drooped limply in the trees, their eyes lidded, for nothing moved in the plain below. Even the orchids were wilting.

It was no cooler on the krantz, and when Harvey found the winding pad which circled the berg, he paused, parched and faint, and considered turning back. But the trip would be long, and perhaps he could find a fontein up here. There were pads he had not yet explored—

He started off at random, and thus it was that he came to the cave of the Black Skelm.

The Black Skelm was a gnarled little monkey-man with a white scraggle of beard wisping from his sunken cheeks. He sat at the mouth of the cave, naked and crosslegged, staring out at the veldt below with immobile eyes.

Harvey recognized him at once and put his knuckles to his mouth. He started to edge back, hoping that the old man hadn't observed him, but suddenly the scrawny neck corded and swivelled.

"Greetings, baas."

The voice was thin and piping, yet oddly penetrating. It gained resonance from an echo in the cave behind.

"G-greetings," Harvey murmured. He continued to edge away.

"You fear me, boy?"

"You are the Black Skelm. You—"

"Eat children?" The old man cackled abruptly. "Yes, I know the tale. It is nonsense, meant only to deceive fools. But you are not a fool, Harvey Wolf."

"You know my name?"

"Of course. An old man learns many things."

"Then you've come down to the plains?"

"Not for long years. But the bats bear tidings. They are my brothers of the nights, just as the aasvogels are my brothers by day." The Black Skelm smiled and gestured. "Sit down. I would invite you inside the cave, but my brothers are sleeping now."

Harvey hesitated, eyeing the little old man. But the man was little, and so very old; Harvey couldn't imagine him to be dangerous. He sat down at a discreet distance.

"The bats told you my name?" he ventured.

The wrinkled black man shrugged. "I have learned much of you. I know you seek the berg because it is your wish to see what is on the other side."

"But I've never told anyone that."

"It is not necessary. I look into your heart, Harvey Wolf, and it is the heart of a seeker. You think to gaze upon the lands beyond this mountain; to see the olifant, the kameel, the great black brothers of the rhenoster birds. But to no purpose, my son. The elephant, the giraffe, the rhinoceros are long gone. They have vanished, with my own people."

"Your people?"

"Those you call the Zulus." The old man sighed. "Once, when I was a jong, the plains beyond the berg were black with game. And beyond the plains the leegtes were black with the kraals of my people. This was our world."

And the Black Skelm told Harvey about his world; the Zulu empire that existed long before the coming of the ecks and the Boers. He spoke of Chaka and the other great indunas who commanded armies in royal splendor, wearing the leopardskin kaross and lifting the knobkerrie of kingly authority to command the impis—the regiments of grotesquely painted warriors in kilts of wildcat tails. They would parade by torchlight, the ostrich plumes bobbing like the wild sea, and their voices rose more loudly than the wind in the cry of "Bayete!" which was the regal salute. And in return the induna chanted but a single response. "Kill!" Casting his spear to the north, the south, the east, or the west, he sent the regiments forth. And the impis killed. They conquered, or never returned. That was the way of it, in the old days.

Until, finally, none were left to return.

None but the Black Skelm, who sought the caves of the bats and the vultures, to live like a scavenger in a world of death.

"But my people are down there," Harvey protested. "They are not dead. They tell me Cape Town is a great city, and beyond that—"

"Cape Town is a cesspool of civilization," said the Black Skelm. "And beyond that are greater sewers in which men struggle and claw at one another, even as they drown. It is a sickening spectacle, this. The world will soon end, and I would that I could die with it. But, of course, I shall never die."

Harvey's head hurt; the sun was very hot. He wondered if he had heard aright.

"You can't die?"

"It is true, baas. Soon, of course, I must decide upon my next move, for this body of mine is no longer suitable. But—"

Harvey rose, reeling a bit, and backed away.

"Don't eat me!" he cried.

The old man cackled again. "Nonsense!" he said. "Sheer, superstitious nonsense. I do not eat children. My brothers feed me." He stretched forth his hand. "Look!"

And the air was filled with the odor of carrion, as the aasvogels gathered, fluttering frantically up the face of the sheer cliff and clustering about the bony body of the wizened black. In their beaks they carried bits of rancid flesh, dropping their tribute into the Black Skelm's fingers.

Then Harvey knew that he was very sick indeed; the sun had played tricks. He ran into the cave, and it was dark and musty, and from the twisted caverns beyond welled a terrible odor of decay. The bats hung head downwards, hung in mute millions, and the floor of the cave was not covered with bones but with whitish droppings. On the walls great eyes winked—eyes that had been painted by hands long dead. The eyes whirled and Harvey felt his kneecaps turn to water. He would have fallen, but the Black Skelm came up behind him and caught him.

The old man’s grip was surprisingly strong.

“Do not fear,” he whispered. “Drink this.” And he held out the hollowed skull. The liquid was warm and red.

“Blood,” Harvey quavered.

“Of cattle. It is pure and fresh.”

“But you are a wizard—”

“What is a wizard? Merely a seeker, like yourself. A seeker who has perhaps peered further than the land beyond the mountain.”

The Black Skelm led him back to the mouth of the cave, and bade him sit in the shadows there. Harvey was suddenly very tired. He closed his eyes, scarcely listening, as the Black Skelm droned on.

“All men are seekers, but each chooses a different path in his search for understanding. There is the path of Columbus who sought to encompass the earth and the path of Galileo who sought to search the heavens; the sevenfold path of Buddha which led, he hoped, to Nirvana, and the path of Appolonius which is an inward spiral with oblivion at its core. There is Einstein and—”

Harvey opened his eyes. He was, he knew, quite delirious. The black man sitting beside him, chanting strange names, eating out of the beaks of vultures, talking of Zulu kraals which had vanished a hundred years ago—this was a fever-dream. He could hear only bits and snatches.

“You will be a seeker, too, Harvey Wolf, You will go out into the world to look for knowledge. Eventually you will sicken of knowledge and try to find truth. Perhaps we can discover it together—”

Harvey’s head throbbed. The sun was blazing off in the west, sinking beneath the purple lower lid of a gigantic cloud. And a voice was echoing along the berg, calling, “Harvey—Harvey, where are you?”

“Jong Kurt!” Harvey rose.

The Black Skelm was already on his feet, scuttling into the shadows of the cave.

"No, wait—come back!" Harvey called, groping after the old man and nearly falling as his fevered body convulsed in a sudden chill.

But the old man retreated into the cave.

And then Jong Kurt was looming on the pathway, his face grave and his forehead seamed with apprehension. He caught the reeling boy in his arms.

Suddenly the blackness blossomed and burst forth from the cave, a blinding billowing of squeaking, stenchful shadows—shadows that flapped and fluttered and stared with millions of little red eyes.

Jong Kurt fled down the mountain, carrying Harvey Wolf. But the eyes followed, haunting Harvey's delirium in dreams. . . .

They sent him away, then. Harvey wasn't conscious when the decision was made, though he did see his father once, afterwards, at the dock in Cape Town. His father introduced him to his Uncle Frank, from America, and gave him strict orders about minding his manners and following instructions. There was talk about a New Life and a Good School and the Unhealthy Outlook that comes from being alone.

Harvey tried to tell his father about the Black Skelm, but his father wouldn't listen; not even Mama or Jong Kurt had listened. They all said Harvey had suffered from sunstroke, and in the end he came to believe it himself. It had all been heat and hallucination and nothing was real now but the great ocean and the great city.

In New York his Uncle Frank and his Aunt Lorraine were very kind. They took vicarious pleasure in his amazement at the sight of the city, and conducted him to his first motion picture.

That seemed to be a mistake, and after they dragged the frightened, hysterical child out of the theater he suffered what the doctor called a "relapse." Afterwards, he forgot the whole incident, and it wasn't until years later—

But meanwhile, Harvey grew up. He went to school and he managed to endure the tight, idiotic abominations called "Health Shoes." Gradually he accumulated the fund of knowledge necessary for a child to flourish in our society—that is to say, he could identify the various makes and models of automobiles in the streets, he learned the names of “baseball stars,” and the meanings behind the four-letter words and the slang-phrases of the day.

Also, he learned to insulate his interior existence from other eyes; he found that seekers are not popular with their fellows, so he concealed his interests from his playmates. His teachers, however, were not unaware of his intelligence; at their advice he went on to private schools and from there to an Ivy League college.

He was still there when Uncle Frank and Aunt Lorraine went over to Cape Town to bring his father back for a reunion; he was there when the news came to him that the private plane had crashed on the return flight.

After the funeral he visited the attorneys.

They told him he had inherited the entire estate. Once liquidated, with all taxes paid, he could count on an accumulation of better than three million dollars. It would be ready for him by the time he reached his twenty-first birthday.

Right then and there he made a sensible decision; he decided it was time to retire.

It was not just the caprice of a spoiled brat or a rich man’s heir. At twenty-one, Harvey Wolf was a fairly presentable young man—many girls even found him handsome, for three million reasons—and he possessed an alert intellect.

He turned his back on the world only because he was fed up with hypocrisy and liars.

Harvey’s first move was to leave the college. He said farewell forever to its small Humanities Department and its huge football stadium.

Next, he departed from a church whose spiritual representatives appeared at launching ceremonies to bless aircraft carriers and destroyers.

At the same time he walked out on most of the phenomena and beliefs held dear by his peers; on chauvinism, on racial prejudice, on the feudal caste-system glorified by the armed forces of our democracy.

He briefly considered going into business, until he found he couldn't subscribe to the widespread doctrine that there is some mystically ennobling value attached to "competition" and that somehow everybody benefits under a system where one man is dedicated to outsmarting another.

Harvey turned his back on the life of a wealthy idler because he could not tolerate the common amusements. He did not believe that animal-killers were "sportsmen," whether they dressed in red coats and drank champagne before chasing a fox or wore dirty dungarees and guzzled beer out of the bottle before shooting at an unsuspecting duck. He did not think that baseball players or boxers or even bullfighters were as much heroic as they were overpaid. He squinted but saw nothing in abstract art; he listened, but heard nothing in its credos and critiques.

Harvey Wolf turned his back on Mother's Day, Valentine's Day, Christmas, and all the other holidays heralded by the joyous tinkle of cash-registers on high. He deplored the phoney virility of the men's magazines, the fake coyness of the women's magazines, and the artificial social values which emotionally warped young people into "manliness" or "femininity."

Taking stock of himself, Harvey found he did not worship sportscars or subscribe to the "theory of obsolescence" dearly beloved by manufacturers and dearly paid for by consumers. He abhorred drum majorettes, bathing beauty contests, and the publicity given "Miss Canned Goods" or the "Oklahoma Cucumber Queen." He took a dim, pained view of billboards, and disliked the transformation of natural parks and beauty spots into commercialized locales for hot-dog stands and souvenir concessions which sold little wooden outhouses.

He held opinions which would automatically antagonize all fraternity-members, morticians, professional evangelists, Texans, and the marchers in St. Patrick's Day parades. He did not believe in caveat emptor; card players who slam each trick down on the table and bellow at the top of their lungs; fake "frontier days" held by rough, tough pioneer towns in the wilds of New Jersey; sound engineers who "ride the gain" on TV commercials; professional fund-raisers who take 40% off the top in charity drives, or people who take pride in announcing that they are "quick-tempered," as though this statement entitled them to special privileges.

Harvey held a bias against practical jokers, and people who obscure driving visibility by decorating their car-windows with dangling dolls, oversize dice, baby shoes, and imitation shrunken heads. He saw no sense to endurance-contests, had no patience with litter-bugs, failed to believe in Beggar's Night or politicians who "compromise" after election at the expense of repudiating their campaign pledges. He had a contempt for Muscle Beach exhibitionists and he objected to the rewriting of history under the guise of "patriotism." He—but the list is endless, and of interest only to psychiatrists; they get $50 an hour for listening.

Harvey Wolf didn't go to the psychiatrists—not yet, at any rate, including the $50 an hour one.

He thought he was searching for something to believe in and that perhaps he could find it in good, hard, scientific logic.

So he sailed for Europe, to study at the source.

In Edinburgh, Harvey encountered a Brilliant Doctor who prided himself on complete objectivity.

"Nothing," said the Brilliant Doctor, in one of his famed private seminars, "is ever finally 'proved' and everything remains possible in theory.

"For example, granted the loose molecular structure of both a human body and a brick wall, it is only logical to concede that, with the exact proper alignment of every single molecule in the given body with every single molecule in the given wall, at a given instant it would be possible for said body to walk through said wall and emerge unscathed on the other side.

"The chances are almost inconceivably infinitesimal, but the possibility must be granted."

Harvey Wolf thereupon asked the Brilliant Doctor, in the light of this opinion, what he thought of allied phenomena. What of his late countryman, the Scottish medium, D. D. Home, who practiced levitation? He rose, resting on his back in mid-air, then floated out of one second-storey window and back into the room through another, in full view and broad daylight.

"Nonsense!" said the Brilliant Doctor.

Harvey Wolf blinked. "But no less an observer than the distinguished scientist, Sir William Crookes, testified he had witnessed this feat with his own eyes," Harvey replied.

"Impossible!" said the Brilliant Doctor. . . .

At Oxford, Harvey Wolf was enthralled by a Learned Scholar who spoke of the biological basis of Life and the almost metaphysical borderland between Being and Nothingness.

"The electromagnetic principles governing sentience and consciousness are still indefinable," he announced. "No man has yet isolated the Life Force or truly defined death or nonexistence except in terms of its absence."

Harvey Wolf was interested. What, he asked, did the Learned Scholar think of Pierre and Eve Curie's signed testimony that they had seen genuine evidence of psychic phenomena demonstrated by a medium? What about Thomas Edison's similar convictions, and his final experiments in communication with the spirit world?

"There is no objective validity offered in evidence here," said the Learned Scholar.

"But we ignored electricity for thousands of years," Harvey protested. "Its omnipresent existence was unknown to us except in lightning until we found a means of harnessing this force. Surely, if the borderline between existence and non-existence, consciousness and unconsciousness, cannot be exactly defined, and yet is apparently subject to certain definite principles—

“Utter rot!” said the Learned Scholar. . . .

In Heidelberg, Harvey Wolf studied under a famous Herr Doktor-Professor whose technical mastery of neuropathology was exceeded only by his interest in psychosomatic medicine. The Herr Doktor-Professor was extremely liberal in his outlook, and even admitted prodromosis as a basis for diagnosis.

“I knew a surgeon who was in charge of an army hospital during the war,” Harvey said. “One of his patients was completely paralyzed from the waist down—the spinal cord had been entirely severed and there was no nervous response. He lay in bed, wasting away, and was informed he’d never move his legs again. He refused to accept the verdict. Each day he pulled himself up in bed, lifted his legs over the side, tried to stand. The surgeon gave strict orders to restrain him, but he persisted. After two gruelling months, he stood. A month later he took his first step. All tests showed it was physically impossible for him to exercise any control over his legs, but he walked—”

“Impossible!” muttered the Herr Doktor-Professor.

“Yet what about Edgar Cayce and his clinically-verified healings of organic disorders with no possible basis in hysteria? What about—”

“Dumkopf!” opined the Herr-Doktor Professor. . . .

In the Sorbonne faculty, Harvey met a Celebrated Savant with unorthodox views; a man who dared to side with Charles Fort in his questioning of organized science. He once stated that if we accepted the theory of evolution from a non-anthropomorphic viewpoint, it was quite possible to believe that man’s function on earth was merely to act as host for cancer cells which would eventually learn to survive the death of the human body and emerge as the next, higher life-form. He was even fond of quoting Mark Twain and others to the effect that the stars and planets of our universe might be merely the equivalent of tiny corpuscles moving through the blood-stream of some incalculably huge monster. And that this monster, in turn, might walk the surface of another world in another universe which in turn might be composed of similar corpuscles—ad infinitum to the nth[2] power.

“It is a humbling thought,” the Celebrated Savant observed, and Harvey Wolf agreed.

“A far remove from petty human concepts,” Harvey mused. “There is no need to concern oneself with trivia in the face of it now, is there?”

But the Celebrated Savant wasn’t listening; he was reading the newspaper and scowling.

“Those pigs of Algerians!” he muttered to himself. “Yes, and those lousy colons, bidding for power and setting up education for all. It is a disaster!”

Harvey shrugged. “The world is only a corpuscle,” he said. “Or perhaps it’s just a virus-cell in the bloodstream of the Infinite. What does it matter?”

“Cochon! The purity of the State depends upon maintaining our autonomy. And furthermore, young man—”

Harvey Wolf found himself walking out once more. But this time he was walking out into Paris.

Paris, of course, is what you make it. To cutpurse Villon, living from hand to mouth and from the Small to the Grand Testament, it was a city of cold cobblestones where every twisted alley led only to the inevitable gibbet. To Bonaparte it was the site of a triumphal arch through which he marched to celebrate victory—or furtively avoided, in a solitary coach, as he whipped his horses from the field of Moscow or Waterloo. Toulouse-Latrec clattered across Paris leaning upon two sticks, and his city was a gaslight inferno. There is the Sec and Brut Paris of poutlipped Chevalier, the cerebral city of Proust and Gide and Sartre, the Paris of the GI on leave for couchez-vous carnival.

There is the Paris of the tourist—the Louvre's legweary legacy, the giddy gaping from the Eiffel Tower, the hasty concealment of the paper-bound Tropic of Cancer at the bottom of the suitcase. There is a Paris as gay as Colette, as tough as Louis-Ferdinand Celine, as weird as Huysmans. You pay your money and you take your choice.

And when you have three million dollars—

Harvey Wolf brooded about it in a Montmartre bistro. A bearded man stared at him with yellow cat-eyes and said, "Welcome, Pontius Pilate."

"Pilate?" echoed Harvey Wolf.

"I recognize the mood," said the bearded man. "You are asking yourself Pilate's age-old question—what is Truth?"

"And the answer?"

"Truth is sensation," the bearded man told him. "Sensation alone is reality. All else is illusion."

"Hedonism, eh? I don't know—"

"You can learn. Experience is the great teacher."

Harvey was sated with civilization, sick of science. He spent six months with the bearded man and the bearded man's friends. He rented a villa near Antibes, and many guests came.

There was the dwarf girl and the giantess and the woman with the filed and pointed teeth; the lady who slept only in a coffin and never alone; the girl whose luggage consisted solely of a custom-made traveling case filled entirely with whips. There was a rather unusual troupe of artists whose specialty consisted of a pantomime dramatization of the Kama Sutra.

Long before the six months were up, Harvey realized that his meeting with the bearded man had not been accidental. Behind the beard was neither Jesus, D. H. Lawrence or even a genuine Gilles de Rais—merely a weak-chinned, looselipped voluptuary adventurer who had visions of sugarplum splendor in the form of a billion-franc blackmail scheme.

Harvey got rid of him, at last, for considerably less, and he did not begrudge the price he finally paid. For he had learned that the senses are shallow and the orgasmic is not the ultimate peak of perceptivity.

Harvey went to Italy and immersed himself in Renaissance art. He journeyed to Spain and somehow he found he'd started to drink. A girl he met introduced him to some little capsules her friends smuggled in from Portugal. At the end of another six months he was picked up in the streets of Seville and shipped back home through the kindly offices of the American consulate.

They put him in Bellevue and then in a private san upstate. Harvey kicked the habit and emerged after a loss of four months and forty pounds.

He ended up, as do most seekers after Truth, on the confessional couch of a private psychiatrist.

The psychiatrist decided that perhaps Walt Disney was to blame for it all.

Harvey admitted the man had an interesting argument.

He was able, after many sessions, to recall his first visit to the movies when he'd come to America. Uncle Frank and Aunt Lorraine had taken him to see what was perhaps the most famous short cartoon of the Depression era—

Three Little Pigs.

He could recreate quite vividly, without the aid of narcohypnosis, the strong fear-reaction engendered by the sight of the Big Bad Wolf stalking the helpless pigs. He remembered how the Wolf huffed and puffed and blew the straw house in. What happened immediately thereafter he did not know, because it was then that he had been carried, screaming, from the theater.

It was, the psychiatrist averred, a "traumatic incident." And now, as an adult, Harvey had read a great deal about animated cartoons and their possible effect on children. Following the success of The Three Little Pigs it seemed as if the entire concept of cartoon-making underwent a drastic change. In place of playful Pluto and droll Donald Duck came a horde of ferocious bulldogs, gigantic cats with slavering fangs; huge animal menaces who tormented smaller creatures and sought to devour them in their great red maws.

But, if anything, their little intended victims were worse; they always outwitted the hulking pursuers and seemed to take fiendish delight in sadistic revenge. One animal was always crushing another under a truck or a steamroller; pushing his enemy off a steep cliff, blasting his head open with a shotgun, blowing him up with dynamite, dragging his body across the teeth of a great circular saw. During the years, the so-called “kiddy matinee” became a horror-show, a Grand Guignol of the animal kingdom in which atrocious crimes and still more atrocious punishments flashed in fantastic fashion across the screen in lurid color, to the accompaniment of startlingly realistic shrieks, groans, screams of agony, and cruel laughter.

Parents who carefully and conscientiously shielded their supposedly innocent youngsters from the psychological pitfalls of the dreaded comicbooks were quite content to listen to the same moppets shriek uncontrollably at the sight of a twenty-foot high animated hyena being burned to death while the happy little rabbit squealed in ecstatic glee.

Harvey had read about this and he listened when the psychiatrist told him there was probably no harm in such fantasies—to the average child it was merely a vicarious outlet for aggression. Such a child unconsciously identified with the small animal who destroyed the larger tormenter; the bigger creature symbolized Daddy or Mama or some authority-figure, and it was satisfying to witness their defeat. The weapons employed were direct concepts and representations of adult civilization and its artifacts. Most children were exposed to such films from infancy on and grew up without psychic damage. As normal adult human beings they were able to go out into the world and fight its battles. Indeed, it was the avowed purpose of many psychiatrists to keep them “mentally fit” during real battles, so that they could continue to spray liquid fire from flamethrowers upon enemy soldiers cowering in tanks, or drop bombs on unseen thousands of women and children.

It was merely unfortunate, said the psychiatrist (at $50 an hour) that Harvey had been brought up away from the influences of normal society and abruptly exposed to the symbolism of the cartoon.

And there were, of course, other factors.

The fact that Harvey's last name happened to be Wolf—so that his little American playmates insisted on calling him "The Big Bad Wolf" when they innocently ganged up on him at recess and tried to emulate the punishments inflicted by the heroic little pigs in the film.

The fact that Harvey, instead of acting any normal, redblooded American boy and fighting back against the six or eight older bullies who came after him with planks and stones, chose to cry and bleed instead.

The fact that Harvey soon underwent another traumatic cinematic experience when he saw a picture called The Wolf Man and its sequels, and gradually came to accept and identify with the role symbolized by his last name.

The fact that Harvey seemed to have totally misinterpreted the message; to him it wasn't important that the Wolf was destroyed, but that he was revived again in the sequels.

Regrettably, said the psychiatrist (at great and expensive length) he seemed to have equated acceptance of his Wolf role with survival. As an adult, he had become a Lone Wolf, moving away from the pack. And his self-styled search for Truth was merely a search for the Father-Image, denied him in childhood.

Harvey attempted, at one point in his analysis, to talk about the Black Skelm and that fantastic fever-dream atop the berg. The psychiatrist listened, made notes, nodded gravely, inquired into the duration of his subsequent illness, and went back to his theory about the traumatic effect of the films. What had Harvey thought when the Wolf Man was beaten to death with a cane by his father in the movie? Did Claude Rains, as the father, remind Harvey of his own parent? Did he perceive the phallic symbolism of the silver cane used as an instrument of punishment? And so on, blah, blah, blah—until Harvey Wolf got up from the couch and walked out again.

Psychotherapy had its own truths, but its methodology was still magic. One had to believe in certain formulae, in spells and incantations designed to cast out demons. At the same time there was this pitiful insistence upon a "realistic" interpretation; an attempt to reconcile frankly magical methodology with the so-called "normal" world.

Perhaps it was silly to compromise. The therapy-sessions had caused Harvey to think about the Black Skelm once more, for the first time in twenty years. He remembered how the little shriveled savage had spoken of Einstein, and of Appolonius of Tyana. He had sat all alone in a bat-cave atop a mountain, drinking warm blood from a skull, but he knew. He had a surety which science and philosophy and art only adumbrated, and the source of his knowledge must be magical insight.

Harvey moved down into the Village and began to fill his ramshackle apartment with books on occultism and theosophy. He avoided the local Beat types, but inevitably the word leaked out. The crackpots came to call, and eventually he met a girl named Gilda who claimed to be one of the innumerable illegitimate offspring of the late Aleister Crowley.

Soon he found himself standing in a darkened room, facing the East, with a steel dagger in his right hand. He touched his forehead saying, in the Hebrew tongue, Atch; touched his breast and murmured Atallcuth; touched his right shoulder as he intoned Ve-Geburah and his left as he muttered Ve-Gedullah. Clasping his hands upon the breast, with dagger pointed upwards, he shouted Le-Olahm, Aum.

Nothing happened.

Gilda's further experiments in sex-magic were equally (and fortunately) nonproductive. She attempted to interest him in a Black Mass, but before details could be arranged she ran off with a young man who yapped obscene ballads in public places but was granted the protection the law affords a folk-singer.

Harvey Wolf decided that he would continue his search alone.

During the year that followed he made many contacts and experiments. Undoubtedly he met with followers of Gerrald Heard and Aldous Huxley. Quite certainly he investigated the effects of lysergic acid and peyote.

Both produced the same trance phenomena. Harvey found himself regressing, the film of his life running backwards, until he reached the point where he was enveloped in the billowing black bat-cloud from the berg. The little red eyes swirled fire-fly fashion all around him, then vanished into a greater darkness. He stood alone on the mountain.

Yet not quite alone, because the Black Skelm was there, pointing to the path and whispering, "I have waited long, baas. The time has come when we must journey together."

The message was manifest; Harvey Wolf knew he would go back to Africa.

Another Wolfe had said You Can't Go Home Again, and in his more objective moments Harvey knew this was right. Twenty years had passed and nothing was left of the Africa he'd known. The world kept changing.

There were new governments with new slogans, new reasons to hate their neighbors, and new weapons poised to punish them. A new spurt of population, subject to new mutations of disease, sought new areas of conquest. Missiles had reached the moon and Man would follow, then go on to the stars with his civilized cargo of bombs, chewing-gum, carbon monoxide and laxatives. Eventually the millenium would come; a Soviet Federated Socialist Republic of the Solar System or a United Interplanetary

States. If the former prevailed, Saturn would be set up as the new Siberia; if democracy triumphed, special facilities for certain groups would be set up on Pluto—separate, but equal, of course.

Harvey Wolf made one last effort to escape such cynical considerations and their consequences. He became an ascetic; a disciple of Raja, Brahma and Hatha Yoga. He took a cabin in the Arizona desert and here he meditated, fasted, and grew faint.

And the Black Skelm came into his dreams and chanted, “This is not the path. Come to me. I have found the way.”

So, in the end, Harvey returned to the dark womb—to the Africa of his birth.

He found a new spirit at the Cape; apartheid had arisen, sanctioned by the sanctimonious and condoned by the cartel of dedicated men whose mission it was to artificially inflate the price of diamonds with which the wealthy bedeck their wives and their whores.

At first they would not even give Harvey permission to journey upcountry, but his father’s name—and a distribution of his father’s money—helped.

This time Harvey made the trip in a chartered plane, which set him down on the flat veldt near the old place and (in accordance with orders) left him there.

The old place had changed, of course. Kassie, Jorl, Swarte and others were gone, and no herds of humpbacked cattle roamed over the plain. The great house was deserted, or almost so; Harvey prowled the ruins for ten minutes before the elderly man with the rifle ventured forth from an outbuilding and leveled his weapon at him in silent menace.

“Jong Kurt!” Harvey cried. And the old man blinked, not recognizing him at first—just as Harvey didn’t recognize a Kurt whom the years had robbed of any right to retain his nickname.

Kurt lowered his rifle and wept. He wept for the passing of the old place, for the death of Mama, for the changes which had come to both of them. Did the baas remember the way it had been? Did he remember the night Kurt had carried him, faint with delirium, down the mountainside?

"Yes, I remember," Harvey murmured. "I remember it very well."

"When you left, your father sold the cattle. The boys went into the mines, everybody left. Only Mama and I stayed on, alone. Now she is gone, too." Kurt knuckled his eyes.

"And the Black Skelm?" Harvey said. "What happened to him?"

"He is dead," Kurt answered, shaking his head solemnly.

"Dead?" Harvey stiffened in the suddenness of the thought, "Do you mean that you—"

Kurt nodded. "Your father gave orders. The day after you went to the Cape, I took the dogs up to the berg. I meant to hunt him down, the verdamte scoundrel."

"You found him there?"

The old man shrugged. "Only the bones. Picked clean, they were, on the side of the ledge near the mouth of the cave. The carrion had fed his vultures for the last time."

Kurst wheezed and slapped his thigh, and he did not see the pain in Harvey's eyes.

"But why do we stand here, baas? You will stay the night with me, eh? Your plane does not return before tomorrow?"

Harvey murmured an acceptance of the invitation. It was true, his plane would not return until the next day. He'd thought to spend the interval in ascending the berg, but there was no need now. The Black Skelm was dead. You Can't Go Home Again.

Kurt had comfortable quarters in one of the smaller outbuildings. Game was scarce, but there was eland steak for dinner. The old man had learned to brew beer in the traditional Kaffir fashion, and after the. meal he sat reminiscing with the young baas and drinking toasts to the past. Finally he succumbed to stuporous slumber.

Harvey stretched out on a bunk and tried to sleep. Eventually he succeeded. Then the bat came.

It flew in through the open window and nuzzled at his chest, brushing its leathery wings against his face and nuzzling him with tiny teeth that grazed but did not bite. It chittered faintly.

Harvey awoke to a moment of horror; horror which subsided when the bat withdrew to a corner of the room. Kurt snored on, stentoriously, and Harvey sat up, brushing at the black, winged creature in an effort to drive it back out through the window.

The bat wheeled about his head, squeaking furiously. Harvey rose, flailing his aims. He opened the door. The bat hung in the doorway. Harvey beat at it. It whirled just out of arm's reach. Then it hung suspended in midair and waited.

Harvey advanced. He stood gazing across the moonlit emptiness of the veldt—a lake of shimmering silver beyond which towered the black hulk of the berg.

The bat cheeped and flapped its wings before him. Suddenly Harvey conceived the odd notion that the wings were beckoning. The bat wanted him to follow.

Then he knew. The Black Skelm wasn't dead. He was waiting for Harvey, there on the mountain. He had sent a messenger, a guide.

Harvey didn't hesitate. He went out into the moonlit plain and it was like the first time. Now he was a grown man in boots instead of a child in rawhide veldschoen, and it was night instead of day, but nothing had changed. Even the odd delirium rose to envelop him once again; not the fever born of the hot sun but the chill of the cold moon. He trudged across the silver silence of the sand and the bat swooped in sinister silhouette before him. When Harvey reached the krantz he almost decided to turn back; this was no mysterious midnight mission, only the tipsy fugue of an over-imaginative man unused to the potency of Kaffir beer.

But they were waiting for him there in the shadows; huddled in teeming thousands, their tiny red eyes winking a greeting. And now thy rose all about him, covering him in a living cloak. He glanced back and found they had closed in solidly, forming a living barrier against retreat. The acrid stench was in itself a wall through which he dared not pass, so he went forward, up to the winding pad which took him, toiling, to the top of the berg.

He saw the mouth of the cave looming before him, and then all vision faded as the moon was blotted out by a cloud—a cloud of wavering wings. The bats flew off and he stood alone on the mountain-top.

The Black Skelm came out of the cave.

"You are alive," whispered Harvey. "I knew it. But Kurt spoke of finding bones—"

"I placed them there for that purpose." The Black Skelm wove his wrinkles into a smile. "I did not wish to be disturbed until you returned. I have waited a long time, baas."

"Why didn't you summon me sooner?"

"There were things you had to learn for yourself. Now you are ready, having seen the world. Is it not as I described?"

"Yes." Harvey nodded at the gnarled little black man. "But how could you know these things? I mean—"

He hesitated, but the Black Skelm grinned. "You mean I am an ignorant old savage, a witch-doctor who believes in animism and amulets." He scratched his grisly chest. "Whereas you are a man of worldly wisdom. Tell me—what is Jack Paar really like?"

Harvey blinked, and the old man chuckled. "You are so naive in your sophistication! Baas, I have seen far more than you in your brief lifetime. Although my base body sat and shriveled in this cave, my spirit ventured afar. I have been with you throughout your wanderings. I was in the theatre when you screamed; I sat with you in seminars; I felt the caress of the woman with her silver-tipped whips; I was one with you when you raised the dagger to invoke the All-Being. There are ways of transcending space and time."

"But that's impossible!" Harvey muttered. "I can't think—"

"Don't try to think." The Black Skelm rose, slowly and stiffly. "One does not learn through processes of organized logic, for the world is not a logical place. Indeed, it is not a place at all—merely an abstract point in infinity. True knowledge is intuitional; an impressionary process which might be labelled as heuristics."

Harvey shook his head. "You drink cattle-blood and summon bats, and you speak of heuristics—unbelievable."

"Yet you believe."

"I believe. But I don't understand. You have these powers. Why live like an animal in a cave when you might have gone forth to rule the world?"

"The world?" The old man put his hand on Harvey's shoulder; the weight was as slight as a sere and blackened leaf. "Look down there." Together they stared at the silvery veldt.

"The world is a plain," said the Black Skelm. "And beyond, as we know, are the cities of the plain. Do you remember what happened to those cities? Then the Lord rained on Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven, and he overthrew those cities and all the valley and all the inhabitants of the cities, and what grew on the ground. Remember?"

"Yes. You're trying to tell me that the world will soon come to an end."

"Can you doubt it, after what you've seen?"

"No."

"The Lord remembered Abraham and brought him to the safety of the hills." The black man smiled, but Harvey stared at him.

"Is that why you sent for me? Because you're—"

"God?" The black man shook his head. "Not yet. I have not chosen. That is why I waited for you. Perhaps you can help me choose."

"I don't understand—"

“Every man is God, or contains within him the seed of godhead. Look.” The Black Skelm fumbled with a little leather pouch at his waist and drew forth a dark, shrivelled object.

“This is a nut, encased in an outer shell. Within is the seed, the kernel. The hard shell is our human consciousness. Once broken, the kernel can be reached, the seed liberated to sprout and grow, to spread through space and thrust beyond the stars.”

The Black Skelm twirled the spheroid in his wrinkled palm. “Shall we open the shell and partake?” he murmured. “No, it isn’t like peyote, or your lysergic acid, either. I spent years searching for the seed, which indeed comes from the Tree of Knowledge. Once eaten, it will do more than merely expand and extend consciousness. Consciousness will be discarded, like the empty husk it is, and the soul will flourish. Flourish and soar beyond all being.”

He cracked the shell and dug within.

“Here, will you share with me?”

“But—why?”

The Black Skelm sighed. “Because the human part of me is old, and afraid. It may be that I will not enjoy being God. It must, I think, be a lonely estate. When you came to me as a child I recognized a fellow-seeker, and I knew that I would wait for you to join me on the quest.”

Harvey stared. “This isn’t just part of some crazy dream?”

“It’s all a crazy dream, you know that,” said the Black Skelm, softly.

“And if it works—suppose I want to turn back?”

“There is no turning back, as you have learned. One can only go forward, through the mist called life and into the mist called death. Or one who dares can go beyond. It is your choice.”

“But why now?”

“Why not? Does life, as you have seen it, appeal to you?”

“No.”

"Do you look forward to death?"

"No."

"Then let us move on." The Black Skelm carefully broke the dried kernel in half and extended a portion to Harvey.

"Place it on your tongue," he said. "Then swallow slowly."

Harvey knew now that he was dreaming. He knew he was back in the bunk at Kurt's place, and there was nothing to fear—in a moment he'd awake. Meanwhile there was no harm in putting the insignificant morsel on his tongue, no harm in gripping the black man's shrivelled hand as the waves of sensation coursed through him.

Because he was back at Kurt's place now, and as he swallowed that too was a dream and he was back in America in Arizona, he was back with Gilda, he was back with the bearded man in France, he was back at the universities, back at the theatre watching that preposterous cartoon, back here again on the mountain-top meeting the Black Skelm for the first time. No, he was further back than that, he was a little boy in Mama's arms, he was crawling, he couldn't even crawl, he was kicking inside a warm darkness, he was only a speck of liquified life, he was nothing, he was—

Everything.

Instantly he leaped forward and upward. The plain faded away beneath him, faded out of focus. He had no eyes to see it with, but he needed no eyes. He was one with immensity and perceived everything. He knew he was still standing—somewhere—and still grasping the black man's hand with his own. But the hand was huge enough to balance a sun on its palm, yet insubstantial enough to feel no pain from its molten mass.

Far below (yes, it was below, there was still space and dimension, immeasurably transfigured as his body had been transfigured) the wheeling planets moved in inexorable orbit.

A voice that was not a voice, a mere beat observed in soundlessness, impinged upon his expanded awareness.

“Behold the earth,” it said. “A speck, a mite, an errant, inconsequential atom.”

Harvey—or that part which remembered Harvey—had a momentary awareness of the old theory of the world as a single cell in the bloodstream of a cosmic monster. But it was not a cell, he perceived, any more than he was now a monster. It was just a speck, as the voice had said.

“Is this what God sees?” he asked.

“I do not know, for I am not yet God. To be God is to act. And I cannot decide. Shall I become God through action?”

“What action is possible?”

“Only one. To destroy this earth. To rearrange the cosmic pattern by removing the atom from being.”

“Destroy? Why not save mankind?”

“God cannot save mankind. This I now know. God is great and Man is small. If left alone, Man will destroy himself. We alone can be saved—by becoming one with God.”

“I dare not.”

“Why? Do you so love the race of Man after what you’ve seen? Do you love the cesspool in which he wallows, the devices with which he brings about the destruction of others and of himself?”

“But I am a man.”

“No longer. You are in Limbo now. Not God, not human. There is no turning back. One must go forward.”

“I cannot.” Harvey—or the greater being that stood between the stars—turned and faced the black, brooding face—an image of immensity, intangible yet limned and luminous in space.

“Perhaps your life on earth was a sweeter one than mine. You did not see your people perish, and the old ways of nature vanish from the world. You did not skulk in a cave on a mountain-top for endless years, companioned by scavengers—nor feed, like them, on carrion corruption. Your skin was not black.”

“You hate the world.”

"I am above hate. And above love."

"Pity, then? Compassion?"

"For what? This insignificant speck, crawling with midges that will soon destroy it if left to their own devices?" The soundless voice thundered. "If there is pity, if there is compassion, let it be for one's self. I shall survive, in eternity. There will be other earths—"

"No!"

But the black, brooding face stared down and pursed its lips. Suddenly it blew, and spat. A cloud of ichor issued from the titanic, toothless maw. It spiralled, gathering speed and form as it fell, twisting into a tunneling black cloud.

The cloud encompassed the earth. The earth seemed to be sucked into the spiralling mass; its shell cracked and fire flared forth fitfully. But only for an instant. Then the spittle evaporated into nothingness and what it had encompassed was gone.

Gone? It had never existed.

Harvey—that which was Harvey now—turned and glanced into the great glowing face in the heavens beside him. But it too was gone. Not gone, but growing—growing to such size and at such a speed that it was impossible to perceive even a portion of its features. It was becoming space itself. The Black Skelm was God and had destroyed the earth—

Harvey's mouth opened, swallowing the universe in a soundless scream.

He could not follow the Black Skelm, grow into godhead. He could not go back to an earth which no longer existed, had never existed.

He could only scream, and merge into a swirling nothingness, a funnel that engulfed him without end . . . THE END

The Show Must Go On

It was intermission time, and the tavern next door to the theatre was crowded when he came in.

Several people nodded and waved as he strode by, but he headed straight for the bar. He couldn't afford to be distracted by conversation now. He was too deep in the role. That was the only important thing, concentrating on the role, planning the part he was to play. But a drink would help.

Peter was waiting to serve him, nodding and murmuring something about somebody who'd been inquiring for him earlier in the evening.

No sense answering and losing the mood. He just stood there and waited for Peter to pour out his whiskey and water and turn away again.

Then he picked up the heavy shot glass and downed the drink. Damn it, his hand was trembling; he'd spattered a few drops on his mustache.

"What's the matter, Pet—are you nervous?"

At the sound of the strange voice from behind him he whirled abruptly and let the glass fall on the bar.

"I beg your pardon?" he murmured.

Two men confronted him. One was burly, bearded, and far gone in drink. The other was only a youngster, pale and wide-eyed. It was the burly man who had spoken.

"I asked if you were nervous, Pet."

This was no time for a barroom brawl. Still, he had to answer. "Please excuse me. I'm not in the habit of addressing strangers," he said.

The burly man shrugged at his youthful companion. "Polite, isn't he, Clem? Not in the habit of addressing strangers, he says. Leastways, not male strangers."

"Father, I beg of you—"

The burly man pushed the boy aside. "Everybody's too damned polite. It's time for plain talk, Pet."

"See here, my name isn't Pet."

"That's what Livvie always calls you." The burly man swayed closer, his brandied breath reeking. "Livvie's my daughter, but you don't even remember her, do you? Well, that's the way of it. A big man like you—a famous actor, if you please—how's he expected to remember the name of every girl he's left in the family way?"

"So you're Livvie's father." It was a stupid remark, but he could think of nothing else to say. All he knew was that he wanted to get out of here without breaking the mood. He had to get out of here, before intermission was over.

"Yes, I'm Livvie's father. You see, she hasn't forgotten you. She still remembers how you promised you'd come back to her after the tour, for the wedding. But I guess you never really planned on that, did you?" The burly man nudged the boy at his side. "Isn't dressed for a bridegroom, is he, Clem? All decked out in that fancy cloak and those slick boots—you'd think he was going traveling."

Then the burly man's hand moved under his coat, and now he could feel the blunt muzzle of the revolver pressing against his ribs.

"You're traveling," said the burly man. "And I've got your ticket right here. You're traveling straight to hell."

This was intolerable. The mood was definitely slipping away now. He had to do something quickly.

"But you cant!" he said, and his voice began to quaver. "You don't understand, sir. I am an actor!"

"And a damned poor one, according to the critics," sneered the burly man. "But that doesn't matter. It doesn't change the fact that you're a blackguard and a scoundrel." The revolver dug deeper.

"Please!" He began to tremble. "Can't we discuss this later?"

“Later?”

“Intermission’s nearly ended, and I’m needed in the theatre. I’ve a role to play—a most important role. Afterward I promise to place myself at your disposal. We can talk about poor Lizzie—”

“Livvie!”

“Yes, of course, forgive me. It’s just that I’m thinking of my part.” He began to sob. “I beg of you, sir, spare me until after I’ve concluded my performance! In the name of the theatre and its glorious tradition, the show must go on.”

“The show must go on!” The pressure of the muzzle slackened. “Is that all that matters to you?” The burly man turned to Clem. “Oh, they warned me he was crazy, but I never thought—”

Clem sensed his indecision. “Father, can’t you see? They were right, he is deranged! No sense threatening him. Would you really want Livvie to marry such a creature?”

The burly man shook his head. He put the gun away slowly. “I’m not sparing you out of pity,” he said. “All I feel for you is contempt. Go back to your play-acting, it’s all you’ll ever be any good for. There’s no point in killing you tonight, because it doesn’t matter whether you live or die.”

The burly man spat at his feet; then he and the boy turned away in the crowd.

He watched them go, glad that no one had seemed to notice the little scene he’d just played. In a way, however, that was unfortunate, for it had been a good scene. One of his best. They didn’t think he was much of an actor, eh? Well, he’d show them yet.

Yes, there was the call now. “Ten after ten,” from the street outside. That meant intermission was over and it was time to go.

He walked next door, greeting old Buckingham at the entrance of the lobby. “You won’t be needing a ticket from me now, will you?” he asked.

Old Buck smiled and let him pass. He went through the lobby as the house lights dimmed, then strode down the aisle. In the darkness he could smile as he thought of the scene he had just played with the stupid old man.

He could loosen his derringer, the derringer which could have killed that fool any time he decided to pull the trigger. But no need to dwell on that now. All he had to do was get back into the mood, prepare for the better scene to come. The biggest and best scene of all. He hadn't really lied; the show must go on.

And now the show was going on, as in the darkness he found the balcony stairs and climbed upward toward President Lincoln's box.

Till Death Do Us Part

A coffin, an invalid, a snooping brother—these were the ingredients involved in Carl Somers' plans of murder. Even circumstance did its part to help . . .

ARDENT FEMINISTS, forever bewailing the fact that it's a man's world, have thus far overlooked a telling example of injustice—it is usually easier for a husband to kill his wife than for a wife to dispose of her husband.

This is particularly true if the husband is fortunate enough to be a mortician by profession.

Carl Somers came to this conclusion one night in May, and by the end of June he was ready to put it to the test. He had his plans perfected and all he needed now was the proper opportunity.

Everything, he reasoned, was in his favor, His wife, Celia, was a semi-invalid who had made no friends in the community. There would be no embarrassing questions asked when he circulated the news that she had gone to Arizona for her health; in fact, several doctors had already urged her to do just that, and Carl had spread the word around.

After her supposed departure, he could fake some letter from her, if necessary, but there probably wouldn't be much talk. And by the time anyone might become suspicious, Carl himself would have disappeared.

He planned to sell die funeral home immediately and tell people he was joining Celia in Arizona. Oh, it would work out splendidly, and he knew in detail just what he intended to do when the chance came.

There was only one fly in die ointment; a big, fat fly named Elmer. Elmer was Carl’s brother, and a sanctimonious prig. He lived in another small community about twenty miles away, and die two of them met infrequently.

But-Elmer knew that Carl had married Celia for her late father’s mortuary establishment, and he didn’t approve of this. He also knew that Carl liked to step out occasionally, and he didn’t approve of that, either. In fact, he seemed to disapprove of everything not connected with his own preoccupation with the church choir.

Psalm-singing prig! When Carl thought about his brother and his possible suspicions, he hesitated. If anybody would ask the wrong questions, it would be that fool of an Elmer; he was always so critical, always so quick to note anything the least little bit out of line. The mere suggestion of impropriety was enough to set him off; a word from him at the wrong time might be just enough to start the authorities thinking—and what was worse, investigating. And therein lay the key to all Car Is plans; there must be no investigation.

So all through June Carl endured his wife’s hypochondriacal, complaints, dreamed of the freedom so tantalizingly offered and so tormentingly denied by his brother’s possible interference.

And then Fate stepped in and provided him with an unexpected opportunity. For on the Fourth of July, Elmer’s wife died.

It was a sudden heart attack, sustained after a picnic outing, and when Elmer came to Carl with the news, he was desolated. Carl pretended to share his brother’s grief, but inwardly he was overjoyed. It wasn’t likely, under the circumstances, that Elmer would be snooping around or asking questions. This would be the perfect setup for what he had in mind.

So Carl set the wheels in motion. He explained to his brother that Celia had just left for Arizona by train, in obedience to doctor’s orders, over this past weekend. She had promised to write him as soon as she arrived at her hotel, but in the meantime it might be difficult to contact her en route so that she could return in time for the funeral. He’d wire her, of course, but he couldn’t promise—

Elmer didn’t seem interested. He was too distraught to-do anything but nod. His own grief overwhelmed him; he asked Carl to handle all the funeral arrangements, and then broke down completely in the midst of choosing a coffin from Carl’s simple stock.

In the end it was Carl who actually selected the casket for Elmer’s wife, and that suited him perfectly. He picked a nice large one, and after Elmer departed, Carl went upstairs and told Celia about it.

“You see, it has to be big,” he explained, “because you’ll be buried in it, too.”

Celia’s only answer was a gurgle, for at that moment Carl thrust the knife into her neck.

It was rather a messy job, cleaning up the bathroom afterwards, but Carl didn’t really mind. He’d done it so many times in his dreams that everything seemed quite routine to him now.

He dragged Celia’s body downstairs and laid it out on a slab, next to that of his late sister-in-law. He did a nice job on Elmer’s wife, and a conscientious one, using the best materials and putting in the fancy smilers at the edges of her freshly-rouged lips. He wanted her to look good when the mourners came.

With Celia he contented himself with a routine embalming and didn’t even bother with makeup. After all, nobody was going to see her. She would be out of sight, tucked away underneath the velvet lining of the casket, with Elmer’s wife resting above her. Nobody would suspect her presence there in the chapel. Of course, when the time came for the ballbearers to carry the coffin out to the hearse they would find it a heavy burden—but it was a very large casket, and they weren’t likely to complain.

They didn’t.

Everything went off; without a hitch, just as Carl had planned and hoped. The mourners came to the chapel the night before and paid their last respects; some of them noted that Celia was absent and it gave Carl the perfect opportunity to spread the story of her trip to Arizona.

During the funeral the next day, Carl had one or two bad moments as he sweated out the ceremony. His brother Elmer was a pillar of the church, and his pastor gave an unusually long and eloquent eulogy. Carl could hardly wait until the casket was closed. But the moment came at last, and he had Celia right where he wanted her. As he reflected that in another half hour she'd be buried, he could scarcely contain his elation.

Out at die cemetery, Carl thought the way his brother carried on was rather odd. At least he thought it was odd, until he returned to the mortuary after the funeral and found die tall man waiting there.

"My name's Swanson," the tall man said. "Sheriff's office. I hate to disturb you at a time like this, but I'm afraid I must ask you a few questions. Do you know if your brother and his wife ever had any differences of opinion?"

"My brother? Differences?—"

"I'll be blunt," Swanson said. "There's talk going around that they'd been quarreling. It seems your brother got mixed up with some girl in the church choir. His wife found out about it. We know she threatened to go to the authorities. We also know that a pharmacist sold your brother some cyanide last week, before the picnic . . .

Carl began to tremble violently.

Swanson sighed and put his hand on Carl's shoulder. "Sorry to bother you," he said. "This must come as quite a shock, but sometimes one never knows what's going on, even with one's own brother. Of course there's one sure way of finding out. I've got the permit right here. We're going to dig up the grave and re-open the coffin . . ."

Beep No More

LADY ROSE from her launching pad shortly before dawn on April 1st. She carried a full payload of sending and receiving instruments as she soared triumphantly into space, and officials freely predicted that she would go into orbit around the sun by April 5th.

S. O. Bushwhacker rose from his pad shortly before noon on the latter date. He carried a full payload of benzedrine and trsnquilizers as he soared triumphantly into his executive suite at UBC in Hollywood, and officials freely predicted that he would go into orbit today without hitting the ceiling.

Lady—or Unmanned Satellite 69, as she was affectionately known to the government observers and astronomers who tracked her course—fell into solar orbit around 3 p.m. The faint and intermittent beep-beep of her signalling devices reassured these who charted her progress.

S.O. Bushwhacker—or “old S.O.B.”, as he was affectionately known to the underlings and network minions who tracked his course—returned from a leisurely luncheon at Tail o’ the Cock and fell into his chair around 3 p.m. The faint and intermittent burping of his digestive devices reassured those who charted his progress.

Exactly what prompted Lady’s sudden outburst a half hour later is still a matter of conjecture. But there is no dispute as to what caused S. O. Bushwhacker’s outburst at precisely the same time.

He was sitting in his private washroom, monitoring a new network comedy show, about a group of loveable hillbillies, called The Real Rabinowitzes, when the explosion occurred.

Members of his staff rushed in from the outer office, fully expecting that the inevitable had finally occurred—somebody had planted depth-charges in the plumbing.

The plumbing, however, was intact. It was Mr. Bushwhacker who had gone to pieces.

“Did you hear that?” he shouted, gesticulating at the TV set.

“Hear what?” inquired personal secretary Crosley Sneed.

“The commercial!” Bushwhacker stabbed a shaking finger in the direction of the television screen. “Listen!”

Centered on the tube was the stern, distinguished face of a prominent physician. Like all medical scientists, he had one of those machines which light up to reveal a cross-section of the human body through which pills raced, arrows of pain darted, and small fires raged in the large intestine.

Crosley Sneed shrugged. “Looks okay to me,” he murmured. “Of course, maybe we could blow up that intestine a little more. Make it king-size, for greater visual impact, like—”

“Never mind how it looks!” Bushwhacker yelled. “I designed the damned thing myself. I’m asking you to listen!”

The prominent physician was pointing his index finger at the viewing audience, as prominent physicians so frequently do—with or without the benefit of finger-cots—and speaking earnestly.

“—and so remember, friends, modern hemmorhoids demand a modem remedy. That’s why leading scientists recommend amazing new miracle discovery, Preparation J—the only hemmorhoid remedy in the world that helps shrink atomic piles! If you suffer from the burning, itching torture of piles, why not limp down to your friendly neighborhood BEEP-BEEP today?”

“What did he say?” demanded Crosley Sneed.

“Yes, folks, that’s Preparation J—the new, quick-acting ointment that will bring instant relief to your BEEP-BEEP or double your money back! Remember the name—that’s Preparation BEEP-BEEP—”

“Hear that?” Mr. Bushwhacker exclaimed. Sneed and the others nodded; they heard it loud and clear. Punctuating every few words now came the BEEP-BEEP tones, blasting out of the set and drowning out the commercial.

“Sabotage!” Mr. Bushwhacker shouted. “We’re being jammed by another network. Get me Edward R. Murrow, that—”

“Wait a moment.” As is usual in a crisis, cooler and wiser heads prevailed. Fortunately, one of the staff-members was the distinguished psychiatrist, J. Hooper Trendex, who may be remembered as the author of that popular adult western series, Have Couch—Will Travel.

It was he who spoke, and now stepped forward to switch channels on the set. For a moment Mr. Bushwhacker’s jaws clenched convulsively; never before had anyone dared to tune in on a rival network here at UBC, and to do so now, in the sacred confines of his own private washroom—

But the deed was done, and J. Hooper Trendex stepped back as a face and voice emerged from the tube. An idiot child gaggled forth in a smiling, loathesome closeup. “Look, Mom!” the little cretin shouted. “No BEEP-BEEP!”

“Just as I suspected,” murmured Trendex. “All over the channels. This isn’t sabotage. It’s the signal from that new satellite they sent up the other day. The one they call Lady.”

“Mamma mia!” Mr. Bushwhacker groaned and seated himself on the sole available article of furniture in the room.

“I’m quite sure,” Trendex continued. “Radio signals have been coming in for days—just a faint beep at regular intervals.”

“But this isn’t a faint beep,” Mr. Bushwhacker protested. “It’s a blast! And it’s interrupting every few seconds. How can anyone listen to television with that noise going on?”

“I’m positive Washington is already aware of the difficulty,” Trendex soothed. “Perhaps something went wrong when the satellite began to orbit around the sun. They’ll take care of it down there. Meanwhile, people can always listen to radio.”

"Oh no they can't!" Otis Wormley, chief of the Radio Division, burst into the room just in time to catch the last remark. "All hell's breaking loose, Chief!" he gasped. "I just got word from the engineers. Somebody is beeping Arthur Godfrey!"

Mr. Bushwhacker sprang to his feet. "Is nothing sacred?" he cried. "This has gone far enough. Get the FCC on the phone. Tell them we want the interference stopped immediately. It must be stopped before we hit A-Time tonight. Don't you realize we're premiering the new western?"

All faces sobered. UBC was indeed launching a new western series—its twenty-seventh effort of the season, and undoubtedly one of the best. Sick and tired of cowboys armed with pistols, revolvers, derringers, rifles and sawed-off shotguns, the network had come up with a novelty designed to revolutionize the field; the first cowboy in television history to carry a machine-gun.

"Get moving!" ordered Mr. Bushwhacker. "We've got to save that show!"

His entire staff mobilized into action, almost precisely at the same moment as other staffs at other networks moved into the fray. They called the FCC and the FCC called the Department of Defense and the Department of Defense called the Top Brass and the Top Brass called the Top Scientists, but—

At 9 o'clock, when the new cowboy hero pointed his weapon at the crooked gambler and pulled the trigger, the machine-gun beeped.

"Holy Moley!" screamed Mr. Bushwhacker. "Why can't somebody do something?"

"You heard the reports," Trendex told him. "Nobody really understands just what went wrong. Apparently the sun's proximity did something to the sending devices—stepped up the signal and beamed it over to AM and FM frequencies. Engineers say it's up to a decibel-count of around eighty right now and rising fast. Just one of those freak coincidences, but apparently there's nothing dangerous about the phenomenon."

“Nothing dangerous? It’s killing the ratings, and you say it isn’t dangerous.” Mr. Bushwhacker gulped.

“How long do they expect this noise to go on?”

Trendex shrugged. “There’s no telling. Lady can orbit around the sun for years, apparently. And the signals should continue for the life of the satellite.”

“Satellite, schmatellite!” Mr. Bushwhacker smote his desk a vicious blow. “You realize what this means? We’ll get beeped out of business!”

During the days that followed, it seemed as if his grim prediction was all too true. Frantic TV viewers and radio listeners were promptly reassured as to the source of the strange sounds emanating from their sets, but this did nothing to alleviate their irritation at the interruptions. Nobody wanted to hear something called This Is Your Beep or follow the irregular rhythm of Lawrence Welk and his Beep-Beep music. So the sets clicked off, and the sponsors cancelled in droves.

Meanwhile, the volume and irregularity of the signals continued to rise. Die-hard listeners began to sue the networks because of headaches they suffered while attempting to listen to headache-remedy commercials. A mob armed with switchblades and zap-guns picketed the studios where American Bandstand originated, protesting that the beeps were destroying the beat of rock-’n-roll. Several prominent stand-up comedians laid down on the couch in utter frustration because while their writers had all come up with beep-beep gags, there was no medium on which the routines could be heard.

Finally, the President preempted the networks for a Special Message, but by this time almost nobody was bothering to listen. The few who did reported that he said little or nothing. Mostly, he just beeped.

“It can’t go on,” Mr. Bushwhacker moaned. “People won’t be able to get along without TV! Why, they’ve got nothing to do! Reports say they’re flipping all over the country—jumping off roofs, blowing their brains out, even reading books.” He paused, then resumed grimly. “That’s right, reading books. You know what that means, don’t you, Trendex? You’re a psychiatrist. You’ve heard what happens when people start reading. It gets so they can't stop. First thing you know, everybody'll be hooked, they can't kick the habit—"

"I know." Trendex sighed. "Another few months and we'll lose our audience forever. Not only are they reading now, but some of-them are even starting to go outdoors again. Taking walks, going on picnics, indulging in sports and games and their own home entertainment. You know what that will lead to. Sooner or later somebody is bound to re-discover sex, and then —"

"This is the ulcer bit! There's got to be some way out!"

"So there is," Trendex mused, softly. "I've checked the government engineering reports, and they've found a method. The trouble is, they can't afford it. The government doesn't have the kind of money we have here at the network."

"Then let's spend the money," Mr. Bushwhacker groaned. "I don't care what it costs, just as long as we get back into business."

"Very well," Trendex murmured. "We'll call a meeting of execs from all networks and raise a kitty. Each network buys its own satellite from the government—yes, they have them ready for launching, but it costs too much to send them up. We'll foot the bill, provided our engineers are allowed to install a frequency system to jam out and ride over the beep-beep signal. And we'll put in a projection system too—"

As he continued, Mr. Bushwhacker's eyes widened. "It'll cost a fortune," he commented. "And what about the set-manufacturers?"

"Who cares?" Trendex shrugged. "As for the cost, once you start operating again, you can always raise the rates and get the money back from the sponsors."

And that is exactly the way it worked out.

Two weeks later, to the day, UBC launched its first satellite. Promptly at sunset, Mr. Bushwhacker and his staff gathered at the window and gazed at the darkening sky. Behind them stood the inner-office TV set, silent and neglected. It would remain so from now on, and so would all the television receivers and radio sets throughout the country and the world.

Because now, up in the sky, the lights of the 21,000,000,000-mile screen brightened into view, projecting the picture from the transmitting satellite orbiting forever around the sun. And all over the nation, eager eyes sought the heavens.

Up there the tremendous face beamed benevolently at the multitude below. A huge hand flicked a switch and a cross-section of the human body appeared against the Milky Way.

Then came the historic moment, as the voice thundered clearly from the sky, penetrating palatial mansions and poorest tenements alike.

“Friends,” boomed the message from the heavens. “Are you one of the three out of four people who can’t visit the washroom after every meal? Scientists say—”

Down on earth, Mr. Bushwhacker wasn’t listening to what scientists say. He was hugging Trendex, and he had a message of his own. “It works!” he exulted. “It really works!”

“Certainly marvelous,” Trendex agreed. “This marks the beginning of a new era of communication. No more sets, no more aerials—”

“Never mind that jazz,” Mr. Bushwhacker said, as the voice in the sky proclaimed amazing new relief from harsh laxatives. He winked at Trendex, and grinned.

“The important thing to remember,” he said, “is that from now on, nobody can ever turn it off . . .”

The Man WHo Murdered Tomorrow

Can you imagine Jack the Ripper with an H-bomb instead of a scalpel, and a whole prostituted world to hate?

"HOW DID you get in here?" asked the General.

I shrugged. "I'm a writer," I said. "Writers have a way of getting into well-guarded places—as the husbands of Lord Byron's mistresses discovered, to their sorrow."

"What a character!" the General muttered. "You sound just the way you did twenty years ago." He paused. "Is it really that long since I've seen you?"

I nodded.

"Well, it doesn't matter." He smiled and extended his hand. "It's great to have you here."

"You're looking fine," I told him, and the lie did not come easily. His hand was cold and moist. His eyes were cold and moist, too.

"Thanks. Sit down and make yourself comfortable, if you can." The cold, moist eyes made a quick survey of the small room. There was nothing to see but the desk and the cot and the wash basin, and the bank of instruments lining the wall.

"Sorry I can't offer you a drink," he said. "But it's against regulations. They don't even let me smoke up here."

I glanced at the small bookcase which stood next to the cot. “You’re permitted to read, I see.”

“That’s the prisoner’s reward for good behavior.”

“Prisoner?” I grinned. “That’s pretty good, coming from a man with five stars on his shoulder.”

“Might as well be five numbers on my chest,” he answered. “But don’t quote me.” The lids narrowed over the cold, moist eyes. “Look here, you’re not after an interview, are you?”

“Of course not. Nobody interviews you. Nobody’s even supposed to know where you are, or what you’re doing. They made that very plain before they allowed me to visit.”

He sat down behind the desk. “Mind telling me just how you managed that little trick? This is top secret. I haven’t seen my own orderly in three weeks, and yet here you come waltzing in, just like that. How’d you swing it?”

“They invited me. Somehow, somebody found out we’d been to school together. Thought you might like to see one of your old friends, help pass the time.”

“They.” He said it like a dirty word. “Meaning the doctors, I suppose. They’ve been watching me for weeks, waiting for a crackup. Medics are the only visitors I ever have—they come around regularly with some tired excuse about a physical checkup. But I can see Section Eight in their eyes.”

“Sorry. I didn’t mean to upset you.”

“That’s all right. I know what you were supposed to do. Cheer me up, eh? Little talk about the good old days, wasn’t that it?”

“Well, more or less.”

“Then, if you don’t mind, I’ll settle for less.” He smiled again, but it was only a twitch of the lips. “I’ve had plenty of time to think about the good old days, all by myself. The subject is played out. Everything’s played out.”

He glanced over at the instrument panels. “I suppose they told you what I’m doing here?”

“In a way. And I can guess the rest. Even with the security lid, the papers are full of rumors. There’s talk of Condition Red at any moment now. And I suppose, when it comes, somebody has to press the button.”

The eyes narrowed again. “All right, so you guessed it. Somebody has to press the button. And I’m elected.”

He turned and faced the instrument panels. “As a matter of fact, there is a button.” He pointed at a small black knob set in the center of a large dial. “When the signal comes, I acknowledge it on intercom. Then I’m supposed to press the button. That’s all there is to it.

“I press the button, the planes and missiles take off, and all hell breaks loose. So simple, really, a child could do it. But they insist on a five-star General.”

He scowled, opened the desk-drawer, and pulled out a service revolver.

“Wait a minute,” I said. “You aren’t going to—?”

The General shook his head slowly. “Of course not. I’m not that far gone. Not yet.” He laid the revolver on the desk-top. “It’s just that I remembered regulations. My instructions are to remain armed at all times when someone else is in this room. Even the medics, or for that matter, the President himself. Because anyone could press that button.

“If they try, it’s part of my job to stop them. Button-pressing is an honor reserved solely for me.” The twitch-smile flickered once more. “And that’s funny, isn’t it, because I don’t have all my buttons.”

I stood up. “Now see here, Sam,” I said. “You called the shot right the first time. They did send me up here to try and give you a lift. But I feel more like bawling hell out of you. This self-dramatizing kick is ridiculous. You’re intelligent enough to know there’s nothing wrong with you except nervous tension. You’ve been under a strain, in enforced isolation. But that's no reason for climbing the walls. So let's not have any more talk about buttons."

"All right. But that leaves us with nothing to talk about. Don't you see, for a man in my spot, there isn't anything else that's important?"

He may have been ready to crack, but they hadn't given him those five stars for nothing. He knew what the score was.

But they'd sent me here to divert him, and there had to be some way.

I walked over to the bookcase. "Still reading detective stories, eh?" Stooping, I examined the titles. "But this is all non-fiction! Wertham, Lindner, Pearson. I see you have Barnard's old anthology, The Harlot Killer."

"Jack the Ripper," he said. "You did a story about him once."

"Who didn't?" I shrugged. "It's the kind of a case that intrigues most writers. Everybody has some theory."

"So have I." He tapped the desk. "That's why I requested this type of reading-matter. Sitting up here, I've had a lot of time to think about murder." There was animation in his voice now, and all at once I was listening closely.

"I needn't tell you anything about the Ripper. He's been identified as a monster, a maniac, a medical man; a sailor, a butcher, a foreigner, a woman. But I think I'm the first to recognize him for what he really was. A symbol. Jack the Ripper was the man who murdered an era.

"It was the Victorian Age which Jack the Ripper really killed, you know. The age of hypocrisy, of sham gentility, of maudlin morality. When the Ripper rose to carve his way to fame, the Victorian Age was doomed.

"A new spirit of scientific investigation was in the air. Some of the sham had already been shaken off. Then the Ripper appeared—in London, the very capital of the Victorian world. He emerged out of darkness; the darkness in which proper Victorians buried all their vices. His victims, appropriately enough, were prostitutes, whose very existence wasn't admitted in this pious, respectable age. But the Ripper turned the spotlight on them as he operated with the weapon of the new science—a bright, gleaming scalpel. In dissecting prostitutes, he dissected the whole, infected corpse of Victorian morality. Jack the Ripper murdered his age. His coming was the symbol of change."

I whistled softly. "Maybe you have something, Sam. Other unknown killers committed atrocious crimes, but it's the Ripper we all remember, Maybe it's because of the unconscious symbolism involved. Now, if you extend your theory a little further—"

"I have," the General told me. "Take Lizzie Borden. Look at the hatchet-job she performed on New England virtue! By the time that case was closed, old ideas of Puritan rectitude were dead forever. This nation entered the new industrial age.

"I tell you, Toynbee and Spengler should have thought of this! You want to know the truth about a historical period? Never mind its heroes—study its murderers!

"Interested in the economic collapse of Europe in the twenties? Read about Landru, and about the German butchers who sold human flesh in the open market. They smybolize what happened perfectly. And when our Depression came, we had the Cleveland Torso Slayer. Is there any better way of dramatizing the fate of the have-nots in that period than what he did to the tramps and derelicts who were his victims?

"The Forties had their symbols, too. Tortured kids like William Heirens. Remember what he scrawled on the wall above one victim's body? 'For God's sake stop me, before I kill more.' The perfect expression of the dilemma confronting modern youngsters in the dawning atomic age. We put a weapon in his hand, a weapon he had to carry and couldn't stop using. Youth couldn't have him, society couldn't save him. Now, in the Fifties—"

I nodded at him. "Let me guess," I said. "The Mad Bomber, of course."

He made a harsh sound which I had some difficulty in identifying as a chuckle. "That's me. The Mad Bomber."

"Now wait a minute. You promised—"

"Sure, I promised. I promised the Top Brass I'd sit up here in this little room and sweat out a crisis. It's all so easy. Just wait for the signal and press a button. I don't have to launch the missiles or guide the planes. I don't even have to know where they go, or see what happens when they reach their targets. But I already know the answer. This era is going to end, too."

"Please, knock it off! Maybe that time will never come."

"The time is coming."

"Forget it." I walked over to him. "If I were you, I'd work on that theory, instead. Put it all down on paper, think it through. If you can really symbolize the end of an era in its major murderers, then perhaps you can find a new approach to the whole problem. Maybe you've stumbled on an offbeat way of getting a real answer, the one we've all been looking for. It's worth trying, Sam."

A buzzer sounded, and I jumped. But it was only the summons from below, telling me that my time was up.

"Got to go," I said. "But please, promise me you'll play around with this idea."

"Occupational therapy, eh?"

"Call it what you like. But I'll be interested in your final conclusions."

"All right," he sighed. "When I figure things out, I'll let you know."

A moment later, I left. As the door closed behind me, he was back at his desk, staring glassy-eyed at the little black button on the wall.

I went right downstairs to see a man named Voigt. He wasn't an officer and he wasn't a doctor; officially, he had no title at all. But when he spoke, everybody jumped.

I jumped, too.

"Tell me about the General," he said.

So I told him. I told him everything, just as I've set it down here. When I finished he frowned and nodded.

“I was afraid of this,” he muttered. “What you say only confirms it. He’ll crack like the rest of them.”

“There were others, too?”

“Naturally.” Voigt spread his palms on the desk and studied the backs of his hands. “When we first set up this Alert, we placed a private on guard in the room—a simple buck private. Nobody minimized the importance of the assignment, but aside from the need for secrecy, we considered the actual duty to be mere routine.

“Well, we were wrong. Within forty-eight hours, the private had disappeared. AWOL. Fortunately, we managed to catch up with him before he talked. Heaven knows what kind of mob-hysteria might have spread if we hadn’t found him in time. But at least we learned one thing. We’d picked an ordinary private on the theory that a man of average intelligence would be too insensitive to react to the situation. That was a mistake.

“So we tried the opposite extreme. A lieutenant this time, a brilliant career physicist in civilian life. But he isn’t a physicist now, and he’s not a lieutenant, either. He’s a catatonic case, a hebephrenic curled up in a foetal position in the bed of a military hospital. It took just four days for him to break.

“The General was next. I’d hoped we’d found our answer. Military indoctrination, intelligence, maturity, emotional stability. An ideal personality-profile, in our opinion. We ran batteries of tests on several hundred candidates. None of the ratings showed a prognosis as favorable as his. And he’s lasted just nineteen days.”

“Why not just use all the men you tested?” I suggested. “Rotate them, on short shifts?”

Voigt shook his head. “Impractical. A single slip and secrecy is lost. With hundreds of men involved, or even half a dozen, there’s bound to be a leak sooner or later. No, we need one man. The right man.”

"How about yourself?" I stared at him directly. "You are a psychiatrist, are you not?"

"Never mind what I am. Titles and professional status don't enter into this problem.

I'll admit this suggestion was considered. But medical men are unfit, by the very nature of their training. We lack the emotional component to stand up under the realization of what would happen if that button were pressed."

"Maybe you're anticipating unduly," I said. "Maybe the General will hold the fort."

"After what you just told me about his theories?" Voigt sighed. "Symbolic murderers!"

"But I believe it," I murmured. "Look, I'm no psychiatrist, or penologist, either. But I know something about the criminal mind. I must have published several million words on crime and criminals through the years. I've studied and observed the destructive tendencies—"

Voigt nodded. "Of course. You've channelized your own aggressions, on paper. But we're dealing with reality now, not symbols. The man must be relieved from duty immediately."

He glanced up as a uniformed man strode into the room. There was no exchange of salutes or greetings; the man crossed to the desk and whispered a few words in Voigt's ear.

Voigt jumped up and motioned to me. "Come on," he said. "I was right."

I followed the two of them out into the corridor and up the stairs. We came to the little door. It stood open, unguarded. "Stay here," Voigt told the man. Then, to me, "You'd better come inside and see for yourself."

We went in and Voigt closed the door behind us.

The General was slumped over his desk, the revolver at his side. We could still smell the cordite fumes. Voigt walked over to the corpse but didn't bother to examine it. Instead, he reached for a slip of paper resting beneath the General's left hand.

“Read this,” he said, and passed the paper over to me.

The message was short and unsigned.

“Yes, there is an answer. Every age must have its symbolic murder. But today, murder is not enough. There is only one fitting crime and that is—self-destruction.”

I passed the paper back. “He must have done it right after I left. The conclusion was inevitable—modern man will destroy himself. What more proof do you need that the theory is correct?”

Voigt shook his head. “He just cracked under the strain, like all the others. One sought refuge in physical flight, one retreated into a psychotic fugue, and the General took suicide as a way out. There is no such thing as a symbolic murderer—it’s sheer nonsense!”

Voigt shouldn’t have said that.

Not about my theory.

Yes, my theory, of course, just as it was my typewritten note which I’d left next to the General’s body after I shot him with his own revolver there in the soundproofed little room.

It had taken me a long time to learn about the room and the revolver, but the rest was simple. After all, haven’t I been killing people on paper, year after year? My scheme had been foolproof, and I’m sure I needn’t have betrayed my hand even now. Voigt would wonder what to do with me, now that I knew the secret, and he would worry about finding a replacement for the General; then he’d finally put the two problems together and arrive at the only logical solution. He was ready to offer me the chance to take the General’s place.

But the besetting weakness of every writer is pride—and I had mine.

So when he laughed at my theory, I merely picked up the revolver and pointed it at his ugly pot-belly.

And then I told him. Told him everything. Told him what it really means to “channelize your agressions” as the stupid psychiatrists put it. Yes, the stupid psychiatrists who have phrases and labels for everything—but can't see the truth when it stares them in the face or pours out of their television tubes.

"This is the age of mass-media," I said. "The age of mass-communication. And it's the age of mass-frustration, too. So today's symbolic murderer has new weapons. The printed page, the motion picture and TV screen. Take a look around you and you'll see violence and horror whereever you turn; violence and horror supplied to frustrated millions by writers like myself. We're the symbolic murderers, using our own fantasies and projecting them because we don't have the courage or the opportunity to make our secret desires come true.

"Well, I've got the courage, and I've found the opportunity. Right here, in this room, with the panic button just waiting to be pressed. Now do you believe me?"

Voigt's face was just a gray, mumbling mask. "Yes," he whispered. "I believe you."

"Then get out."

I squeezed the trigger of the revolver ever so gently, and he got out. I locked the door behind him.

And then I just sat there. Sat there and stared at the little black button. For a little while I was quite happy. Happy for myself, and for all the other writers in the world who had to be content merely to cut the throats of paper dolls. Now I was all those writers, and I was Jack the Ripper, too, and Landru and Crippen and Hitler and Napoleon and Tamberlaine. I didn't have to do anything; the mere knowledge was enough. The knowledge that the little black button was there, waiting. If I wanted to press it, I could. I could press the button and explode the world.

And meanwhile, I could set everything down here, just as I've done, and nobody dared stop me. Nobody dared try to open the door or break it down, because I have the gun.

But I might have known it wouldn't last forever. I might have known Voigt was lying—that he really didn't believe my theory.

Because he came back. Yes, he came back and stood outside the door and shouted at me to come out, or they'd pump cyanide gas into the room.

He thinks I'm crazy. He can talk about killing me with cyanide gas and he thinks I'm crazy!

Well, there's only one thing for me to do now, of course. I must prove my sanity. That's the only way I can get Voigt to believe me.

You understand that, don't you? You believe it's true about the symbolic murderer.

Or you will, in a moment. Because I've just pressed the button . . .

THE END

The Bald-Headed Mirage

The four great heads loomed in the desert . . . offering riches, threatening doom. . . . Could they be sentient or were they merely

THE asteroid didn't have a name, unless one wanted to count the four-letter word which Chuck had used to designate it as he set the ship down.

Barwell didn't like the word, or any of the words Chuck used. Back in the old days, before space-travel, people with Chuck's limited and unsavory vocabulary were often described as "earthy." Barwell wondered what they should be called today. "Planetary" ? Or "asteroidy" ?

It didn't matter. What mattered was that Chuck happened to be a typical space frontiersman. Some day he and his fellows would probably be transfigured in legend as heroic interplanetary pioneers, just as the early settlers of the old American west had been transfigured. Songs and sagas would be written of their fearless exploits, their bold vision, their thirst for freedom, their struggle to shake down the stars.

But men like Barwell, who had to live with them now, knew that the space frontiersmen were probably no different than their historic counterparts back on Earth. They were misfits, antisocial aberrants who fled the responsibilities of organized society and the punishment of its laws. They sought the skies not out of poetic yearning but in a desperate attempt to evade bad debts, extortion charges, murder raps, bastardy warrants—and what they hoped to find was not the beauty of nature but the booty. They were led not by light but by loot—and because most of them were uncouth, ignorant men, they teamed up with partners like George Barwell who provided the brain to balance the brawn.

Perhaps, Barwell reasoned, he was being unfair. Chuck, like most of his counterparts, had more than brawn; he had natural coordination, natural comprehension manifesting itself in mechanical aptitudes. He was, in a word, a damned good pilot—just as the stumblebums of the Old West were often damned good horsemen, stagecoach drivers, bull-whackers, hunters and scouts. What he lacked in ratiocination Barwell provided. Together they formed a team—cerebrum and cerebellum, plus a psychic medulla oblongata composed of a fusion of component qualities.

Only by the time they landed on the asteroid, Barwell was damned sick of Chuck's four-letter words. Chuck had a four-letter word for everything during their long cruise—to describe the food, the confinement in the tiny cabin of the ship, his need for a sexual outlet. Chuck talked about nothing else, was interested in nothing else.

Barwell's own tastes ran towards poetry; the oldstyle poetry of long ago, complete with rhyme and metre and onomotopoeia. But there was no sense even mentioning the subject to Chuck; give him a title like The Charge of the Light Brigade and he'd think it was about the narcotics supply of some regiment. And as for The Lay of the Last Minstrel—

No, it was easier for Barwell to keep silent and let Chuck do the talking. About the . . . mineral deposits they were going to find, and the . . . money they'd make so they could go back to that . . . Lunadome City and tell everybody to . . .

It was easier for Barwell to keep silent, but not much easier. And by the time they were approaching the surface of the asteroid he was heartily sick of his partner, and his earthy aspirations. If George Barwell had invested his small inheritance in a second-hand ship in order to conduct a private sky-scan, it wasn’t because he wanted wealth to gratify his aggressive drives against society. He knew exactly what he meant to do with his money, if successful. He’d buy himself a little place out past Pluto and set up an interplanetary Walden’s Pond. Here he’d settle down to write poetry in the ancient manner; not the intermediate vers libre of the first space age or today’s soundspeak synthesis which had emerged from what the scholars once called “progressive jazz.” He hoped, too, to do some erudite and expensive research with the priceless tapes of forgotten folk-songs.

But there was no time for such speculations now, no time for poesy. They were skimming across the surface of the asteroid, off autopilot, of course, while the instruments tested for grav., ox., density, radiation, temp., and all the rest. Chuck was at the controls, set for a handland any minute.

Barwell got the tape comps and studied them. “We’ll do all right,” he muttered. “One and one-fourth grav. is no problem. But we’ll have to wear our bubbles. And—”

Chuck shook his head.

“Dead,” he muttered. That was one of the bad things about a trip like this—both of them had gotten into the habit of muttering; they didn’t really converse with one another, just vocalized a monologue interieur. “All dead. Desert and mountains. Of course, we want the mountains, but why the . . . does it have to be so dead?”

“Because it’s an asteroid.” Barwell moved over to within visual range of the scanners.

“You seldom find mineral deposits on inhabitable bodies.”

His mind played the usual tricks, contradicting his last statement. He thought of the mineral deposits he had seen in the form of gold and diamonds, ornamenting the women of Lunadome City; mineral deposits on inhabitable bodies. And that thought led him to still another; the lying premises of most of the “space romances” he had read, or for that matter, the so-called “factual accounts” of space travel. In almost all of them the emphasis was on the so-called thrill and challenge involved in expeditionary flights. Few were honest enough to present the reality of a spaceman's outlook, which was one of constant physical frustration. When he set up his interplanetary Walden's Pond, he'd make sure to bring along some feminine companionship. All spaceships were really powered with sex-drive, he decided. But to satisfy the libido required money.

"Look!" Chuck wasn't muttering now, he was shouting. And pointing at the starboard scanner.

Barwell gazed out and down.

They were at a half-mile elevation, over the desert, and the white sky shone pitilessly on an endless expanse of nothingness—the flat, monotonous expanse of sand or detritus was like a smooth, unrippled lake. A lake in which giants bathed, immersed to their necks—

Barwell saw them now; four giant bald heads in a row. He turned to Chuck. "What do you mean, dead?" he murmured. "There's life here. See for yourself."

"Stones," Chuck grunted. "Just stones."

"Look like heads to me."

"Sure they do, from this angle. Wait, I'll make another run."

The ship obeyed, dipping lower.

"Statues," Barwell decided. "Those are heads, you can see that now, can't you?"

". . .!" said Chuck. It wasn't a reply, merely a forceful observation. And now Barwell could see what he observed. The four heads set in sand were artificially carved, and in their eyesockets blazed a livid luminance.

"Emeralds," Chuck whispered. "Emeralds as big as wagon-wheels!"

"Can't be." Barwell shook his head. "There are no such concentrations of stratification—"

"I see 'em. So do you."

"Mirage. Some kind of igneous deposit."

"Why the . . . can't you talk English, like me?" Chuck demanded. "That's no mirage. It's real. Whoever heard of a bald-headed mirage?"

He began to snort and busied himself at the controls.

"What do you think you're doing?"

"Setting down for a landing, that's what."

"Now wait a minute—"

"What for? Man, those emeralds—"

"All right, hold it." Barwell's tone was subdued, but something about it caused Chuck to hesitate.

"Let's think things through for a minute," he continued. "Grant that there actual stone heads down there. And that they have some kind of ornamentation for eyes."

"Emeralds, dammit!"

"That's beside the point. The point is, statues don't come into existence through spontaneous generation."

"Will you for . . . talk English?"

"Somebody has to make statuary. Don't you see, there must be life down there."

"So?"

"So we land a good distance away. And come out armed. Armed and cautious."

"All right. Anything that shows its head, I blast."

"You don't blast. Not until you know what it is, and whether or not it shows hostility."

"Blast first, talk later." Chuck repeated the code that was older than the hills. The only good Indian is a dead Indian. Is prejudice a survival-mechanism?

Chuck's instantaneous, automatic response to anything new or different would be to lash out at it and destroy it. Barwell's would be to examine it and intellectualize. He wondered which of them was reacting correctly, then decided it would depend upon individual circumstance. But then, one must never generalize, because everything is unique—and this in itself is a generalization.

Barwell unracked the weapons, nevertheless, as Chuck went into reverse landing position. He opened the compartment and extracted the suits and the bubbles. He tested the oxygen-cycle of the containers. He checked the food-belts. He brought out the footwear. And all the while he was drowning in the muddy stream-of-consciousness. Bubbles arose.

Columbus, buckling on his armor before the landing at San Salvador . . . Balboa, that voyaging voyeur, peeking at a peak on Darien . . . Henry M. Stanley, being presumptuous with Dr. Livingstone . . . the first footfall on the moon, and the first man to scrawl Kilroy Was Here and disfigure the lunar landscape with an obscene injunction . . . a faroff memory of the California hills and a whitewashed message writ on rock; Help Stamp Out Reality . . . what was this land worth if those were emerald eyes? . . . Emerald Isles . . . when Irish eyes are bloodshot, sure, ’tis like a . . . but the eyes weren’t emeralds, it was a mirage . . . a bald-headed mirage . . . a mirage of convenience. What do you think about when you’re preparing to land on a strange and alien world? You think about what a wonderful thing it would be to be back in Lunadome City, settling down to a good meal of dehydrated eggs or a bad night with a dehydrated woman. Powdered women. A new recipe. Just add water and stir. Serves two. That’s what you think about, that’s all you ever think about.

And Chuck? What was he thinking about?

“Better make sure you use the relief tube before you put a suit on and go out there,” Chuck grunted.

That was Chuck, all right—the practical one.

And on this high note, the expedition proper started.

On the sweat of opening the locks. On the wrenching effort of lowering the landing-ladder. On the stumbling contact with the hard sand. On the wheezing accommodation to the oxygen-feeders. On the blinding brilliance of the garish glare, searing into the skull through eyes long-accustomed to half-darkness. On the trickle of sweat inside the suit, the tightness of the constricting crotch at every step, the heaviness of tank and weapon. O Pioneers—

"Oh . . .!" said Chuck. Barwell couldn't hear him, but like every spacer, he'd learned lipreading. He'd also learned to keep his own mouth shut, but now, as he turned towards the stone heads in the sand a dozen miles to their right, he broke his own self-imposed rule of silence.

"They're gone!" he gasped. And then blinked, as the echo of his own voice rebounded in reverberation from the bubble in which his head was encased.

Chuck followed his stare and nodded.

The heads were gone.

There was no possibility of miscalculation in landing. Chuck had set down within ten or twelve miles of the sighting spot. And Barwell remembered now that he had glanced sidelong through a scanner as he'd donned his suit and bubble. The heads had been visible then.

But they were gone.

Nothing on every side but an expanse of shimmering sand. And far beyond, to the left, the mountains.

"Mirage," he whispered. "It was a mirage, after all."

Chuck was reading him. His own lips formed a phrase. It wasn't exactly a reply—merely an obscene reaction.

As if by common, unspoken consent, the two men turned and trudged back to the ship. They clambered up the ladder, closed the locks, wearily removed their suits.

"We were space-bugged," Chuck muttered. "The two of us." He shook his head. "But I saw 'em. So did you."

"Let's go over the course again, retrace our route." Barwell waited until he saw Chuck nod. Then he sought a position at the starboard scanner.

"Waste a lot of juice taking off," Chuck grumbled. "Damn clumsy old tub!"

"If we find what we're looking for, you can have a new one. A whole fleet," Barwell reminded him.

"Sure." Chuck tested, then busied himself. There was a shuddering lurch.

"Slowly," Barwell cautioned.

Chuck answered with a suggestion as impossible as it was indecent, but he obeyed. The ship skimmed.

"Right about here," Barwell murmured. "Wasn't it?"

"Think so."

The ship hovered and the two men peered down. Peered down at empty wasteland.

"If only Mr. Eliot were alive to see it," Barwell told himself aloud.

"Who?"

"T.S. Eliot." Barwell paused. "A minor poet."

"T.S., huh?" Chuck snorted. Then he sobered. "Well, now what do we do?"

"Keep cruising. We'll head for the mountains. That's where we intended to go, anyway."

Chuck nodded and turned away. The ship rose, picked up speed.

Barwell contemplated the dryness of the desert, then refreshed himself by plunging back into the stream-of-consciousness.

Well, Columbus was disappointed with San Salvador, too; it wasn't really Asia. And Balboa never really stood upon a peak of Darien, except in the poem. Actually, he was at the Isthmus of Panama. Henry M. Stanley couldn't persuade Dr. Livingstone to return with him, and the first man to reach the moon was the first man to die there. And there were no dehydrated women, either, or hydrated ones, either. Water, water, everywhere, and not a drop to drink.

The feeling of frustration came again, and Barwell thought of the one woman he had truly loved, wishing she were somehow beside him now as she had been beside him once, so long ago.

“There they are!”

Chuck’s shout brought him wet and dripping tears of self-pity, from the pool of memory. Barwell stared down and out.

The heads rose from the desert below. The great eyes gleamed.

“We’re setting down!” Chuck told him.

Barwell shrugged.

Once again, the interminable routine. But this time, after both men were fully accoutred, they stared through the scanner to reassure themselves the stone heads were still visible, scarcely a mile away.

The heads stared back.

Then the locks swung open, the ladder swung down, and they emerged. Emerged upon the emptiness.

“Gone!”

Both men muttered simultaneously.

Then they walked—walked warily, weapons at the ready, across the barren plain. And walked wearily back again.

In the cabin, interminably, they argued and discussed. “Gone with the wind,” sighed Barwell. “Only there is no wind.”

“It can’t be a mirage. I saw those emeralds just as clear—” Chuck shook his head. “But if it was, why in hell did it have to be stone heads? When it comes to mirages, I’ll take—”

And he proceeded to describe his preferences in mirages very graphically. It was Barwell who finally resolved the situation.

“The mountains,” he said. “Let’s not waste any more time.”

So they went to the mountains.

That is, they went near the mountains, skimming in low for a drop-landing on the smooth sands before the foothills. They squinted through the shimmering sheen of the scene, but there were no stone heads; only the looming loftiness of the great peaks in the distance.

Leaving the ship, they set forth on foot to clamber and climb and curse. But in the end there were merely the muttered oaths. For there was nothing to climb. The mountains were merely another kind of mirage—palpable, but not solid. Mountains of detritus, mountains of dust into which the two men swiftly sank as they attempted to proceed.

"Volcanic ash," Barwell mouthed, through the bubble. "That's the answer."

Chuck had another answer, but Barwell ignored it. He knew now that their quest was quixotic. There would be no mineral deposits in the non-existent soil of this asteroid; it was merely a gigantic lava-splinter flung forth into space by the eon-old eruption of a volcano on some far-distant planet. Either that or a meteoric byproduct. The actual explanation didn't matter. What mattered was that there would be no way to wealth in this wilderness. They'd have to go back to the ship.

The two men turned, the grippers on the soles of their footwear useless in the shifting sand as they plodded down into the plain once more. Far in the distance they could see the black speck of the ship. It was hard to walk, but they kept moving as the speck became a bulk, the bulk became a recognizable object, the object became a—

Chuck must have seen it first, because he halted. Then Barwell squinted and stared. Even in the lurid luminence his eyes widened as he saw the ship; saw the crushed and crumpled hull that had been squashed and serrated—

Then they were both running across the plain, stumbling and lurching towards the wreckage. Everything seemed to function in slow motion, as in a nightmare, but the nightmare continued. It continued as they peered up at the incredibly battered silver shell; proceeded as they swung up the ladder and found the entry squeezed shut.

They stood below, on the surface of the sand, and there was no need to mouth a word from behind the bubbles. Both of them knew the situation. Food and water for a day, if they dared remove the bubbles long enough to ingest a supply. Oxygen for perhaps another twelve hours at most. And then—

There was no point in considering what had happened, or why, or how. All that seemed important now was the fait accompli.

"Fate accompli," Barwell told himself. And that's all he could tell himself, or trust himself to tell. Staring up at the shattered sides of the spaceship, he experienced a sensation surpassing horror. For this phenomenon was alien.

Alien. A much-used, misused word, which cannot express the inexpressible. A lien—foreign. Foreign to understanding, foreign to human comprehension. Barwell recalled Arthur Machen's definition of true evil—when the roses sing.

When the roses sing.

Perhaps alien isn't always synonymous with evil—but something had destroyed the ship. There was no wind, and no life; yet they had walked away for a few miles and returned, and the ship was crumpled.

The roses were singing. What is a rose? Barwell thought of a long-dead poetess, Gertrude Stein. A rose is a rose is a rose. And added, is evil. But do roses live, does evil live, does the impalpable truly exist? A rose by any other name—

"Dammit, what happened?" Chuck, and the voice of reality. He wasn't concerned with roses, or neuroses, either. He wanted to name the enemy, locate it, and strike back. And with the realization Barwell (like a rose) wilted.

Here was a situation which didn't call for theory, or for any form of abstruse speculation. The ship was gone. They were stranded, with food and oxygen in short supply. A clear call for Chuck and his pioneer blood—or would his pioneer blood, too, be spilled across the sand?

Barwell hesitated helplessly, waiting for his partner to make the first move. No sceptre changed hands, but both sensed it was a moment of abdication. The king is dead, long live the king. For another twenty-four hours, anyway.

Both of them knew better than to waste breath in trying to talk through their bubbles. When Chuck turned back towards the mirage-mountains, Barwell followed without even moving his lips in token assent. At least there would be shadow there, and shelter, and surcease. The desert held nothing for either of them. The desert was all utter emptiness and shimmering mirage. Once more, Barwell thought of a lake.

Lake. As he trudged along behind Chuck's steadily-striding figure, he wondered what would happen if—as in the olden space-romances, the aliens actually invaded Earth. They'd probably send out scouting parties first; perhaps one or two at a time, in small ships. Granted the premise that their sensory organs roughly corresponded to the human and afforded similar impressions, what might they surmise from a skimming expedition over the earth at a height of a few hundred miles?

The first thing they would note was that the Earth's surface is more than three-quarters water and less than one-quarter land. So the logical conclusion; if there is any life on this planet, the chances are better than three to one that it is marine life—or at the very best, amphibious. The denizens of the great seas must be the highest and most intelligent life-forms. Conquer the fishes and rule the world. A highly sensible notion, that.

But there are times when high sense does not prevail. And if aliens could not be expected to comprehend humanity's existence offhand, then how could humanity interpret alienity?

In short—was there life on this asteroid which Barwell could not detect?

While there's life, there's hope. But Barwell had no hope. He had merely a premise. Something had crushed the spaceship. Where did it come from, where did it go? How did it link with life as he knew it, how did it differ? And the desert—was it a desert? The mountains had not been mountains. And the mirage had been—

Chuck still wasn't wasting words, even obscene ones. He merely turned and gripped his partners' arm with a plasticene-and-metal glove. Gripped it tightly, and turned, and pointed with his free hand. Pointed straight ahead, at the heads in the sand. Yes, they were here.

Barwell could have sworn that the heads hadn't been there a moment ago. But there they were, silhouetted against the searing surface, a scant mile before them. Even at this range the emerald eyes gleamed and glared, gleamed and glared as no mirage was meant to.

Four huge stone heads, with emerald eyes. Visible to them both; visible to them Chuck's lips formed a sentence beneath the bubble. "Keep looking at them," he said.

Barwell nodded. The two men moved forward, slowly.

Their gaze was intent, focussed upon the lambent, livid flame of the monstrous emeralds. Barwell knew, or thought he knew, what Chuck was seeing. Riches, infinite riches.

But he saw something else.

He saw all the idols of all the legends; the idols with the jewelled eyes, who stirred and moved and walked amongst men to spread destruction with a curse. He saw the massive monoliths of Stonehenge and the great figures of Easter Island and the stone horror beneath the waves in sunken R'lyeh. And the waves reminded him again of the lake, and the lake of the aliens who might misconceive and misconstrue the life-forms of Earth, and this in turn caused a curious concept. There had once been a man named Ouspensky who had speculated upon the possibility of varieties of time and different rates of duration. Perhaps the rocks also live, but at infinitely slow pace by comparison to flesh, so that flesh is unaware of the sentience of stone.

What form might life take, if forged in fire, if birthed precipitately from a volcano's flaming womb? Those great stone heads with the emerald eyes—

And all the while they were coming closer, approaching slowly. The stone heads stared and did not disappear. The emeralds blazed and burned, and now Barwell could no longer think; he could only stare and he tried the old trick again. The cool stream-of-consciousness was waiting. Little eddies of thought swirled.

Emerald eyes. His love had emerald eyes; sometimes turquoise, sometimes smoky jade, but his love was not stone. And she was worlds away and he was here, alone on the desert. But that's not where he wanted to be—plunge back now into the stream, use the fanciful thoughts to ward off the still more fanciful reality. Think of anything but emeralds, think of longforgotten stars of a longforgotten art-form, the motion pictures; think of Pearl White and Ruby Keeler and Jewel Carmen and of anything but emeralds, think of Diamond Jim Brady and the fabulous stones of history which men wrested from the Earth for love of woman. Love is just around the Kohinoor. Faith, the Hope Diamond, and Charity . . .

Emerald eyes . . . Esmeralda, and the Hunchback of Notre Dame . . . Hugo's title was Notre Dame de Paris . . . the vast cathedral with its stone gargoyles staring . . . but stones do not stare . . . or do they? The emeralds were staring.

Barwell blinked, shaking his head. He half-turned, noting that Chuck had broken into a run as he neared the four fantastic monuments in the sand. Wheezing and panting, he followed. Chuck didn't see what he saw—that was obvious. Even at the point of death, he wanted the emeralds. Even at the point of death—

Somehow Barwell managed to overtake his companion. He clawed at his arms, halted him. Chuck stared at him as he shook his head and mouthed the words.

“Don’t go any closer!”

“Why not?”

“Because they’re alive!”

“Nonsense.” That was not the word Chuck used, but Barwell divined its meaning.

“They are alive. Don’t you see? Living rock. With their immense weight, the desert is like water, like a lake in which they can immerse at will. Immerse and reappear, up to their necks. That’s why they disappeared, because they were swimming beneath the surface—”

Barwell knew he was wasting precious oxygen, but he had to make Chuck understand.

“They must have grabbed our ship, picked it up to examine it, then discarded it.” Chuck scowled and said another word which meant, “Nonsense.” He pulled free. “No—don’t—keep away—” But Chuck had the pioneer spirit. The grab-claw-lunge-loot-rape reflex. He could only see the emeralds; the eyes that were bigger than his stomach.

And he started to run the last five hundred yards, moving across the sand towards the four staring heads which waited, watched and waited.

Barwell sprinted after him—or tried to sprint. But he could only flounder forward, noting as he did so that the huge rock heads were pitted and eroded, but not chiselled. No man, and no conceivable alien, had sculpted these semblances. For they were not semblances but actualities. The rock lived, the stone sensed.

And the emerald eyes beckoned . . .

“Come back!” It was worse than useless to shout, for Chuck couldn’t see his face behind the bubble. He could only see the great faces before him, and the emeralds above. His own eyes were blinded by hunger, by a greed greater than need.

Panting, Barwell caught up with the running man, whirled him around.

“Keep back,” he mouthed. “Don’t get any closer—they’ll crush you like they crushed the ship—”

“You lie!” Chuck turned, his weapon suddenly poised. “Maybe that was a mirage, too. But the jewels are real. I know your idea, you . . .! Get rid of me, take the emeralds for yourself, repair the ship and take off. Only I’m way ahead of you, because that’s my idea, too!”

“No—” gasped Barwell, realizing at the same moment that some poet had once said, “Say Yes to life!” and simultaneously aware that now there would be no time for further affirmation.

Because the weapon blazed, and then Barwell was falling; falling into the stream-of-consciousness and beyond, into the bubbling blackness of the stream-of-unconsciousness where there were no stone heads or emerald eyes. Where there was, no longer, any Barwell . . .

So it remained for Chuck to stand over the body of his partner at the base of the great stone head; to stand and grin in triumph as the smoke curled up as if before the altar of a god.

And like a giant god, the stone accepted its sacrifice. Incredulous, Chuck watched the incredible—saw the rock split open, saw the mountainous maw loom large as the head dipped and gulped.

Then the sand was smooth again. Barwell’s body was gone.

Realization came brutally, belatedly. Chuck turned to run, knowing the heads were alive. And as he ran a vision came to him of these Cyclopean creatures burrowing through the sand, bathing beneath the surface of the plain—rising at will to survey the silence of their dread domain. He could see a great stone paw emerge to fumble with the ship; knew now what the serrations in its sides meant.

They were simply the marks of gigantic teeth. Teeth in a mouth that tasted, rejected; a hand had tossed the ship aside like a crumpled toy floating on the lake of sand.

For one moment Chuck thought as Barwell thought, and then the thought was transfigured by reality. A gigantic paw did emerge from the sand before him as he ran. It scooped Chuck up and tossed him down into the grinding stone mouth.

There was the sound stone makes when it gulps, and then silence.

The four heads turned to stare once more—stare at nothingness. They would gaze silently for a long, long time through ageless emerald eyes, for what is eternity to a stone.

Sooner or later, in another thousand years—or a million, what did it matter?—another ship would come.

THE END

The Masterpiece

You talk of masterpieces, messieurs.

Well, I, too, have created a masterpiece in my time.

There is no need to laugh. I know what you are thinking—that it is the wine speaking. You fine gentlemen, you artists, thought to play a little joke. "Who is the old one, le pauvre, who comes nightly to this cafe to peddle shoelaces and paper flowers? Bid him join us, give him to drink until he grows tipsy, and we will have our sport with him."

You see I comprehend, and I am not offended. I myself have done the same many times, when gathered with my friends at the sidewalk cafes of Paris. Here in Buenos Aires it is much like the Paris I remember, before the war. But I was young then, as you are now, and I, too, was an artist.

You are looking at me, and I perceive that you do not believe. That is because I am aged and a peddler of shoelaces, an exile in this Argentina of yours. But I was an artist, and if I spoke my name you would surely recognize it. You will find my signature on a painting that hangs in the Louvre.

So, you laugh again. But it is the truth—I have created a masterpiece!

The painting of which I speak? It was my last finished canvas, a life-sized portrait.

Ah, you raise your eyebrows at that! Representational painting is out of fashion? This I know. Nevertheless, "Girl with Flowers" hangs in the Louvre, and it is as fresh and true today as the moment I completed it. Vivienne said—

Vivienne? Vivienne Surlac, my friends. She was the model, a tall dark girl from Bordeaux. She was like the wine of that region—full-bodied, richly sweet, and, upon further acquaintance, treacherous.

I did not know this when I worked on the portrait, though in my ignorance I fancied I knew her well. One does not live with a woman for a year without learning certain secrets: the mole on the left thigh, the heart murmur from a childhood ailment, the unreasoning love of sweets and pastries, the unreasoning fear of insects, the favorite song—

Perhaps you find these matters boring, but I assure you I was not bored during our year together. For I was in love with Vivienne, and the portrait was painted out of love, and it was in my mind to make her an honorable proposal of marriage.

You see, I did not know about the treachery.

When my affairs called me away from Paris for a week I left with a light heart, and it was with a light heart that I returned. My studio was empty; she had gone. From the concierge I learned that she had not gone alone. A gentleman had come for her. Gentleman! Her description was vivid and left little doubt—and when I inquired of my friends I found my guess confirmed. She had gone with Dobrieux. Max Dobrieux, fat Max who couldn’t paint a mural suitable for the decoration of a pissoir; fat Max, who used to sit quietly in the studio, watching me at the easel—and watching Vivienne as she posed. Often he brought champagne, for fat Max was also rich Max.

And that, of course, was why she went with him. Because of his wealth, because of the handsome little villa in the new suburbs beyond Versailles.

Now that it was, in effect, a fait accompli, my friends saw no reason not to talk. It seems they had all known of the intrigue; everyone had known except me. Love is proverbially blind.

Justice is blind, too, and so is rage. When I returned to my studio my first impulse was to destroy the painting. Then reason prevailed. The painting was without fault. As I said, it was fresh and true. The corruption and the falseness were in the model. In the name of love, in the name of justice, I would destroy Vivienne.

But not blindly. I went about the affair with my eyes open.

There was the trip to the villa, made merely to spy from afar and to learn that she was indeed living there with Max. There was the matter of arranging the phone call which summoned Max back to Paris because of the sudden illness of a brother. There was the hiring of the flics who taught the fat one a lesson, gave him something to reflect on as he lay recuperating in the hospital.

And finally there was my own journey back to the villa, unobserved, that same night. The steel was in my pocket and the cardboard container was in my hand, and of what was in my heart I need not speak.

Entering the villa was no problem. Justice is blind, but it can see in the dark. I made my way down the tiny corridor, into the bedroom.

She lay naked upon the bed, in the pose of Goya's "Maja," and when I tiptoed in she called out, "Max, darling, I've been waiting."

"You wait no longer," I murmured. Perhaps she recognized my voice, but by this time it did not matter, because I stood beside her in the darkness. My left hand swiftly pinned her wrists together behind her head and my right hand scooped the steel from my pocket. The handcuffs clicked as I fastened them, and she was helpless, chained to the headboard of the bed.

Then I switched on the lamp and she could see me. More important, I could see her—and for a moment I hesitated. Even her fear was beautiful to behold, because it was true, and one does not easily destroy reality.

But my love had been real, and she had destroyed it. And there, over the bed, was the painting—an ugly, grotesque daub, the sort of abstraction which wealthy idiots like Max buy because they are connoisseurs, because they despise representational artists who seek to show the truth. We are old-fashioned, so they mock our work and steal away that which we hold precious. Well, I would show them—Max and Vivienne both—that I, too, could deal in falsehood and treachery.

She read it in my eyes that she must die, for she began to whimper. No matter, for the villa was set well back from the road in a private park. She watched me as I opened the cardboard box. I held it up to the light, directly over her face.

I do not know what Vivienne expected. Perhaps she thought the box contained a gun, or a knife, or vitriol. Poor fool, she did not understand that a lover of beauty would not mar her body.

Slowly I tilted the box forward so that she could see its contents. Then she started to scream.

She screamed as she saw a score of black, wiggling figures, scuttling forth like tiny, furry monkey hands. She screamed as the box tipped and she saw the fatal symbols—the red hourglass markings on the bellies of the spiders.

"Black widows!"

These were the only words I could distinguish, because it was then that the screams rose—as the spiders fell. They descended upon the writhing whiteness of her body in a cloud of death; they crawled upon her and fastened themselves swiftly, surely.

I snapped off the light, and now there was only the darkness and the screaming. There was not long to wait before the screaming died.

And when I turned on the light once more, Vivienne was dead too.

I did what must be done, just as I'd planned. I unshackled her wrists, rearranged the coverlet, and gathered up the little wriggling horrors that marred her loveliness. Then I left as silently and secretly as I had come, left the villa and went directly to the airport. No one knew, and no one would ever know. And it does not matter now, because I am old—and because there is, of course, no extradition law here in the Argentine.

So, messieurs, the hour is late and I shall leave you. I trust I have not wearied you with all this talk of a forgotten masterpiece. But you, too, are painters; you understand the matter of an artist and his pride.

"Girl with Flowers" ? Yes, that is the title of my painting, and I assure you it hangs in the Louvre today, just as I have said. If it were truly a masterpiece, in it you could see the Vivienne I knew—the dark girl with the mole, the bad heart, the absurd fear of insects. But of course it is merely a good representational portrait.

No, you heard me right. When I refer to my masterpiece, I speak of the last bit of painting I ever did—the painting of those oh-so-real and frightening red hourglasses on the bellies of the harmless little spiders. . . .

Pin-Up Girl

Lulubel and I like attractive creatures of the opposite sex. Of course, Lulubel has her favorites and I have mine . . . After all, who'd want to pin up a picture of a tarantula? Ugh!

THE FIRST TIME THE PRINCE SAW Lani was at Ciro's.

She was having herself a ball—dinner, drinks, the works. Gibson was with her, and it was all part of the buildup. He'd even given her an evening dress to wear and she looked wonderful in it—or halfway out of it, really. Anyhow, everybody was staring and the camera boys kept flashing away, and she was really living.

Then the headwaiter left the card at her table. It had this name, Prince Ahmed, engraved at the top, and a single line of handwriting which read, May I have the pleasure of your company?

She showed it to Gibson. "Who is this character?" she asked.

Gibson rolled his eyes. "Well, really!" he said. "Darling, you can't be serious. Don't you even read Time magazine? Why they say he's simply rolling in the stuff, half a million a week or some such figure. Oil leases, you know. Absolutely *fab*ulous! He's here on some kind of diplomatic mission—"

"What does he look like?" Lani wanted to know. "Can you point him out to me?"

Gibson rolled his eyes again, until they came to rest at a point directly to his right. “Over there, third table, down front.”

Lani stared. She saw a party of four men. Three were tall and bearded; the fourth was slight, clean-shaven, and a bit less swarthy than his companions.

“That’s the Prince, the one without the beard,” Gibson told her. “Of course, he’s not exactly an Aly Khan type, but—”

Lani smiled at him. “Don’t worry,” she murmured. “I’m not interested. We’re doing fine without any greaseballs, so who needs it?” She put her hand on Gibson’s wrist. Ordinarily he disliked being touched, but this time he didn’t draw away.

“We are doing fine, aren’t we?” she asked. “I mean, this isn’t just a snowjob you’ve been handing me.”

Gibson licked his lips and stared down at her cleavage. ™ I told you the first time I met you, darling. I know how to peddle merchandise. And what you’ve got I can sell. Haven’t I been taking pictures for two months? Didn’t I spend a fortune on negatives, a wardrobe, that flack I hired just to spread your name around? The payoff is coming, precious, believe me. Not just the calendars and the art-photo bits, or the phony contests, either. I’ve placed shots of you in twenty-three magazines so far, and inside of another few weeks you’ll be lined up for fifty more. Covers, inside spreads, color stuff, the works! I’ll shove that fair white body of yours under the faces of every male in the country, from six to sixty. I’ll have them rubbing their noses between your—”

The headwaiter coughed discreetly and deposited a small white envelope in Lani’s hand. She opened it.

“Another card,” she sniffed. “This one just says Please.”

“Wait a moment, darling.” Gibson reached for the envelope. “There’s something else inside. Look.”

“Christ!” said Lani.

They stared down at the ruby. It was the size of a small marble.

Gibson smiled weakly.

“Christ!” said Lani, again.

Suddenly, she scooped up the gem in her hand. Then she rose.

Gibson turned away and faced the wall.

“Please, lamb,” Lani murmured. “I’ll just be a minute. After all, I have to return it.”

Gibson didn’t say anything.

“Well, let’s not make a big production out of this,” Lani said. “I mean—”

Gibson shrugged but he still wouldn’t look at her. “We’re shooting the beach series tomorrow, remember?” he muttered. “I’ll stall until noon. Try to make it by then, darling. Please?”

Lani hesitated. She could feel the ruby burning in her hand. All at once she turned and made her way toward the Prince’s table. The ruby was burning and she knew that his eyes were burning too, and she felt her cheeks burning as she smiled and said, “Excuse me, but are you the gentleman who—”

It was way past noon the next day when Lani awoke. She’d forgotten all about the photographer’s appointment, of course, and for a moment she didn’t even know where she was, what with the hangover and all. Then she recognized her surroundings; the big bedroom in the big suite of the big hotel. And she recognized the little man who was standing at the foot of the bed. When she saw that he was staring at her she remembered to smile. Artfully artless, she let the covers slide as she yawned, then stretched. Now the covers slid away completely. Lani waited for his reaction.

Surprisingly enough, he frowned.

“Please, my dear,” he said. “Cover yourself.”

Lani fluffed out her hair. “What’s the matter, hon?” she purred. “Don’t you like what you see?”

“Of course. It is only that in my country the women do not—”

"Never mind about your country." Lani held out her arms. "You're here now."

The Prince shook his head. "It is past midday," he said.

"What's that got to do with it?"

"I had thought you might be hungry."

Lani sat up. "You're going to take me to lunch?"

"Luncheon will be served here," the Prince told her. "It is already ordered and on its way."

"Then I'd better hurry up and get dressed." Lani jumped out of bed. "Here, lover, you want to hand me my things—?"

But the Prince didn't seem to hear her. He was already halfway out of the room.

Lani shrugged. The Prince was a strange one, all right. She'd have to tell Gibson all about it when she saw him. As a matter of fact, she ought to call him right now and explain why she was going to be late.

She located the telephone on the end table next to the bed. Just before she picked it up, she noticed the envelope with her name on it. Inside was another card, with the engraved name on it, but no writing. And underneath the card was a green stone. Lani took it out and looked at it. An emerald, twice as big as last night's ruby. First she stared at it and then she stared at the phone. Finally, she shook her head. Gibson would have to wait. She still intended to tell him all about it, of course, but he'd just have to wait . . .

Gibson waited well over a week before Lani saw him again. When they finally met it was at his studio. Gibson's own apartment occupied the rear of the establishment and it was there that Lani found him.

"I can only stay a minute, darling," Lani told him.

"Don't give me that minute routine," he pouted. "And you can skip the darling, too. What on earth has happened to you?"

"It's positively fantastic!" Lani sighed. "You remember the ruby? Well, the next morning it was an emerald, and then a diamond, and the third day a string of pearls. Then it was a jade bracelet, and yesterday a turquoise clip, and I swear I don't know how he managed it because we practically never left his suite all week. He had all our meals sent up and nobody on his staff has even seen me. It's like something out of the Arabian Nights—"

Gibson rolled his eyes. "I suppose that dress is out of the Arabian Nights, too. Where did you pick up such a ghastly abomination? Why, it comes way up to your chin?"

"He had it made for me. A whole wardrobe like that. He says that in his country the women are modest, a wife wouldn't even think of undressing in front of her husband—"

"So," said Gibson.

Lani put her hand to her mouth. "I didn't mean to tell you that way," she said. "Honest, I didn't. But he's going back tomorrow, and he's been begging me ever since I met him, and like you say, he's rolling in it. Why, he's one of the richest men in the whole world, I'll have a fortune—"

"Love's old sweet song," Gibson murmured.

"All right, so I don't love him. You can't have everything!"

Gibson's eyes narrowed. "You can't have anything," he said. "Not anything you want."

"I tell you, I don't care about the love part. Men don't mean a damned thing to me, not that way. Any more than women mean anything to you. But money—"

"You don't want money, either," Gibson muttered. "Not really." He went over to his desk in the corner of the studio and returned, holding out a sheaf of paper. "This is what you want," he said. "Here, take a look."

"Why it's my picture! On the cover! And here's an inside spread—and the glossies, these must be the mail-order series you were telling me about! Oh, darling, these are simply divine! Do you think they'll let us get away with this panty shot? Why you can almost see—"

"Stop squealing." Gibson was smiling again. "I told you the payoff was coming, didn't I? I promised you we'd be hitting the big time soon, didn't I? And this is only the beginning, believe me. Wait until we really spread that shape of yours around. You know what's going to happen then. They'll come running after you with their fountain pens just dripping—you'll get any kind of a contract you want; movies, television, the works! You saw what happened with Monroe. Mansfield, Ekberg, didn't you? Well, this can be even bigger."

Lani bit her lip. "Are you sure you're just not thinking about your end of the deal?"

Gibson shook his head. "Never mind that part. I ate before I ever met you and I'll keep right on eating, thank you. I'm not interested in the money, any more than you are, really. You don't want to be a star because of the money. You want to be a star so that they can see you up there on the screen. Millions and millions of men, all sitting in the darkness, staring at your body. Sitting there with their eyes popping, their throats dry, their fingers clenched into fists while they try to sneak a peek down the front of your dress. And then, going home and looking at your pictures in the magazines, drooling over the bust and torso shots. Putting your photograph up on the wall and trying to imagine what it would be like if you were really there, in bed with them."

Gibson stood so close to her that Lani could feel his breath on her face. "But that wouldn't do them any good, would it, darling? You know it—and I knew it the minute I set eyes on you. Because you're never going to fall in love with anybody except yourself. Your body, that's what you love. Your body, and knowing what it does to other bodies.

"I recognized that, and I realized what I could do with it. You'll never be an actress, but I can make you a star. You'll never be a real wife to anyone, but I can make you the love partner of the whole damned world. So forget this money kick. It isn't important. It isn't you!'

Lani stepped back. "I don't know," she said.

"What do you mean? Of course you know."

"All right. It isn't that. You were telling the truth just now, I guess. I do feel that way. I want them to look at me. All of them. Ever since I was a little girl, I've always felt it. The big thing is not when they touch you or try to do things to you; it's just when they look, or when you know they're looking and you can imagine what they're thinking—"

"I know," Gibson whispered. "I know, darling. Just like my kicks come from taking the pictures. From teasing them. From teasing the whole dirty, rotten world. So why not? We'll give them what they want, we'll get what we want."

"It isn't quite that easy," Lani said. "That's what I was trying to tell you. The Prince—he's big on this jealousy bit. I mean, I actually had to sneak out to get to see you at all, today. If he so much as suspected where I was —"

"Don't be ridiculous!" Gibson snapped. "This is your U.S.A., remember? Nobody comes around playing the oriental heavy—"

"Jesus!"

Lani's exclamation startled Gibson, but his reaction was slowed. He had just time to turn around and see the Prince step out from behind one of the studio screens, and just time enough to throw up his hands when he saw the gun the Prince was carrying.

But the Prince did not shoot. He merely advanced, smiling with empty eyes, and when he came close enough his arm went up and he brought the gun down squarely on Gibson's head.

When Gibson returned to consciousness he was propped up in a sitting position on a couch in the corner of the studio. The Prince sat in a chair across the way, smoking a cigarette. Lani was nowhere to be seen.

"I was concerned that I might have seriously injured you," the Prince told him. "So I thought it best to wait until I made certain of your recovery."

"How very thoughtful!" Gibson murmured. He rubbed his aching temples. "I guess I'm all right. And now, you'd better get out of here before I call the police."

The Prince smiled. "I think not," he said. "Diplomatic immunity, you know. But I intend to leave in a moment. If it will make you any happier, I am departing on my return flight tonight, ahead of schedule."

"You're not taking Lani, though."

The Prince inclined his head. "As you say. I am not taking the young lady. You see, I overheard all of your conversation together. That is good, for it saved me from making a regrettable mistake."

The Prince rose and walked over to the door. "As the two of you spoke, I was reminded of one your legends. The story of Circe, the beautiful enchantress, in whose presence men were transformed into swine. Lani has this power, the power of changing men into beasts. Her very image is enough to turn them into dogs, slavering and panting in heat. You think of her as a pin-up girl, but I know she is a sorceress. It is an evil thing, this power which the two of you conspire to spread, and I count myself fortunate to escape its influence."

He opened the door as Gibson stood up. "Wait a minute," Gibson said. "Where is Lani?"

The Prince shrugged. "When I struck you she fainted, and I took the liberty of carrying her into your apartment. I believe you will find her awaiting you in the bedroom. An appropriate place for a pin-up girl."

Then he was gone, and Gibson staggered back along the hall leading to his apartment. The light was on in his bedroom and he blinked as he stood in the doorway, forcing a smile. Might as well laugh it off. The Prince was gone for good now, and there was no harm done. He and Lani would be together, they'd go through with everything, just as they'd planned. Give her a big grin, a real watch-the-birdie look.

There she was, waiting for him. The Prince must have stripped her while she was unconscious, because she was stark naked now, standing against the bedroom wall with her arms outspread, and a seductive smile on her face. Pretty appropriate, all right.

Then Gibson took a closer look and he saw that the smile was really a grimace; saw that her arms and legs were not merely parted, but actually spread-eagled.

Just before he passed out again, the Prince’s parting words echoed in Gibson’s ears. “An appropriate place for a pin-up girl.”

It was appropriate, all right. He’d nailed Lani to the bedroom wall.

A Matter of Life

The salesman had a most unusual product to offer—and, for obvious reasons, only one to a customer . . .

IT WAS A BRIGHT AND SUNNY morning, but the thin man hugged the inside of the walk, staying within the shadows as he made his way carefully along the street.

He paused beneath the ornate awning of a Gold Coast apartment and put his small black bag on the sidewalk, setting it down gingerly as though its contents might be fragile. He drew a little leatherbound notebook from his pocket and opened it to the first page, peering carefully at what he saw there. Satisfied, he flipped it shut, replaced it in his pocket, picked up the black bag, and entered the fancy foyer of the apartment building. His long, bony finger pressed a buzzer beside a marker lettered Anderson, Julius T.

Exactly seventy-two seconds later he was standing before a door on the third floor, watching it ease open.

A woman thrust her head out. It was a most expensive sort of head; quickly he inventoried its assets—the thirty-five dollar permanent, the twenty-dollar dye job, the five-dollar tip to the beauty-parlor operator. In addition, he estimated the worth of the dangling miniature mobile earrings at perhaps another twenty-five dollars, plus ten percent tax. The face itself was decorated with easily five dollars' worth of assorted eyebrow pencil, eyeshadow, mascara, rouge, powder, lipstick, and dabs of perfume. Also, the sagging double chin had been lifted for a considerable fee; contact lenses were fitted to the myopic eyes and caps placed over the irregular teeth. The whole head, give or take a few pennies, must have cost at least two thousand dollars just for upkeep and maintenance.

And yet now, seeing it cocked forward apprehensively with a deep frown furrowing the brow, one could only conclude that the money had been wasted; it was still the head of a middle-aged woman.

“Mrs. Anderson?” the man murmured.

“Yes.” She glanced down at the little black bag, then straightened. “Come in, please.”

The door opened wider, permitting him to step inside, then closed quickly behind him. He stood in a spacious, deeply-carpeted alcove, gazing through to the living-room of the apartment. There was no need to inventory its contents or even guess at the fee of the interior decorator who had obviously ordered its furnishing.

Also, there was no time. The woman faced him, the maroon sateen sleeves of her lounging pajamas rustling faintly as she moved a step forward.

“I really wasn’t expecting you, Mr.—”

“Mr. Swift.”

“Yes.” She acknowledged the name with an impatient nod and hurried on. “That stupid Mr. Ross of yours, down at the office, kept telling me it was no use to even discuss the possibilities of a case, because I had no grounds. Of course, that’s utterly ridiculous, and I told him so. Even if Julius is good about money and doesn’t chase after other women, surely there must be some thing! I mean, no man his age is a saint, and I’m perfectly willing to pay a good fee, within reason of course, if you’ll arrange to—”

“Please, Mrs. Anderson,” said the man. “There seems to be a slight misunderstanding here. I’m not from your attorney’s office.”

“You’re not?” The surgically-lifted chin muscles sagged slightly. “Then if it isn’t about the divorce, what are you doing here? I mean, when I saw the briefcase, I just naturally assumed—"

"Sorry." The man shrugged. "It's not even a briefcase. It's just a bag. I've something interesting to show you."

"You mean you're a salesman? What's the matter with you, can't you read? The sign in the lobby says distinctly—"

"I saw the sign."

"Then what are you doing here? I don't want to buy anything." Mrs. Anderson waved her arm. "Please leave. I'm not in the mood for sales-talks."

"So I see." The man retreated a step, but only to set his bag down upon the rich pile of the foyer carpet. "From your remarks, one would gather that you're faced with personal problems. And it occurs to me that perhaps my visit is more opportune than you might think. A little distraction, even a sales-talk, may prove helpful." Slowly, he dropped to his knees and cautiously unzipped the black bag.

Mrs. Anderson stared at him curiously. "What are you selling?" she asked.

"This." A bony hand fumbled in the bag and brought forth a small plastic bottle.

"What is it, perfume?"

"Not at all, dear lady. It's a window-wiper."

"Window-cleaner?"

"Wiper." The man stood up, dangling the bottle between long, thin fingers. "Not an ordinary cleaning compound at all. It wipes away much more than dirt—it literally removes every obstruction, and will give you an entirely new view of the world. Oh, there's a definite psychological element involved, I assure you! Once you use this cleansing compound, your whole viewpoint changes. I would be only too happy to demonstrate—"

"No!" Mrs. Anderson spoke quickly and emphatically. "I don't need anything like that. My maid takes care of the windows. Besides, who ever heard of such nonsense? Why, there isn't even any label on your bottle, it's probably just something you make up yourself, out of water and a few chemicals."

The man nodded slowly. "You're right, of course," he said. "I do make it myself. And of course I use chemicals. Funny your mentioning that. Some of the chemicals are quite unusual. Odorless, colorless, undetectable. Strong enough so that a drop applied to a window will wipe away any stain without leaving a trace of its presence. Strong enough so that a drop placed in a cup of coffee will wipe away life itself—again, without leaving a single trace of its presence. One must therefore be most careful about using this solution. You would be careful, wouldn't you?"

Mrs. Anderson nodded at him now—at him, but to herself. "It really works, you say?"

"I assure you that used properly it will brighten your entire outlook on life."

"How much?"

The man shrugged. "Let's call this a free sample." He held out the bottle.

Mrs. Anderson reached for it, then drew back. "But suppose it—it doesn't work?"

"It will. There's never any difficulty. Take it."

"Maybe I should think it over."

"Dear lady, I'm afraid this is your only opportunity. I won't be coming this way again for some time."

Mrs. Anderson's fingers worked. "You wouldn't be back, then? I mean, in case of trouble—"

"No. I make only one call to a customer."

Mrs. Anderson closed her eyes for a moment and took a deep breath as she reached out her hand. The man placed the bottle in her palm, scooped up his bag, opened the door and made his exit—all in the few seconds that her eyes were closed. When she opened them again, he was gone.

And an hour later he was ringing the doorbell of the neat suburban ranch-house out in Skokie, staring out of the shadows at the harassed face of the young housewife who greeted him with an impatient gesture. The hand which waved him inside held a dust-cloth. She blinked at him through thick glasses.

"Honestly," she sighed, "I thought you'd never get here! What with the kids and the housework and all and having to run back and forth between here and the hospital every day, I'm just about out of my mind."

"I'm sorry, Mrs. Baker," he said. "I came as quickly as I heard."

He glanced around the disorder of the front room, staring at the litter of toys, the playpen in the corner, the soggy diapers tossed into one corner.

The young woman brushed her hand across the damp curls plastered across her forehead and removed her spectacles with a weary shrug.

"You see how it is," she said. "The place is such a mess I don't even know where to tell you to sit down."

"That's all right, Mrs. Baker. I'll just be a minute."

"A minute? With all we've got to discuss?" She put the glasses back on. "I told the man at the agency what a spot we're in, and he said there just wouldn't be any way of working something out. Can you imagine that? Ben in the hospital with a broken spine, paralyzed for life, and me stuck here with the three kids and he tells me that! Not a penny of. accident insurance, either. If he died, I'd collect fifty thousand dollars of life insurance from your firm, but when it comes to an accident like this, they say there isn't one red cent I can collect. And he'll never be up and working at sales again, the hospital is eating up our last penny, they can't even promise to stop the pain, and what am I going to do?"

"I really don't know, Mrs. Baker," the man said. "You see, I'm not from the insurance agency."

"Then where did you get my name?"

"There are sources for such information."

"Oh." She blinked at him through her spectacles. "But who are you? What do you want?"

“My name is Mr. Quick. I’ve come to give you a free sample, something to help you.” He put down his bag delicately in the center of the cheap inlaid carpeting. “I have here a preparation which works wonders on window-glass—or on spectacles, too, for that matter. One drop, properly applied, and you’ll really be looking at the world through rose-colored glasses—”

Two hours later the man was back across town, walking through a tangle of tenements on South Halstead. He hadn’t stopped for lunch.

He paused in a dim areaway and consulted his notebook, then nodded to himself and plunged into a dank and darkened doorway. Four flights of stairs creaked beneath his feet before he reached the landing he sought and knocked briskly on a door from which all paint had peeled.

“Mrs. Connors?” he called.

“Go away!” The voice from behind the door was muffled, sullenly monotonous.

The man knocked again.

“Go away!” the sullen voice repeated. “The Mister ain’t here.”

“I came to see you. Open up, please.”

“You from the police? I tell ya, he ain’t here.” But she opened the door and shook her frowsy head, squinting at him through red-rimmed eyes framed by larger bluish-black circles. “Coupla beauties, ain’t they?” she muttered. “The dirty rat give ’em to me. That’s all I ever get from him. You can’t prove by me that he pulls any of them big bank jobs you cops always think he’s pulling . . . I wish you guys could pin a real rap on him, something that’ll send him up for twenty years, maybe? Hell, I’d like to see him get life, that’s what he deserves. And that’s the only way I’ll ever get rid of him.”

He edged through the door and into the squalid room. “Perhaps I’d better explain, Mrs. Connors. I’m not from the police department.”

“No? Then who the hell—”

“The name is Fast. And I’ve got something here that might interest you.” He glanced at the six-pack and the big dime-store goblet on the kitchen table, then put his black bag down beside them with fastidious care. “You see, it’s a little something that cleans beer-glasses. And that’s not all. If there’s anything you want to get rid of—”

Early afternoon along LaSalle Street, and the shadows slanted sharply as the man entered the brokerage office. He took off his hat politely before he bent over to give his message to the receptionist. Her own smile faded as she heard what he had to say; then she rose and disappeared into another room. In a few moments she was back, beckoning for him to enter the private, panelled sanctum beyond the big mahogany door.

A fat, baldheaded man looked up from behind a kidney-shaped desk.

“Yes?” he snapped. “Now what’s all this nonsense my girl tells me? Something about a matter of life and death—”

“Exactly.” The man smiled and began to open his little black bag. “A matter of life and death. I have here a preparation for which you will pay me ten thousand dollars in cash. It is something which I assure you is absolutely essential to your welfare.”

“Look here, I’m a busy man—”

“I know that, and I won’t take much of your time. I’m sure only a few words of explanation will be necessary. As it so happens, I still have two other similar calls to make after I leave you this afternoon. Now, about this little preparation of mine. It’s the only antidote to an undetectable poison, Mr. Anderson . . .”

The Beautiful People

When Jimmie Hartnett came back to Highland Springs he was twenty-five years old, and there was some argument as to just how he looked.

According to the matronly friends of his late mother, he resembled a Greek god. Their daughters, on the other hand, were more apt to describe him as a "living doll." But everyone agreed that he was an extremely handsome young man.

Since Jimmie Hartnett was a lieutenant (j.g.) on terminal leave, it was quite proper for him to wear his dress uniform on formal occasions—and there were formal occasions aplenty, once the matrons and their daughters got a glimpse of him. The uniform did things for his curly brown crewcut, his deep tan, his blue eyes. In a month or so he'd probably have to content himself with the gray flannel suit which is the normal attire of young men in even so prosperous a suburb as Highland Springs, but meanwhile he cut an impressive figure at the country club.

And it was there, during the third set of a Saturday night dance, that he met Millicent Tavish.

Somebody—it doesn't really matter who, and Jimmie never remembered—led him over and introduced him to the tall, slim blonde wearing the diamond earrings. Jimmie acknowledged the introduction with his standard boyish grin and offered the standard invitation for the next dance, with his standard warning that he was not a very good dancer. This was nonsense, of course, for Jimmie was an excellent performer both on and off the dance-floor, and nobody was more aware of it than himself.

But genuine blondes wearing genuine diamond earrings are a rarity indeed, and Jimmie was quite determined to make an impression. He was all set to lead off with a few opening remarks—perhaps something about how unusual it was to discover a wild orchid in suburbia—when Millicent Tavish took the play away from him.

"You don't remember me, do you?" she asked.

Jimmie stared down at the upturned face. Pale complexion, flushed cheeks, downcast eyes told him nothing, except that the girl was inwardly excited by his presence. A good thing, but no clue. Nose slightly snub, firm chin, even teeth, high cheekbones, straight hair—Jimmie catalogued her features, thinking what a pity it was he seldom retained a memory of faces. He was much better on bodies. When it came to a matter of breasts and thighs (as it so frequently did) his memory was encyclopedic. But this was neither the time nor the place, unfortunately, and besides he was quite certain he had never been closer to this particular female than he was at present. All he could do was grin and stall for time.

"Think hard, now," she was saying. "It's over six years since you went away to college and the Navy, and you'll have to go further back than that. I used to live on Williams Street. Millie Tavish. Does that help any?"

Jimmie blinked at her and came to a standstill over in a corner of the dance-floor.

"Millie," he said. "Now I remember. Millie the—"

He stopped quickly, conscious that his ears were reddening, but she gave a little laugh and pressed his hand with a moist palm.

"Go ahead and say it," she told him. "Millie the Mule. After all, you're the one who christened me, aren't you? You must have called me that a thousand times."

"No," said Jimmie.

"But you did. And you used to pull my hair—"

"That isn't what I meant. I meant, 'No, it can't be.' Come out here and let me get a good look at you."

“On the terrace? There isn’t much light there.” But she came willingly enough, and when he tilted her face she bore his scrutiny with a soft smile.

“I can’t believe it,” he muttered. “Millie Tavish. You were just a scrawny little kid with freckles and buck teeth.” He flushed. “Sounds like the dialogue in one of those corny movies, doesn’t it?”

Her smile broadened. “Yes. And then I remind you that I was seventeen when you left town, and a girl grows up in six years.”

“Yes, but—”

“I know what you’re thinking,” she murmured. “I didn’t just grow up, did I? You want to know what became of the teeth that stuck out, and the big nose, and the long chin. You want to know what happened to Millie the Mule.”

“Please.”

“Don’t worry, I want to tell you. You, more than anyone else. Because you did it.”

Her palm was very wet now, but she gripped his hand tightly. “This isn’t a movie, Jimmie. This isn’t the scene where the hero comes back and finds the ugly duckling transformed into a lovely swan. I was an ugly duckling, but there was no chance I’d ever just outgrow it. I could have been Millie the Mule all my life, the way you thought of me.”

“Kids are kind of cruel, I guess,” Jimmie said.

“ ‘Kind of’ cruel? They’re monsters.” Her voice faltered, then went on. “You’ll never know how bad it was, Jimmie. But I might have stood it, if it hadn’t been for you. Even then I was sure you’d be coming back some day. So that’s why I had myself changed.”

“Had yourself—?”

“Three years ago, after Dad and Mommy died, in the crash on the turnpike. But you didn’t hear about that, did you?”

“I’m sorry.”

“I’m not. Maybe it’s a dreadful thing to say, but I’m almost glad. Dad never paid any attention to me, he’d always wanted a boy. And Mom was ashamed of the way I looked. She used to nag me, and worry out loud about what would happen after she was gone and I'd be all alone in the world. I think she hated me, really."

"Millie, you mustn't talk about it."

"But I must. It's important. I want to tell you what happened. When the folks died, and I came into the estate, I didn't go back to college. I went into the hospital instead. Dr. Madison worked on me. Everybody says he's the best plastic surgeon in this part of the country. Do you think he did a good job?"

"You're beautiful."

"Do you really mean that?"

"You're a beautiful woman, Millie."

"It took a long time, Jimmie. And it hurt, quite a lot. But it was worth it, to hear you say that."

Jimmie smiled down at her. She was beautiful; the doctor had done his work so well that you couldn't even see the scars. And he could see the way her eyes were shining, and he could see the diamond earrings sparkling too, and this made him remember that old man Tavish had been loaded. He must have left his only daughter a fortune. All at once Jimmie wasn't worried about exchanging his uniform for a gray flannel suit. Why not a yachting outfit, for example? Besides, there comes a time when a man ought to think about settling down.

He put his hands on Millie's bare shoulders, conscious that she was trembling.

"Would you like me to tell you more, darling?" he murmured . . .

It was a big wedding in the big church, with the biggest crowd, the biggest reception, and just about the biggest spread on the society page. And the honeymoon was big, too.

They went to Bermuda, and they were very happy together. Jimmie was accustomed to being happy, of course, but it seemed an almost overwhelming experience for Millie. He couldn't quite understand it when, after making love, she would whisper to him, “Darling, that was like the tolling of great bells.”

But Millie often talked that way. Apparently she’d been a great one for reading during her lonely adolescence, and even now she spent a lot of time with her nose buried in a book.

Jimmie didn’t go for that; he’d read his share of books in college, but even then it had come hard. He’d been grateful for the help of chicks like whatever her name was; some little redhead he’d shacked up with all during his senior year.

The point was, no sense wasting time on reading now. He’d cracked his last exam, and he wouldn’t be boning up for any job, either. Not with all the loot Millie had. Be enough of a nuisance just keeping track of the income from the estate, and running the big house back in Highland Springs.

He wasn’t anxious to go back, and even talked to Millie about buying a yacht, but she didn’t go for the idea. Then he suggested they hop a plane to Jamaica and hook up with a luxury cruise through the Caribbean. They’d met another young couple in Nassau, the Wilsons, and they could travel together.

Millie rejected that notion, too. Maybe she had some sneaking idea about Mrs. Wilson. A lush little number, no doubt about it, and she did wave her eyelashes and other things when Jimmie was around, but Millie should have known better. A guy doesn’t step out of line when he’s on his honeymoon. Anyway, he had his hands full the way it was.

But Millie wanted to go home, so they returned to Highland Springs and opened the big house. There was a lot of excitement about redecorating and refurnishing, and Jimmie let her handle everything.

What got him excited was the new four-car garage and its contents: the big Lincoln, the Caddy station-wagon, Millie’s convertible and the loaded Jag she bought him on their first month’s anniversary. When he got the Jag he insisted on putting in a fancy selection of tools and equipment; there was plenty of room in the garage, and he liked to putter around with engines.

Not that he had much time for it, because the minute the house was ready, Millie began to throw parties. She'd hire a caterer and a big staff and invite a gang over, and she really had herself a ball playing hostess and introducing Jimmie to all the big wheels and their wives. You could see she got a large charge out of showing him off.

Jimmie didn't get such a big bang out of it. Oh, it was nice at first, but the novelty wore off. And the people were cubes. Every once in a while some fluff turned up, only there was no chance to do anything about it. Jimmie watched his step, and he was almost glad when Millie decided she'd had enough of parties for a while.

Then it was just sitting around, mostly; Millie liked to read, and he'd go out and putter with the Jag. They didn't talk very much about plans. Once or twice she brought up the subject of kids, but Jimmie thought it would be better if they waited a while and enjoyed life while they were still young. He tried to interest her in another trip, and she said not now, next year perhaps, and didn't he like it here?

Of course there was only one answer to that. Only one answer she seemed to want. And since they were alone together so much, he had no choice. Millie just couldn't seem to realize that there comes a time when the honeymoon is over.

That's why she wouldn't hire any permanent servants. This was ridiculous, with all their dough, but she said she liked to cook for him and take care of him all by herself. At first it seemed kind of flattering, the way she fussed over him, even picking out the clothes he wore, but when he realized she was often in the habit of just sitting there and watching his face as he slept, Jimmie began to feel like a damned fool.

Finally, along about the fourth month, he faced up to the truth like a man. Millie was beginning to give him a distinct pain. Might as well be honest about it—there were a lot of things about the woman which disappointed him.

For instance, that doctor's job hadn't been one hundred per cent perfect. True, he'd left no scars, but when Millie was out in the harsh sunlight or felt particularly dragged, you could see her face wasn't quite natural. Her nose and chin looked too waxy, and when she smiled her lips went crooked. Maybe he was just being self-conscious, because he could remember Millie the Mule. But whatever it was, it bothered him. Especially when he had to kiss her, which was frequently.

That was the real reason for his gripe; she just couldn't let him alone. At first he'd been surprised at the way she responded, but in a way it had been sort of a tribute to his personality and good looks. Jimmie was used to that. But now there was more than response—there was demand.

Jimmie knew that any virile male like himself wants to be the aggressor; that was the man's job, to get his kicks from the challenge, the chase, the conquest. But here there was no challenge, no chase, and he was beginning to suspect that the real conquest was Millie's.

Of course, there was nothing he could do about it. He was a married man, and a married man just doesn't walk off and leave his wife just because she loves him. That would be a sneaky thing to do. And as for walking away from a million bucks—that would be downright crazy.

A smart guy plays the game. He may stall a little, encourage his wife to get interested in bridge parties and trips with "the girls," and try to spend more time himself out in the garage or with the car.

At first this didn't seem to work, because Millie wanted to come along when he took the Jag out for a spin. But she had a sort of a thing about high speeds, and when he found that out it was easy to discourage her. Then, when he told her about joining the Sports Car Club, she wasn't interested at all. By this time she was up to her neck in suburban social life; she got her satisfaction out of visiting with all the old school friends around town—girls who had probably snubbed her but good back in the days when she was Millie the Mule.

Jimmie wondered if she lorded it over them now, particularly the ones who'd married potbellied little junior execs or guys with horn-rims who had to lug their briefcases onto the 8:10 every morning. If so, he could understand that; under similar circumstances, he'd give them a hard time.

But it didn’t matter, as long as she was interested and kept out of his way. Because he was finding his satisfaction, too.

Her name was Peggy. Peggy Allen.

He’d met her through the club, and she had a Porsche, but she preferred a Jag. She was only a kid, nineteen or so, and she had some dumb ape of a boyfriend who was crazy about drag races; it was very convenient when he went off to school in September.

To be perfectly frank about it, maybe she really wasn’t any goddess, but she knew how to keep a guy interested. Half the club was after her, and she played the field, but she was no pushover. When it came to wrestling, she knew all the holds. But the more she stalled him, the more Jimmie wanted her. And she couldn’t fool him: he knew damned good and well it was mutual. All he needed was the time and place. Meanwhile, Jimmie was beginning to feel more like himself again. He was having a few laughs, a little excitement. At the same time, there was the big thing of knowing it wasn’t really serious. Just a little fun on the side. Hell, at twenty-five, a man is just hitting his stride. He doesn’t want to curl up in a corner and die. And since there was no question about ever leaving Millie, he had nothing to worry about. No reason why he couldn’t enjoy himself. All he needed now was opportunity.

When the opportunity came, it happened so fast he almost muffed it.

Millie wanted to take a run into Cleveland with a couple of “the girls” to see some damned ballet troupe or other. They’d stay over a day and do some shopping; would he like to come along?

Well, there was no trouble getting out of that one. Besides, he had a golf date the following afternoon. So he gave her a pat on the fanny and told her to run along and enjoy herself. No trouble at all.

The thing was, he didn’t check with Peggy Allen right away, and when he did get hold of her she said she was dated. Fed him the old hard-to-get line, and it wasn’t until he spelled it out for her and told her it was either-or that she stopped teasing.

So he picked her up the first night in his Jag and took her back to the house.

Even when it was over, Jimmie was surprised to find out that he was still coming on strong for the kid, and he wished they had a few more days before Millie was due back.

Then he got another break. Lucille Sims, one of Millie's snooty friends, called him up the next afternoon. Millie had come down with a cold and she'd decided to stay over in Cleveland at the hotel for another day, then come back on the train.

Jimmie phoned the hotel right away and talked to Millie. She didn't sound too bad, and he asked if she wanted him to drive up and get her. But she said no, she'd prefer the train, and he promised to pick her up at the station the following afternoon.

After that he was set. He called Peggy, and this time there was no stalling. He brought her over to the house at seven, and it must have been after midnight when he took her home again.

Driving back after dropping her off, Jimmie felt a lot better. He had everything under control now. Peggy was a softie underneath, like all the rest—she really went for him in a big way, and he'd be seeing her again. No promises, no strings, no problems. Handling Millie would be a cinch.

He put the car in the garage, the automatic doors closing softly and silently behind him. He turned on the light and grinned as he inspected the shining fleet, the immaculate workshop in the corner, the big breezeway enclosure leading to the house.

Yep, he really had it made. What more could a guy ask for? Plenty of moola, a dumb wife, and a hep chick on the side. Plus everything it takes to get anything he wanted. The character who made that crack about your face being your fortune sure knew what he was handing out.

Jimmie stared at his face in the shiny reflection of the Jag's hood. You're not bad, kid, he told himself. Not bad at all.

He was still staring when the lights went out.

And then the lights came on again, hurting his eyes and clear through the top of his head, and he said to himself you must have passed out. He tried to move, and he realized his hands were tied behind his back. So you didn't pass out, he thought. You were sapped. What goes on here?

That's when he looked up and saw Millie standing there.

"Hey!" he said.

"Is that all?" Millie asked. "No questions? Don't you want to know about the first time I got suspicious, when I happened to pick up the extension phone and heard you talking to that little tramp of yours? It was over a month ago, and I've been wondering ever since. Wondering so much that I finally decided to go to Cleveland and arrange to get sick. I kept hoping I was wrong, of course, even when I slipped out and rented a car tonight to drive back and surprise you."

"When—when did you get here?"

"Soon enough." Millie stared down at him, and he could see she was still holding the small wrench she'd used as a sap in her gloved hands. "Soon enough to know that I could stop wondering, and stop hoping, and stop worrying about surprises. You and the girl took care of that."

"That girl," Jimmie said. "She's just a—"

"I know what she is," Millie told him. "She doesn't really mean a thing to you, does she?"

"Of course not, darling. You understand, don't you?"

"I understand."

"Then why the melodrama? Come on, untie me. A gag's a gag."

"I won't need a gag. There's nobody around and this place is practically soundproof."

"Millie, for God's sake, you aren't going to do anything foolish—"

"No. What I'm going to do is very sensible. I've been sitting here in the dark, ever since I saw you leave to take that girl home, and I've been thinking things over. There's no need for me to use this."

She put down the wrench and opened her purse, pulling out the gun.

"Millie!"

"Don't worry. I told you I wouldn't use it." She slipped the gun back into her bag. "I said I'd be sensible."

Jimmie squirmed and tried to sit up. He couldn't quite make it, but he did manage a wry grin.

"I suppose that means a divorce," he said.

She shook her head. "That wouldn't work. I thought about it for a while, but you can see what would happen. No matter what kind of charges we trumped up, the story's bound to come out. I don't think I'd care to know about all the gossip going on."

"Then—" Jimmie hesitated, pitching his voice to just the right note of penitence. "I know I haven't even got the right to ask, but does this mean that you're going to—forgive me?"

Millie didn't answer, so he went on.

"I don't have to tell you I'm sorry. I know I made a mistake. All I can do is try to make it up to you."

"Yes." It was Millie's turn to pause. "You are sorry, aren't you? Sorry because you weren't smart enough, because you got caught."

"No, that's not it. I told you I'd make it up to you, I'd try."

"Of course you'd try, darling. And you'd fail. Because that's the kind of a person you are, Jimmie dear, the kind of a person you always have been and always will be. It's my fault for not realizing it from the very beginning. You're a pretty boy, and you can't stand anything around you that might mar your own perfection. You've always got to have new clothes, new cars, new women. You're one of the beautiful people, Jimmie, and you hate ugliness. The way you hated me when you were a kid. The way you hate me now."

"But I don't hate you, you're not ugly—"

"Oh yes I am, Jimmie." She smiled at him. "Only an ugly woman could do the sensible thing I'm going to do."

She walked over to the workbench and picked something up in her gloved right hand. Then she came back and stood over him again. He saw what she was holding and his throat went dry, so that the words were only a whisper.

"You'd better put that down, you can't get away with it!"

"I'm not going to get away with anything, darling. It's the thieves."

"What thieves?"

"The ones the police will think broke in here tonight while you were sleeping, and while I was still away in Cleveland. I'll be back there in my hotel room before anyone notices my absence, and tomorrow I'll check out and come home. I'll be very surprised when you aren't on hand to meet me at the station, and I'll be very shocked when I come home and find out what the thieves have done. Don't worry, you'll be mourned. And I'm going to be proud of you for doing such a foolish, proud thing—trying to keep the combination of the house safe from the thieves, even under torture—"

"Millie, you're crazy!"

"Not crazy. Just ugly, remember?" She walked away to the bench again, picked up a rag from its surface, returned and knelt beside him. "On second thought, it will look more natural if I do gag you, after all. Besides, I won't have to listen to your silly interruptions any longer. And maybe you'll scream more loudly than I thought. I'm almost certain you will."

"M—"

"There. That's better." She stood up. Jimmie kept watching her hands. She was holding the thing, pointing it.

"You don't understand what I mean by ugliness yet, do you?" she murmured. "Beautiful people never do. I suppose that's why you hate it so, because you don't understand. And you don't care. Life is so very easy for you, because we live in an age that worships beauty above all else; worships it the way I worshipped you. Even when you wrecked my life.

"No, I'm not talking about tonight. You wrecked my life years ago, Jimmie. When we were children together, when you gave me my new name. Millie the Mule. I told you once you'd never know what that did to me, and I was right. I didn't realize the whole truth until tonight.

“I thought having an ugly face and an ugly nickname was the worst thing that could ever happen to me. When my friends made fun of me, and even my parents were ashamed, that seemed the most terrible fate. And it went on for years, Jimmie. Even after you went away, the name stuck by me. The name, and the face. I thought nothing more dreadful could possibly happen, but I was wrong.

“The dreadful thing was to try and change. To forget the old saying that beauty is only skin-deep. Well, I found out that it’s true, Jimmie. You taught me that, tonight. Because you’re one of the beautiful people I’ve always envied, one of the favored few who walk through life getting everything they want without effort, without worries or problems or unpleasantness. And yet you’re not beautiful, inside. You’re ugly as sin. And it is a sin to get everything you want without doing anything to deserve it.

“That’s the thought which used to console me, Jimmie. I guess it helps console all of us ugly ones. I kept believing that I was better than I looked, underneath. That my heart was full of understanding, that my love was pure, all sorts of maudlin nonsense. And I had faith that if I kept striving, I’d get what I wanted.

“So I had my face altered, and I got what I wanted. You. I didn’t look like Millie the Mule any more, and I thought it was enough to make us both happy. That was my mistake, darling. Because it didn’t make you happy, did it? You could still see Millie the Mule underneath the mask, and that’s why you strayed.

“The only person I fooled was myself. And it wasn’t until tonight that I realized the truth.

“I am Millie the Mule. Inside, I’m as ugly as you are. Only an ugly person could dream of doing what I’m going to do to you.”

Jimmie stared at her hands, knowing that in a moment she’d move. Then he stared at her face, and in the half-light it seemed oddly altered. For a moment he could almost see her as she had once been, years ago—Millie the Mule, ugly as sin.

"But I'm not crazy," she whispered. "Please understand that, because it's important. You did your best to drive me mad, torturing me for years with your name-calling, your nastiness, your sniggering, your loathing. Still, it wasn't enough to drive me mad; just enough to make a monster out of me. That's right, Jimmie. I'm a monster now. That's why I've got to do this thing. Because you deserve it for making me ugly inside. So ugly that when I saw you and that girl together tonight, I gave up any thought of just shooting you. That's when I knew just how much of a monster you'd made of me—when I realized what I was planning, and how much I'm going to enjoy it.

"It's going to take a long time, Jimmie. I want it to take quite a long time. It will help me to get rid of your ugliness and mine, together."

Jimmie was thinking that she had never looked more like Millie the Mule than she did at this moment, as she knelt beside him and went to work . . .

It was quite the most horrible tragedy Highland Springs had ever known. When poor Millie came back from Cleveland and found her husband in the garage that way, everybody thought she'd collapse. But she managed to hold up quite bravely, even through the investigation and inquest, and when the ordeal of the funeral was over, she seemed like a different person.

In fact everyone remarked on it. While plastic surgery had done wonders for her, it wasn't until after her husband's death that Millie became a truly beautiful woman. She seemed to glow with an inner serenity, as if all the ugliness had been burned out of her.

All the more surprising, considering the shock she must have had when she discovered her husband's corpse. It was bad enough that the unknown thieves had tortured him, burning the soles of his feet to get the combination of the safe. But then, probably by accident, they'd set the gasoline torch down right next to his head. Even with a low flame, his face had been burned completely off . . .

The Covenant

Five famous science-fiction authors pool their talents in this "round-robin" novelette that stretches man almost to the breaking point on the rack of Time and Space. Here is a rare pyrotechnic display of sf writing skills and styles.

Part One

By Poul Anderson

TIME," she said.

Ban stirred, uneasy in this dim and rustling air. From outside, he would not have thought The Oracles wide enough to hold as many rooms as now appeared to stretch, doorway beyond arched doorway, further than he could see. Or was this a single great many-vaulted chamber? He didn't know. It was too dark to tell. Too many wings moved under the invisible ceiling. He wondered where the light came from, what little there was of it.

"I beg your pardon, prophetess?" His voice sounded strange in the bones of his head. "I don't quite understand."

"It is as well," said the one who sat across the black table. Her face was not veiled, and he should have been able to see what she looked like. But somehow he had only a blurred impression—eyes which caught more light than they should, so that they became blind luminous ellipses—perhaps, he guessed confusedly, more than somewhat afraid, it was because he could not stop watching her hands. They lay palms down on the table, relaxed, but with strength in every line. They had less taper than a woman's hands commonly do, but he thought he had never seen any so beautiful.

"If you understood," she said, "you might not dare to act."

That touched his pride. He sat up straight, clenching his gun, and answered: "Prophetess, the Cloud People killed friends of mine. Also, I am the son of the Warden—I have duties—" He faltered beneath her gaze. Something scuttered across the dusky stone floor. Pompousness drained from him. Almost wryly, he finished, "If the Cloud People take the City itself, what Wardenship will there be for me to succeed to?"

Did she nod? "Yes," her low tones replied, "there will be nothing then but the Heaths . . . a few lonely huts where men huddle and mutter, forgetting they ever raised a City . . ." After a pause: "Time is the strength of the Cloud People, even as Space is the strength of man. What you must overcome is Time itself."

Ban sat in twilight, and the rustlings and whisperings seemed to go around and around his head, but he could only see the hands of the prophetess. He fumbled for comprehension: "A man may walk or ride or fly in Space—from here to there—but no man can swim Time's river. Unless you—What is an Oracle? One who has mastered Time, ever so little perhaps, but not altogether helpless before it?"

She made no answer. "Forgive me," he said. "I am surely wrong. I didn't mean you were merely human, prophetess."

"There was an age once, which may come again if the last men flee out onto the Heaths, when lightning destroyed where it would," she told him. "Now, a hundred times a year, the highest towers of the City are crowned with lightning, and unhurt. That is one force which men have come to understand a little; and so they are not its pawns. There are others. Once, it may be, there were many others. But the world is very old, and much has been forgotten."

Then the silence lengthened so unendurably that he got the courage, or the desperation, to remind her: “Prophetess, I came to ask on behalf of the City—of all mankind, maybe—how the Cloud People can be overcome. For none of our weapons has served. You have not replied to my question.”

“Not yet,” she said. “Not ever, in full. For there is no destiny. Time is not a single river, sweeping from the birth of the stars to their last cinders. It is more akin to a huge many-branched delta.”

She sighed. “Armies have been broken. So by now, Captain Ban, you should know the uselessness of armies. One man alone, though—”

Her words were like fingers closing on his heart. But he found the strength to say, “Myself.”

“I can tell you nothing.” The shakenness in her voice was the most unnerving thing of all. “I can promise you nothing. I can only say, go secretly and alone to the island. Remember that Time is the strength of the Cloud People, but Space is the strength of man, and remember that in the end Time and Space are the same. More than that, I cannot say. It is too dark.”

The beautiful hands rose to cover the face he had never quite seen. “It has always been too dark,” she screamed. “Go!”

Ban rose. He didn’t even stop to make obeisance. He almost ran, stumbling over his feet and his gun. For a moment the room echoed with his noise, then he lost awareness of the echoes because his own heartbeat grew so loud.

When he emerged on the terrace—never quite sure how he had done so—it was like waking from nightmare. He spent a while simply leaning on the rail, breathing hard. Piece by piece, he began to recognize familiarity. He looked a thousand sheer feet down the black side of The Oracles to an incongruous park where clipped trees and formal flowerbeds made star patterns. Several other towers were visible, though even at this height the City stretched too wide to be encompassed in a glance. He saw the colonnaded tiers of Alpha, graceful against a deep blue late-afternoon sky; the startling red slimness of The Needle; the shifting polychrome which rescued the massive facade of Arsenal from monotony. The sun was low, striking long rays between those walls, flaming off windows and making parks, forests, gardens, crop fields glow an impossibly intense green. Here and there the light flashed off wings, bird or human. And far on the eastern edge of the world lay a blinding silvery gleam of sea.

It was quiet up here. A breeze ruffled Ban's sweat-dampened yellow hair. He shivered, drawing the tunic closer about his big young body. From somewhere, freakishly borne across a mile or two, he heard faint merry strains of music. Hard to believe that anyone could dance to a ballad while the Cloud People laired on this same planet. But he had done it himself, a few days ago. (Only days? It felt like centuries, now.) Life persisted unto the final destruction, and life was not a single thread. It was war and defeat and misery, yes, but it was also eating and sleeping and lovemaking and playing games to pass idle hours and looking at the stars with wonder and disputing with your blacksmith neighbor whose shop got too noisy and—

Urmuz came from behind one of the weeping willows which, with stone seats and an intricately playing fountain, ornamented this terrace. He looked out of place here, his great frame squat and hairy in a black tunic, his face battered beneath a military helmet. "What did she say, sir?" he rumbled. "Any help at all?"

Ban blinked, stared around him, clasped his gun as if to draw strength from iron. He felt dimly surprised, through all the turmoil within him, that he should reply with coolness, "I don't know. I did get some advice. But who ever heard of an Oracle making a straight answer?"

Urmuz spat. "Old Mother Grotta, on the twelfth floor, she'll speak plain. I told you not to monkey around with these here upper-level seeresses. Let's go find Mother Grotta right now."

Ban actually chuckled. "I don't need homely common sense, Urmuz, or a fake love philtre—"

"Dammit, captain, her love philtres work! I know!"

“The situation has gone beyond that.” Ban’s smile vanished, though his lips remained tense. “I suppose it was always beyond that, though we realized too late what the coming of the Cloud People meant.”

“What good are these upper-level prophetesses?” persisted Urmuz. “They’re frauds, captain, that’s what they are. Their words’re so bloody vague that after things’ve happened, they can always claim that’s what they meant. Me, I’ll waste my money on blondes and booze.”

“Be quiet!” Ban yelled. “What do you know about it, you mud-brained sub-level mechanic? Go back to school and learn about the prediction paradox, at least, before you start quacking—” He saw the ugly face stricken, and knew he was only venting his own fear. Urmuz had stood with him in the last battle, when others fled and the Cloud People laughed unseen. Urmuz had guided his first baby footsteps, and taught him to handle a gun, and carried him home from youthful nights when they drank down stars and moon and sang the sun awake . . . “I’m sorry,” said Ban. “Nerves.”

“Nothing to be sorry about, captain,” said Urmuz. “Part of my job, being cussed out. Well, so what did she tell us to do?”

Ban looked away. “I have to do it alone,” he said. “Secretly.”

Another emerged from the willows. She was as young as he, and her light white robe did not much hide fullness and suppleness. The loose hair streaming down her back was the color of a sunset after storm, and her eyes were great and gray in a sweetly shaped face. “Ban,” she said, making his name beautiful to him. “Captain Ban—”

“Yes?” He turned with eagerness to watch her, thinking that he would probably not have many more hours to watch anything at all.

She stopped before him, flushing, and they stood a while in mutual awkwardness.

Finally she sighed. “May you reveal what the prophetess told you?” she asked.

Ban shook his head. “Best I don’t.”

“He has to go somewhere secret,” blurted Urmuz. “Why don’t you wait here, captain, and I’ll get our kit and we can start right out?”

“At once?” breathed the girl.

“I think so,” said Ban. “No way to tell when the Cloud People will attack next, but it will be soon—and that next attack will bring them to the edge of the City.”

She looked seaward and shivered. “Mists out there,” she said, “and cold, and thin singing. Is that how it will be?”

“If we don’t stop them,” he said. “Yes, I’d better leave at once.”

Before I become so afraid I can’t leave at all, he thought.

“I’ll get our kit, sir,” repeated Urmuz.

“You stay here,” said Ban.

“Sir!”

All at once Ban had no strength left to argue. “Very well,” he said. “Go fetch the stuff, then, and come back here.”

“Yes, sir!” Urmuz snapped a salute.

“Don’t tell anyone,” said Ban. “Not even my father.”

“No, sir. Of course not.”

Urmuz touched the flight stud on his brass belt. The wings unfolded from the flat pack under his tunic, catching the light in a gauzy metallic shimmer. The noise of his takeoff resounded loudly among the willows.

When he was out of sight, Ban took the girl’s hands. She tried to withdraw them. “Please,” she whispered. “Don’t. I am her attendant—”

“And someday you’ll be her successor,” he said bitterly, not letting go. “Oh, yes. But still, if the Covenant allowed me to come up here, again and again, and allowed you to sit by me and talk in the moonlight, surely I can touch you when I say good-bye!”

She gulped and stopped pulling. Her head drooped.

“What is your name?” he asked.

“I haven’t any,” she said in a hurt, uncertain tone. “You know that.”

"You must have had one once, before your mother gave you to the prophetess. What was it?"

"Please," she begged again.

He released her. One hand smacked against his bare thigh, the other clamped on his gun. "All right," he said harshly. "As you will. Goodbye."

"You aren't—your man won't be back till—"

"I sent him off to get rid of him," said Ban. "Someone has to go, and alone . . . she told me. It may as well be myself."

"No!" she cried. "Someone else, Ban!"

"I am the Warden's son," he declared, "and you won't tell me your name. So good-bye."

He opened his wings with a savage blow on the belt control, and whipped off the terrace while her mouth was still parting to speak.

After a moment he realized how childishly melodramatic his exit had been. A mature man wouldn't have sped off like this—the very absence of farewells underlining his self-sacrificing heroism and similar egotistic noises. But it was too late now. Stubbornness, resentment, the fear of looking foolish, were stronger than survival instinct.

His wings rotated hard and steadily. He must squint into the speed of his own passage, and felt cold in a mere tunic. The brass belt contained, in its various compartments, basic field equipment and a few days' emergency rations. But he should have gotten full kit. A helmet, at the very least—

Well, he thought with sudden excitement, well, he wasn't really about to embark on any one-man campaign of reconquest. The prophetess had only said to go secretly to the island. Doubtless that meant nothing but a spying-out expedition—closer, to be sure, than anyone had yet dared approach a stronghold of the Cloud People, but still, just a quick investigation. He might be back before dawn, and Urmuz would make him a stiff drink and—He shook his head, as if to clear the last of that oracular twilight from it, and tried to look sanely out on a sane world.

Once or twice he passed a hovering citizen, and they hailed him, but he continued and soon had left them all behind. No one ventured far out over the sea any longer.

Nonetheless, the realization broke through his thoughts with a shock: that he was now above the water. He looked behind, seeking a final view of home. The sun exploded in his vision. For minutes that burning after-image remained. When he could see again, there were no towers, no beach, only dark choppy waves.

He didn't need map or compass to tell him he was bound due east, cutting across the Gulf of Orea toward Mwyrland. He had flown this way often enough, in boyhood years before the Cloud People came. (Where now were the green Mwyrland hills, the cottage of Ilbur the Robot with smoke lazing up from its chimney, the girl who shyly brought him milk in a wooden bowl? He remembered the sound of bells, and the belling of hounds when he hunted, but now there was nothing there but fog, gray fog and the Cloud People flitting and singing in a cold formless gray—where had Mwyrland gone? Indeed Time was a mystery which men did not comprehend.) He had usually passed over the island which marked the halfway point. Even then it had been a swart volcanic desolation; now the mists had reached that far westward and the island could no longer be seen. Scouts flying close thought they had glimpsed black towers on it, through an occasional rift in the fog, but they were never sure—

There!

The vapor bank rose like a mountain. Ban swallowed panic and slanted downward. This was as close as those scouts who returned had ever ventured. A few had tried to fly into the swirling thick mass of the cloud itself, but they had not come home.

It was very silent here.

When he landed, retracting wings through his tunic slits into the unit on his back, Ban felt the water chilly around his knees. A few streamers of fog curled and smoked; the waves were stilled. The sun was directly behind him, already blurred. Ahead was no sharp demarcation. The air simply grew murkier, until at last blackness loomed from water to sky, cutting off half the world.

Ban hefted his gun and started wading.

That was the idea which had sprung into his head, when the prophetess said to go alone to the island. Anyone else would approach from the air—would he not?—and the Cloud People would see him (or hear him, or whatever they did for awareness) and destroy him. But the island shelved very gradually toward open water. There were places where, at low tide, you could walk knee deep for miles until you reached shore. In fog and night, would even the Cloud People know of a single man walking through the sea?

The water splashed with his passage. Its cold stung him. The air was frigid, too, with a dank taste. Despite all need for caution, he cherished his own little noise, for otherwise he was totally alone. Grayness thickened; the sun was a blur at his back, heatless and cheerless, toppling toward the night only minutes away now. Ban unclipped the flashlight at his belt and tested its beam. Already it helped him. Hard to tell without it where water left off and the bleak, eddying air began. Mist streamed through the cone of light. Somewhere out in the unseen, he thought he heard dripping, as if the bowl of the sky were chilled and wet and dripping into the sea.

The sea felt heavy. He was getting higher all the time, now the water was hardly above his ankles, but it was an effort to shove it aside. He began stumbling more and more often on the irregular bottom, nearly dropping his gun. Seen by flashbeam and the last daylight, the weapon looked rusty. And it weighed in his hand. How it weighed! The flashlight, of thin inert metal, remained itself; but the gun barrel grew dull. Was there really a faint patina on his brass belt?

And when had he torn his clothes? Ban squinted through deepening gloom at his tunic. It hung from his bent shoulders, damp and rotten. He jerked a hand in startlement. The sleeve ripped apart and hung in rags. His belt certainly was tarnished, no, it was corroded, close to crumbling from his waist. The air was like ice; as it entered his lungs he coughed and cleared the rheum from his throat. His legs hurt, the knees weren't quite steady and he wanted to stop and rest but there was no place to rest. Was the sun down yet? Or had his eyes blurred on him? He rubbed them with the back of the hand that held the flashlight. He couldn't see so well. His legs were twin blotches. But his gaunt liver-spotted hand was still visible, if he held it close. He stroked it down his wet white beard—slowly, ever so slowly.

Time, he thought wearily, Time was the strength of . . . of who had she said? And with every step forward—His thoughts trailed off incoherently. He was too tired now to think, or be afraid, or anything except sleep. When he reached the black shore, maybe he could lie down and sleep. There had been something he meant to do there, but—He waded onward.

Part Two

By Isaac Asimov

THE land tottered under his feet, the last of the wavelets gone. Maybe—Maybe—

To sleep—sleep—

* * *

It was like the soft sound of chimes in his dull ear, the distant sound of thin singing. Where had he heard something like that?

A battle? A tall, rough man at his side? What was—his—name? Music—

Like thin sweet wind-torn words.

"There! He was almost gone!"

Ban heard that. His eyes flickered open and suddenly he knew he was Ban. Of course. What was wrong? Where was he?

He could breathe more easily somehow. He lifted his hands and the tawny, yellowing hair of his chin caught on them and he stared foolishly at it, uncomprehending.

“Help me hold him,” said the girl’s voice.

How did he know it was a girl? There were no words, only a singing in his mind, and yet there were words and they were girl’s words.

A different voice—different in what way?—but a boy’s, said, “He’s not that timevy.”

“Timevy enough for me. Get under.”

Ban struggled to his feet and stared about him. No one was holding him. No one was lifting him. The fog stretched out, luminously gray, not quite as dank as he remembered.

The sun, he thought suddenly. The sun must be gone by now. Why was it not night? The fog was still gray, as gray as the Prophetess’ blank eyes. He remembered the Prophetess? What had she said?

The girl’s voice sang, “I never saw one before.”

“I did,” said the boy. “I came out once where the fog closes in and saw one on—on—like—change—like—different—come and go.”

Fly, thought Ban, catching the dim thought intuitively. The boy had no proper expression for it. We fly, he thought, we fly. He whirled around and spoke for the first time since the fog had closed him in. “Who are you?”

There was nothing, at first, just the voices, and as he turned and tried to beat the fog aside by force of eyes alone, there was a short smothered chime without words.

Then, “Here we are, Changeman.”

They were like two coagulations, two clottings in the cloud; two shrouds with nothing inside.

He felt a chill and the hairs rose on his arms, so that he could feel their pressure against the sleeve of his tunic.

Oddly, his mind jumped backward. Hadn’t the tunic been torn, shredded? He remembered feebly for it was all as foggy as the fog. He shone the flashlight on his sleeve and it was whole, thinned and worn with age, but whole.

Suddenly, he flashed the light in the direction of the Cloud People and there was nothing there. Musical wordless chimes in his ears was all. He moved the light away and the shrouds were there again.

He said, “What has happened to me?”

The boy’s voice said briefly, “You fell.” Then, “You Change People always fall, don’t you know that.”

“Fell?” He looked down, shrinking automatically from an unseen and non-existent cliff.

“Fell,” said the girl. “You are so silly.”

“They don’t know,” said the boy.

“Tell him,” said the girl.

“I don’t think we ought to.”

“Who cares? I want to watch his top move when he talks. Do you see it in among the fringe, there.”

“The fringe came when he fell. It always does.”

Ban stared, feeling worn with the accumulating strain. They were discussing him and by fringe they must mean his beard.

It hit him with the shock of cold water colliding after a dive. His beard. He had no beard. He felt it and it was there and was yellow but it had been white.

He said, “Even so, I’ve grown old.” He felt the brittleness in his knees, so noticeable against the lithe strength he remembered.

“You fell,” said the boy, explaining.

I fell, thought Ban, and I grew old. He said, certain, “I fell through time. How?”

“I don’t know. You Change People always fall. You can’t lift up.”

Again Ban was remembering: Time is the strength of the Cloud People.

She had said that. The Prophetess had said that. Hadn’t she said more?

But he wasn’t as old now as he had been. His beard was no longer white. His uniform was no longer in shreds. They had held him, the boy and the girl. They had gotten under.

“Are you holding me now?” he demanded.

“Of course,” said the boy, “or you’d fall.”

“Lift me higher, then.”

“Why?”

“So I can talk.”

It was like feeling air come into clogged lungs, or slowly straightening a cramped muscle. The beard shrank to a yellow inch and his gun was almost glossy. He looked at it and at his jagged fingernails, then pointed the gun in the direction of the figures, automatically.

The girl’s voice said, “What’s that, ______ ____ ________?”

(She concluded with a clear musical triad which did not resolve itself into words. Was it the boy’s name?)

The boy said, “It throws a piece of metal. It can’t hurt, but if he tries I’ll drop him at once.”

Ban put the gun down hastily. He had to find out. He might get back. The Prophetess had sent him to find out. And if he didn’t get back, even so—He might not get back—He would not—

Drearily, he thought that after all he might not die in some flaming instantaneous holocaust or under the crush or cut of steel, but peacefully of sleep and old, old age.

He was young enough now to laugh shortly. He said, “Why do I fall here? I don’t fall back there.” He jerked his head, not knowing in the least if he were gesturing in the right direction.

The girl said, eagerly, “The fog holds you up.”

“No, it doesn’t,” said the boy at once. “Keep quiet, ________ ____ ______, you know nothing about it.”

The girl made a spiteful little discord, a sound that resolved itself into nothing in Ban’s mind.

The boy disregarded it. He said, “You do fall. Slowly.”

Ban said, “Fall?”

“In your world,” said the boy, “everything is a gentle slope, isn’t it?”

“No,” said Ban.

“Yes, it is,” said the boy. “Our Knower has told us. Your world is a slope and you roll down it all the time. Down and down until you wear out and die.”

Time, thought Ban, the inexorable flow of time. What had he said to the Prophetess? No man can swim Time’s river. Or climb up Time’s slope. One could only roll downward, or slide and slip downward, or, if one were at complete peace, walk downward.

“Time,” he said aloud, as the Prophetess had said to introduce their recent meeting.

“And here,” said the boy’s chiming voice, “there is no slope. Here it is free and we can move as we wish, up and down—”

No, he didn’t say “up and down.” Ban caught at the nuances of the chimes. This was different. His mind seized on “up and down” because the musical tones put the thought in his mind, but the thought was not quite “up and down.” The words were different; the meaning—

“Up and down in time,” said Ban, breathlessly.

“Up and down,” said the boy, with again that difference.

“And I fall down, only down.”

“It’s the only way you Change People ever move. So if you come here, you fall.”

Because here there is no slope, only a precipice; a plunging gap into which all life and matter fell, changing and aging and falling apart and dying. Rock might survive unchanged and water and air and all the fundamental fabric of the universe, but metal would rust and fabric disintegrate and—all living things would die.

Ban’s heart beat faster. No wonder men penetrating the fog never returned. No wonder armies and arms were useless. How hit a creature or how beat one who could evade you by moving in a direction you could not even conceive.

He could go back now and tell them there was no victory.

But could he go back?

They were holding him now, the boy and the girl, and under him was the black remorseless pit of eternity.

He said, “How do you move upward?”

“You just ____ ______ ____ __ ______.”

They went on and on but the chimes were chimes, not words. He lacked the ability to make meaningful concepts out of meaningless ones. As well, he thought bitterly, ask a fish how to breathe water or a tree how to live on sunlight.

“Teach me,” he said earnestly, desperately. “Teach me.”

Teach me to breathe water, fish, for I must or drown. Teach me to live on sunlight, tree, or I starve.

“I’m showing you. See, you are moving. See, up and down.”

Ban held his breath, closed his eyes. Was there any sensation at all other than what he felt in the way of strength. Now he felt his muscles harden, then slacken. There was no movement, no feeling of up and down. He was simply standing on the beach; he could even hear the faint noise of the surf. There was only the change within, the physiological concomitants of old age coming and going. That was all.

He said, “Isn’t there any way I can see better?” What good would seeing do?—He didn’t care, seeing was man’s chief sense. While the fog closed in, nothing could be clear.

“See?” asked the girl.

“See!” said the boy, changing the word too subtly for Ban to catch the nature of the change.

“You mean he’s so used to the fog that—” began the girl.

“I want no fog,” said Ban, with a sense of physical loathing at the very word. “I want it clear.”

“But it is clear. Your people have the fog.”

Ban fell silent. Here was a world in which all levels of time were commingled, in which people could move up and down—NO, he wondered if the words they were trying to say were "pasted" and "futured"—in such a world with up and down and past and future all commingled, surely all would be a fog to a man condemned to an eternal soft travel down a slope.

He pleaded, "Hold me. Hold me."

He had to work it out in case—in case he could get back. And on earth, with Time a mere slope that bound all creatures and all matter to a limited inexorable downward wash, it was fog to them, to the Cloud People.

Earth was a world in a universe of open space and bound time. Space is the strength of man, had said the Prophetess.

Had she known all this? he wondered suddenly. Had she understood? Then why had she not said so?

And did she know how to fight them, the Cloud People, as the Cloud People were fighting us?

His youngish heart leaped. But it was hard for them, too. It was for that reason that they, irresistable as they were, unfightable, undefeatable, didn't take over at once. The time-limited universe fought them and they advanced only slowly.

If men could only help the universe. If he could get back—

He said, "Teach me to fly in—in time."

The girl's voice said, "He means ____ ______ ____ ______."

The boy interrupted. "I know what he means, but how can I show him?"

"Show me," insisted Ban, desperately. "Show me."

"I am showing you. I'm up'n'downing you." (And behind the words, Ban could now hear a dim and simultaneous "past'n'futuring you.")

The girl said suddenly, "Lift him all the way up—Let's see what happens."

"No," screamed Ban.

He felt the lifting as though something, not air, not matter, but something, pressed against him with the speed of his passage. His cheeks were downy with unreaped fuzz and his legs were spindly. The pants came down over his shoes and then he seemed to shrink together.

He remembered his wings. He reached for the flight stud but it was gone and the wings themselves had fallen off his back a dull lump of reddish rock.

"No," he screamed in treble, and started to run across a fog-shrouded beach on short legs that entangled themselves in strands of raw wool that was turning to fleece. He fell and kicked chubbily, drooling and conscious of nothing more than a vague hunger. His lips moved in response, sucking —

Then his legs stretched out, and he rose tottering, unsteadily, to his feet. He was thin, about a foot less in height than he dimly realized he ought to be.

A voice said, and he recognized it all over again, as a girl's. "He changed. Did you see that? He changed."

"Of course." It was a boy's voice. "He's one of the Change People. What do you expect?—He isn't as timevy as he was."

Timevy, thought Ban's boy-mind. Time-heavy.

He remembered. And he didn't remember, too. He remembered the past and his own future when he would grow up; no, when he had grown up. It was madly confusing. He was twelve years old. Just a moment ago, he had been on Mwyrland and Ilbur the Robot had told him stories out of his long, long memory of a time when men crowded the earth and built cities on power unthinkable—dim myths and legends coming out of the crowded mechanical consciousness of a deathless robot—

And then he had been twenty-two and then ninety-three and then fifty-one and then twenty-nine and then a half and then twelve again, in inextricable confusion.

Yet how could he understand it better now? It made more sense.

Even the fog—The fog!

It was still there, but thinner. He could make out a glimpse of flatness, of gleaming smooth evenness and of infinite gap and sparkle and, in the distance, moving patches of shininess. The Cloud People?

He turned to bend his glance at the two who were with him. They were shrouds still, but sparkling shrouds now.

The boy said, "He's ______ now. When we lifted him up high, he got ______."

Ban almost caught that. The young were intimate with time. Time stands still for them and flows oddly, commingled and intermingled. It is only in maturity that the convention clamps down.

He had felt the movement through time just there at the end. He had felt something rushing past them.

"Teach me," he said, "teach me now how to move through time."

"Put out ________ ______ ____ ________," said the boy's chiming voice.

Ban tried. He tried. He tried to let his mind intuit if it could not understand. Almost he thought he had it. He put out something—something—

"No," said the boy. "Like this."

Ban felt something wrenching at him and something of him had moved. Nothing anywhere on his body. Something deep in his mind. It had moved and even fluttered.

"Now," said the boy. "I'll let you dow-ture-n easy."

Ban felt himself swelling and filling out, lift up and grow broad across his shoulder. The uniform was on him, fitting snugly, and the comfortable weight of furled wings was on his back.

The boy said, "No. You don't get the right ______. It's out, but you don't use it."

And a new voice interrupted. A deeper voice of chords that were incredibly beautiful. A mature voice, a subtle one.

"Younglings. It is long past time you were home. And you have been asked not to stray so near the fog banks."

The boy's chimes, thin and subdued, said, "Yes, Knower."

But the girl said, "We have one of the Change People."

"I know that, youngling. And you have been amusing yourself with him, which is not kind. And I see you have been trying to teach him to ______ also."

"It was wrong," said the boy, humble.

"Have you decided it was wrong?" said the Knower, without anger or reproof, merely questioning.

Ban cried, "Knower. Wait." But when he cried "Knower" he felt the thought shoot across the gap between himself and the Cloud People in a different form.

"You wish something?" There was a third shroud next to the two he had seen earlier, and it did not glitter. Even in the thinned fog, it did not glitter.

Ban had to bring his new knowledge to the City. He said, "Send me back, Knower. Let me return."

"Ought I?" The Knower said nothing more than that to him. The next words were addressed to the boy. "You are holding him."

"He's not very timevy," said the boy.

"I understand that. Let him go."

"But I'll fall," cried out Ban. "I'll die. Don't let go."

The third shroud clarified itself. A face, something very like a blank, formless face, came mistily into view. Something like blind, luminous ellipses formed themselves to gaze with infinite compassion down upon him.

"Let him go," said the Knower, and Ban knew that the boy must.

And he also knew the thought into which his word "Knower" had transmuted itself. He cried out, stranglingly, "Prophetess—Prophetess—Are you one of them?" And the boy let go and, in his despair, Ban let himself fall, uncaring. The beach was under him, steady, motionless, but he fell and his aching muscles slackened.

And when the desire for life overwhelmed him, as it must to the end and he struck at his flight-stud to unfurl wings and race old age to the City, the rusted remnant came off in his trembling fingers and his cheeks fell in over disappearing teeth.

He struggled with fading fierceness against the end. “Prophetess—” he wailed.

Part Three

By Robert Sheckley

DESPERATELY he fought time. Wisps of fog curled around him like pale headless snakes, and the sand far beneath his feet shifted and crept like an army of malignant ants. Ban winged through the fog bank, eternally falling, and saw his rifle barrel corrode and crumble to fine dust before his eyes. He flew, and a part of him watched with fascinated horror as ropelike blue veins corrugated his emaciated arms, and his head, unsupported by the wasted muscles of his neck, drooped on his chest.

“No man wins a race against time.”

Who had spoken? Was it the Knower? Or had the prophetess shrieked into his ear. Whoever spoke the words, Ban knew they were true. Even before reaching the far edge of the fog bank, Ban knew himself as old, too old. He could feel the sluggish blood pounding in his brittle veins, could sense the threadlike beat of his heart threatening momentarily to stop.

He knew then that he would never live to reach his city. Even now he was dying, dying . . .

Uselessly.

With an old man’s petulant anger he turned back. What had the Cloud People taught him? Could he remember it now, when memory had grown dim? Could he check his fall through the unplumbed depths of time?

Ban fought his way upward, swimming like a tired fish against the rushing river of time. He remembered concepts without words, he sensed his heaviness in time. A new direction seemed to open for him. He struggled toward it singlemindedly, and someone was singing a song without words. He fought for knowledge. Truly were his people called the Change People! For now Ban discarded everything he had learned, believed or felt before entering the fog banks that marked the furthest ramparts of time.

He attempted to lift himself in time.

In part, he succeeded.

He could feel the bone-wrenching jar as his body struck the sand. The blow would have shattered an old man's frame; but Ban was old no more.

Neither was he young.

He lay helpless on the sand, and realized that his stupendous effort had been based upon an incomplete knowledge of time's processes. He had held back death; but his present state was perhaps worse.

Stretched out on the sand was the heroic trunk and head of a middle-aged, yellow-bearded man. Beside him was his gun, the barrel deeply pitted, the wooden stock turned green and beginning to sprout. The hand that held the gun was a talon with brown-spotted parchment skin stretched tightly over frail bones. The other hand belonged by rights to a chubby boy of perhaps twelve. His legs could be judged at about four years old; but there from those small, fat legs hung a man's colossal feet.

Ban had learned the use of time—partially.

"Listen to me, Ban. Can you hear me?"

"I can hear you," Ban said, and realized that the Knower had spoken to him.

"You must become again what you were, Ban. You must fight again with time. You must ______ yourself."

"Impossible!"

"You must do it," Knower said. "For your own sake, and for the sake of all others. Because now we are all in deadly peril."

"I do not understand," Ban said.

"You still comprehend yourself only spatially. You must think temporally, as well. You must realize that you have stretched yourself to an immeasurable distance across time. How can I explain to you? Ban, your temporal elongation has created a flaw, a fault, a discontinuity in time. Now you are a ______."

"I still do not understand."

"Do you know what a fuse is?" Knower asked.

"Yes."

"You are a fuse. You are a connection. You are a conductor. A sea-wall holds back the ocean; you are a hole in the wall. A single tree on a barren plain attracts the lightning; you are a tree. Two elements may be stable until a link has been made between them; you are a link. Now do you understand why you must become as you were?"

"For whose good?" Ban asked.

"For the good of your people and mine," Knower said. "Ban, our people are not truly at war. Instead, we are both warred against. We push you because we ourselves are pushed, by the chaos that seeks to engulf the ordered universe. We must quarrel no longer. We must cooperate, your people and mine."

"How can I believe you?" Ban asked. And after a moment, he heard a cool, lucid voice behind him.

"What he tells you is true," the voice said, and Ban recognized it as that of the prophetess. "I myself tell you, Ban, you must become as you were. That is the first step."

Ban listened in an agony of indecision. Here in the thin mists, a man could be led to believe anything! Was this the prophetess speaking to him, or had the Knower adopted new form? What was happening, what was time going to do?

He decided. He fought to become as he had been. The heroic middle-aged trunk and head grew years younger; the parchment right hand started to fade, to take on size and strength. He fought to retain it, and suddenly his boy's legs grew three years younger. Desperately he aged his legs, and felt his arms grow thin and old. He made them young again, and felt his feet shrink hideously in his boots.

"It's impossible!" Ban screamed. "I can't do it all at the same time!"

"You must!" the prophetess told him.

"I need help!"

"No one can help you. Only you can do it. And Ban—there is very little duration left to do it in!"

Now Ban could hear a vast roaring in his ears. The sand beneath him seemed to mutter and shrink. He heard the Time children wail suddenly.

"Quick, Ban, quick!"

Staring wildly, Ban saw a strange entity before him, a creature of blind, luminous ellipses, beautiful, unhuman hands, a sparkling shroud. It was Knower. It was the prophetess. For a moment, Ban thought that they were standing side by side. Then he realized that he was staring at a single hermaphroditic entity, neither male nor female nor neuter, combining essences of all. Surely not human, yet perhaps benevolent. And Ban could not fathom the purpose of this Janus-natured creature, though he knew that purpose had to be there.

"Ban! For your own sake and for the sake of your people! Become what you were!"

Ban stared at the entity. Barren knowledge flooded his mind. Suddenly he understood the important yet ambiguous nature of the Time children, and what they would do to him, and he to them. Almost, he could understand the nature of the Knower-Prophetess.

"Ban!"

He blocked all thought from his mind. He made a massive effort, pitting all his strength and concentration against the baffling task before him. His hands became a man’s, and his feet grew large again, his legs stretched. He ground his teeth together, concentrated . . .

Space and time recognize no differences, no difficulties, no separations. Near and far, past and present, are terms for men to use; but the forces of space and time are not contained in terms.

So, in another part of the galaxy, at another time and place, an event was taking place whose meaning was crucial to Ban and also to his people.

On a planet named by its inhabitants Hiallo, a small red crustacean dropped to the sandy ocean floor. Far from his burrow, he moodily contemplated the mysterious ways of love. He considered the reasons for his rejection by the brood-queen. He thought of his position in life, the honors he had attained, the chances he had missed. He wondered about the ocean of air far above him, distant, hidden.

He finished thinking. With one powerful claw he pinched off his head, thus committing the eight thousandth suicide for that year upon Hiallo.

His act was in no way remarkable. Rejection by the brood-queen was normally followed by suicide upon Hiallo. And yet, this one particular act was crucial to Ban and his people.

In another part of the galaxy, at another time and place, an event was taking place whose meaning was crucial to Ban and his people.

A biped named Marcellus, of a planet called Terra, sat beneath a huge oak tree. The sun was hidden, and the gloomy forest somewhere in Germania was chilly, so Marcellus pulled his woolen cloak tightly around him. He looked around and tried to figure out where he was. Everything looked the same in these damned woods; one tree looked like another tree, and all the avenues of the forest led in different and unknown directions.

Marcellus and ten others, under the command of a centurion, had marched out from the forward command post at Legae to check on the movements of the barbarians. They had penetrated half a day's march into the forest, had been about to turn back when the tall, pale-skinned men had fallen upon them. It had been a slaughter. At the end, Marcellus had fled; and now he was lost.

He was an unimportant man; and yet, it was very important that he get back. For he, a common foot soldier, had glimpsed a sight in the forest that might change the destiny of Rome itself.

Marcellus got to his feet, stifling a curse when he put weight on his slashed leg. He looked around at the identical corridors of the forest. From what direction had he come? He didn't know; but it was unlike a Roman to stay indecisive for long. Marcellus chose a direction and struck out, limping.

After half an hour's march, he stopped. There were faint sounds on either side of him, sounds that no bird or beast would make. Marcellus peered around him into the gloomy woods. It was almost night. He was very hungry, thirsty, and weaponless.

The whispering sounds came closer. Marcellus listened for a moment, then broke off a branch of a tree. Quickly he stripped it of twigs. A Roman soldier would die fighting, no matter what he had to fight against.

His only regret, as the whispering drew nearer, was that he would probably not live to tell the others of the strange and marvellous thing he had glimpsed in the woods of deep Germania.

Death in battle was a common fate for soldiers of the Roman Empire, and Marcellus himself was in no way a remarkable man. And yet, what he had seen in the dark German forest was crucial to Ban and his people.

In another part of the galaxy, at another time and place, an event was taking place whose meaning was crucial to Ban and his people.

On a planet whose discoverers called it 3Bcc, two explorers were having an argument. They were at present four-legged and two-handed. For the purposes of the argument, each had extruded a triple tongue. Enormously simplified, their argument went like this:

"It was your fault!"

"Yours!"

"You took the gravity readings wrong. You left out an entire decimal point. You gave me this misinformation, and in that way our ship was wrecked."

"I will admit that the dials did not read correctly. But you were landing the ship. You should have felt the gravity fault and corrected for it in spite of the readings."

"You shouldn't have trusted the dial. You should have become a dial."

"I was sleepy. Besides, if I had become a dial, who would have been on standby?"

The two explorers stared at each other. At last, good humor reasserted itself. They flowed into friendlier shapes and contemplated the planet upon which they had crashed.

"It is a good land."

"A very good land."

"We will stay here, we will propagate, we will increase."

"And lose capability for our journey?"

"It is intended for journeys to have an end. And when the end is reached, the capabilities for journeying are no longer needed."

"That is true. This is a good land, and you have made a good answer. We will not be as we are . . . Still . . . Tell me, which of us will bear the children?"

"You will. After all, I piloted the ship."

"No, you will. For through me we came to this place, and the next task is yours."

The two explorers thought for a time. Then one said, "So important a decision cannot be argued. We must let another decide."

“That could de dangerous!”

“Not to us.”

So they constructed a hermaphroditic machine to select fairly and randomly who would be the mother and who the father. And when that was done they turned with a good will to the land, and let the machine do as it desired, and where and when it desired.

The machine lived. With hideous self-awareness it knew itself and its destiny. Not even desire was spared the machine; not even a strange and absurd destiny connected inextricably with the act of a red crustacean creature, with the courage of a Roman soldier, and with the final decision of two explorers.

“The machine is dangerous,” the female explorer said.

“Not to us,” said the male explorer.

“Then to our children, or to their children.”

“Would you have me destroy the machine?”

“No. Limit it, confine it, dedicate it!”

“Very well,” the male explorer said.

The machine, which no longer directly perceived itself as a machine, accepted the limit and the dedication with good grace. It could not blame the explorers, for the machine recognized its own danger inherent in its qualities of randomness. The built-in limit almost took care of that; but made much more difficult the task to which it had been dedicated. Perhaps now the task would be impossible; but the explorers didn’t care.

“Where is the machine?” the female explorer asked after a while.

“It has left us,” the male explorer answered. “It has gone in order to do its work.”

“And it didn’t even say goodbye,” the female explorer said thoughtfully. “I wonder if that means anything . . .” But then she had to take care of her two children, and there was no more time to think of the machine.

And Ban, lying in the coiled sea-mists, was dimly aware of all this. A red crustacean, a Roman soldier, a hermaphroditic machine . . . He fought to become as he had been, struggled, cursed. Slowly, inexorably, he began to succeed. He was becoming Ban again . . .

And then he heard the despairing wail of Knower, the simultaneous shriek of the Prophetess. It was too late. The lightning had struck, the sea-wall had collapsed, the last fraction of the fuse had flared. Just before unconsciousness struck him, Ban could feel the forces of chaos engulfing him much as storm clouds engulf the sky.

Part Four

By Murray Leinster

HE DID not exactly return to consciousness. Later, it seemed to him that he had not really become unconscious, but that the things he saw and heard and felt were so completely preposterous that his mind rejected them. Because it appeared that chaos had engulfed the universe and that time and space and reality had ceased to be. On the whole, that was a reasonable assumption.

Nevertheless he saw. He felt. He even heard. The hearing was a thin singing which did not form words at all, but muted wailings. The feeling was that the cosmos had turned askew, and the horizon had tilted so that what should have been the east was up, and what should have been the west was down—and he tended to fall toward it—and the beach was merely before him and the sky behind.

The seeing was unexpressable distortion of the beach. He saw it, but in a manner he could never have explained to anyone. An artist’s portrait of the beach and the waves would be something like it. But it would have to be a portrait, which differs from a photograph because a photograph is a picture of an instant and the sitter happens to be in it. But a portrait is of a person, and the moment is only a convention.

So Ban saw the beach, not as of this minute and second, but as a portrait shows a person. Somehow he saw it, all at once, shrouded in the fog that had come upon it since he was a boy, and also he saw it in bright sunshine. It was merely a pretense that he saw it between two breaths—at a given moment—because he could look inland and see smoke coming from the chimney of Ilbur the Robot, and he could see the beach empty as it was before there were either Cloud People or men. And he could see it as it would be aeons from now—

No. What he could see changed, even as he looked. He saw it, after a fashion, as a man in flight, and thousands of feet high, would see a winding highway in all its turnings in the same seeing. A man on foot on the same highway would see only a few hundred yards before him, and only remember what was behind. Ban saw the beach in such a strange perspective. He saw the beach from that dimension which is time. But it changed. There was an ending, which drew nearer. It was not unlike a highway seen from far above, with a cloud-mass moving to blot it out. Ban saw an ending of the beach, in time. There was a thing which was like a wall in the direction he knew to be the future. Nothing existed beyond that wall. The beach came to an end. There was no time beyond the wall. It was the end of everything—the solid world of men and the cloudy mist of the Cloud People alike. And the Cloud People wailed.

Ban could not actually see the wall because it was nothingness. Only nothingness could bring an end to time. And nothingness cannot be seen. Yet Ban knew it because it did not reflect the light that fell upon it, not yet absorb it. Nothingness cannot do either. It cannot do anything. If it could act it would not be nothingness, but something. Yet Ban knew that yonder real things ceased to be. Beyond that spot in time there was no time. There was a moment beyond which there was no next second. And this was what had made the Knower and the Prophetess cry out in horror, because Ban had brought it about.

Back in the city of the tall towers and living people, folk were apprehensive, but they feared the Cloud People. They did not fear this. But here with the east overhead and the west underfoot Ban knew that the Cloud People wailed because they could perceive what men could not, save Ban.

But how could he know? What had happened to him? The Knower had said bewildering things, each one specific but all of them confusion. The Knower said that Ban had stretched himself across an immeasurable distance of time. He had made a short-circuit, a discontinuity, perhaps a hole or a puncture in time, rather, a gap in time and space together. While the different parts of his body were child and man and doddering ancient all at once, he had created a weakness in the fabric of the universe. And somewhere, somewhen, reality began to collapse. These things were the only possible explanation, but Ban found himself objecting. A thing cannot collapse unless by so doing it releases energy. A thing is not destroyed unless its destruction releases some tension. Yet it was old, old knowledge that the universe of suns and stars and matter—and of Cloud People and men—exists only because it is held in existence. It did not create itself, and it does not sustain itself. And in some strange fashion Ban's blind fumbling had broken one small spot in the fabric of being. It could be likened to a puncture. And it spread.

But why could he see through time as the Cloud People did? And why was the east now overhead and the beach before him and the west beneath his feet? He noticed, suddenly, the tugging which pulled at him. He tended to fall. Downward. Toward the west. He fought the fall automatically, struggling to sum up this experience to know what to do. But he did not incline to fall toward the beach, any more than a man beside the Needle or Alpha or the Arsenal would be drawn toward those vast structures. Down, to Ban, was westward.

Why? There had to be an explanation.

He struggled to grasp his situation to do battle with it. In his absorption he unconsciously lessened his conflict with the westward pull. He reminded himself of a bird that had flown against a window in one of the City's towers. All windows and all outer doors were screened by force-fields like bubble-films, which allowed air to pass in or out gently, but resisted any fast-moving solid object or any strong wind. Sometimes a bird in full flight struck such a screen. Then the screen which was meant to act gently became violent. The bird was flung away, spinning and reeling and toppling helplessly. Sometimes the circuit-breaker clicked off and the bubble-field ceased to be unless someone restored the circuit. Yet one could reach a hand gently through the field, and the field ceased until the hand was removed. A man could walk through. But a running man would be flung back with violence.

That was it! Normally a man travelled slowly through the bubble-films which were instants of time. They let him pass slowly and gently through to the future, and age, and death. The boy and girl of the Cloud People had transported Ban through innumerable such films. Where the mists of the Cloud People hung, there was less impediment to time-movement than where clean sunshine shone upon the City. But when Ban became partly capable of time-motion, yet erratically; when Ban's legs were in one time-film and his body in another; when his body violated the laws of time and space, he shorted out the time-films as a hand through the bubble-screen destroys the screen until the hand is removed.

In effect, his body thus impossibly stretched through time acted as a man's body across an open screened doorway. It would destroy the screen; so that tornado-winds might roar through with nothing to stop them. And those tornado-winds would beat with terrific violence upon the man. He might be flung crazily away, like a bird trying to fly through a window.

This would explain everything. Partly instructed and partly capable of motion through time like the Cloud People, Ban had destroyed the time-films of unguessable centuries. And this caused the terror of the Knower and the Prophetess. Some part of him, some trivial part perhaps, remained remote from its proper place in time. There was a connection between it and now. There could be no time-films between while that connection lasted. So there could be no time. And through that gap came nothingness, to spread as a break in a soap-bubble spreads . . .

And Ban was beaten upon by the forces of the cosmos, trying to hold to what held it in being, like a force-bubble with a man lying across a door while a tornado raged. He was flung crazily about like a bird which has tried to pierce a window's bubble-field. He moved in no normal direction; he had no secure link either to space or time, and therefore the east was up and the west was down—but where was the past and future?—and the sky was behind him and the beach before. At least that was so.

But the beach was not before him! There was water, rippling like a vertical wall. There was stone. He looked ahead and saw down upon the rocky pinnacles of that small island halfway between Mwyrland and the City. There was no mist upon it now. He had forgotten to resist the pull upon him, and he fell, but not toward ancientness and death, nor toward the ground or sea, nor even skyward.

He fell toward the west. He gazed downward and saw that his motion was a retracing of the path he had flown, from the Oracles to Mwyrland. He fell headlong.

And then he noticed his body. It had changed again. He was a gangling boy of fifteen. He cried out angrily, and his voice broke. It was partly treble and partly the discordant croak of early adolescence, and then Ban realized what the tugging at him was, and what was its consequence. He was not only in a new relationship to the things of space, but of time. He no longer had an inherent tendency to fall toward the future and increasing age. Now he fell toward infancy. And the direction of infancy was the west.

He checked his fall by a terrific exercise of will, to look at his hands. They were not thin as a youth's hands are. They tended toward chubbiness like the hands of a child. The first phalange of each finger was rounded. His finger-joints were smooth.

It was exhausting to hold himself still, and not to fall toward the west. The pull was not as strong as it had been at first. He was a boy now, and the Cloud People children had said of him as a child that he was not as timevy—as time-heavy—as an old man. But as a boy he had not the strength of manhood. Yet now it was a man's mind that demanded the impossible of a child's body.

And that man's mind despaired, while still he fought the pull of time toward infancy, which lay to the west. He needed help. He needed knowledge. He raised his face toward the beach and cried out shrilly for the Cloud People to come and help him, however great their desperation.

Again there was a change. He still saw the beach as from time, but the distance through which he could look future-ward had dwindled. The wall-which-was-not-a-wall was nearer. The end of existing things was closer. As a standing forest grows small while a forest fire rages across it, time-to-come grew less as nothingness swallowed it. Yet nothingness cannot swallow anything. The beach and the sky and the sea were not devoured, but bit by bit they ceased to act; to reflect light or absorb it, to pull together or push apart, to move or to resist motion.

They ceased to be real. They became one with all those things which are merely possible and are not actual. There remained, in theory, a link to actuality in that they could exist if they could affect each other, if they could do anything, if they could perform any action of any sort. But for a thing to operate there must be time. Time is the arrangement by which things are able to happen. Without time nothing can occur. And there must be space. Space is the arrangement by which things can consist of parts which are side by side. But time and space were broken and breaking together like a punctured bubble, and the universe grew smaller.

There was no longer a cloud-bank over Mwyrland. Ban had gone back to a time in his childhood before the Cloud People formed their mist over Mwyrland and slowly, slowly, slowly deepened it until ageing men and women fled their homes and the war with the Cloud People began. But though Ban went back toward days long past, he still could see the vast encroachment of nothingness upon all things that were.

He knew very bitterly that he had brought the catastrophe about. He'd not intended it, to be sure. He hadn't done it alone, even, two Cloud-Children really began it, and the Knower was aware and thought their behavior only unkind. There had been no awareness that there was danger in the playful investigation, by Cloud-Children, of the nature of mere man. Yet the Cloud-People could travel back and forth in time from past to future. They could see the future. Then there had been a future, but now it grew less and less, so that there must be some dimension beyond the three of space and the fourth of time in which alterations of those four could come about. And of this dimension neither the Knower nor the Prophetess had any inkling. So there was a limit to prophecy.

And now he understood his present estate and the topsy-turviness of up and down and past and future. The universe attempted to use him—who had begun it—to bring an end to its destruction. The cosmos strove to heal itself. Had Ban died on the beach as an incredibly aged and futile dodderer, the sun would not shine on Mwyrland, to be sure, but it would still shine on the City, for a while. Had Ban not extended himself through time, there would not now be a gap blocked by his still-displaced body in which time could not exist as bubble-films which make the endless succession of seconds and minutes and hours and years. If Ban could restore himself to what he had been—withdrawing every atom of himself from any other time but the present—the crack in the cosmos would heal itself, like a force-bubble across a door or window. But it was impossible. He could not do it.

There was only one thing he could do, which would have the same effect. He could repair the fabric of reality by not ever having been.

It was this that he must consent to, in yielding to the westward tugging. His body was fourteen years old, now. Perhaps thirteen. To him, childhood lay to the west and maturity to the east. He was drawn backward through a displaced time toward infancy. This tugging, this pull, was the result of the laws of existence, because existence could not continue while his body contravened the laws of existence. If he let himself fall past ten years of age, and six, and two, and infancy itself . . . If he let himself fall back into the time before he was, then there would no longer be a break in the unity of time and space. He who had never been could not create a flaw. His body which had never existed could not short-circuit time. There could not be a break where he had never existed to make it.

Ban raged. It is not too bad a thing to die. All men face it sooner or later, and there is a secret knowledge which comes to every man at such moments. The knowledge is that it is not the end. But Ban was required to make a greater sacrifice than death. It was demanded of him that he surrender ever having been. He was required to embrace extinction.

He raged. But he was the Warden's son, and the City must be defended. He could not survive, but he could make extinction count. With somehow an air of scorn, he let himself fall. And it was dramatic, as he fell, to remember bitterly such unrelated things as a girl who shyly gave him a bowl of milk in the home of Ilbur the Robot, and Urmuz scolding him respectfully for some unrecalled fault, and the Prophetess with the strong hands and strangely indefinite face beneath her hood, and the girl who was to be her successor, who denied that she had a name and yet looked wistfully at Ban when he was in the prime of his strength and arrogance.

He remembered innumerable things, and now not one of them would ever have been real. Because he would never have been, and Urmuz would not teach him soldier-craft, nor his companions ever sing or drink with him, nor his father try to hide his pride in a swaggering son who would be Warden after him.

These things would be worse than forgotten. They would never be thought of. They would go into that limbo of possible things from which so few ever emerge to become actual. When Ban had never been born—why—things would start fresh. Perhaps his father would have another son, whom Urmuz would guide and scoldingly cherish. His friends would not miss him. How could they miss someone who never was? Perhaps they would choose another in his place, not knowing that it was a place that could have been filled otherwise. The girl at the Oracles would not think of him. How could she? She would think wistfully of someone else entirely. The Prophetess would not guide him, nor the Cloud-People children.

Then Ban revolted. In midair, he abruptly fought his own descent to infancy. His mind was still a man's mind, in a body perhaps four years old. The disparity, in fact, was very probably the reason for the disaster to all things. But he was required to make a greater sacrifice than any other man was ever asked to make. And it was not a reasonable bargain. He would accomplish nothing worth the sacrifice if he ceased to exist.

He fought the pull that dragged at him. He ceased to fall. Above him was the east and below the west and behind him there was the sky and before him the very shore-line of the Gulf of Orea. But he would not fall farther. He would not! Because there was no reward for his falling.

His non-existence would not keep the Cloud-People from forming the thinnest of mists above Mwyrland, in which people aged overnight, when the mist was thin, and then between sunrise and even-fall, when it grew thicker, and then in fractions of an hour when the cloud was at its densest.

If he were not ever born, the army of the City would still sally forth valiantly to do battle with the Cloud-People, and never return. The mist over Mwyrland would spread slowly out over the water, and cover the rocky volcanic island halfway to shore, and move forward to the City.

If he were never to exist, still someone—not he, but someone—would desperately demand counsel of the Prophetess on how the Cloud-People could be vanquished, and she would send him to Mwyrland as she'd sent Ban, alone. And he would die and ultimately the towers of the City would be filled with mist. Then the Cloud-People with their singing voices would drift about the wetted structures and only a few men would remain out on the Heath, forgetting that men had ever built cities or flown among the clouds.

These things would happen despite his sacrifice. But Ban had ventured greatly in defense of the City, because he was the Warden's son and it was his obligation. He was still the Warden's son, and it was still his obligation to defend the City. This sacrifice would do no good to the race of men. He would not sacrifice himself to extend the dank domain of the Cloud-People! He would not!

He cursed, and wept with rage because his curses were in a shrill treble voice, and he was a small and naked child in whom a man's mind inexplicably functioned, and because he stood alone against time and space and destiny and there was no one to help him in what he must accomplish. Must!

"I won't do it!" he cried in his child's high voice to the world and the sky and the sea about him. "I won't do it!" he cried fiercely to the galaxy. "You can't make me!" he cried to the universe itself. "Unless you make it save the City I won't do it!" he cried to all creation. But oddly enough he thought of a girl in the Oracles, who had looked wistfully at him when he was a tall, virile young man.

There was no reply. He clenched his child's fists and pipingly defied all time and space and destiny:

"I won't!—won't! won't!—won't!"

Part Five

By Robert Bloch

THE warp was widening. Time and Space had lost coalescence in a disintegrating cosmos. The Prophetess had predicted, the Knower suspected, but only one man had full knowledge, full realization. And shrilled his ultimate defiance against the ultimate extinction of all things—Ban, in his child's body, tangled in the loosening web of Time and Space, keening, "I won't, I won't, I won't!"

Only one man, and he helpless.

One man—and one other.

It was not man, nor beast; neither male nor female, but both and more than both. The machine which had been created on 3Bcc and vanished, was dedicated to a mission. And that mission involved neither instinct nor emotion. It was the pure, objective goal of cosmic survival.

Unfettered by tri- or quadri-dimensional laws of Time and Space, it moved freely through the universe as a random entity. All choice was its portion, all sentience and sensation was there to sample. But the machine was seeking the focal point, the focal point of weakness wherein it must function.

And its initial data was limited.

Perceptivity came slowly. First came the knowledge of weakness—a learned acquisition, for the machine had no initial referents. Then came the dimly-intuited associations.

The cosmos was a maze. Somewhere in the maze there was a flaw, threatening the entire structure. Problem: find a way through the maze to the flaw. Clue: personify awareness of distress.

On these vague premises the dedicated entity acted, and localized isolated instances; computing and discarding on the basis of intensity, probing for full comprehension.

Two images emerged, two clues to aid in the search. The machine established them as voices.

"I won't, I won't, I won't!"

First the voice was an interior echo. The machine sought to personify it. The only data which came through was ambiguous enough, and in the form of a single, simple impression—redhead.

Redhead.

Where in the universe was the redhead in distress? Another mechanism moved into full operation—and the machine found itself foundering upon the sandy ocean floor of the planet Hiallo, contemplating the red head of a crustacean which rested there, snapped clean from the lifeless body.

The cry had not come from here.

And yet it echoed, was still echoing, for in the Oracles the nameless neophyte who loved Ban could hear his call; she pressed her hands to her head, tangling her fingers in the red locks as his cry came to her. "I won't, I won't, I won't!"

The machine sensed her presence now, but simultaneously a stronger image came—not the echo-emanation but the source of the call itself.

A yellow-haired man.

The machine blurred and left the ocean bed of Hiallo. It was on Terra now, in Germania's tangled forest, perceiving the battle. Perceiving, and perceived. For yellow-haired Marcellus glimpsed it.

Marcellus—was this the entity the machine sought? It sensed no danger to the cosmos here, only individual destruction, and yet it could not be sure. There was more data to be gleaned. It followed Marcellus, waited for him in the wood. And it assumed substance and beckoned Marcellus with a whisper. Marcellus awaited it, armed with a puny branch.

The machine probed. Here was fear and courage, commingled in defiance. Marcellus did not want to die, but his thought was wholly self-centered. It was his danger and his alone which prompted him. And "I won't, I won't, I won't!" had not emanated from this yellow-haired biped.

So this was not the area of threat.

The machine moved from Terra, probing again. The keening cry existed. The keening crier existed. Existed in an area of almost non-existence.

Images and impressions multiplied. A fog, and a singing. A hairy, ugly man pacing the entrance to a tall edifice. A cold-eyed female in prayer. A moist-eyed female (redhead? yes!) in supplicating agony. An amorphous presence, a Knower, drained of all but dread.

All of them caught, caught in the maze. And the maze itself disintegrating. Yes, the cosmic threat was here, in this area. In this non-area. For that was what it was becoming, as Time and Space twisted and tore, and only one faint voice defied eternal termination with "I won't, I won't, I won't!"

The voice of a yellow-haired biped.

On land?

On sea?

In the air?

The machine probed. Probed land that was scarcely land, as Space sundered. Searched a sea that was now sky and mist and fog commingled. Roamed air that was truly empty—empty of all dimensional interrelationship.

The machine sought the source of the sole remaining strength; the awareness of extinction which still rebelled against the knowledge of its own ending.

And it came to Ban; came to the ridiculous child-body twisting and turning in a loosening Limbo where north, south, east, west, down, up, forward and back whirled free of all relationships.

The machine sensed the problem and the solution. It communicated with Ban using neither word nor image, merely direction in the form of reinforcing Ban's own survival-urge.

Suddenly Ban felt the strength surge back to implement his defiance. He began to move, to grow. He would become himself once more. And give himself up to the gap, to heal the breach between Time and Space. When he was properly timevy, he would be fixed in the balancing-area, forever, so that the universe could stabilize.

There was no right, no wrong, no alternative at all to consider. This was his purpose, his function. Where the new-found resolution came from was not even a question; nor was the source of his sudden power to act.

He became Ban.

And being Ban, he had only to remain fixed, forever fixed in this Limbo beyond Space and Time, so that the balances he had disturbed would be restored.

It meant an end to living, an end to consciousness, and end to self-awareness. But it was meaningful sacrifice, and worthy of the son of a Warden. Even if he would no longer know himself to be the son of a Warden. Even if he would no longer retain consciousness of squat Urmuz or the beautiful nameless one who waited (would wait forever, now, and in vain) inside the Oracles.

Ban was the sacrifice, his was the dedication. He felt consciousness spin away. For a moment there was a physical twinge of regret, but then the physical awareness left him, and the regret was purely psychic. He would cease to be, and that was right; yet he had lost the final battle. For in the end, this wouldn't alter the inexorable course of events. The cosmos would persist, but for how long? Only until the Cloud-People invaded his city and the Heaths beyond. Then the extinction would proceed until all was engulfed in nothingness. For Time would devour Space.

So it was a delaying-action, at best, this sacrifice he was making. But it must be done. He must surrender himself, lose himself in the whirling, for he was dedicated—

Dedicated.

The machine observed, registered. Something was wrong. Ban was not dedicated. Dedication was the machine's function.

Ban must not usurp its place.

The machine could heal. And it must communicate, quickly, establish a relationship with Ban before he was irrevocably lost in the elemental

Limbo.

“Ban—come back!”

Then the directive came, implemented by action. The machine lifted, grasped, transported.

Ban awoke to blinking awareness, standing upon the terrace beside the black bulk of the Oracles. He felt the firmness beneath his feet, sensed his proper physical-temporal relationship with Alpha, The Needle, the distant Arsenal.

He was himself again.

But for how long?

Something had snatched him from the jaws of sacrifice. But the jaws still gaped. Far away was the sea and the mist. Beyond that the Cloud-People hovered. Hovered closer and closer. Nothing had changed.

Nothing had changed, because he had failed.

Urmuz emerged from the shadows, breathless.

“You left me behind, sir—I was looking everywhere—” His face worked. “She told me—”

The girl with the great gray eyes stirred in the shadows behind the burly man.

Ban faced them, nodding slowly. “Yes, I went alone.” He shrugged. “And to no avail. There is no way to conquer the strength of the Cloud-People. Man cannot conquer Time.”

“But I don’t understand, sir—tell us what happened—” Urmuz stared at Ban helplessly. Then his eyes fell. “I suppose it’s no use talking.”

Ban nodded. “No use talking,” he echoed. “The end will come soon.”

The girl stepped forward. She walked proudly, bearing a gift in her great gray eyes. Ban saw it there, and found the exultation of ecstasy even in despair. His hands went out to claim the gift, and she was in his arms, her hair enveloping his shoulders in a red caress. So we die, Ban told himself. But first, even for a moment, we live—

"Hold!"

The voice that was not a voice came from the face that was not a face.

Ban stepped back, releasing the girl. She turned to stare, as he and Urmuz stared, at the apparition of the Prophetess.

"I heard," she said.

Ban squared his shoulders. "Then what does it matter?" he countered. "You know time has run out for all of us. Let the girl be. Give us the last few moments that remain."

"Captain Ban." The beautiful accents were measured. "You spoke of failure. Of this you need not be ashamed, for I am aware that you fought hard, even to the point of giving up the ultimate essence of identity."

"I tried," Ban murmured. "I failed."

"To fail is one thing. To surrender, another." The tones were even. "You are a soldier. Even now, with the battle lost, you cannot capitulate. You cannot flee, as you seek to flee, into the oblivion of momentary sensation. This girl is dedicated to the Covenant of the Oracles, just as you are dedicated to Wardenship of this City."

"I cannot stop the Cloud-People," Ban replied. "Time is too strong."

Urmuz stirred restlessly. "What do you want us to do?" he grumbled.

The Prophetess faced him. Something in her face—or what radiated from it and obscured it—caused the squat man to bow his head.

"I—I meant no disrespect, Prophetess," he muttered. "But the Captain's right. We are finished. What can we do now?"

"We can function as we were meant to function. We can observe the enemy. Watch and wait." A beautiful hand rose and beckoned. "Come with me."

Together they moved into the many-vaulted vastness of the Oracles. Together they sank down before the table as the Prophetess took her place behind it and bowed her head. For a moment, silence. The long, meaningful silence which is a prelude to extinction.

Almost Ban could see the clouds gathering and moving towards them; the Cloud-People were swirling before the sea and city, as Time moved forward to devour Space. Almost Ban could sense the death of the world as he knew it.

And then he could see, could sense.

For a cloud was with them now; the Prophetess, Urmuz, the girl could see it, too. It hovered in the vaulted archways above, and it emanated from the lovely hands upon the table-top.

The Prophetess had conjured up the final vision . . .

Once again Ban gazed upon the desolate shores where the shimmering clouds hovered. He thought he recognized the shape he had come to think of as the Knower, but he could not be sure. For there were thousands of shapes; thousands upon thousands of swirling semi-solid shadows, lambent and yet unillumined, obtuse and opaque. They were not merely hovering, they were converging now—converging upon a common goal.

It might have been a machine there in the sky, but it was not an artifact Ban recognized. It might have been a gigantic ship, designed to transport those who had not mastered flight by wing. It might have been a living entity, functioning to attract the Cloud-People.

Ban and the others did not know. But they could perceive what it was doing—incredibly, inexorably, it lured the cloud-shapes to its side. And a myriad whirring slits opened and engulfed them. The cloud-shapes disappeared, incorporated into the shining, shimmering sphere. The object was now a gigantic, blinding blur, and Ban could not look upon it, even in prophetic image.

He wrenched his eyes away, stared down at the Prophetess, seeking to fathom her face.

And now, suddenly, her face was a blinding blur, mirroring the machine.

The non-voice spoke.

“Fear not. Time is conquered. The Cloud-People, as you know them, are willing to depart. For they know that there is no future for them here. Their Time can devour our Space, but by the very nature of the act, the cosmos will be destroyed. I have told them so, and they have agreed that their place is in a cosmos of their own. I shall transport them there. That is my purpose, the function to which I am dedicated."

"But—who are you?"

"An instrument. An instrument serving one purpose—survival. I have served here in many ways. As Knower of the Cloud-People. As Prophetess, to your humanity. Now my service here is ended."

Ban glanced upwards and away. The gigantic vision was fading—and within it, the gigantic machine was blurring, too—

He tore his eyes from the incredible and searched the features of the Prophetess. The features that were fading now as the machine faded.

The lovely, lulling voice was fainter, too. But Ban could still hear it as it spoke.

"You thought you had failed, Captain Ban. But you did not fail. My mission was to save the cosmos, but I could not function until I found the focal point. And that focal point was in your strength, your human defiance of all destiny. It was your voice, crying, "I won't, I won't, I won't!" that guided me, brought me here. I go now, forever from your cosmos and your consciousness. But there is no need for me any longer. The Covenant is ended. I leave you with all you require to survive—your humanity, which is your strength."

The voice blurred, the vision blurred, the Prophetess blurred.

And then there were only the three of them—the squat, shaken man, the quiet, trembling girl, and the yellow-haired warrior in an empty, vaulted chamber.

"I don't understand," said Urmuz.

"I do," murmured the girl.

"I'll try," said Ban.

Together, the three of them walked back into the garden.

The sun was shining, as far as the eye could see.

"Dream?" muttered Urmuz.

"Reality," the girl affirmed.

"Perhaps both," Ban nodded. He paused. "If, somewhere, sometime, someone perfected a mechanism dedicated to saving the universe—and if it directed itself to us—"

"Foolishness!" Urmuz was scowling.

"But the Cloud-People are gone. We're safe. You know that, don't you?" the girl persisted.

"Yes. And I'm going to do something sensible about it—in the nearest tavern." Urmuz turned. "Coming, sir?"

Ban shook his head, moving closer to the girl.

Urmuz shrugged and moved down the dappled sunlight of the path.

For a moment Ban stared down into the great gray eyes—so cool a contrast to the red radiance of the haloing hair.

"You heard what she—it—said," he whispered. "The Covenant is ended."

She nodded gravely.

"That means there is no need for the Oracles. The future need not be foreseen; it is in our hands."

His hands reached for hers and she did not draw away.

"You are now destined to be a prophetess. You are a woman now."

Again she nodded. "And mine to claim."

She gave him her lips willingly enough, but Ban sensed no surrender. And when she was at last free to speak, her voice was firm. "Claim," she echoed. "But not to conquer. For I am a woman, as you are a man, and that is a struggle which never ends."

"You're joking," said Ban, with all the instinctual arrogance of the commander and future Warden.

"Perhaps," said the girl.

“Be serious for a moment, my darling. Remember, it is permitted now—tell me your name.”

Slowly she raised her great gray eyes to his, and in them he read the forecast of his future.

“Your name,” he commanded.

“Time,” she said.

THE END

Talent

Life's but a walking shadow—says the Bard—but this Player was heard forever!

IT is perhaps a pity that nothing is known of Andrew Benson's parents.

The same reasons which prompted them to leave him as a foundling on the steps of the St. Andrews Orphanage also caused them to maintain a discreet anonymity. The event occurred on the morning of March 3rd, 1943—the war era, as you probably recall—so in a way the child may be regarded as a wartime casualty. Similar occurrences were by no means rare during those days, even in Pasadena, where the Orphanage was located.

After the usual tentative and fruitless inquiries, the good Sisters took him in. It was there that he acquired his first name, from the patron and patronymic saint of the establishment. The "Benson" was added some years later, by the couple who eventually adopted him.

It is difficult, at this late date, to determine what sort of a child Andrew was; orphanage records are sketchy, at best, and Sister Rosemarie, who acted as supervisor of the boys' dormitory, is long since dead. Sister Albertine, the primary grades teacher of the Orphanage School, is now—to put it as delicately as possible—in her senility, and her testimony is necessarily colored by knowledge of subsequent events.

That Andrew never learned to talk until he was nearly seven years old seems almost incredible; the forced gregarity and the conspicuous lack of individual attention characteristic of orphanage upbringing would make it appear as though the ability to speak is necessary for actual survival in such an environment from infancy onward. Scarcely more credible is Sister Albertine’s theory that Andrew knew how to talk but merely refused to do so until he was well into his seventh year.

For what it is worth, she now remembers him as an unusually precocious youngster, who appeared to possess an intelligence and understanding far beyond his years. Instead of employing speech, however, he relied on pantomime, an art at which he was so brilliantly adept (if Sister Albertine is to be believed) that his continuing silence seemed scarcely noticeable.

“He could imitate anybody,” she declares. “The other children, the Sisters, even the Mother Superior. Of course I had to punish him for that. But it was remarkable, the way he was able to pick up all the little mannerisms and facial expressions of another person, just at a glance. And that’s all it took for Andrew—just a mere glance.

“Visitors’ Day was Sunday. Naturally, Andrew never had any visitors, but he liked to hang around the corridor and watch them come in. And afterwards, in the dormitory at night, he’d put in a regular performance for the other boys. He could impersonate every single man, woman or child who’d come to the Orphanage that day—the way they walked, the way they moved, every action and gesture. Even though he never said a word, nobody made the mistake of thinking Andrew was mentally deficient. For a while, Dr. Clement had the idea he might be a mute.”

DR. Roger Clement is one of the few persons who might be able to furnish more objective data concerning Andrew Benson’s early years. Unfortunately, he passed away in 1954, a victim of a fire which also destroyed his home and his office files.

It was Dr. Clement who attended Andrew on the night that he saw his first motion picture.

The date was 1949, some Saturday evening in the late fall of the year. The Orphanage received and showed one film a week, and only children of school age were permitted to attend. Andrew's inability—or unwillingness—to speak had caused some difficulty when he entered primary grades that September, and several months went by before he was allowed to join his classmates in the auditorium for the Saturday night screenings. But it is known that he eventually did so.

The picture was the last (and probably the least) of the Marx Brothers movies. Its title was Love Happy, and if it is remembered by the general public at all today, that is due to the fact that the film contained a brief walk-on appearance by a then-unknown blonde bit player named Marilyn Monroe.

But the Orphanage audience had other reasons for regarding it as memorable. Because Love Happy was the picture that sent Andrew Benson into his trance.

Long after the lights came up again in the auditorium the child sat there, immobile, his eyes staring glassily at the blank screen. When his companions noticed and sought to arouse him he did not respond; one of the Sisters (possibly Sister Rosemarie) shook him, and he promptly collapsed in a dead faint. Dr. Clement was summoned, and he administered to the patient. Andrew Benson did not recover consciousness until the following morning.

And it was then that he talked.

He talked immediately, he talked perfectly, he talked fluently—but not in the manner of a six-year-old child. The voice that issued from his lips was that of a middle-aged man. It was a nasal, rasping voice, and even without the accompanying grimaces and facial expressions it was instantaneously and unmistakably recognizable as the voice of Groucho Marx.

Andrew Benson mimicked Groucho in his Sam Grunion role to perfection, word for word. Then he "did" Chico Marx. After that he relapsed into silence again, and for a moment it was thought he had reverted to his mute phase. But it was an eloquent silence, and soon it became evident that he was imitating Harpo. In rapid succession, Andrew created recognizable vocal and visual portraits of Raymond Burr, Melville Cooper, Eric Blore and the other actors who played small roles in the picture. His impersonations seemed uncanny to his companions, and the Sisters were not unimpressed.

"Why, he even looked like Groucho," Sister Albertine insists.

IGNORING the question of how a towheaded moppet of six can achieve a physical resemblance to Groucho Marx without benefit (or detriment of make-up. it is nevertheless an established fact that Andrew Benson gained immediate celebrity as a mimic within the small confines of the Orphanage.

And from that moment on, he talked regularly, if not freely. That is to say, he replied to direct questions, he recited his lessons in the classroom, and responded with the outward forms of politeness required by Orphanage discipline. But he was never loquacious, or even communicative, in the ordinary sense, The only time he became spontaneously articulate was immediately following the showing of a weekly movie.

There was no recurrence of his initial seizure, but each Saturday night screening brought in its wake a complete dramatic recapitulation by the gifted youngster. During the fall of 49 and the winter of 50, Andrew Benson saw many movies. There was Sorroicful Jones, with Bob Hope: Tarzan's Magic Fountain: The Fighting O'Flynn; The Lite of Riley: Little Women, and a number of other films, current and older. Naturally, these pictures were subject to approval by the Sisters before being shown, and as a result movies depicting or emphasizing violence were not included. Still, several Westerns reached the Orphanage screen, and it is significant that Andrew Benson reacted in what was to become a characteristic fashion.

"Funny thing," declares Albert Dominguez, who attended the Orphanage during the same period as Andrew Benson and is one of the few persons located who is willing to admit, let alone discuss, the fact. 'At first Andy imitated everybody—all the men, that is. He never imitated none of the women. But after he started to see Westerns, it got so he was choosey, like. He just imitated the villains. I don't mean like when us guys was playing cowboys—you know, when one guv is the Sheriff and one is a gunslinger. I mean he imitated villains all the time. He could talk like 'em, he could even look like 'em. We used to razz hell out of him, you know?"

It is probably as a result of the "razzing" that Andrew Benson, on the evening of May 17th, 1950, attempted to slit the throat of Frank Phillips with a table-knife. Probably—although Albert Dominguez claims that the older boy offered no provocation, and that Andrew Benson was exactly duplicating the screen role of a western desperado in an old Charles Starrett movie.

The incident was hushed up, apparently, and no action taken; we have little information on Andrew Benson's growth and development between the summer of 1950 and the autumn of 1955. Dominguez left the orphanage, nobody else appears willing to testify, and Sister Albertine had retired to a rest-home. As a result, there is nothing available concerning what may well have been Andrew's crucial, formative years. The meager records of his classwork seem satisfactory enough, and there is nothing to indicate that he was a disciplinary problem to his instructors. In June of 1955 he was photographed with the rest of his classmates upon the occasion of graduation from eighth grade. His face is a mere blur, an almost blank smudge in a sea of preadolescent countenances. What he actually looked like at that age is hard to tell.

The Bensons thought that he resembled their son, David.

LITTLE David Benson had died of polio in 1953, and two years later his parents came to St. Andrews Orphanage seeking to adopt a boy. They had David's picture with them, and they were frank to state that they sought a physical resemblance as a guide to making their choice.

Did Andrew Benson see that photograph? Did—as has been subsequently theorized by certain irresponsible alarmists—he see certain home movies which the Bensons had taken of their child?

We must confine ourselves to the known facts, which are, simply, that Mr. and Mrs. Louis Benson, of Pasadena, California, legally adopted Andrew Benson, aged 12, on December 9th, 1955.

And Andrew Benson went to live in their home, as their son. He entered the public high school. He became the owner of a bicycle. He received an allowance of one dollar a week. And he went to the movies.

Andrew Benson went to the movies, and there were no restrictions. No restrictions at all. For several months, that is. During this period he saw comedies, dramas, Westerns, musicals, melodramas. He must have seen melodramas. Was there a film, released early in 1956, in which an actor played the role of a gangster who pushed a victim out of a second-story window?

Knowing what we do today, we must suspect that there must have been. But at the time, when the actual incident occurred, Andrew Benson was virtually exonerated. He and the other boy had been “scuffling” in a classroom after school, and the boy had “accidentally fallen.” At least, this is the official version of the affair. The boy—now Pvt. Raymond Schuyler, USMG—maintains to this day that Benson deliberately tried to kill him.

“He was spooky, that kid,” Schuyler insists. “None of us ever really got close to him. It was like there was nothing to get close to, you know? I mean, he kept changing off so. From one day to the next you could never figure out what he was going to be like. Of course we all knew he imitated these movie actors—he was only a freshman but already he was a big shot in the dramatic club—but it was as though he imitated all the time. One minute he’d be real quiet, and the next, wham! You know that story, the one about Jekyll and Hyde? Well, that was Andrew Benson. Afternoon he grabbed me, we weren’t even talking to each other. He just came up to me at the window and I swear to God he changed right before my eyes. It was as if he all of a sudden got about a foot taller and fifty pounds heavier, and his face was real wild. He pushed me out of the window, without one word.

Of course I was scared spitless, and maybe I just thought he changed. I mean, nobody can actually do a thing like that, can they?"

This question, if it arose at all at the time, remained unanswered. We do know that Andrew Benson was brought to the attention of Dr. Max Fahringer, child psychiatrist and part-time guidance counselor at the school, and that his initial examination disclosed no apparent abnormalities of personality or behavior patterns. Dr. Fahringer did, however, have several long talks with the Bensons, and as a result Andrew was forbidden to attend motion pictures. The following year, Dr. Fahringer voluntarily offered to examine young Andrew—undoubtedly his interest had been aroused by the amazing dramatic abilities the boy was showing in his extracurricular activities at the school.

ONLY one such interview ever took place, and it is to be regretted that Dr. Fahringer neither committed his findings to paper nor communicated them to the Bensons before his sudden, shocking death at the hands of an unknown assailant. It is believed (or was believed by the police, at the time) that one of his former patients, committed to an institution as a psychotic, may have been guilty of the crime.

All that we know is that it occurred some short while following a local re-run of the film, Man in the Attic, in which Jack Palance essayed the role of Jack the Ripper.

It is interesting, today, to examine some of the so-called "horror movies" of those years, including the re-runs of earlier vehicles starring Boris Karloff, Bela Lugosi, Peter Lorre and a number of other actors.

We cannot say with any certainty, of course, that Andrew Benson was violating the wishes of his foster parents and secretly attending motion pictures. But if he did, it was quite likely that he would frequent the smaller neighborhood houses, many of which specialized in re-runs. And we do know, from the remarks of fellow classmates during these high school years, that “Andy” was familiar—almost omnisciently so—with the mannerisms of these performers.

The evidence is oftentimes conflicting. Joan Charters, for example, is willing to “swear on a stack of Bibles” that Andrew Benson, at the age of fifteen, was “a dead ringer for Peter Lorre—the same bug eyes and everything.” Whereas Nick Dossinger, who attended classes with Benson a year later, insists that he “looked just like Boris Karloff.”

Granted that adolescence may bring about a considerable increase in height during the period of a year, it is nevertheless difficult to imagine how a “dead ringer for Peter Lorre” could metamorphose into an asthenic Karloff type.

A mass of testimony is available concerning Andrew Benson during those years, but almost all of it deals with his phenomenal histrionic talent and his startling skill at “ad lib” impersonations of motion picture actors. Apparently he had given up mimicking his associates and contemporaries almost entirely.

“He said he liked to do actors better, because they were bigger,” says Don Brady, who appeared with him in the senior play. “I asked him what he meant by ‘bigger’ and he said it was just that—actors were bigger on the screen, sometimes twenty feet tall. He said, ‘Why bother, with little people when you can be big?’ Oh, he was a real offbeat character, that one.”

The phrases recur. “Oddball,” and “screwball,” and “real gone” are picturesque, but hardly enlightening. And there seems to be little recollection of Andrew Benson as a friend or classmate, in the ordinary role of adolescence. It’s the imitator who is remembered, with admiration and, frequently, with distaste bordering on actual apprehension.

“He was so good he scared you. But that’s when he was doing those impersonations, of course. The rest of the time, you scarcely knew he was around.”

“Classes? I guess he did all right. I didn’t notice him much.”

“Andrew was a fair student. He could recite when called upon, but he never volunteered. His marks were average. I got the impression he was rather withdrawn."

"No, he never dated much. Come to think of it, I don't think he went out with girls at all. I never paid much attention to him, except when he was on stage, of course."

"I wasn't really what you call close to Andy. I don't know anybody who seemed to be friends with him. He was so quiet, outside of the dramatics. And when he got up there, it was like he was a different person—he was real great, you know? We all figured he'd end up at the Pasadena Playhouse."

THE reminiscences of his contemporaries are frequently apt to touch upon matters which did not directly involve Andrew Benson. The years 1956 and 1957 are still remembered, by high school students of the area in particular, as the years of the curfew. It was a voluntary curfew, of course, but it was nevertheless strictly observed by most of the female students during the period of the "werewolf murders"—that series of savage, still-unsolved crimes which terrorized the community for well over a year. Certain cannibalistic aspects of the slaying of the five young women led to the "werewolf" appellation on the part of the sensation-mongering press. The Wolf Alan series made by Universal had been revived, and perhaps this had something to do with the association.

But to return to Andrew Benson; he grew up, went to school, and lived the normal life of a dutiful stepson. If his foster parents were a bit strict, he made no complaints. If they punished him because they suspected he sometimes slipped out of his room at night, he made no complaint or denials. If they seemed apprehensive lest he be disobeying their set injunctions not to attend the movies, he offered no overt defiance.

The only known clash between Andrew Benson and his family came about as a result of their flat refusal to allow a television set in their home. Whether or not they were concerned about the possible encouragement of Andrew's mimicry or whether they had merely developed an allergy to Lawrence Welk and his ilk is difficult to determine. Nevertheless, they balked at the acquisition of a TV set. Andrew begged and pleaded, pointed out that he “needed” television as an aid to a future dramatic career. His argument had some justification, for in his senior year, Andrew had indeed been “scouted” by the famous Pasadena Playhouse, and there was even some talk of a future professional career without the necessity of formal training.

But the Bensons were adamant on the television question; as far as we can determine, they remained adamant right up to the day of their death.

The unfortunate circumstances occurred at Balboa, where the Bensons owned a small cottage and maintained a little cabin cruiser. The elder Bensons and Andrew were heading for Catalina Channel when the cruiser overturned in choppy waters. Andrew managed to cling to the craft until rescued, but his foster parents were gone. It was a common enough accident; you’ve probably seen something just like it in the movies a dozen times.

Andrew, just turned eighteen, was left an orphan once more—but an orphan in full possession of a lovely home, and with the expectation of coming into a sizeable inheritance when he reached twenty-one. The Benson estate was administered by the family attorney, Justin L. Fowler, and he placed young Andrew on an allowance of forty dollars a week—an amount sufficient for a recent graduate of high school to survive on, but hardly enough to maintain him in luxury.

IT is to be feared that violent scenes were precipitated between the young man and his attorney. There is no point in recapitulating them here, or in condemning Fowler for what may seem—on the surface of it—to be the development of a fixation.

But up until the night that he was struck down by a hit-and-run driver in the street before his house, Attorney Fowler seemed almost obsessed with the desire to prove that the Benson lad was legally incompetent, or worse.

Indeed, it was his investigation which led to the uncovering of what few facts are presently available concerning the life of Andrew Benson.

Certain other hypotheses—one hesitates to dignify them with the term “conclusions”—he apparently extrapolated from these meager findings, or fabricated them out of thin air. Unless, of course, he did manage to discover details which he never actually disclosed. Without the support of such details there is no way of authenticating what seem to be a series of fantastic conjectures.

A random sampling, as remembered from various conversations Fowler had with the authorities, will suffice.

“I don’t think the kid is even human, for that matter. Just because he showed up on those orphanage steps, you call him a foundling. Changeling might be a better word for it. Yes, I know they don’t believe in such things any more. And if you talk about life-forms from other planets, they laugh at you and tell you to join the Fortean Society. So happens, I’m a member.

“Changeling? It’s probably a more accurate term than the narrow meaning implies. I’m talking about the way he changes when he sees these movies. No, don’t take my word for it—ask anyone who’s ever seen him act. Better still, ask those who never saw him on a stage, but just watched him imitate movie performers in private. You’ll find out he did a lot more than just imitate. He becomes the actor. Yes, I mean he undergoes an actual physical transformation. Chameleon. Or some other form of life. Who can say?

“No, I don’t pretend to understand it. I know it’s not ‘scientific’ according to the way you define science. But that doesn’t mean it’s impossible. There are a lot of life-forms in the universe, and we can only guess at some of them. Why shouldn’t there be one that’s abnormally sensitive to mimicry?

“You know what effect the movies can have on so-called ‘normal’ human beings, under certain conditions. It’s a hypnotic state, for this movie-viewing, and you can ask the psychologists for confirmation. Darkness, concentration, suggestion—all the elements are present. And there’s posthypnotic suggestion, too. Again, psychiatrists will back me up on that. Most people tend to identify with various characters on the screen. That’s where our hero worship comes in, that’s why we have western-movie fans, and detective fans, and all the rest. Supposedly ordinary people come out of the theater and fantasy themselves as the heroes and heroines they saw up there on the screen; imitate them, too.

“That’s what Andrew Benson did of course. Only suppose he could carry it one step further? Suppose he was capable of being what he saw portrayed? And he chose to be the villains? I tell you, it’s time to investigate those killings of a few years back, all of them. Not just the murder of those girls, but the murder of the two doctors who examined Benson when he was a child, and the death of his foster parents, too. I don’t think any of these things were accidents. I think some people got too close to the secret, and Benson put them out of the way.

“Why? How should I know why? Any more than I know what he’s looking for when he watches the movies. But he’s looking for something, I can guarantee that. Who knows what purpose such a life-form can have, or what he intends to do with his power? All I can do is warn you.”

IT IS easy to dismiss Attorney Fowler as a paranoid type, though perhaps unfair, in that we cannot evaluate the reasons for his outburst. That he knew (or believed he knew) something is self-evident. As a matter of fact, on the very evening of his death he was apparently about to put his findings on paper.

Deplorably, all that he ever set down was a preamble, in the form of a quotation from Eric Voegelin, concerning rigid pragmatic attitudes of “scientism,” so-called:

“(1) the assumption that the mathematized science of natural phenomena is a model science to which all other sciences ought to conform; (2) that all realms of being are accessible to the methods of the sciences of phenomena; and (3) that all reality which is not accessible to sciences of phenomena is either irrelevant or, in the more radical form of the dogma, illusionary.”

But Attorney Fowler is dead, and we deal with the living; with Max Schick, for example, the motion-picture and television agent who visited Andrew Benson at his home shortly after the death of the elder Bensons, and offered him an immediate contract.

“You’re a natural,” Schick declared. “Never mind with the Pasadena Playhouse bit. I can spot you right now, believe me! With what you got, we’ll back Brando right off the map! Of course, we gotta start small, but I know just the gimmick. Main thing is to establish you in a starring slot right away. None of this stock-con tract jazz, get me? The studios aren’t handing ’em out any more in the first place, and even if you landed one, you’d end up on Cloud Nowhere. No, the deal is to get you a lead and billing right off the bat. And like I said, I got the angle.

“We go to a small independent producer, get it? Must be a dozen of ’em operating right now, and all of ’em making the same thing. Only one kind of picture that combines low budgets with big grosses, and that’s a science fiction movie.

“Yeah, you heard me, a science fiction movie. Whaddya mean, you never saw one? Are you kidding? How about that? You mean you never saw any science fiction pictures at all?

“Oh, your folks, eh? Had to sneak out? And they only show that kind of stuff at the downtown houses?

“Well look, kid, it’s about time, that’s all I can say. It’s about time! Hey, just so’s you know what we’re talking about, you better get on the ball and take in one right away. Sure, I’m positive, there must be one playing a downtown first run now. Why don’t you go this afternoon? I got some work to finish up here at the office—run you down in my car and you can go on to the show, meet me back there when you get out.

“Sure, you can take the car after you drop me off. Be my guest.”

SO Andrew Benson saw his first science fiction movie. He drove there and back in Max Schick's car (coincidentally enough, it was the late afternoon of the day when Attorney Fowler became a hit-and-run victim) and Schick has good reason to remember Andrew Benson's reappearance at his office just after dusk.

"He had a look on his face that was out of this world," Schick says.

" 'How'd you like the picture?' I ask him.

" 'It was wonderful,' he tells me. 'Just what I've been looking for all these years. And to think I didn't know.'

" 'Didn't know what?' I ask. But he isn't talking to me any more. You can see that. He's talking to himself.

" 'I thought there must be something like that,' he says. 'Something better than Dracula, or Frankenstein's Monsters, or all the rest. Something bigger, more powerful. Something I could really be. And now I know. And now I'm going to.' "

Max Schick is unable to maintain coherency from this point on. But his direct account is not necessary. We are, unfortunately, all too well aware of what happened next.

Max Schick sat there in his chair and watched Andrew Benson change.

He watched him grow. He watched him put forth the eyes, the stalks, the writhing tentacles. He watched him twist and tower, filling the room and then overflowing until the flimsy stucco walls collapsed and there was nothing but the green, gigantic horror, the sixty-foot-high monstrosity that may have been born in a screenwriter's brain or may have been spawned beyond the stars, but certainly existed and drew nourishment from realms far from a three-dimensional world or three-dimensional concepts of sanity.

Max Schick will never forget that night and neither, of course, will anybody else.

That was the night the monster destroyed Los Angeles.

Fat Chance

Their names were John and Mary, and they lived in a little white frame house with a picket fence all around the front lawn. They owned a fintail car and a TV set with a 21-inch screen, and a power mower and a freezer. John went bowling once a week, on Thursday nights, and Mary subscribed to three of the better women's magazines and cut out all the recipes. They had been married for fourteen years now, and in every respect they were a typical middle-class American couple.

So, naturally enough, John wanted to kill Mary.

Perhaps this is an oversimplification. In John's defense, it must be stated that he was perfectly willing to put up with most of his wife's little ways. He did not object to her pincurled presence at the breakfast table every morning, or to her habit of using baby-talk when she addressed the canary, or the way she appropriated his electric shaver to use on her legs. He had no complaints about her cooking, or the way she ran the household and spent his money. He had long ago realized that she was not a stimulating companion or conversationalist, and he was willing to accept the fact that her domestic habits, in the kitchen, parlor, or bedroom, were dull indeed. All this he resigned himself to putting up with, as most typical middle-class American husbands inevitably do. But there was just one thing he couldn't endure, one crime he could not forgive.

Mary was getting too fat.

She had begun putting on weight a few years after they were married. Eight years ago she had been "pleasingly plump" but presentable. Six years ago she began having trouble finding "her" size in the dresses she selected.

Five years ago she had embarked on what proved to be an endless series of ineffectual diets, all of which failed to remedy the situation because in the end they required that she cut down on her intake of calories. Three years ago she had apparently resigned herself to the situation—she was fat, and she admitted she was fat. Not too fat, of course; just plain “heavy.”

Of course Dr. Applegate warned her about stuffing herself; there were examinations and explanations about the way she reddened upon the slightest exertion, about the high blood pressure and the strain on her heart. But the fatter Mary became, the less she felt like exerting herself and the easier it was to just stay home and watch television. Besides, as she told the doctor, John was away almost every night at the store—his pharmacy stayed open until ten, except on Sundays—and there was nothing for her to do. And she didn’t really eat a lot; just nibbled now and then to calm her nerves.

Dr. Applegate had a few words to say about compulsive appetite, and John had quite a lot to say about her sloppy appearance, but these things only seemed to make Mary more nervous. So, of course, she ate.

Now she was positively gross, but John didn’t bother to talk about it anymore. He knew it wouldn’t do any good. She was fat as a pig.

That’s when John began to have these dreams about butchering hogs.

It might very well have ended with that—after all, John was so typically middle-class and middle-aged, and he could have so easily developed a few interests of his own. An ulcer, perhaps, or a coronary condition, or a woodworking shop in the basement.

It took something out-of-the-ordinary to bring him to the actual point of murder.

Her name was Frances.

Actually, Frances Higgins was extraordinary only in John’s eyes; to others she was only a tall, well-preserved woman on the wrong side of thirty, with rather pretty auburn hair. John saw her slimness and was dazzled. He had frequent opportunities to be dazzled, because Frances Higgins was Mary’s best friend.

They had gone to school together (incredible, that fat, candy-chewing, Welk-watching Mary had ever attended business college!) and continued the acquaintance after Mary married and Frances went on to a career as private secretary for a prominent downtown attorney.

Neither John nor Frances realized that they were embarking on an affair. One does not associate passion with middle-aged pharmacy proprietors, or with private secretaries who keep rubber plants in the office. Both of them were quite unprepared for the overwhelming consequences—the compulsive need to constantly see one another, touch one another, and be with one another at any cost to self-respect or self-control.

"I can't stand it, darling!" she told him. "Visiting you and Mary, seeing you together. And then thinking of you and Mary together when I'm not there—"

"I know," John sighed. "How do you think it is with me? I don't want to be with Mary; I hate the sight of her. Even before I found you, I hated her. Now I can't bear it. And if what you say is true about a divorce—"

Frances nodded sadly. That had been one of the first things they'd thought about; the possibilities of divorce. Frances had not been fool enough to reveal her true feelings about John when she sounded Mary out on the subject. Instead she had chosen the devious method; she had gone to Mary, as her best friend, and hinted that there was something she ought to know. It appeared as though John had been, as she put it "stepping out of line a little." There were nights when he absented himself from the drug store without Mary's knowledge. She refused to mention the sources of her information, but people were talking. And while it might not be really "serious" one never knew; perhaps Mary ought to prepare herself just in case and think about the future. A friendly warning—

Mary shrugged. Yes, she knew John had been restless lately; a wife can always tell. And she and John had been so very close through all the years. But for that very reason, she had no intention of leaving him, now or ever. Let him have his fling, poor dear. Sooner or later, it would blow over.

"But what if he came to you and demanded a divorce?" Frances had persisted. "What if he just walked out on you, cold, and left you for another woman?"

"He wouldn't do a thing like that," Mary answered. "He just couldn't; John isn't that type at all." Then her apologetic air had suddenly given way to grim resolution. "But if he did, he'd be sorry, believe me! There are laws, you know. I'd see to it that he paid—I'd get everything I've got coming to me. By the time I was through with him, he and this little tramp, whoever she is, would be good and sorry they ever started anything."

Frances had reported the conversation to John the following evening and they both agreed, sadly but logically, that Mary meant what she said. Moreover, she had the power to execute her threat. A divorce would mean an irreparable financial loss to John, perhaps even the loss of his business. And as for Frances, her elderly employer (who never, under any circumstances, ever handled a divorce proceeding) would fire her handily. Love in a garret is all very veil for moonstruck teenagers, but both John and Frances had reached a time in life where they enjoyed the creature comforts both of them had striven for over the years. And, being human, they felt the equal necessity of protecting their present status as respectable members of the community.

So divorce was out. And the only apparent result of Frances' conversation with Mary was that she began to gorge herself still more heavily. Dr. Applegate's latest diet was tossed overboard and Mary stuffed herself night and day. John would come home and find her consuming candy from the store—indeed, she insisted that he constantly supply her with more each time he put in his appearance from a night of work behind the counter.

"Cheer up," John told Frances, although he didn't really believe she would follow his suggestion. "The way the old sow is going now, she'll eat herself to death in a few years."

"A few years!" Frances looked at herself in the mirror behind the soda-fountain. Then she looked at John. She didn't say anything, but then she didn't have to. John knew what she was thinking. A few years was all they had left, really. A few years of being together as they wanted to be together, or a few years of this endless aching, this ceaseless torment of furtive, fear-filled meeting interspersed with interludes of mocking, maddening pretense. And meanwhile Frances would have to live on in her little cell-like apartment, while John stayed with the fat pig.

That's what Frances called her now. "The fat pig." A year ago she would never have dreamed of describing anyone that way, let alone her best friend. But a year ago she hadn't really known John, hadn't wanted John. So now it was easy for her to say what she really felt. "I can't go on like this. I won't go on! It isn't right. It would be different if she felt anything for you, darling, anything at all. But she doesn't. I've talked to her, and I know. To Mary, you're just property. Another household appliance, something she owns, a convenience that supplies her with food and shelter and performs menial chores around the house for her comfort. When I hinted you might be running around, she wasn't even jealous—just angry. The way you get angry at some gadget when you suspect it might be going out of order and cost you something to repair.

"I can't bear to think of you putting up with her any longer; the way she just sits around all day and all night feeding her fat face—why all the time I was talking to her, even when she started to get excited, she kept eating those damned macaroons out of a big box and watching the Arthur Godfrey show. She isn't any good to you. She isn't any good to herself. Nobody would miss her if she died tomorrow."

She stared at John. He lowered his eyes and didn't answer.

"Look, darling. I've been thinking. You're a druggist. Isn't there something you could give her that—"

John shook his head. He continued to avert his gaze as he answered. "I won't lie to you. I've been thinking about that, too. And it wouldn't work. Just because I am a pharmacist. Don't you realize that's the very first thing the police would think of if they ever became suspicious? And they would become suspicious, because of the medical report. A doctor would have to be called, he'd have to sign the death-certificate, and he'd know right away. Contrary to what you may be thinking, there just aren't any drugs that will do the trick without detection; at least nothing I could get out of stock here. And I couldn't order anything special or obscure without accounting for it. We have to make out reports, they check on us, we're inspected. No, that's out."

Frances put her hand on his arm—her cool, slim hand, with the long fingernails which could claw so deeply when she clung to him.

"All right," she said. "All right. But you've got to do something. I can't take much more of this. In fact, I'm going away."

"Going away?"

There was such anguish in his response that her own voice softened. "Don't be alarmed, darling. It's just a vacation. I've got two weeks coming this year, you know. At first I wasn't even going to take them, but I decided I'd better. All this has made me so nervous lately. There's an aunt and uncle of mine out in Portland—they've asked me to visit them."

"When?"

"Next week. I've got plane reservations for Monday."

John blinked. "But that means I won't be seeing you again, not for almost three weeks."

The nails dug into his arm. He could feel them even through his suitcoat. "Maybe longer than that," she said. "Darling, I meant what I told you. I can't stand living this way any longer. It's up to you, now. Either you find some way out for us, soon, or this is the end."

"But I can't—"

"You must! I don't care if you hit her over the head with a club and lock her in the deep-freeze. All I know is that I've had it. From now on, it's all or nothing." She relaxed her grip. "I didn't tell you this, darling, but my aunt and uncle have been urging me to move out there. They say the climate is wonderful in Oregon, and I'd have no trouble finding another job in Portland. When I visit them, I'm going to investigate the possibilities. Maybe that's the best thing to do, after all."

"No!" John muttered. He stood up taking a deep breath. "You're coming back here, you've got to promise me you'll come back."

"Do I?"

"Yes. And I'll make you a promise, too. I'm going to think of a way. I don't know how, but I'll think of one. When you come back, she'll be gone."

John kept his word. From that moment on, he thought of a way. He thought of a hundred ways during the next few days before Frances' departure. He thought of them by day while he sold bobbie pins and aspirins and band-aids in the store, and he thought of them by night as he watched Mary eating doughnuts in the living-room, belching in the bathroom or snoring stertorously by his side in bed.

He didn't see Frances again during the weekend, but he saw a lot of Mary. There was, he reflected grimly, quite a lot of her to see. She tipped the scales at about 240 now. All weekend long she kept babbling about still another new diet Dr. Applegate wanted her to try. And all weekend long, John kept thinking about ways of killing her. A hundred ways.

But none of them were any good. None of them would work. Oh, he could murder her all right, but the point was to get away with it. Get away with it scot free, get away with Frances, sell the damned business and move to Oregon after everything was over. That part would be easy. But the method, the method—

One Sunday night it came to him, just like that. And there was nothing particularly surprising in the phenomenon, because it had been there all the time. Frances had told him; he was a pharmacist and he had access to poisons.

Not obscure poisons, not undetectable poisons, but that didn't matter; he didn't need anything special, as long as he made sure he administered a lethal dose. Of course a physician would examine Mary's body before writing out a death-certificate, but there wouldn't be any trouble.

Because the physician would be Dr. Applegate. And Applegate, in addition to being the family doctor, was the man who had come to John when he needed some extra, but also extra-legal, prescriptions for narcotics. Now he would come to John's aid in his hour of need. And he would not demur, he would not question, he most certainly would not talk. If he did, then John would talk too, and Dr. Applegate would be up on criminal charges.

It was really very simple, now that he realized how to solve the medical aspects of his problem. Mary's few friends all knew that she was grossly overweight, that she had put a strain on her heart. So the death-certificate would testify, and nobody would ask any embarrassing questions.

All that remained to be considered now was the exact modus operandi to employ.

John thought about it all that day Monday in the store. It kept him from thinking about Frances' departure that morning. On the other hand he was really quite glad that she had left, under the circumstances. It meant she'd be out of town during the time of the tragedy; there'd be no strain of having to simulate grief, attend the funeral, and avoid any accidental betrayal of her true feelings in John's presence. Better still, her absence would rule out any evidence of collusion.

For his own part, it would be ideal for him to dispose of Mary immediately; the funeral and the subsequent winding-up of her affairs would occupy him during the next two weeks and keep him from brooding about Frances' absence. Yes, all in all, this was the ideal time.

And the method?

He had the whole pharmacopoeia at his disposal, everything from acetanilide to zinc phosphide. Yet in the end, John decided upon the simplest toxic agent of all, the old standby of Borgia and bourgeoise alike—plain arsenic. It was fast, reliable, deadly, and that's what he wanted; it didn't in the least matter if the symptoms of arsenic poisoning were apparent to a physician under the circumstances. More to the point, John could easily remove the necessary quantity from his stock without fear of its loss being noted.

Administration of the dosage would be no problem, either. He'd put it into some chocolates; bring Mary a box of candy from the store, as she expected. With her sweet tooth, she'd gobble down one or two—probably just one, because of the taste, but that would be enough. More than enough. Her resultant agonies would be painful to witness, but John had no intention of being present. He'd take her the box tonight but neglect to give it to her until tomorrow when he left again for work. That should give her something to do while she watched her daily soap-operas. Of course, there was always the off-chance that Mary, after swallowing a piece of the candy, would manage to get to the telephone before collapsing. But even then there was little risk; she would either call him or Dr. Applegate. He knew how to react, and as for Applegate, John intended to have a chat with him this evening in private before heading for home with the chocolates. It might prove to be a bit messy, but he knew he could convince the physician to cooperate.

As it turned out, he had little difficulty with Applegate. The only really messy part of the entire business was in actually introducing poison into the candy.

There were so many things he hadn't anticipated; opening the box itself and removing the plastic wrapper without damage, so that it could be resealed without detection—carefully melting the chocolate coating and removing a portion of the creamy fondant to make room for the poisonous powder—then re-melting the coating and smoothing it over until each individual piece of candy could survive inspection.

But finally he was finished, and the telltale evidence of his labors obliterated so that Willie Hayes, the assistant pharmacist, would notice nothing tomorrow morning when he opened the store, John made a mental note; he must remember to dispose of the remainder of the chocolates tomorrow night, the moment he was sure Mary had succumbed. If he took care of a few details like that, the rest was just a matter of routine.

The routine of going home, after his brief but satisfactory interview with Dr. Applegate. The routine of greeting the old sow as she grunted up at him from her chair before the TV set; of kissing her fat forehead and asking her the same stupid questions about the same stupid daily routine; of using the bathroom and turning out the lights and settling down in bed next to that repulsive mountain of flabby flesh (for the last time) and composing himself for sleep.

Sleep did not come easily, because anticipation stood in its path; anticipation of the morning, when he'd give her the box of candy and leave for work. He'd let Willie handle the evening shift tomorrow, as was usual on Tuesdays, and come home for supper early. No sense in waiting too long; suppertime would be long enough. She ought to open the box right after lunch, and then—

No, John did not sleep. He merely planned. He planned what he'd do after he found the body and phoned Applegate, planned how he'd break the news to the neighbors and send a wire to Mary's sister in Omaha. While he was at it, he might just as well be practical and consider what undertaker to select. A decent funeral would be expected, but there was no need of being unduly lavish. Mary had two thousand dollars' worth of life insurance. He could probably pick out a nice coffin for about four hundred; the whole deal would run a little under a thousand. Then, with the extra thousand, he could think about something for Frances, later on. On their honeymoon, perhaps. Say a year from now, or a little less. He could sell the business, sell the house here, move out to Portland or some other city. He'd always wanted to see the West Coast anyway; he'd never been there. Maybe Frances and he could take a plane over to Hawaii. That would be nice. Oh, it was all going to be nice, after tomorrow—

The odd thing was that he felt no guilt, no fear, no remorse. It had been Frances who actually came out and suggested the murder, of course, but now he realized that he had been killing Mary for years, in the deepest, darkest dungeon of his own mind. He was completely prepared to accept the act; he welcomed the role of murderer as familiar.

Everything seemed familiar, everything was normal. In the morning he rose and shaved and dressed and Mary had his breakfast ready as usual. She made the usual pretense of passing up the meal—"just coffee and orange-juice, that's enough for me today"—but he knew she'd fry herself the usual three eggs as soon as he was out of the door. And when, at the door, he produced the box of chocolates as an afterthought, she could not conceal her squeal of delight. Hogs always squeal.

John managed to conceal his own elation long enough to peck at her cheek and escape.

Escape. Today was the day he would really escape! Escape forever.

Forever is a long time, and before the afternoon was over, John was thinking only of escaping the store itself by five o'clock.

He wanted to get home and get it over with. He didn't actually look forward to seeing what he'd see when he got there, or doing what he'd have to do during the subsequent evening hours. But the whole point was that it was something which must be done, and the sooner, the better.

So he drove home, as usual, at Five-thirty, parked the car in the driveway, and went inside.

The kitchen was deserted, and he could hear the idiot drone of the TV set from the parlor beyond. Naturally that's the way it would be; she'd settled down to watch the afternoon programs, opened the box of candy, popped a chocolate into her mouth, and probably never managed to leave the easy-chair.

John tiptoed through the hall. He saw her then, slumped in the big chair, with just the back of her head showing—the back of her head and her big fat neck with those repulsive rolls of heavy flesh. Frances had a slim neck; a pale white adorable neck, with delicious little hollows made for kisses.

John was glad he could think of her under the circumstances because it proved he wasn't frightened, he wasn't going to lose his nerve, even at a time like this. A time like this, when he walked into the parlor to see his wife's dead body—

His wife’s dead body turned and stared at him. And then it rose from the chair. Mary was standing in front of him, big as life. Hideously big, hideously alive. She grinned at him.

“Early tonight, aren’t you?” she said. And then, “John, what are you staring at?”

It took a moment for him to answer, and when he did he couldn’t help himself, he had to blurt it out.

“Wh-where are the chocolates I brought you?”

The stupid grin loomed closer. “Surprise! I didn’t eat any of them! Remember that new diet I told you about? Well this time I’m sticking to it. I’ll lose at least twenty pounds, you’ll see. I was telling Frances—”

“Frances?”

“Yes, Frances, silly! Remember she was supposed to leave yesterday? Well, she didn’t. She left today. She stopped by here this afternoon, on her way to the airport. And since she was going on a trip, I gave her the box of candy to eat on the plane.”

“You gave her—?”

“Sure.” Mary giggled. “I figured it was a sort of a farewell present . . .”

The World-TImer

Definition of a time capsule: you put things into it for posterity to find. Definition of a Time Capsule: you put it in you, and find yourself. Dr. Morton Placebo was not at oil sure he liked the idea.

HE MAY or may not have been human.

It was hard to tell, because in a psychiatrist's office, you get all kinds.

But he looked human—that is to say he had two arms, two legs, one head, and a slightly worried expression—and there was no reason for the receptionist to turn him away.

Particularly since he was here to give free samples.

"I'm from the Ace Manufacturing Company," he told the girl. "An old established firm. You've heard of us?"

The receptionist, who dealt with an average of ten salesmen a day, nodded politely and proceeded to file her nails.

"As the name indicates, we used to be a specialty house," the salesman continued. "Manufactured all the aces used in decks of playing cards. But lately we've branched out into pharmaceuticals."

"How nice for you," said the receptionist, wondering what he was talking about, but not very much.

"Not ordinary products, of course. We have the feeling that most pharmaceuticals are a drug on the market. So we've come up with something different. As our literature indicates, it's more along the lines of the lysergic acid derivatives. In addition to the usual tranquilizing effect, it alters the time-sense, both subjectively and objectively. Mind you, I said 'objectively'. I'm sure your employer will be interested in this aspect, which is to say the least, highly revolutionary—"

"I doubt it. He's always voted Republican."

"But if I could just discuss the matter with him for a few moments—"

The girl shrugged and cocked her head towards the inner sanctum of Morton Placebo, M.D.

"Nobody rides that couch without a ticket," she told him. "The standard fee is $50 an hour, first-class, or $30, tourist. That's with three on the couch at the same time. He says it's group-therapy, and I say it's damned uncomfortable."

"But I'm not a patient," the stranger persisted. "I merely want to discuss my pharmaceuticals."

"You can't discuss your hemmorhoids without paying the fee," the receptionist drawled. "Doctor isn't in business for your health, you know."

The salesman sighed. "I'll just have to leave a few samples and some literature, I guess. Maybe he'll look it over and see me when I call back later. I'm sure he's going to be interested, because these little preparations will alter the entire concept and structure of psychotherapy."

"Then he won't be," the girl decided. "Dr. Placebo likes psychiatry just the way it is right now. Which is to say, at $50 an hour."

"But he will take the free samples?" the salesman persisted.

"Of course. He'll take anything that doesn't cost money. In fact, he told me it was the free-fantasy which attracted him to the profession in the first place."

She reached out her hand and the representative of the Ace Manufacturing Company placed a little packet of three tablets on her palm.

"The literature is inside," he said. "Please ask the Doctor to study it carefully before he experiments with the dosage. I'll stop by again next week."

"Don't you want to leave your card?" asked the girl, politely.

"Of course. Here you are."

He handed it to her, turned on his heel, and made his exit.

The receptionist studied the card curiously.

It was the Ace of Spades.

Normally, Dr. Morton Placebo wouldn't have paid much attention to a salesman's sample; largely because the very idea of paying was anathema to him.

But, as psychiatrists are so fond of saying—and, quite frequently, demonstrating—the norm is an abstraction.

And Dr. Placebo was always interested in anything which came to him without charge. Perhaps his receptionist hadn't been far wrong when she'd analyzed his reasons for entering a psychiatric career. All psychotherapists have their quirks.

According to his eminent disciple and official biographer, Ernest Jones, the great Sigmund Freud believed in occultism, telepathy, and the magic of numbers. The esteemed Otto Rank developed a manic-depressive psychosis; Wilhelm Reich's rationality was impugned on occasion; Sandor Ferenczi suffered from unbalance due to organic brain-damage.

Compared to these gentlemen, Dr. Placebo's problem was a minor one; he was a frustrated experimenter. Both his frustration and his stinginess had their origin in his childhood, within the confines of the familial constellation.

In plain English, his father was stingier than he was, and when the young Morton Placebo evinced an interest in laboratory experimentation, the old man refused to put up the money for a chemistry set. Once, during his high school years, the young man managed to acquire two guinea-pigs, which promptly disappeared. He was unable to solve the mystery—any more than he could solve the fact that his father, who always carried peanut-butter sandwiches in his lunch-pail, went to work during the following week with meat sandwiches.

But now, at fifty, Morton Placebo, M.D., was fulfilled. He had his own laboratory at last, in the form of his psychiatric practice, and no end of wonderful guinea-pigs. Best of all, the guinea-pigs paid large sums of money for the privilege of lending themselves to his experiments. Outside of his receptionist's salary, and the $25 he spent having the couch resprung after a fat woman patient had successfully re-enacted a birth-fantasy, Dr. Placebo had no overhead at all. With the steady stream of salesmen and their free samples, there was no end to the types of experimentation he could indulge in.

He'd used pills which produced euphoria, pills which produced depression, pills which caused a simulation of schizophrenia, pills which had remarkable side-effects, pills which tranquilized, pills which stimulated; pills which resulted in such fascinating manifestations as satyriasis, virilescence and the sudden eruption of motor reflexes in the abductor minimi digit. He kept copious notes on the reactions afforded by LSC, peyotl extracts, cantharadin, yohimbine and reserpine derivatives. Whenever he found himself with a patient on his hands (or couch) who did not respond to orthodox (or reformed) therapy, Dr. Placebo—purely in the interest of science, of course—reached into his drawer and hauled out a handful of free pills.

Thus it was that he was grateful when he received the samples from the Ace Manufacturing Company.

"The literature's on the inside," his girl told him. He nodded thoughtfully and stared at the glassine packet with its three yellow pills.

"Time Capsules," he read, aloud.

"Alters the time sense, both subjectively and objectively," the receptionist said, parroting what she remembered from the salesman's pitch.

"Subjectively," snapped Dr. Placebo. "Can't alter it objectively. Time is money, you know."

"But he said—"

"Never mind, I'll read the literature." Dr. Placebo dismissed her and thoughtfully opened the packet. A small wadded-up piece of paper fluttered out onto the desk. He picked it up, unfolded it, and stared at the message.

> "Nstrctns
>
> Nclsd smpls fr prfssnl s nly. ch s cpbl f prdcng tmprl dslctn prmnntly nd tmsltng sr nt nthr cntnm r tm vctr."

There was more to it, much more, but Dr. Placebo didn't bother attempting to translate. Apparently this literature was written in the same foreign tongue used by general medical practitioners when they scrawl their prescriptions. He'd better wait and get an explanation from his friendly neighborhood drug-store.

He gazed at the samples once again. Time Capsules. Catchy name for a pharmaceutical product. But why didn't the Ace Manufacturing Company print its literature in English? He scanned the last line of the literature. "Dnt gt yr vwls n n prr."

Made no sense. No sense at all.

But then, neither did most of his patients. So perhaps the pills would do some good. He'd have to wait for a likely subject.

The likely subject arrived at 3 p.m. Her name was Cookie Jarr, which was probably a polite euphemism for "sexpot." But what's in a name?

Sexpot or Jarr, Cookie was obviously quite a dish. She sprawled, in obvious deshabille, on the couch, and like the professional stripper she was, proceeded to bare her psyche.

After a dozen or so previous sessions, Dr. Placebo had succeeded in teaching her the technique of free association, and now she obediently launched into a form of monologhorrea.

"I had a dream under very peculiar circumstances the other night . . . I was sleeping alone . . . and in it I was a geek . . ."

"One moment, please," murmured Dr. Placebo, softly. "You say you were a geek? One of those carnival performers who bites the heads off of chickens?" Cookie shook her auburn locks impatiently. "Not chickens," she explained. "I was very rich in this dream, and I was geeking a peacock." She frowned. "In fact, I was so rich I was Marie Antoinette. And they dragged me out for execution, and I looked at the executioner and said, 'Dr. Guillotine, I presume?' and he said, 'Please, no names—you must be the soul of indiscretion'. So then I woke up and it was four in the morning and I looked out of the window at this big neon sign that says OK used cars. You know something, Doc? I'd never buy an OK used car. And I'd never eat at a place that says EAT. Or one that says fine food. And I'd never be buried in a funeral parlor approved by Duncan Hines. Do you think I'm superstitious? They say it's bad luck to walk under a black cat."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Placebo, sagely, "And then again, perhaps not. We must learn to relate, to adjust. Life is just a bowl of theories." He gazed at her piercingly. "The dream sequence is merely symbolism. Out with it now—face the truth. Why did you really wake up at four in the morning?"

"Because I had to go to the bathroom," Cookie snapped. "No, really, Doc, I'll level with you. It's the love bit. That damn' Max keeps getting me down, because he's so jealous of Harry, only that's ridiculous because I don't like Harry at all, it's really Fred, on account of he reminds me of Jerry, the guy I'm crazy about. Or almost as crazy about as Ray."" She paused, biting her lip. "Oh, I hate men!" she said.

"Ummm-hmmmm," said Dr. Placebo, doodling on a scratchpad with which he was ostensibly taking notes but actually drawing phallic symbols which looked suspiciously like dollar-signs.

"Is that all you got to say?" demanded Cookie, sitting up. "Fifty bucks an hour I'm paying, and for what? My nerves are killing me. You got any happy pills, Doc?”

“Happy pills?”

“Tranquilizers, or like whatever. Remember that stuff you gave me last month?”

“Oh, the cantharides.”

“Yeah.” Cookie smiled happily. “That was the greatest!” Dr. Placebo frowned; his memories did not coincide with Cookie’s, particularly when he recalled the frantic aftermath of that episode when he had to drag her bodily from the ninth floor of the local YMCA. But the experimental urge was strong.

Few men could look at Cookie without feeling the urge to experiment.

“Well, there’s something new,” he said, cautiously.

“Give.”

“It’s called a Time Capsule, Alters the subjective time-sense and—er—all that jazz.” He found himself lapsing into the idiom with Cookie; she was the sort who inspired lapses.

“Meaning what?”

“I’m not quite sure. I imagine it slows down the reflexes.”

“Relaxes you, huh? That’s for baby.”

“You’ll have to take it here, under test conditions.”

“The mad scientist bit? You are gonna hypnotize me and get fresh, is that it?”

“Nothing of the sort. I merely mean I must observe any side-effects.”

“Stuff really turns you on, eh?” Cookie bounced up happily. “Well, I’m for kicks. Spill the pill for me, Bill.”

Dr. Placebo went to the water-cooler and filled a paper cup. Then he carefully extracted one of the yellow capsules from its cellophane container. He handed it and the water to Cookie.

She gulped and swallowed.

Then she lay back on the couch. “Wow, I’m in Dizzyville,” she whispered. “Everything’s like round and round—no squares—”

Her voice trailed off, and for a very good reason.

Now it was Dr. Placebo's turn to gulp and swallow, as he stared down at the empty couch.

Cookie had disappeared.

"Where is she?" Ray Connors demanded. "Come on, where is she?"

Dr. Placebo sighed. He felt a horrible depression, quite unlike the shapely depression which had been left in the couch by Cookie's body.

"She—she cancelled her appointment this afternoon," he said, weakly.

"But I drove her over," the mustached young man insisted. "Went downstairs to do a bit of business—I'm booking a flea circus out in Los Angeles and I had to see about renting a dog so the troupe could travel in comfort—and then I came right back up to your office to wait. The receptionist told me Cookie was inside. So what happened?"

"I—I wish I knew," Dr. Placebo told him, truthfully. "She was lying right there on the couch when she vanished."

"Vanished?"

Dr. Placebo nodded. "Into thin air."

"Thin air, fat air, I don't believe it." Connors advanced on the pudgy little psychiatrist. "Come on, where you hiding the body?"

"She vanished, I tell you," Dr. Placebo wailed. "All I did was give her one of these sample pills—"

He indicated the packet on his desk-top and Connors picked it up. "This says Time Capsules, not Vanishing Cream," he snorted. "Look, Doc, I'm not one of your loony patients. I'm an agent, and you can't con me. So you got sore at Cookie and pushed her out of the window—this I can understand. Why don't you admit it and let me call the cops? We could get a big spread on this." He began to pace the floor rapidly. "Real headline stuff—JEALOUS HEADSHRINKER SLAYS BEAUTIFUL PATIENT. Why, we'll push the Finch trial right off the front page! Think of the angles; exclusive interview rights, sob-stories to all the women's magazines, a nice big ghostwritten best-seller, a fat movie deal. Doc, you've got a fortune in your lap and you don’t know enough to cross your legs! Now for ten per cent, I’ll handle everything, you won’t have to worry—”

Dr. Placebo sighed softly. “I told you,” he murmured. “She swallowed one of these pills and disappeared.”

“Fiddlesticks,” said Connors. “Or words to that effect.” And before Dr. Placebo could stop him, he walked over to the couch, sat down, ripped a pill from the cellophane confines of the package, and popped it into his mouth.

“No—don’t!” cried the Doctor.

Connors shrugged. “You see? I swallowed one and nothing happens. I’m still here.” He leaned back. “So how about it, Doc, you gonna level with me? Maybe you didn’t push her out of the window. Maybe you carved her up and stuck the pieces in your filing-cabinet. Hey, that’s an eves better angle—mad BUTCHER CARVES CHICK! Or RIPPER GETS FLIPPER WITH STRIPPER. For ten per cent of the gross, I’ll fix it so you—.

Young Mr. Connors fell back on the couch and closed his eyes.

“Hey, what was in that last drink?” he mumbled. “I can’t see.”

Dr. Placebo advanced upon him nervously. “That pill,” he gasped. “Let me phone Dr. Glutea down the hall—he’s a G.U. man, maybe he has a stomach-pump—”

Connors waved him away. “Never mind,” he whispered, faintly. “I can see, now.”

This was strange, to say the least, for he still had his eyes closed. Dr. Placebo bent over him, not daring to touch his rigid body.

“Yeah, I can see. Stars. Nothing but stars. You running one of those science fiction movies, Doc?

“Sure, I’m hip now. There’s the world. Or is it? I can see North America and South America, but where are all those funny lines?”

“What funny lines?”

“Like in all the geography books—isn’t there supposed to be latitude and longitude?”

“That’s just on maps.”

"I dig. This isn't a map, Doc. It's for real . . . but it can't be . . . no . . . no . . ."

"Please, Mr. Connors, pull yourself together!"

"I'm pulling myself apart . . . oh, Doc, if you saw what I see . . . like crazy, the world inside a big egg-timer up in the sky . . . sort of an hour-glass, you know the bit?"

"Go on," murmured Dr. Placebo.

"There's sand or something running out of the end, into the other half of the timer . . . and now . . . a big claw, bigger than the whole world . . . reaching out and squeezing . . . squeezing the guts out of the earth sgueeeee . . ."

"Go on," repeated Dr. Placebo. But it wasn't necessary, for Connors had already gone on.

The couch was empty.

The little psychiatrist blinked and shook his head. He walked over to the desk and, indulging in a symbolic funeral, buried his face in his hands. "Now what?" he groaned. "Physician, heal thyself."

Then he sat up and took stock of the situation. After all he was a physician; moreover, a skilled analyst. The thing to do was to consider the problem logically. There were several obvious courses of action.

First of all, he could call the police. He'd simply explain what had happened, they would simply not believe him, and he'd simply go to the gas-chamber.

Secondly, he could tell his receptionist. She was a sweet young thing, and madly in love with him as a Father-Image. Her reaction was predictable; she'd pop him into her car and they'd drive off to Mexico together, where they'd live happily ever after until she ran off with a bullfighter. No, the gas chamber was better. But why wait, when there were even faster methods?

Maybe he could adopt some of Connors' ideas to his own use. Perhaps he could jump out of the window, or cut himself up into little pieces and hide in the file-cabinet. Merely a logical extension of filing one's fingernails.

No, he was irrational. He needed time to think. Time to think—

Dr. Placebo stared at the cellophane envelope which still rested on his desk where Connors had tossed it after taking the capsule. Time Capsule.

"Alters time-sense both subjectively and objectively." Suppose it were true? Once again he picked up the cryptic literature and studied it closely. And all of a sudden he found himself translating fluently. Only the vowels were missing.

> Instructions
>
> Enclosed samples for professional use only. Each is capable of producing temporal dislocation permanently and translating user into another continuum or time vector."

It was plain English, all right, and even the last line of the literature made sense now. He read it slowly.

"Don't get your vowels in an uproar."

Excellent advice. Advice from an area where the time-sense was altered, where linguistics were attuned to another tempo, where others marched to a different drummer.

Cookie had vanished suddenly, Connors slowly. Why the difference? Perhaps because Cookie had taken the capsule with water and Connors swallowed his dry. Took a while for the gelatin coating to dissolve.

Funny, Connors seeing those hallucinations. All very symbolic—the earth in an egg-timer and somebody squeezing it; the sands of time running forth. Running where? Running out, that's where. In another minute his time would run out; the receptionist would run in and ask where his patients were.

He had lost his patients. He had lost his patience. It all came back to the same thing—call the police, run off to Mexico, jump out of the window, or kill himself and stuff his dead body in the file. Sort of a necro-file. Maybe he deserved to die, if he was capable of making puns like that. It would rise up from the grass over his grave to haunt him, for the pun Is mightier than the sward—

No time for that now.

No time.

But a Time Capsule—

He picked up the cellophane container gingerly.

Why not?

It was a way out. Way out, indeed—but a way.

For one idiotic instant, Dr. Placebo took a good hard look at himself. A fat, foolish little man, driven by greed, who had never known love in all his life except as a professional Father-Image. A man surrounded by sensualists like Cookie and opportunists like Connors. What was he doing here in the first place?

"I am a stranger and a Freud, in a world I never made."

It was a terrible realization, a bitter pill to swallow. But swallow it he must. There was no other choice. Fingers trembling, he extracted the last Time Capsule from the packet and raised it to his lips. He swallowed.

There was no sensation. He floated over to the water-cooler and poured a drink. It gurgled down his throat. And then came the kaleidoscope, engulfing him.

Five minutes later his receptionist walked into the empty office. She inspected it, panicked, but eventually recovered and did what any sensible girl would do under the circumstances—called the Bureau of Missing Persons.

There was no answer . . .

There was, of course, no kaleidoscope. Nor did Dr. Placebo find himself entrapped in a cosmic egg-timer whirling in outer space. No huge hand stretched forth to menace his reason and he knew that he had not died.

But there was a dizzying sensation and he waited until it ceased before he allowed the autonomy of his nervous system to resume sway and blinked his eyes open once more.

Dr. Placebo was prepared for almost anything. If, indeed, the Time Capsule had been efficacious, he knew that he could have gone an infinite distance forward or backward in temporal dimension. Long conditioning through attendance at monster-movies led him to expect either the titanic vistas of papier-maché cities of the far future or papier-maché dinosaurs of the distant past. In either era, he knew, nothing would bear the slightest resemblance to the world he had lived in, except that the women of the future or the prehistoric age would still wear lipstick and mascara.

There was just one thing Dr. Placebo didn't expect to see when he opened his eyes—the familiar walls of his very own private office.

But that's where he found himself, sitting upon his own couch. And most uncomfortably, too, because he was wedged between Cookie and Connors.

"Oh, here you are," Cookie greeted him. "Where'd you go, Doc?"

"Nowhere. I've been here all the time. Where did you go?"

"Never left the couch."

"But you weren't here when I showed up," Ray Connors interrupted. "Then I saw you and I lost the Doc."

Dr. Placebo shook his head. "That's not the way it happened at all! First she disappeared and then you disappeared. I stayed right where I am."

"You weren't right where you are a minute ago."

"Neither were you."

"What does it matter? We're back, now," Connors said. "I told you those pills were fakes."

"I'm not so sure. We didn't travel in space, obviously, because we're in the same place we started. But if the capsules affect objective time—"

“So each of us passed out and lost a couple minutes. Big deal.” Cookie sniffed and swayed to her feet.

She glanced curiously at the calendar on the desk. “Hey, Doc,” she called. “What kind of a month is Jly?”

Instantly, Dr. Placebo was at her side. “You’re right,” he groaned. “It does say ‘Jly’. And that’s not my writing on the note-pad. Who is this ‘Dr. My’ ?”

“Maya,” said a soft voice. “We don’t write the vowels but we pronounce them. Indoctrinated associative reflex.”

Placebo turned to confront the newcomer to the room. She was a tall, plump, gray-haired woman with a rounded face and shoe-button eyes. She wore a plain smock and a bright smile.

“You must be the new patients,” she observed, glancing at the trio. “Armond did his job well.” She glanced again at the startled faces before her. “I had hoped for a random sampling, but you actually exceed my expectations.”

“We’re not patients,” Dr. Placebo exploded. “I happen to be a practicing psychiatrist. And expectations be damned—we want explanations!”

“Gladly given.” The woman who called herself Maya moved into the chair behind the desk “Please sit down.”

The trio retreated to the couch.

“First of all,” Dr. Placebo began, “Where are we?”

“Why, here, of course.”

“But—”

“Please.” Maya lifted a plump hand. “You don’t deny that you are here, do you? If so, you’re more disturbed than I thought. Believing yourself to be a psychiatrist is dangerous enough without any further disorientation.”

"I am a psychiatrist!" Dr. Placebo shouted. "And this used to be in my office."

"It still is, in another temporal vector. But when you swallowed one of Armond's little capsules, you entered a parallel continuum."

"Hey, how about making with like English?" Cookie demanded. "I don't dig."

"This must be one of those crazy planets," Connors muttered. And she's an alien." He stood up and approached the desk. "So take me to your leader."

"Leader? There is no leader."

"Then who runs things around here?"

"Things run themselves."

"But who's the boss?"

"We all are."

Maya turned back to the girl. "I note your saying that you don't dig. Allow me to reassure you—in our society there is no need for physical labor. I'm sure you'll find a worthy niche here for whatever you are qualified to do."

"Wait a minute," Connors interrupted. "Nobody books this chick except me. I'm her agent."

"Agent?"

"Yeah, her manager, tike. I find her work and collect my ten per cent."

"Ten per cent of what—the work?"

"No, the money."

"Ah, yes, money. I'd forgotten about that."

"You'd forgotten about money?" Dr. Placebo asked, excitedly. "Very peculiar symptom indeed. Rejection of the economic incentive—"

But Maya ignored him. Again she addressed herself to the girl. "Might I inquire just what sort of work you perform?"

"I'm a stripper."

"I see," Maya said, though it was obvious she didn't. "And just what do you strip?"

"Why, myself, of course."

"Oh, an exhibitionist." Maya smiled. "That's very nice. We have lots of them around. Of course, they don't get any recompense for it here, outside of their own pleasure."

"You mean they do it for fun?" Cookie demanded. "Standing up there on a bare stage with the wind blowing up your G-string and letting a lot of meatheads watch you break your fingernails on your zippers—this you call kicks?"

"I've had it," Connors announced, leaning over the desk. "The way I figure it, there's just two answers to the whole kockamamie deal. Either you're squirrelly or we've been kidnapped. Maybe both. But I'm calling the fuzz."

"Fuzz?"

"Law. Coppers. Police."

"There is no police force. Unnecessary. For that matter, no method of outside communication."

"You don't have a telephone?"

"Unnecessary."

"Then, lady, you'd better start hollering for help. Because if you don't send us back where we came from in thirty seconds, I am going to lean on you."

"Why wait?" Cookie bounded to her feet, raced over to the window, and flung it open. She leaned out.

"Help!" she yelled. "Hel—" Her voice trailed off. "Holy Owned Subsidiary!" she whispered, faintly. "Sneak a preview at this!"

Connors and Dr. Placebo moved to her side and stared out at this.

This was the city below them, a city they knew as well as they knew the month of the year.

But the month was Jly, and the city too was oddly altered. The buildings seemed familiar enough, but they were not nearly so high here in the downtown section, nor were there so many of them. No traffic hummed in the streets below, and pedestrians moved freely down the center of the avenues. The sides of the structures were not disfigured by billboards or painted advertisements. But the most drastic difference was a subtle one—everything was plainly visible in clear bright sunlight. There was no smoke, no soot, no smog.

"Another continuum," Dr. Placebo murmured. "She's telling the truth."

"I still want out," Connors said. He balled his fists. "Lady, I'm asking you in a nice way—send us back."

Maya shook her head. "I can't possibly do so until next week. Armond must return and prepare the antidotes."

Cookie frowned. "You still insist we got here just because we swallowed some kind of Mickey Finn? You didn't smuggle us aboard a spaceship or whatever?"

"Please, my dear, let me explain. As I understand it, in your time-vector you employ a variety of drugs—heroin, cannabis indica, various preparations such as marijuana and peyotl which affect the time-sense."

"I never touch the stuff," Cookie snarled. "I'm clean, see?"

"But there are people who use these concoctions, and it does affect their time-sense. Their subjective time-sense, that is. A minute can become an eternity, or a day can be compressed into an instant."

"I buy that," Connors said.

"My friend Armond has merely extended the process. He perfected a capsule which actually produces a corporeal movement in time. Since it is impossible to move into a future which does not yet exist, or into a past which exists no longer, one merely moves obliquely into a parallel time-stratum. There are thousands upon thousands of worlds, each based upon the infinite combinations and permutations of possibility. All co-exist equally. You have merely gone from one such possible world to another."

"Merely," Cookie muttered. "So Connors was right. You kidnapped us. But why?"

"Call it an experiment. Armond and I worked together, to determine the sociological variations existing in several continuums. You will remain here a week, until he returns. During that time, let me assure you, no harm can possibly befall anyone. You'll be treated as honored guests."

Ray Connors stepped closer to Cookie. "Don't worry, baby—I'll protect you," he said. "You know I only got eyes for—wow!"

Wow stood in the doorway. She was about eighteen, with baby-blue eyes, but any resemblance to infancy ended right there.

"This is Lona," Maya told him. "She will be your hostess during your stay here."

Lona smiled up at Connors and extended her hand. "I already have my instructions," she said. "Shall we go now?"

"Over my dead body!" Cookie screeched. "If you think for one minute I'm gonna let you fall out of here with that hunk of Bastille-bait, you got another—" It was her turn to react, when the tall young man entered. He too was about eighteen, but big for his age.

"I'm Kerry," he said. "Your host during the coming week. If you'll be good enough to accompany me—"

"I'm good enough," Cookie told him.

"Now wait a minute," Connors interrupted. "If you go off with this gorilla, how'm I gonna protect you?"

"You better worry about protecting yourself, buster," Cookie told him, eyeing the clinging blonde. She turned to the waiting Kerry. "Off to Funville," she said, and swept out.

"Shall we go?" Lona asked Connors. "A week is so little time, and I've so much to learn—"

"That's the spirit," Connors said. "Come on."

As they exited, Dr. Placebo glanced at Maya. "And what is in store for me—something out of Lolita?"

The plump woman frowned at the unfamiliar reference. “Why, you’ll be my guest. Stretch out on the couch and make yourself comfortable. I expect there are a few questions you’d like to ask.”

Dr. Placebo was beyond resistance. Meekly, he sank down on his own couch—which wasn’t really his own couch any more—and Maya promptly joined him.

“Really,” spluttered the little man. “This is hardly approved psychotherapeutic procedure.”

“I’m not a psychotherapist,” Maya told him. “I’m your hostess.”

“Need you be so hospitable?” Dr. Placebo protested.

“My feet hurt,” Maya explained, kicking off her shoes and wriggling her toes. “Besides, is there any rule that says you have to conduct a sociological experiment standing up?”

“This is an experiment?”

“Of course. Why did you think Armond brought you here?” She stared at him levelly.

“I was going to ask about that. There are so many things I don’t understand.”

“Look into my eyes. Perhaps I can tell you better in that way than by questions and answers.”

“Hypnosis? Telepathy? Rubbish!”

“Three labels, in as many words. Just forget that you’re a scientist for a moment and open your mind. Look into my eyes. There, that’s better. Keep looking. What do you see there?”

Dr. Placebo stared fixedly. His breathing altered oddly and his voice, when he spoke, seemed to come from far away.

“I see—everything,” he whispered.

There was the world he came from, and there was this world. But these were only two in a coexistent infinity of possible states of being, each subject to an individual tempo, and each ruled by the Law of the Universe, which men call If.

There was a world where the dinosaurs survived, and the birds who ate their eggs perished. There was a world in which amphibians crawled out upon the land and found it uninviting, then swarmed back into the sea. There was a world in which the Persians defeated Alexander, and oriental civilization flourished on the site of what would never be Copenhagen.

Dr. Placebo, guided by some power of selection emanating from Maya’s will, sampled a dozen of these possibilities in rapid succession.

He saw worlds which had developed in a manner very similar to his own, with just a tiny difference.

A world in which a few tiny birds wheeled and took flight at the sight of sailing vessels, so that Columbus never noticed them and sailed on his course to the coast of Mexico where he and his men were quickly captured by the Aztecs and enslaved. So quickly did the inhabitants of Central America learn the arts of their prisoners that within a hundred years they built ships and weapons of their own, with which they conquered Europe . . .

A world where it didn’t rain along the Flemish plains one night early in the nineteenth century—and next morning, Napoleon’s cavalry charged to victory across a dry field instead of tumbling into a sunken road. After winning Waterloo, there was no Bourbon restoration, no ensuing Republic, no Commune, no rise of Communist theory, no German nation or Russian Revolution, no World Wars. And Napoleon VI was emperor of all the earth . . .

Dr. Placebo saw the world in which the Hessians overheard the sound of oars one Christmas Eve at Trenton, and hanged George Washington. He saw the world where an axe slipped, and a young rail-splitter named Abe Lincoln lost his left leg and ended up as the town drunk of Magnolia, 111. He saw a world in which an eminent scientist suffered a minor toothache and neglected to investigate the queer mould which he’d observed, with the result that two of the men who might have subsequently developed atomic power installations died of disease instead, because there was no penicillin to save them, and a whole continent subsequently plunged into war and . . .

Faster and faster the worlds whirled; the one in which Adolf Hitler was just a man who painted houses and Winston Churchill painted landscapes fulltime instead of on Sundays . . . a world in which a real detective named Sherlock Holmes wrote a highly-successful series of stories about an imaginary London physician whom he called Arthur Conan Doyle . . . a world ruled by great apes, and a somewhat similar world ruled by a teen-age aristocracy who were proud of their blue genes.

"Possible," murmured Maya's voice, from a great distance. "All possible. Do you understand, now?"

Dr. Placebo sensed that he was nodding in reply.

"Good. Then, this world."

The panorama of impressions expanded, on a multi-leveled basis, so that Dr. Placebo was aware of sweeping generalization and specific example simultaneously. And slowly, a picture evolved. Dr. Placebo sensed and surveyed it with growing horror.

"But it can't be!" he heard himself muttering. "No Freud—and Havelock Ellis entering a monastery at twenty-two—no psychiatrists—no wonder you all became disturbed."

"You're disturbed," Maya's voice told him, calmly. "We're not. Look again."

Dr. Placebo looked again.

He looked at a world in which society was conditioned by biological principles, with Kinsey-like overtones; a world which lived in accordance to certain basic postulates. And as the examples expanded, Maya's voice provided accompaniment.

"As in your world, the sexual drive in the human male reaches its height between the ages of 16 and 26, whereas in the females the sex-urge is highest between 28 and 40. The only difference is that in our world this biological fact is accepted, and acted upon.

“Accordingly, our young men, at 16, are permitted to establish relationships with women of 28 or older, for any period of time up to 10 years. During this decade of association, there is no procreation—and, of course, no domestic or emotional responsibilities.

“At 26, the males are permitted to establish another relationship, again for a decade or so, with the females aged 16 and upwards. During this time, reproduction is encouraged, for the females are young and healthy and the males are fully mature; they lavish affection upon their offspring, who are —of course—turned over to the care of the state when they reach the age of 6.

“As both males and females reach 40 or thereabouts, they can again change their partners and seek permanent or temporary companionship within a domestic relationship—but without reproducing.

“Thus the sex-drive is fully satisfied during its period of maximum intensity, the reproductive urge is given full sway at a time likely to be most beneficial to both parents and offspring, and the social needs of later life are gratified without the rancor, tensions, frustrations, and naggingly permanent obligations which are the fruit of most monogamous marriages in your world. Simple enough, isn’t it?”

Dr. Placebo sat up. He was once again in full possession of his faculties, all of which were strained beyond credulity.

“It’s absurd!” he shouted. “You’re going against all natural instinct—”

“Are we?”

Maya smiled. “Our society is actually founded on a realistic basis—pure biology. In the animal kingdom, ‘fatherhood’ as we know it does not exist. The male may protect its spawn for a time and feed the pregnant female, but it does not safeguard or exhibit affection for its young over any extended period of time, except in your ‘moral’ textbooks for children or the cinematic fantasies of your Mr. Disney. In many species, the male does not even secure food for the female, let alone ‘support a family’. This is an artificial concept, yet your whole society is based upon it and everyone seems to believe that it’s ‘natural’.

"And when your poets and writers and philosophers envision an 'ideal' society, it is merely an extension of the same basic misconceptions with an attempt to put a little more of what you call 'justice' into them—even though one of your own writers, Archibald MacLeish, in his play J.B., so wisely observes, 'There is no justice; there is only love Ours is a world founded on love, and it begins by setting aright the biological basis of love."

"Monstrous!" Dr. Placebo exploded. "You've destroyed the fundamentals of civilization—the home—the family—"

"The so-called home and so-called family have destroyed the fundamentals of your civilization," Maya told him. "That's why you therapists flourish, in a sick world of emotionally-twisted youngsters who grow up as overly-frustrated or overly-aggressive adults; a world of prurience and poverty, of sin without atonement and atonement without sin, a world of bombs without balms. Don't look at your prejudices and your theories; look at the results. Are the people of your world truly happy, Doctor? Are they?"

"I suppose your way is better?" Dr. Placebo permitted himself a slight sneer.

"See for yourself," Maya suggested. "Look into my eyes—"

Dr. Placebo found himself staring and sharing; it was all a matter of viewpoint, he told himself.

He saw a world in which there was no transference of aggressions, due to sexual problems; a world devoid of jealousy and fear and secret guilts.

There was, to begin with, a complete change in the pattern of courtship; the element of rivalry, of competition, was almost eliminated. Male and female paired first for mutual pleasure, without the necessity of seeking the almost impossible combination of perfect lover, ideal helpmate, good provider, wise companion, and social prize which dogs most young people in their choice.

Later on, male and female paired for the purpose of reproduction; children born of the union of these matings were given a healthy environment of genuine love during the years when they were most loveable—and most subject to lasting psychological impressions. Then, at the time when they became encumbrances in a complex social order, they were turned over to well-organized state establishments for education and proper development.

Finally, male and female allied on the basis of fully matured judgments; as companions with mutual tastes and interests. Their early sexual drives fully satisfied, their reproductive drive fulfilled, their responsibilities in these areas ended, they were free to seek permanent or temporary liaisons on a fully realistic basis of compatibility.

Inevitably, there were other—and far-reaching—results.

For one thing, a change in personality-values—the notion of what constituted a "good" or a "bad" individual differed greatly from those prevalent in Dr. Placebo's world.

Less time was wasted, by young and old alike, in false and exaggerated emphasis upon presumably "masculine" or "feminine" attributes. A 16-year-old boy could honestly prove his masculinity, with full approval and satisfaction, on a biological basis, instead of spending most of his energy on football, juvenile delinquency, surreptitious indulgence in alcohol and narcotics and the assumption of an outward brutality designed to impress the female. A 16-year-old girl could fulfil her biological function in maternity instead of retreating into narcissism, virginity-fantasies, or a rebellious and unsatisfactory promiscuity.

The young man found sympathy and understanding with an older woman during his initial relationships, and learned to appreciate these qualities. The young woman found steadiness and strength in an older man, and was not impressed by reckless exhibitionism and irresponsible behavior. When the age-patterns of later relationships were reversed, an even greater mutual understanding prevailed; in the final maturity, there was a peace and a satisfaction born of genuine love and respect. In this world, men and women actually enjoyed one another's company, and there was no rivalry.

As a result, there was no fear of the domestic situation; it was not a lifelong trap in which both parties became enslaved to a consumer economy because they had to "preserve" a so-called home at all costs. Because there was no set and permanent family status, the element of economic competition virtually vanished; there was no need to pile up great accretions of consumer-goods for conspicuous consumption or as substitutes for genuine satisfactions. And there was no "Inheritance." The state regulated employment and recompense but did so benevolently—for there was no familial tension-source to spawn the guilt, hate, frustration and aggression which resulted in individual crime and mass warfare. Hence a "police state" proved unnecessary. Simple miscegenation had done away with national, racial and religious strife. And the limited 12-year breeding span had done away with population pressure; there was abundance for everyone. Social and economic freedom followed as a matter of course.

Perhaps most important of all, there was a great increase in creativity and the development of aesthetics.

Dr. Placebo began to realize why, when he looked out the window, there were no advertising displays—why there was no need of automotive traffic or "quick communication" devices, or any variety of artificial stimulants, escape-devices, or gilded carrots designed to keep the donkeys in perpetual harness as they tugged their cartloads of woe along the road of life.

There was actually plenty of time to live in this world; no claws were squeezing; within this hourglass lay no danger of an eruption or explosion.

All this Maya showed him, and much more. Until at last, Dr. Placebo hurled himself upright again and tore his gaze away.

"Fine!" he commented. "Wonderful! Now I know why you found a youthful hostess for Bay Connors and a young host for Cookie. And maybe it does work, at that."

"I'm glad you think so," Maya said. "Because that was Armond's plan, you see."

"I don't see," Dr. Placebo confessed.

"For some time Armond and others have used the capsules to visit worlds in other time-vectors. Most of them were either too alien in their patterns or too dangerous to explore, but yours seemed most similar to our own.

"Somewhere along the line, your world went wrong in the area of social-sexual relationships, but we have studied your mores and folkways and decided to make a radical experiment. Armond believed we could, if necessary, live in your world—but of course, we wouldn't want to. He then determined to discover if you could live in our world. That's why he went down to hand out a limited number of sample pills—in the hopes of getting a representative assortment of specimens here for observation. One week should be long enough to determine your reaction—"

Dr. Placebo stood up.

"One minute is all it takes," he announced. "At least, as far as I'm concerned."

"You are a wise man, Dr. Placebo," Maya said. "It didn't take you long to see how sensibly we live, how sanely we have ordered our lives."

"That is correct," Dr. Placebo murmured, and then his voice swept upwards shrilly. "And that's just why I want out of here! I'm a psychiatrist, and a highly successful one. What place have I in a world where nobody is emotionally disturbed or maladjusted? Why, I'd starve to death in a month! I tell you, all this sanity is crazy—"

Suddenly he doubled up and fell back upon the couch.

"Why, whatever is the matter?" Maya cried.

"Ulcer," Dr. Placebo groaned. "Kicks up on me every once in a while. Purely psychosomatic, but it hurts like hell."

"Wait just a minute," Maya soothed. "I'll get you some milk." And in exactly a minute, she was back with a glass. Dr. Placebo drank it slowly and gradually relaxed. It was good milk—damned good milk, he reflected bitterly, and no wonder. In a lousy, perfect world like this, the cows were probably more contented than any back on Earth . . . It figured!

“All right,” said Ray Connors, pausing in his restless pacing to face Cookie and Dr. Placebo. “I got to talk fast because there’s not much time. For a whole week I’ve been figuring out how to get a chance to see you two alone here in the office without Maya or any of the rest of these squares butting in. Because I got a billion-dollar idea by the tail and all I need is your help.”

“How’s Lona?” Cookie inquired.

“The chick?” Ray Connors smiled. “Okay, okay. But that’s not important.”

“Isn’t it?” Cookie frowned. “You know, this guy Terry is the greatest. He’s so—so sweet. Treats me like I was some kind of princess—”

“Never mind that jazz,” Connors interrupted. “We got no time.”

“Your idea?” Dr. Placebo inquired.

“Okay, now hear this. This is a square setup, dig? Both of you must have noticed what I did—everybody gets along with everyone else, there’s no muscle, no sweat. Strictly Loveville.”

“Yeah, isn’t it wonderful?” Cookie sighed. “That Terry—”

“I’ll say it’s wonderful!” Connors exulted. “The whole setup is a pushover for a couple of hip operators like us. I started to figure things out, and you know, I think the three of us could really do it?”

“Do what?” inquired Dr. Placebo.

“Why, take over, of course!” Connors eyed him elatedly. “Look, we each got our own racket, and all we need to do is start working. Cookie here knows how to turn on the glamor. Me, I’m the best combination agent and flack in the business. You’re a skull-specialist, you know about psychology and all that crud. Suppose we just team up and go to work?

“Remember that old gag about Helen of Troy, or whoever—the gal whose face launched a thousand flips, something like that?

Started a big war over her, didn’t they? Well, we got Cookie here. Suppose I started beating the drums, working up a little publicity, spreading the word about how this chick is the hottest dish in the whole pantry? And you coach me on the psychology, Doc.

“You know the way they got things rigged here—young gals with middle-aged guys, middle-aged guys with young gals, old folks at home together. Well, it would be the easiest thing in the world to upset the whole applecart. Get the kids excited about Cookie, and the old daddy-types, too. Teach ’em something about sex-appeal. You know what’ll happen. Inside of a month we can start opening up schools—regular courses to give all the chicks lessons on how to really land a man and hang onto him. Give ’em all the techniques on how to play hard-to-get. And that means the works—we bring out a line of cosmetics, fashions, beauty-parlor treatments, promote jewelry and perfume and luxury items.

“We’ll have the men flipping, too. They don’t use money in this crazy system, but we ought to be able to take our cut in land and services. I tell you, they’re so innocent it’ll be like taking candy from a baby. Inside of a year we can work our way up so that we’ll be running the whole world! Think of it—no police, no army, nothing to stop us! Wait until we bring in advertising, and juke-boxes, and hotrods, and pro football and falsies—”

“You intend to transform this world into a reasonable reproduction of our own, is that correct?” asked Dr. Placebo.

“Reasonable is right,” Connors snapped. “What’s to stop us?”

“I am,” said Cookie. “I don’t buy it.”

“You don’t—what?”

“I like it just the way it is,” she murmured. “Look, Ray, let’s face it. I’m pushing thirty, dig? And for the past fifteen years I been knocking around, getting my jollies in just the kind of a world you want to turn this into. Well, I had it, and no thanks. What good did it ever do me? I ended up a second-rate stripper, tied to a second-rate nogoodnik like you spending all my extra loot on Doc’s couch.

“I don’t need to be Helen of Troy here. I’m just Cookie, and that’s good enough for Terry—and believe me, he’s good enough for me. I never had it so nice as this past week, believe me. Why louse it up?”

“Okay, so who’s begging? You think you’re the only chick I can promote? I got Lona. She’s plenty square—one of those real sick good-hearted types—but I can twist her around my little finger. So I’ll slap a little makeup on her, teach her a few tricks, and we’re off and running.” Connors wheeled to face Dr. Placebo.

“How about it, Doc? You want in, don’t you?”

“You’re quite sure you can do all this?” Dr. Placebo murmured. “It’s a big program for one man to tackle.”

“Yeah, but we got a natural. No competition. No opposition. Nobody that’s hip. They’ll never know what hit ’em. In fact, they all love each other so damned much they don’t suspect anyone could ever pull a fast one, and they’ll cooperate just for asking.”

Connors walked over to the open window and gazed out at the sunlit city.

“Look at it, Doc,” he said. “All laid out and waiting for us to carve. Like the old saying, the world’s our oyster.”

“That’s right.” Dr. Placebo moved to his side, nodding thoughtfully. “And the more I think it over, the more I believe you. You could do it, quite easily.”

“I damn’ well will do it,” Connors asserted. “And if you and Cookie chicken out, I’ll make it alone.”

Dr. Placebo hesitated, shrugged, and glanced at Cookie. She nodded. He put his hand on Connors’ shoulder and smiled.

“A good idea,” he muttered. “Make it alone, then.”

And with an agile dexterity somewhat surprising in an older man, he pushed Connors out of the window.

The press-agent fell forth into the world that was his oyster; Dr. Placebo and Cookie leaned out and watched as he landed in the oyster-bed below.

“Nice work, Doc,” Cookie commented.

He frowned. “That’s the last time I’ll ever do anything like that,” he sighed. “Still, it was necessary to use violence to end violence.”

“Yeah. Well, I got to be running along. Terry’s waiting for me. We’re going to the beach. See you around, Doc?”

“I hope so. I intend to be here for a long, long time.” Dr. Placebo turned, staring past the girl, as Maya entered the room.

“Your conference is over?” the plump woman inquired. “Your friend left?”

Cookie nudged Doc in time for him to match her sudden look of consternation.

“A terrible thing just happened,” she gasped. “He fell out of the window!”

“Oh, no—” Maya gasped and rushed to the open window, staring down. “How awful! And just when he could have joined you in returning home—”

“Home?”

“Yes. Armond is back. The week is up, and he’ll be able to supply you with time-capsules now. You’re free to return to your own world.”

“Do we have to go?” Cookie’s voice quavered. “I—I want to stay here. Terry and I talked things over, and we hit it off so good together, I was hoping I could just sort of like settle down.”

“And what about you?” Maya confronted Dr. Placebo.

“Why—uh—I agree with Cookie. Since that first day, I haven’t had the slightest twinge from my ulcer. Something about the milk you serve, I suppose.”

“But what about your profession?” Maya asked. “You said yourself that there’s no need for a psychiatrist here. And, of course, there’s no way of making money.”

“I’ve been thinking about that,” Dr. Placebo said. “Couldn’t I assist you in your sociological experiments?”

Maya permitted herself a small smile. “Standing up or lying down?” she demanded.

“Er—both.” A slow blush spread over the bald expanse of Dr. Placebo’s forehead. “I mean, each of us is past forty, and under the existing order of things—well—”

"We'll discuss that later," Maya told him, but the smile was broader, now.

She turned to include Cookie in her glance. "Actually, I'm very happy about your decisions. And I shall inform Armond that the experiment was a complete success. I take it your deceased friend intended to stay, also?"

"He did," Cookie answered, truthfully. "He intended to make his mark here," She glanced down at the sidewalk below. "And in a way, I guess he succeeded."

"Then you can adapt," Maya said.

"Of course, we can adapt," Dr. Placebo nodded.

"All right, I shall inform Armond. And we can go into the second stage of the experiment."

"The second stage?" Dr. Placebo echoed.

"Yes. And we'd best hurry because there isn't much time."

Just how Maya got her information, we, of course, shall never know. Perhaps Armond read the papers during his visits to Earth, or maybe he just used his eyes and ears.

At any rate, Maya knew the truth—the truth behind the vision of the green claw squeezing the sands of time from the hour-glassed earth. She knew that time is running short for this world.

Hence the second stage of the experiment; the stage in which not one but thousands of Armonds will descend in mortal guise or disguise, to pass out millions of time-capsules.

Some will come as salesmen, some as pharmacists, some as physicians. Naturally, techniques of distribution will vary; it will be necessary to disguise the capsules as vitamin tablets, tranquilizers, or simple aspirin. But Dr. Placebo and Cookie will both cooperate with their suggestions, and Armond and his crew are both knowledgeable and efficient.

So, sooner or later, chances are you will be handed a capsule of your own.

Whether you elect to swallow it knowingly or not depends upon whether or not you’re willing to swallow the concepts of another world.

If not, of course, there’s always a simple choice.

You can stay right where you are, and let this world swallow you. . . .

THE END

The Final Performance

There's nothing I admire more than a man who is a master of his craft. I knew an undertaker once—lovely fellow—who was without a peer in dressing up a corpse to look handsomer than in life. He once offered to give me a free haircut, and I'd have accepted—except for one thing. I was afraid he didn't know how to cut hair in the back. Heh-heh. But that undertaker was nowhere near as good as Rudolph Bitzner, the character in this grisly masterpiece by one of our favorite macabre authors.

THE NEON INTESTINES HAD BEEN twisted to form the word Eat.

I squinted up at it, the sand stinging my eyes, and shifted my overnight bag to the left hand. As I opened the sagging screen door a trickle of perspiration ran down my arm.

Two flies accompanied me into the restaurant. One of them headed for a pile of crullers on the counter and the other alighted on the bald head of an elderly fat man who leaned behind it. The man looked up and the fly buzzed away.

"Evening," he said. "What'll it be?"

"Are you Rudolph?" I asked.

He nodded.

I slid onto a stool. "Fellow named Davis sent me."

"From the garage?"

"That's right—the place up the highway. My car conked out on me coming through the mountains. He had to phone Bakersfield for a new connecting rod. They're bringing it out first thing tomorrow morning, and he figures he can get it installed before evening. But tonight I'm looking for a place to stay. He told me to try here—said you used to run a motel."

"Not any more. Isn't enough traffic along this route."

"I noticed a couple of cabins out in back."

"Closed up." The fat man reached under the counter and came up with a half-empty bottle of beer. He took a long gulp; when he set the bottle down again it was empty. "Look, you could hitch a ride into Bakersfield and come back tomorrow."

"I thought of that, but I hate to leave all my belongings. Everything I own is in that car—guess it broke down because it was overloaded. You see, I'm moving to Hollywood, and I packed all my books and—"

"Hollywood?" The fat man blinked. "You in show biz?"

"I'm a writer."

"Television?"

"Short stories and books."

He blinked again. "That's better. TV is lousy. I can't understand what they think they're doing out there. Now you take a guy like that Ed Sullivan —" He broke off abruptly and stared at me. "Book writer, you say. Ever run into Arnie Pringle?"

"No. I can't say that I have."

"Before your time, I guess. Probably dead by now. He used to write my act."

"You were in show business?"

"Are you kidding? Rudolph the Great. Twenty years top billing, Pantages, Albee, Keith-Orpheum time. Why, I've got three press books full of—"

I rose from the stool.

"Here, where you going?"

I shrugged. “Sorry, but if I’m hitching a ride into Bakersfield I’d better get out there on the highway before dark.”

“Never mind that. Guess we can fix up a cabin for you. Put some clean sheets on the bed.” He swayed along behind the counter, and it suddenly occurred to me that he was just a little bit drunk.

“Look, I wouldn’t want to put you to any trouble,” I told him.

“No trouble. My pleasure.” He jerked his head toward the swinging door behind him. “Rosie!” he yelled.

Rosie came into the room.

She was a tall girl, blonde and amply proportioned, her hair done up in a ponytail. She wore a blue sleeveless smock and her legs were bare.

“Rosie, this is Mr.—”

“Chatham. Jim Chatham.” I nodded at her and she wrinkled up her nose at me. It took a moment before I realized she was smiling.

“Had a little trouble with his car,” Rudolph said. “Davis is fixing it up at the crossroads. He needs a place to stay overnight. You think you can find some clean bedclothes for Number One?”

She nodded at him, still looking at me.

“Better take him out with you. Let him have a look.”

“All right.” Her voice was soft, deeper than I’d expected.

“Keys in my desk, right-hand drawer.”

“I know. I’ll get them.”

She turned and left the room. Rudolph reached under the counter into the cooler and brought out another bottle of beer, a full one this time. “Care for a brew?” he asked.

“Later, perhaps. Let me get settled and then I’ll come back for dinner.”

“Suit yourself.” He bent to open the bottle, then raised it to his lips.

Rosie came back into the room; she carried a bundle of sheets wrapped around a pillow. “All set?” she asked.

I picked up my bag and followed her outside. The sun was setting and the desert wind was cool. Joshuas cast their shadows along the path leading to the cabins in the rear, striping the sand and the backs of her bare calves as she walked along before me.

"Here we are." She halted and opened the door of the tiny cabin. The interior of the little shack was dark and stifling hot. She switched on the light. "It'll cool off in a minute with the door open," she said. "I'll make up the bed for you."

I put down the suitcase and slumped into the single chair next to the gray-filmed window. She went to work, bending over the bed. She had fine breasts. As she moved around to tuck in the sheet, her leg brushed mine.

All at once, for no reason at all, my mind was filled with corny dialogue. What's a nice girl like you doing in such a godforsaken hole? Let me take you away from all this . . .

Suddenly I noticed she had stopped working. She stood there with the pillow in her arms, staring at me.

"I heard you talking to him," she said. "About being a writer. What are you going to do out in Hollywood, work for the movies?"

"I doubt it. Probably just keep turning out stories the same as usual. But the climate's better."

"Yes, the climate." She nodded and wrinkled her nose at me. "Take me with you."

"What?"

"I said, take me with you."

"But Mrs. Rudolph—"

"His first name is Rudolph. Bitzner."

"Mrs. Bitzner, then—"

"I'm not Mrs. Bitzner either."

"Oh, I just thought—"

"I know what you thought. Never mind that. Just take me with you. All I'd do is ride along. There wouldn't be any trouble." She let the pillow fall on the bed and moved closer. "I wouldn't be any bother at all. I promise."

I stood up, but I didn’t reach for her. I didn’t have to reach for her, because she came right into my arms, and she said, “Please, please, say you’ll take me. You’ve got to. You don’t know what it’s like all alone out here. You don’t know what he’s like. He’s crazy—”

She had this trick of talking without opening her mouth, keeping her lips puckered up, waiting to be kissed, and she wrinkled her nose and I could see the tiny freckles on the bridge, and her skin was marble-cool in all this heat. And it’s one thing to sit back and make sophisticated remarks about cheap waitresses named Rosie (Rosie, for God’s sake!) and another thing entirely to feel a waiting, willing woman stirring hard against you and whispering, “Please . . . promise me you will . . . I’ll do anything . . .”

So I opened my mouth to answer, then let it remain open in bewilderment as she stepped back quickly and picked up the pillow again. Then I heard him scuffling along the path and understood.

“Rosie!” he yelled. “You almost finished? Customers!”

“Be right in,” she called.

I stepped over to the doorway and waved at Rudolph.

“Everything all right?” he asked.

“Everything’s fine.”

“Come and eat, then. You can wash up inside.”

I glanced back at Rosie. She was bending over the bed and she didn’t look at me. But she whispered, “I’ll see you later. Wait for me.”

That’s what kept me going through the long evening.

I followed Rudolph, and I cleaned myself up a bit in the filthy washroom, and I shared a steak and french fries with the two flies and their cousins. The customers were in and out for the next couple of hours, and there was no chance to talk to Rudolph or even catch a glimpse of Rosie out in back. Then, finally, it was nine o’clock and the place was empty again. Rudolph yawned and walked over to the door, switching off the Eat sign.

"This concludes the evening's performance," he said. "Thanks for the use of the hall." He went over to the swinging door. "You fixing yourself something?" he yelled.

"Yes, just a hamburger. How about you?" Rosie asked.

"Never mind. I'll have myself another beer." He looked at me. "You ready for one now?"

I shook my head and stood up. "No, thanks. It's about time I turned in."

"What's your hurry? Stick around. We'll go in back and chew the fat awhile. To hell with the beer—I've got some hard stuff there."

"Well, I—"

"Come on. Got some things that might interest you. Man doesn't get much chance to talk to anybody halfway intelligent around here."

"All right."

He ran his wrist across the gray stubble around his mouth.

"Tell you what, I'll check the register first. You go right on back, through that door on the end. I'll be along."

So I went back, into the little room on the side of the restaurant which served as a parlor. I saw the overstuffed couch and the easy chair and the desk, the lamp, the TV set, but I didn't do any more than glance at them.

Because I was staring at the walls—the walls of another world.

It was the world of the twenties and the early thirties, a world that belonged to the half-forgotten faces which peered out at me from a thousand photographs reaching from floor to ceiling. Some of the pictures had peeled and faded, just as my memories had peeled and faded in the long years since early childhood. But I could still remember the familiar countenances, and I had at least heard of most of the names scrawled in autograph fashion beneath the unfamiliar ones. I moved around the room, moved around the mementos of what had once been a world called vaudeville.

Here was a skinny, gangling kid called Milton Berle and a buxom young woman named Sophie Tucker. Here was a youthful Bert Wheeler holding an apple and a smiling Joe Cook holding an Indian club and explaining why he would not imitate the Four Hawaiians. There was an entire section of faces in burnt cork—Cantor, Jolson, Lou Holtz in the pre-Sam Lapidus days, Frank Tinney (way before my time), and one mournfully humorous countenance which needed no spurious blackface; the signature read, “To Rudolph from Bert Williams.”

And there were the teams and the acts—Moran and Mack, Gallagher and Shean, Cross and Dunn, Phil Baker and Ben Bernie, Smith and Dale (Dr. Kronkheit, I presume), and a surprisingly handsome young couple who signed themselves “George and Gracie.” And there was an incredible Jimmy Durante—with hair—and Clayton and Jackson.

“See? It’s like I told you, I knew ’em all.” Rudolph had come up behind me, carrying a bottle and glasses. “Here, let me fix you a snort and I’ll show you my press books.”

He made me a drink, but he didn’t get around to the press books. Instead he sprawled out on the sofa, uncorked the bottle again, and uncorked himself.

I don’t know how long he rambled on about the old days and the old ways; about the Six Brown Brothers and Herman Timberg and Walter C. Kelly and Chic Sale. At another time, under other circumstances, I might have hung on to his every word. But right now I was hanging on to other words—“I’ll see you later. Wait for me.”

So I really didn’t listen to him, to Rudolph the Great who used to do Orpheum Time until vaudeville died and then wandered out here into the desert to do a twenty-year layoff as Rudolph Bitzner. Twenty years—why, Rosie, couldn’t be much over twenty herself! And here was this fat old man wheezing away on the couch, drinking out of the bottle now and slobbering. He was getting ready to pass out. He had to pass out soon, he had to . . .

“Have ’nother drink?” He sat up, blinking at the bottle. “Oh, ’s empty, well whaddya know?”

“That’s all right,” I told him. “I’ve had enough.”

“Well, I haven’. Got more ’round here someplace. Rosie!” He yelled her name, then lowered his voice as he turned to me. “She’s out front. Told her to clean up the joint. Won’t come near me when I’m drinking, anyhow, you know?” He chuckled. “Don’t matter—I locked the door before I came back. Got the key ri’ here, so she can’t get away. Never get away, not from me.”

He swayed to his feet. “Know what you’re thinkin’—just an old lush, that’s all, just an old lush. But wait till I show you the press books. Then you’ll see who I was. Who I am.” He stumbled back against the sofa. “Rudolph the Great. Tha’s me. Keep in practice. Jus’ as good as I ever was. Better. Why, I could go on Sullivan’s show nex’ week . . .”

Then the color drained from his face and he fell back on the couch. I never did get to see those press books. By the time I put his feet up on the sofa he’d started to snore. I took the keys from his pocket and went back into the restaurant. She was waiting for me in the dark. And we went out through the dark to my cabin, and she clung to me in the dark, and that’s the one thing I want to remember, have to remember now.

Afterward she told me about herself. She’d been ten when she’d come to Rudolph—her parents stopped by on their way to Texas and dropped her off while they filled a fair date. They were a couple of ex-vaudevillans themselves: the Flying Keenos. They knew Rudolph from the old days and they accepted his suggestion to leave her in his care while they traveled on, because they were down on their luck.

“Only they never came back,” she said. “They never came back. And he tried to find them. He wrote to Billboard and everything, but they just disappeared. So I stayed on. Rudolph—he wasn’t so bad then, you know. I mean, he didn’t drink so much or anything. He sent me to school on the bus, bought me clothes and things. Treated me just like he was my father—until I was sixteen.”

She started to cry, very softly. “He isn’t even in love with me, not really. It’s because of living out here all alone in this crazy desert and knowing he’s getting old. Before it started he used to talk about making a comeback on TV. He said it was just like vaudeville, he’d always known there’d be a revival. Then, that summer when I was sixteen, he decided the time was right and he took me with him out to L.A. He went around and saw some agents, had a few auditions. I never did find out what really happened. But when we came back here in the fall he started to drink right away, and that’s when—”

That’s when she tried to sneak off, and he caught her, and he closed up the motel so she couldn’t see anyone or attempt to hitch a ride. He kept her inside the restaurant, didn’t even allow her to go up to the crossroads for supplies, wouldn’t let anyone come near her.

There were times when she thought of running away in the night, but something always stopped her. She realized she owed him something for all the years he’d taken care of her, and he needed her now. He was just an old man, not quite right in the head, and he seldom bothered her any more. Most nights he just drank and passed out. She’d resigned herself to putting up with it until this evening. Then, when she saw me—

“I know. You figured you could get a ride, and maybe I’d even take care of you out on the Coast for a week or so, long enough for you to find a job. That’s it, isn’t it?”

“No!” She dug her nails into my arms. “Maybe I did think something like that at first. But not now. Believe me, not now.”

I believed her. I believed her voice and I believed her body, even though it was incredible that I should be lying here in the desert night with this stranger whom I’d known forever.

“It’s all right,” I said. “We’ll go away. But I’d feel better if we told him. Maybe if I talked things over with him, explained, I could make him understand.”

“Oh no—you can’t do that! He’s crazy jealous. I didn’t want to tell you, but one time he caught this truck driver talking to me outside—just talking is all—and he took after him with that big butcher knife. He would have killed him if he caught him, I know he would! And he beat me up so that I couldn't even get out of bed for three days. No, he mustn't even suspect. Tomorrow afternoon, when the car is fixed . . ."

We made our simple plans. The restaurant was closed on Sundays, and it would be better if I didn't attempt to take a meal there—just went straight to the garage and saw to it that Davis got the car fixed as soon as possible. Meanwhile Rosie would have her suitcase packed and ready. She'd encourage Rudolph to drink—not that he generally needed any encouragement from her. Maybe he'd even pass out. If not, she'd go so far as to cut the phone wire, if necessary; just so she could slip out to me with the assurance of getting a head start.

So we talked it all over, calmly and sensibly, and she slipped out of the cabin, and I lay there and tried to sleep. It was almost dawn when I closed my eyes, and the bats were out, flying against the gaudy desert sunrise.

I slept for a long time. When I left the cabin and cut across to the highway, it was almost two o'clock. I walked the mile to the crossroads garage and found Davis working with the car up on the rack. We talked for a while, but I didn't listen to what he said, or to what I said either. From time to time somebody drove up for gas and Davis would have to stop and give them service. The car wasn't ready until a little after five; it was already getting dark.

I paid him and drove off. The motor hummed smoothly, but I almost stripped gears as I shifted. I was nervous, that's all, just nervous. I didn't feel any guilt and I didn't feel any fear. Certainly I didn't feel any horror.

That came later.

That came when I parked in the deepening shadows on the side of the darkened restaurant and went up to the door. This was it. If something had gone wrong—

But nothing could go wrong. I squared my shoulders and took a deep breath, then rattled the doorknob. That was the signal; she'd be waiting to hear me.

Nothing happened. A few flies buzzed against the glass awaiting entry. I rattled the door again softly. It was locked.

Then the figure emerged from the back room.

I recognized Rudolph.

He moved briskly; there was no shuffle in his gait and no stagger either. His face was gray and puffy, but his red-rimmed eyes weren't blinking. He stooped and unlocked the door, motioning for me to come inside.

"Good afternoon," I said. There was nothing else I could say, not yet, not until I knew what had happened.

He nodded, moving behind me to lock the door again. I could hear the click of the key and I didn't bother to look around.

That's when the horror came.

Horror is something cold and sharp, biting against the back of your neck.

"Let's go into the other room," Rudolph said. "Rosie has something to say to you."

"What have you done to her?"

"Nothing. She just wants to talk to you. You'll see."

We went down the aisle past the counter, the flies buzzing in our wake. Then we were in the back room and they were all waiting for me there—George and Gracie, Frank Tinney, Lou Holtz. They were all staring, as I stared, at the open torn heap. For a moment, in the dim light, I thought it was Rosie lying there.

But no, Rosie was sitting on the sofa and she was looking at the suitcase too. She didn't say a word when I came in because there was nothing to say now.

I could feel Rudolph's breath on my neck, right behind me. And I could feel the coldness, too, the sharpness, the horror. All at once it went away. I heard the knife clatter to the floor.

"You can thank her for that," Rudolph murmured. "I could have killed you, you know. I wanted to kill you. But she talked me out of it. And now she has something to say to you. Go ahead, Rosie, tell him."

He left me standing there in the doorway and walked over to where Rosie was sitting. He slid down on the sofa beside her and put his arm around her, smiling. Rosie looked up then, but she didn't smile.

The shadows crept across the walls, across the faces of Williams and Bernie and Jolson, across his face and hers. But I wasn't watching the shadows. I was listening to the girl.

"You see how it happened," she murmured. "He walked in while I was packing. He found out."

"All right," I said. "So he found out. I wanted to tell him in the first place. And that he knows, he can let us go."

I was already moving before I finished my last sentence, crossing the room in two strides and scooping up the big, broad-bladed butcher knife from the floor.

"Look," I said. "I've got the knife now. He can't hurt us and he'd better not try. We can walk out of here whenever we please."

She sat there, turning her head to stare at the knife. And he stared, too, tightened his arm around her and stared and smiled while she said, "No. I've changed my mind. I'm not going with you."

"But I don't understand—"

"We talked it all over before you came. I can't go. He needs me so. It's right that I should stay. I belong with him. Can't you see that?"

I shook my head. There was something wrong with her words, something wrong with the way she stared and he smiled. And all at once it came to me as I looked into his fat face off in the shadows. "Maybe I can see," I said. "Rudolph the Great. You were a hypnotist, weren't you? That's the answer, isn't it? You've hypnotized her, that's what you've done—"

He started to laugh.

"You're wrong, mister," he said. "Tell him how wrong he is. darling."

And then she was laughing, too, in a high, hysterical titter. But there was no laughter in her face, and her words, when they came, were soft and somber.

"He's no hypnotist. I know what I'm doing, believe me. I'm telling you to get out. Just get out, do you hear me? Go away and don't come back. I don't want to go to the Coast with you. I don't want you pawing me in some dirty cabin. I know what you are. You're a—"

She began to curse me then; the filth and the foulness poured out of her mouth and she bobbed her head at me in rage, while he just sat there and smiled.

Finally she was finished. "All right," he said. "Have you heard enough?"

"I've heard enough," I said. "I'll go." And I dropped the knife again. It rolled across the floor, and a thin ray of light from the dying sunset streaked the dulled and darkened blade.

I turned to go, and neither of them rose. They just sat there, arms entwined, and stared at me. The shadows blotted out their faces, then pursued me all the way down the hall.

The car stood waiting for me in the twilight. I climbed in, switched on the ignition, pulled away. I must have gone two or three miles before I remembered to turn on my lights. I was in a daze. There was nothing but the shadows, the strange shadows. Shadows in the room, on their faces, on the dulled and darkened knife. The dulled and darkened knife . . .

Then it hit me, and I speeded up. I found a phone just ahead in a filling station outside Pono and put in my call.

The state troopers arrived in fifteen minutes, and I told my story as we roared back to the restaurant in their patrol car.

"He must have done something to her," I said. "That knife blade was dark with dried blood."

"We'll see," the sergeant told me.

But at first we didn't see, because Rudolph must have heard us coming, and that's when he used the knife on himself. We found it sticking out of his chest there on the floor in the back room, and he was quite dead.

Rosie still sat there on the sofa, staring at us. It was the sergeant who discovered she'd been strangled.

"Must have happened a couple of hours ago," he told me. "The body's getting stiff."

"Strangled? A couple of hours? But I was just here. We were talking—"

"See for yourself."

I walked over and touched her shoulder. She was stiff and cold and there were purple marks on her neck. Suddenly she toppled forward, and that's when I saw how the knife had been used—saw the huge, foot-long gash extending from the back of her neck down across the shoulders. The wound was incredibly deep; I couldn't understand why. Not even when the sergeant called my attention to the blood on Rudolph's right hand.

It wasn't until I saw the press books that I really knew. Yes, we found his press books, and I finally saw them there at the last, finally found out what must have happened in his dark room, in his dark mind, when he walked in and discovered her getting ready to leave.

That's when he'd strangled her, of course, strangled her to death in a crazy rage. But he was sane enough to realize I'd be coming by to get her and that he'd have to find a way to get rid of me.

So he used the knife then and cut the hole, cut it wide and deep. Wide and deep enough so that she could bow and nod and turn her head when he had his hand behind her. Of course I'd heard her talking to me, but the press books explained all that.

He wasn't lying about his notices; they were raves.

And he wasn't lying about hypnotism either. Rudolph the Great hadn't been a hypnotist. He was just one of the best damned ventriloquists in the business . . .

Philtre Tip

Mark Thornwald had an obsession.

Now there is nothing wrong with having an obsession in our society, provided one chooses it wisely. The man who is obsessed with the desire to make money often becomes wealthy. Those who dedicate an entire existence to the pursuit of fame frequently are rewarded, and can deduct the clipping bureau's fee from their income tax. Men who devote a lifetime to excel in athletic pursuits often wind up with a sizable collection of trophies, plus an occasional hernia.

But Mark Thornwald chose the wrong obsession.

Her name was Adrienne.

It is easy to deal with this particular obsession in terms of labels—mother-fixation, chemical attraction, love object, and the like.

Unfortunately, Thornwald wasn't satisfied with labeling his obsession. He had other plans for Adrienne. With the sorry result that he wasn't satisfied, period.

The first time he attempted to put his plans into action, Adrienne laughed at him. The second time, she slapped his face. The third time she threatened to call her husband and have Thornwald thrown out of the house.

Thornwald elected to leave quietly, hugging his obsession to his breast, nursing it on the juices of hatred and frustration. As a result, it grew enormously.

Since Adrienne's husband, Charles, happened to be an associate professor of medieval history and since Thornwald was one of the regents of the university, it was no great trick to see that his contract was not renewed. After assuring himself that attrition had set in, Thornwald again approached Adrienne and made what he considered a handsome offer.

Adrienne thought both the offer and Thornwald quite ugly, and told him so. Again he retired to defeat, comforted only by the knowledge that she would never stoop to telling her husband.

Thornwald took stock of the situation. Of course, being obsessed, he did not consider matters realistically. When one is obsessed with avarice, one does not reflect upon the widows and orphans who may purchase the phony uranium stock; the seeker of fame at any price is quite willing to propel his pelvis in public or even run for Congress if needs be. And the man whose obsession takes a delectable, feminine form is equally lacking in ethics and scruples. To him, love laughs at locksmiths and goes into positive hysteria over the spectacle of a faithful wife.

"The end justifies the means," Thornwald told himself, and when he spoke of "the end" in connection with Adrienne it is to be feared he had a very tangible image in mind.

But there were no means available until Adrienne's husband provided them.

They came to Thornwald in the shape of a bulky manuscript, delivered by Charles himself.

"Aphrodisia," Thornwald murmured. "A Study of Erotic Stimuli Through the Ages."

"Don't let the title deceive you," Charles told him. "It's a scholarly work. I've been doing research on it now for almost a year—ever since I lost my position at the university. See what you think. Maybe it could stand a chance with Harker House."

"Ah yes, Harker House." Thornwald happened to be on the board of editors of the publishing firm.

"Read it as a professional," Charles urged. "Not as a friend."

This wasn't difficult for Thornwald, since by no stretch of the imagination did he consider himself to be Charles' friend. Rival, or deadly enemy—that was much more to Thornwald's taste, and the nourishment of his obsession.

Still, after Charles went away, he did read it professionally. And found the answer.

"Why did you cross out this formula for a love philtre?" he asked Charles, upon a subsequent visit. Thornwald indicated the page. "Here—the one from Ludvig Prinn's Grimoire, in the English edition." He read the ingredients listed and the description of effects.

"The meerest droppe, if placed in a posset of wine or sack, will transforme ye beloved into a veritable bitche in heate."

Charles smiled and shrugged. "You've just answered your own question," he said. "Most of the spells and incantations I've set down are mere curiosa. I doubt if there's any amorous incitement in owl dung, and calling a tomato a love apple is just sympathetic magic. But a few items come from sources I respect. Ludvig Prinn, for example, was a considerable sorcerer in his day."

Thornwald elevated his eyebrows. "In other words, you decided to omit this particular formula because you're afraid it might work?"

Charles nodded. "Look at the ingredients," he said. "Some of them I never heard of, and heaven only knows what their reaction might be in combination. The ones I do know—yohimbine and cantharadin, for example—are in themselves powerful aphrodisiacs. Added to this other stuff, the result could be trouble."

"Just what I was thinking," Thornwald said. And made a mental note, which he at once underlined in big black encephalographs.

"Interesting material," he told Charles. "Let me pop this in to the editorial staff and we'll see what we can do."

He took the manuscript away and, three weeks later, called Charles. "It's practically set," he said. "You've an afterdinner appointment with the board tonight. Get into town and come back with a contract."

That part was easy. The difficult matter had been to trace down all of the obscure ingredients for the love philtre. Some of them were only approximated in the pharmacopia and others had to be illegally obtained, but Thornwald's obsession brooked no obstacles. And now he was ready.

As soon as he made certain that Charles had indeed departed for the city he made his final preparations. Promptly at eight he knocked on the door of Charles' flat and Adrienne admitted him.

"Charles isn't here," she said.

"I know, but he'll be back before midnight. And then we'll celebrate his new book contract." Thornwald waved the two bottles. "Champagne, my dear, and already iced. One bottle for when Charles returns. One to share between us while we're waiting."

Adrienne eyed the bottles dubiously, but before she could object, Thornwald took over. "Glasses," he demanded. "And a corkscrew, if you please."

"But—"

"It's to be a surprise," Thornwald assured her. And he meant it.

Adrienne, he knew, could never resist surprises. And this particular one she could resist least of all. He didn't tell her about the third bottle—the tiny one—which he carried concealed in his pocket. He waited until she brought in the glasses and the corkscrew and an ice bucket.

"I'll open the bottle," he said. "Man's work." He winked at her. "Meanwhile, why don't you slip into that party dress of yours, so that we can give Charles a proper welcome?"

Adrienne nodded and left the room. It was then that Thornwald opened the champagne, poured it, and added just the merest drop of the love philter to the contents of her glass.

He finished just in time, dropping the little vial back into his pocket just as Adrienne blossomed into the room. His hand trembled, not with apprehension but with anticipation.

Obsession or no, Adrienne was a beautiful woman in her own right; slim, shapely, and quite probably a natural redhead. Thornwald determined to satisfy himself on this latter point the moment Adrienne downed her drink.

She swept over to him, proffering his glass and raising her own as he turned away until he could control his shaking fingers. Now was the time for self-control. In a moment, he felt certain, it could be abandoned.

Thornwald raised his champagne glass.

“To tonight,” he said. And sipped tentatively.

Adrienne nodded, bent her shapely wrist, brought the edge of the glass to her lips, and hesitated.

“Now that we seem to be friends again,” she murmured, “suppose we seal our relationship in a friendly gesture?”

“Such as?”

“Let us take each other’s glasses.”

Thornwald gulped. “Oh no!” he exclaimed. “Believe it or not, I have a cold.”

“Very well.” Again, Adrienne paused.

“Drink up, my dear,” Thornwald urged. “Here’s to surprises.”

“Surprises,” Adrienne echoed. And drank.

Thornwald tossed off the champagne. His hands were trembling again. How long would he have to wait?

Not very long, apparently. For it seemed but a moment before the change came.

Adrienne moved quite close and her voice, like her smile, was soft and caressing.

“I don’t know what you put in my drink,” she murmured. “But you did put something in. That’s why you wouldn’t switch glasses with me, isn’t it?”

Thornwald noted the warmth in her voice and felt it was now safe to nod.

“Good,” Adrienne said. “I thought as much. Which is why I switched glasses before I made the suggestion—when I handed you your drink.”

Thornwald blinked. And then the philter took effect and he knew it worked, knew that if the merest drop would transform a woman into a bitch in heat, it was equally potent when administered to a male.

All he could do was tremble and watch the room swirl and listen to Adrienne’s laughter. If only she could understand his motivations, if only she realized he’d acted out of genuine affection! Thornwald knew he had to tell her, so he took a deep breath and opened his mouth.

“I love you,” he barked.

A Home Away From Home

The train was late, and it must have been past nine o'clock when Natalie found herself standing, all alone, on the platform before Hightower Station.

The station itself was obviously closed for the night it was only a way-stop, really, for there was no town here and Natalie wasn't quite sure what to do. She had taken it for granted that Dr Bracegirdle would be on hand to meet her. Before leaving London she's sent her uncle a wire giving him the time of her arrival. But since the train had been delayed, perhaps he'd come and gone.

Natalie glanced around uncertainly, then noticed the phone booth which provided her with a solution. Dr Bracegirdle's last letter was in her purse, and it contained both his address and his phone number. She had fumbled through her bag and found it by the time she walked over to the booth.

Ringing him up proved a bit of a problem—there seemed to be an interminable delay before the operator made the connection, and there was a great deal of buzzing on the line. A glimpse of the hills beyond the station, through the glass wall of the booth, suggested the reason for the difficulty. After all, Natalie reminded herself, this was West Country. Conditions might be a bit primitive.

'Hello, hello!'

The woman's voice came over the line, fairly shouting above the din. There was no buzzing noise now, and the sound in the background suggested a babble of voices all intermingled. Natalie bent forward and spoke directly and distinctly into the mouthpiece.

'This is Natalie Rivers,' she said. 'Is Dr Bracegirdle there?'

‘Whom did you say was calling?’

‘Natalie Rivers. I’m his niece.’

‘His what, Miss?’

‘Niece,’ Natalie repeated. ‘May I speak to him, please?’

‘Just a moment.’

There was a pause, during which the sound of voices in the background seemed amplified, and then Natalie heard the resonant masculine tones, so much easier to separate from the indistinct murmuring.

‘Dr Bracegirdle here. My dear Natalie, this is an unexpected pleasure!’

‘Unexpected? But I sent you a ’gram from London this afternoon.’ Natalie checked herself as she realized the slight edge of impatience which had crept into her voice. ‘Didn’t it arrive?’

‘I’m afraid service is not of the best around here,’ Dr Bracegirdle told her, with an apologetic chuckle. ‘No, your wire didn’t arrive. But apparently you did.’ He chuckled again. ‘Where are you, my dear?’

‘At Hightower Station.’

‘Oh, dear. It’s in exactly the opposite direction.’

‘Opposite direction?’

‘From Peterby’s. They rang me up just before you called. Some silly nonsense about an appendix probably nothing but an upset stomach. But I promised to stop round directly, just in case.’

‘Don’t tell me they still call you for general practice?’

‘Emergencies, my dear. There aren’t many physicians in these parts. Fortunately, there aren’t many patients, either.’ Dr Bracegirdle started to chuckle, then sobered. ‘Look now. You say you’re at the station. I’ll just send Miss Plummer down to fetch you in the wagon. Have you much luggage?’

‘Only my travel-case. The rest is coming with the household goods, by boat.’

‘Boat?’

‘Didn’t I mention it when I wrote?’

‘Yes, that’s right, you did. Well, no matter. Miss Plummer will be along for you directly.’

‘I’ll be waiting in front of the platform.’

‘What was that? Speak up, I can hardly hear you.’

‘I said I’ll be waiting in front of the platform.’

‘Oh.’ Dr Bracegirdle chuckled once more. ‘Bit of a party going on here.’

‘Shan’t I be intruding? I mean, since you weren’t expecting me tonight . . .’

‘Not at all! They’ll be leaving before long. You wait for Plummer.’

The phone clicked off and Natalie returned to the platform. In a surprisingly short time, the station wagon appeared and skidded off the road to halt at the very edge of the tracks. A tall, thin grey-haired woman, wearing a somewhat rumpled white uniform, emerged and beckoned to Natalie.

‘Come along, my dear,’ she called. ‘Here, I’ll just pop this in back.’ Scooping up the bag, she tossed it into the rear of the wagon. ‘Now-, in with you and off we go!’

Scarcely waiting for Natalie to close the door after her, the redoubtable Miss Plummer gunned the motor and the car plunged back on to the road.

The speedometer immediately shot up to seventy, arid Natalie flinched. Miss Plummer noticed her agitation at once.

‘Sorry,’ she said. ‘With Doctor out on call, I can’t he away too long.’

‘Oh, yes, the house-guests. He told me.’

‘Did he now?’ Miss Plummer took a sharp turn at a crossroads and the tyres screeched in protest, but to no avail. Natalie decided to drown apprehension in conversation.

‘What sort of a man is my uncle?’ she asked.

‘Have you never met him?’

‘No. My parents moved to Australia when I was quite young. This is my first trip to England. In fact, it’s the first time I’ve left Canberra.’

‘Folks with you?’

‘They were in a motor smashup two months ago,’ Natalie said. ‘Didn’t the Doctor tell you?’

‘I’m afraid not you see, I haven’t been with him very long.’ Miss Plummer uttered a short bark and the car swerved wildly across the road. ‘Motor smashup, eh? Some people have no business behind the wheel. That’s what Doctor says.’

She turned and peered at Natalie, ‘I take it you’ve come to stay, then?’

‘Yes, of course. He wrote me when he was appointed my guardian. That’s why I was wondering what he might be like. It’s so hard to tell from letters.’ The thin-faced woman nodded silently, but Natalie had an urge to confide. ‘To tell the truth, I’m just a little bit edgy. I mean, I’ve never met a psychiatrist before.’

‘Haven’t you, now?’ Miss Plummer shrugged. ‘You’re quite fortunate. I’ve seen a few in mv time. A bit on the know-it-all side, if you ask me. Though I must say, Dr Bracegirdle is one of the best. Permissive, you know.’

‘I understand he has quite a practice.’

‘There’s no lack of patients for that sort of thing,’ Miss Plummer observed. ‘Particularly amongst the well-to-do. I’d say your uncle has done himself handsomely. The house and all but you’ll see.’ Once again the wagon whirled into a sickening swerve and sped forward between the imposing gates of a huge driveway which led towards an enormous house set amidst a grove of trees in the distance. Through the shuttered windows Natalie caught sight of a faint beam of light—just enough to help reveal the ornate facade of her uncle’s home.

‘Oh. dear,’ she muttered, half to herself.

‘What is it?’

‘The guests and it’s Saturday night. And here I am, all mussed from travel.’

‘Don’t give it another thought,’ Miss Plummer assured her. ‘There’s no formality here. That’s what Doctor told me when I came. It’s a home away from home.’

Miss Plummer barked and braked simultaneously, and the station wagon came to an abrupt stop just behind an imposing black limousine.

‘Out with you now!’ With brisk efficiency, Miss Plummer lifted the bag from the rear seat and carried it up the steps, beckoning Natalie forward with a nod over her shoulder. She halted at the door and fumbled for a key.

‘No sense knocking,’ she said. ‘They’d never hear me.’ As the door swung open her observation was amply confirmed. The background noise which Natalie had noted over the tele telephone now formed a formidable foreground. She stood there, hesitant, as Miss Plummer swept forward across the threshold.

‘Come along, come along!’

Obediently, Natalie entered, and as Miss Plummer shut the door behind her, blinked with eyes recently unaccustomed to the brightness of the interior.

She found herself standing in a large, somewhat bare hallway. Directly ahead of her was a large staircase; at an angle between the railing and the wall was a desk and chair. To her left, a dark, panelled door evidently leading to Dr Bracegirdle’s private office, for a small brass plate was affixed to it, bearing his name. To her right was a huge open parlor, its windows heavily curtained and shuttered against the night. It was from here that the sounds of sociability echoed.

Natalie started across the hall towards the stairs. As she did so, she caught a glimpse of the parlor. Fully a dozen guests eddied about a large table, talking and gesturing with the animation of close acquaintance with one another, and with the contents of the lavish array of bottles gracing the table-top. A sudden whoop of laughter indicated that at least one guest had abused the Doctor’s hospitality.

Natalie passed the entry hastily, so as not to be observed, then glanced behind her to make sure that Miss Plummer was following with her bag. Miss Plummer was indeed following, but her hands were empty. And as Natalie reached the stairs, Miss Plummer shook her head.

'You didn't mean to go up now, did you?' she murmured. 'Come in and introduce yourself.'

'I thought I might freshen up a bit first.'

'Let me go on ahead and get your room in order. Doctor didn't give me notice, you know.'

'Really, it's not necessary. I could do with a wash.'

'Doctor should be back any moment now. Do wait for him.' Miss Plummer grasped Natalie's arm, and with the same speed and expedition she had bestowed on driving, now steered the girl forward into the lighted room.

'Here's Doctor's niece.' she announced. 'Miss Natalie Rivers, from Australia.'

Several heads turned in Natalie's direction, though Miss Plummer's voice had scarcely penetrated the general conversational din. A short, jolly-looking fat man bobbed towards Natalie, waving a half-empty glass.

'All the way from Australia, eh?' He extended his goblet. 'You must be thirsty. Here, take this. I'll get another.' And before Natalie could reply he turned and plunged back into the group around the table.

'Major Hamilton,' Miss Plummer whispered. 'A dear soul, really. Though I'm afraid he's just a wee bit squiffy.'

As Miss Plummer moved away, Natalie glanced uncertainly at the glass in her hand. She was not quite sure where to dispose of it.

'Allow me.' A tall, grey-haired and quite distinguished-looking man with a black moustache moved forward and took the stemware from between her lingers.

'Thank you.'

'Not at all. I'm afraid you'll have to excuse him. The party spirit, you know.' He nodded, indicating a woman in extreme décolletage chattering animatedly to a group of three laughing men. But since it's by way of being a farewell celebration.

'Ah, there you are!' The short man whom Miss Plummer had identified as Major Hamilton bounced back into orbit around Natalie, a fresh drink in his hand and a fresh smile on his ruddy face. ‘I’m back again,’ he announced. ‘Just like a boomerang, eh?’

He laughed explosively, then paused. ‘I say, you do have boomerangs in Australia? And blackfellows? Saw quite a bit of you Aussies at Gallipoli. Of course that was some time ago, before your time, I daresay ‘Please, Major.’ The tall man smiled at Natalie. There was something reassuring about his presence, and something oddly familiar, too. Natalie wondered where she might have seen him before. She watched while he moved over to the Major and removed the drink from his hand.

‘Now see here ’ the Major spluttered.

‘You’ve had enough, old boy. And it’s almost time for you to go.’

‘One for the road.’ The Major glanced around, his hands waving in appeal. ‘Everyone else is drinking!’ lie made a lunge for his glass but the tall man evaded him. Smiling at Natalie over his shoulder, he drew the Major to one side and began to mutter to him earnestly in low tones. The Major nodded in sudden, drunken placation.

Natalie looked around the room. Nobody was paying the least attention to her except for one elderly woman who sat quite alone on a stool before the piano. She regarded Natalie with a fixed stare that at once emphasized her role as an intruder on a gala scene. Natalie turned away hastily and again caught sight of the woman in décolletage. She suddenly remembered her own desire to change her clothing and peered at the doorway, seeking Miss Plummer. But Miss Plummer was nowhere to be seen.

Walking back into the hall, she peered up the staircase.

‘Miss Plummer!’ she called.

There was no response.

Then, from out of the corner of her eye, she noted that the door of the room across the hallway was ajar. In fact, it was opening now, quite rapidly, and as Natalie stared, Miss Plummer came backing out of the room, carrying something in her hand. Before Natalie could call out again and attract her attention, she had scurried off down the hallway.

Natalie crossed before the stairs, meaning to follow her, but found herself halting instead before the open doorway.

She gazed in curiously at what was obviously her uncle’s consultation room. It was a cozy, book-lined study with heavy, leather-covered furniture grouped before the shelves. The psychiatric couch rested in one corner near the wall and near it was a large mahogany desk. The lop of the desk was quite bare, save for a cradle telephone, and a thin brown loop snaking out from it.

Something about the loop disturbed Natalie and before she was conscious of her movement she was inside the room, looking down at the desk-top. Now she recognized the loop, of course: it was the cord from the phone.

And the end had been neatly severed from its connection at the wall.

‘Miss Plummer!’ Natalie murmured. ‘That’s what she was carrying a pair of scissors. But why?’

‘Why not?’

Natalie turned just in time to observe the tall, distinguished-looking man enter the doorway behind her.

‘It won’t be needed,’ he said. ‘After all, I did tell you it was a farewell celebration.’ And he gave a little chuckle.

Again Natalie sensed something strangely familiar about him and this time it came to her. She’d heard the same chuckle over the phone from the depot station.

‘But you’re playing a joke!’ she exclaimed. ‘You’re Dr Bracegirdle, aren’t you?’

‘No, my dear.’ He shook his head as he moved past her across the room. ‘It’s just that no one expected you. We were about to leave when your call came. So we had to say something’

There was a moment of silence. Then, ‘Where is my uncle?’ Natalie murmured, at last.

‘Over here.’

Natalie found herself standing beside the tall man, gazing down at what lay in a space between the couch and the wall. An instant was all she could bear.

‘Messy,’ the tall man nodded. ‘Of course it was all so sudden, the opportunity, I mean. And then they would get into the liquor.

His voice echoed hollowly in the room and Natalie realized the sounds of the party had died away. She glanced up to see them all standing there in the doorway, watching.

Then their ranks parted and Miss Plummer came quickly into the room, wearing an incongruous fur wrap over the rumpled, ill-fitting uniform.

‘Oh my!’ she gasped. ‘So you found him!’

Natalie nodded and took a step forward. ‘You’ve got to do something,’ she said. ‘Please!’

‘Yes.’ But Miss Plummer didn’t seem concerned. The others had crowded into the room behind her, and stood staring silently; Natalie turned to them in appeal.

‘Don’t you see?’ she cried. ‘It’s the work of a madman. He belongs in the asylum!’

‘My dear child,’ murmured Miss Plummer as she quickly closed and locked the door and the silent starers moved forward. ‘This is the asylum . . .’

Crime Machine

For that real deep-down badness, nothing beats the Good Old Days.

“LET HIM alone,” said Stephen’s father. “It’s I J a phase they all go through. He’ll snap out of it.” Stephen didn’t really believe he was ever going to snap out of it, but he was grateful that his folks let him alone. He wasn’t worried what they thought, just as long as they allowed him to watch the viddies.

Because his father was rich and connected with the university labs, Stephen had his own viddie set. While his parents indulged their normal tastes and watched the adult mush on the wall downstairs, Stephen stayed in his room and his own world.

It was a wonderful world for any thirteen-year-old—the world called the Good Old Days. There were all kinds of viddie shows about the golden pioneer era of seventy-five years ago, the marvelous time when heroes like Dion O’Bannion and Hymie Weiss walked the Earth.

Stephen watched a show called Big Jim—about Big Jim Colosimo and his lovable friends. He watched The Enforcer; that was the one about Frank Nitti. He was a man of action, like the heroes of Johnny Torrio and Legs Diamond. The Legs Diamond show was very exciting, because Legs was the one who always danced his way around the bullets in a gang war. That was how he got his name.

Stephen learned a lot about the people who had lived in the romantic past. He knew about flashy gambling men like fancy Arnold Rothstein, who was so suave, and wild rascals like Bugs Moran. There was a new show out called The Great Dillinger, and that was pretty good. But the best of all was Stephen's favorite—Scar face Al. No wonder it was right up there on top with all the kids; its hero was Scarface Al Capone, the Robin Hood of Chicago, who took from the rich and gave to the poor.

Lots of times Stephen found himself humming the theme song, which went:

Al Capone, Al Capone,
A mighty man who walked alone>—
Wherever daring deeds
are known,
Men sing the praise of Al Capone.

Stephen liked the way the machine guns came in on the end of the last line.

But then he liked everything about Al Capone; the way he got his scar—defending his sister from the crooked prohibition agents; the way he disguised himself as "Mr. Brown" when he was fighting the wicked cops and the thieving politicians of Chicago. Stephen knew all about Al Capone, riding in from his hideout in Cicero to bring justice to Chicago and save pretty girls from the evil Vice Squad men.

Stephen joined the "Scarface Al Club" and ate enough cereal to get himself the complete prize outfit—the artificial scar to wear, the bulletproof vest and everything.

He might have been a very happy boy if he hadn't found his uncle's subjectivity reactor.

IT WAS a big machine, resembling nothing quite so much as the genetic control, which his uncle had also invented. The genetic control was a large box in which a woman could sit and be bombarded by radiations which would eradicate recessive and undesirable traits in her ova, thus leading to the reproduction of healthy offspring. This apparatus, marketed under the popular name of “Heir Conditioner,” was an immediate success because it was a failure. Nothing really happened, but the woman who used it felt better; in that respect it resembled a face cream and had the additional advantage of being much more expensive.

The machine which Stephen found—the subjectivity reactor—was a failure because it was a success. Not an immediate failure, for it was never manufactured or marketed, but a gradual failure. His uncle had devised it while still a young man, many years ago, and it too was a large box which contained a variety of mechanisms. Under their stimulus, the subject became capable of materializing, in tangible three-dimensional form, his immediate thought patterns.

The gradual failure came about because his uncle had experimented upon himself, and pretty soon his home was overflowing with tangible three-dimensional forms to which his wife objected; most particularly to the redheads.

Consequently the subjectivity reactor was carted off to the storage building behind the university labs where Stephen’s uncle and father both worked, and no one ever mentioned that it was also capable, by virtue of the same principle of materializing thought, of acting as a time machine.

Stephen himself found it out by accident one day when he was playing around, exploring the deserted warehouse premises. He noticed the boxlike apparatus and crawled inside, pretending for the moment that he was a hero like Pretty-Boy Floyd, hiding out from the dirty old Feds. He didn’t pay much attention to the blinking lights and whirling mirrors which became self-activating the moment he stepped inside and closed the door; he was wishing he had a gat to protect himself in case that archfiend J. Edgar Hoover showed up. He’d show him!

“All right, copper—you asked for it.” And he’d reach in his pocket and pull out his gat, like this, and—

Stephen felt the weight before he saw it. And then he did pull his hand out of his pocket and he was holding a gat. A real roscoe, a genuine equalizer. Stephen stared at it, his thoughts whirling faster than the mirrors.

The gun—where did it come from? He’d just thought about it and it was here; how could that be? Actually, he hadn’t even thought, just wished. The way he wished he had been around back in the Good Old Days, the way he was wishing now. He’d give anything to see real live American History in the making, like that morning of St. Valentine’s Day in the garage on Clark Street . . .

THE MIRRORS revved faster and suddenly they disappeared. Everything disappeared.

It was like a viddie dissolve, so Stephen wasn’t frightened. He knew the next scene would come up right after the commercial. Only this wasn’t viddie and there was no commercial. The next scene came up when the blurring stopped and he found himself sitting in the same box, the mirrors still whirring and he heard the noise outside. Stephen blinked, tugged at the door of the compartment, opened it, and saw the machine guns spit.

He knew where he was now. He’d seen it a dozen times on viddie, imagined it a thousand more. The garage, at eleven o’clock in the morning; the two executioners disguised in the uniforms of the hated police were mowing down the seven finks.

Stephen, in the subjectivity reactor, had materialized at the very instant the firing started. For thirty seconds Stephen stared at the finks as they writhed and fell. And during those thirty seconds the finks became men. Men who wriggled and flopped after the bullets struck, until the two swarthy hoods in uniform stepped up and completed their work with revolvers. There was blood on the wall and floor, and a terrible, acrid odor.

The two men noticed it, too, and commented harshly in Italian. One of them laughed and spat on the floor.

Stephen wasn't laughing and he felt that unless he got out of here right away he'd do more than spit. He started to close the door and it was then that the executioners looked up and saw him.

"What the hell—" said the short one, and raised his revolver. His taller companion slapped it out of his hand.

"Wait," he said He stooped, picked up the machine gun, and faced Stephen in the doorway of the compartment "Awright, kid, how you get in here? Where you come from?" He raised the muzzle of his weapon. "C'mon, talk!"

Stephen talked. It was hard to, with the choking in his throat as he watched the machine gun muzzle that was like a cruel mouth—almost as cruel as the mouth of the man who held it.

It was hard to explain, too, and he wasn't sure he understood the situation himself. Certainly the shorter assassin didn't understand, because he nudged his companion and said, "He's nuts! Hurry up and give it to him—we gotta get outa here!"

The big man with the machine gun shook his head. "Shaddup and listen. Dincha hear? This thing goes through time. It's a time machine. Aincha never heard?"

"Porko Dio! No such thing—"

"No such thing now." The big man nodded. "But maybe they invent it later on. That's where this kid comes from. How else you figure he got here if not like that?"

"So?"

"So you wanna get outa here, right?"

"Sure, to St. Louis. That's where Al said we'd get the payoff—"

"You know what kinda payoff we end up with." The big man made a nasty noise in his throat. "But suppose we really get out. Suppose we go back with the kid here."

He took a step forward. “Awright, kid, whaddya say?” He stared at Stephen.

STEPHEN stared back, into his face and the face of his companion. Here was his chance to take two real live gangsters back into his own world, his own time. It was something he’d always dreamed of. Only he had never dreamed they really looked and talked like this. And he had never dreamed the reality he glimpsed over their shoulders; the torn, huddled, oozing reality on the garage floor. Now he knew all there was to know about the Good Old Days.

The big man raised his weapon. “Hurry up! We ain’t got all day. Whaddya say?”

Stephen knew he himself didn’t have all day, or even another minute. Fortunately, thanks to the viddies, he knew what to say and how to say it. His hand squeezed the trigger inside his coat pocket. First the small man went down and then the big man.

As the big man fell there was a short, staccato burst from the machine gun. Several bullets punctured the shell of the compartment. But by this time Stephen had slammed the door of the subjectivity reactor and hurled himself to the floor in quivering panic, wishing with all his being that he was back where he belonged . . .

He might have had a hard time explaining the presence of the gat if he hadn’t wished so strongly that it would disappear. As it was, he emerged from the subjectivity reactor completely unscathed. To all intents and appearances, Stephen was unchanged by his experience.

The thing of it was that from then on he never watched Scarface Al any more.

“He’s growing up,” his mother said proudly.

“What did I tell you?” his father said. “I knew he’d get over it. All it takes is time.”

When he said, “All it takes is time,” he suddenly remembered Stephen’s visit to the old storage building. That night he made a trip there himself to confirm his suspicions.

And there, as he expected, he found the subjectivity reactor—and the telltale impressions left by the machine-gun bullets.

Funny thing, they didn’t penetrate with half the force of the old Colt .45s. Stephen’s father stopped until he found the holes near the bottom of the machine. Stephen’s father remembered the day those shots had been fired.

Sometime he’d have to tell Stephen. Tell him how it was when he was a boy, when the machine had first been invented. Like father, like son.

Stephen’s father gazed at the Colt bullet holes and smiled reminiscently. He too had had his viddie heroes in his youth. Only his personal favorite happened to be the real 1870 Wyatt Earp.

The Man Who Looked Like Napoleon

"A classical example of megalomania," said Doctor Rand—and one of the finest stories by the author of PSYCHO.

THE MAN WHO LOOKED LIKE NApoleon got out of the elevator on the fifth floor. He walked down the hall slowly, his head bent so that his forelock bobbed up and down. He might have brushed his hair back, but only if he took his hand from inside the front of his coat.

He couldn't take his hand out now—later, perhaps, but not now. He was being watched.

All eyes were on the Emperor as he moved along the hall. Nd one was visible, but he knew they were there—behind the doors, watching. Watching and whispering. Well, let them whisper. He was protected by the Old Guard and the people were behind him, to the last man.

He came to the door. The sign on it read: G.K. Rand, M.D.

It was the right door. It was the right time. It was the right day—the anniversary of Austerlitz. The sun had been shining this morning, so he knew it was the right day. The sun of Austerlitz shone. And now he was coming here for his appointment—and because of something else.

A little pulse moved up and down in his throat when he thought of that something else. Well, he'd be able to handle things. Able was I ere I saw Elba—

He entered the office and the woman in white said, “Mr. Throng, good to see you—the doctor will be free in a moment. Please sit down.”

“Merci.”

She didn’t look at him directly, didn’t notice the way he glared when she called him. Mr. Throng.

He couldn’t help glaring when people called him that. He knew why they did it—they hated him and tried to pretend they didn’t recognize him. Well, they would have to recognize him now. He would tell the doctor.

“You may go in now.”

She didn’t even say “Sire”; she didn’t how. But he ignored the insults and strode into the other room. He took short steps walking with dignity, still keeping his hand under his overcoat. Doctor Rand was sitting in his chair waiting for him, and he walked over and lay down on the couch and closed his eyes.

Doctor Rand was talking to him, and from far away he heard his own voice saying, “I’m fine, thanks,” and “Yes, I’m ready,” and “There’s a lot I must tell you.”

The doctor said, “Aren’t you going to take off your coat before you begin?”—but he shook his head without opening his eyes. He liked it better this way, with his coat on and his eyes, closed. Then there were epaulettes on the coat, and underneath was the uniform of a colonel of artillery, the one he had worn ever since 1802, ever since Josephine had—

“Just relax now,” said the doctor. “You know how to do it. Say whatever comes into your mind.”

The doctor was master here. So begin. Let nothing interfere, let no man say him nay.

“Ney,” he said. “Peter Ney. Marshal of France. Yet he denied me before my return from Elba. He said nay to me. Peter denied me. He denied Our Lord. Peter denied Our Lord, and I was Peter Ney’s Lord, come to redeem all France.

“Why don’t they tell the truth, Doctor? I wrote them of my escape to America. I can show you the letter. I told them to go to Paris and look into the Tomb. They'd find it empty and then they'd know. The Tomb was empty after the third day. Read your Bible."

He paused. Doctor Rand prompted. "Please, Mr. Throng. You aren't letting yourself go. Just say words—not sentences or thoughts. You understand, we've been all through this before. I want you to say just what comes into your mind—"

It was no use. He could see that now. He sat up on the couch and opened his eyes, swinging around until he could face Doctor Rand.

"I'm sorry," he said. "I'm afraid I'll have to give this up. You can't help me."

"If you'd only take my suggestion," the Doctor said softly. "Arrange to go away for six months. I could recommend a nice private sana—"

He interrupted the doctor quickly. "So that's it. History repeats itself. You want me to abdicate, go to St. Helena." He laughed grimly, and the laugh abruptly soared to a falsetto giggle.

The doctor shrugged. "It's the sensible solution, Mr. Throng. I think I can speak frankly to you. This is getting out of hand. We haven't arrived at the adjustment I hoped for. You seem to be retreating from reality and—"

Retreating. He was rubbing it in about Russia again. But that had not been a retreat. Winter, and the firing of Moscow—how could he be held responsible for things like that? He wasn't responsible. That was the answer. He just wasn't responsible any more. That's what they had told him last week down at the office, when they fired him. The doctor didn't know about that part yet. And there were a lot of other things the Doctor didn't know, either. He found himself shouting.

"You're a fool, Doctor! It is you who refuses to face the truth. You earn a living by telling everyone who. comes in here he's crazy. That's your little scheme and I see through it. No crazy ones and there'd be no business for men like you, would there? That's how it works, isn't it, Doctor?"

The nurse peeked into the room and the doctor nodded. She said, "Please, there are people waiting. I must ask you to restrain yourself, Mr. Throng."

"Restraint, eh?" he said when she disappeared again. "I know all about restraint. Remember two years ago, I got a sample of restraint at the hospital when I had my concussion. They put me in a jacket without sleeves and strapped it up my back. If it hadn't been for Josephine I'd still be rotting away in some damned asylum."

The doctor patted his shoulder and he calmed down. His voice dropped. He had to explain once more.

"Why don't you admit the truth, Doctor? Admit that I'm a product of reincarnation. There's no accident or coincidence about the way I look, though I didn't recognize myself until after the automobile accident. But it all ties in, doesn't it? Didn't I marry a woman named Josephine? And you know my family history. I'm a Corsican—I proved that to you. It's simple reincarnation, Doctor.

"All my life I moved in a dream—until that accident. Then I had time to lie there and think while my head healed up. Even when they put me in the psycho ward I knew exactly what I was doing, I let them keep me there so I could work things out in my mind, until I, was absolutely sure it all made sense. Don't you see now, Doctor?"

Doctor Rand rose. "Really, Mr. Throng, you're not making the progress your wife hoped for when she suggested that you visit me. With your permission I'd like to speak to her again about this."

"Go ahead. Why don't you call her now? You. have my house phone number."

He sat there grinning as the doctor dialed, waited, and finally replaced the phone.

"No answer, is there? I could have told you that. I was going to tell you, anyway. That's really why I came here today—to tell you. History repeats itself, Doctor. You see, I finally forced the issue. This morning I got rid of Josephine."

"You're divorcing her?"

"I wanted to. Believe me I did. I begged and pleaded with her. I told her it was long past time. I must have children, an heir. It's written in History.

But she refused to consider divorce—she absolutely refused. And so I got rid of her."

"You—"

As the doctor started to ring for the nurse, he stood up and pulled his hand out from under the overcoat. He brought the gun with it. "Don't do that, Doctor," he said. "Just sit quietly. That's better. Now I'm going to tell you all about it. Yes, I got rid of her this morning. You can't stop History, but you can alter it.

"That's the secret, Doctor. You can alter History, and this time things will be different. That's the real reason for reincarnation. It gives a man a chance to improve on Destiny. And I have my chance now. No Waterloo this time!

"I started to change the pattern this morning, when I killed her. She's lying on the bed at home now, but nobody knows. The police don't know. Fouche will never discover her. I won't tell. And you won't tell. Because I'm going to kill you, too."

He moved the gun up; stepped closer. The doctor was watching him, but he must be believing at last, because he didn't stir. He just sat there and listened while the truth came out.

"You see, I never recognized you before, you traitor. I didn't realize the whole truth—that we are all reincarnations of our past selves. How could I guess that it was you who betrayed the Revolution and then betrayed me to the Allies and the Bourbons? If I'd killed you the first time I would have saved myself. This time I'll make sure you're out of the way. I recognize you now. Doctor Rand, is it? I know your real name—Talleyrand!"

The doctor glanced toward the door. Hadn't the nurse looked in and out again just then, before he could stop her? That meant she was calling help. Yes, now he could hear footsteps and sounds in the outer office. She had summoned the police. But they couldn't stop him; this wasn't Waterloo, this time there wouldn't be any Waterloo.

Doctor Rand turned and said, "Mr. Throng!"—but it was too late. He aimed carefully and felt his finger move along the trigger.

He closed his eyes, started to squeeze and pull. Everything was squeezing and pulling and Josephine was dead, Talleyrand must die, he would raise a new army and they'd come out of the grave for him, the Marshals of France: Lannes, Bessieres, Davout, Marmont—all of them. Squeeze and pull—now!

Then he fired and Talleyrand was lying on the floor and there was shouting. A man in a blue uniform ran into the room and he had a gun too—he was the Enemy.

Squeeze and pull, run for the window, it was jammed, the glass, splintered all around him, trapped, the Old Guard dies but never surrenders, aim and fire now, this is Waterloo after all, jump, black and falling—Vive I'Empereur . . .

The man who looked like Napoleon lay on the sidewalk. He was quite dead by the time Doctor Rand got downstairs.

Doctor Rand felt lucky that he had got off with only a flesh wound in the shoulder. Thank goodness the nurse had got the police in time!

He stared down at poor Mr. Throng and shook his head. A classical example of megalomania. It was almost a comic strip cliche—the man who thought he was Napoleon. Poor Throng, with his theories of reincarnation, his pitiful misinterpretation of coincidence!

Doctor Rand turned as the homicide men arrived. They were talking to the patrolman who had burst into the office and fired the shot which had saved his life and sent Mr. Throng tumbling out of the window.

He walked up to the patrolman and held out his hand. "Thanks," he said. "If you hadn't got him in time—"

"That's my job," said the patrolman. "That's what I'm here for."

"Well, I appreciate it, Mr.—"

"Wellington," said the patrolman. "Wellington's the name."

The Model Wife

Murder, like love, is blind, it knows neither color nor creed.

Elise, for example, was a quadroon, and although she was perhaps the most beautiful member of the demi-monde in all Haiti, she was a devout churchgoer.

Josef was a mulatto and, despite his education, not a communicant of any established religion. Although he held a reputable position as display manager for the leading department store in Port-au-Prince, he came originally from the hill country where voodoo still flourishes.

Elise had her particular reputation, yet she gave up a promising career to marry Josef. And Josef, who some had predicted might have developed his native talent as a brilliant artist and sculptor, contented himself instead with routine commercial employment in order to support his voluptuous young bride.

They made a somewhat incongruous couple, but for a while all went happily.

Yet in the end, as the old saying goes, blood will tell. Elise was civilized, and Josef was still a savage.

Because Elise was civilized, she fell in love with Monsieur Carnet. Monsieur Carnet was an octoroon, and quite wealthy. He wanted to take her with him to Paris. “A wonderful life awaits you, cherie,” he told her. “You will pass for white easily enough, just as I do. France is a civilized country. I have means, we will travel, you shall be able to do all the things you were meant to enjoy—”

Because Josef was a savage, he did not understand all this, even though Elise carefully explained what such an opportunity meant to her.

For a short time, therefore—because she was civilized—Elise toyed with the idea that she might have to kill Josef in order to be free of him.

But in the end—because he was a savage—Josef relapsed into a sullen silence and let her go. He did not attempt to interfere with her meetings with Monsieur Carnet, and he did not contest the divorce proceedings. A month later, Elise sailed away with her new protector.

Before sailing, it is probable that she prayed to her God, just as it is unmistakable that Josef prayed to his. Yet, in the end, she left.

Elise and Monsieur Carnet planned to be married on shipboard, en route to France, and a gala ceremony had been arranged. Unfortunately, on the second day of the voyage she became ill. It was an illness which baffled the ship's doctor.

When the fever came, early that morning, Elise complained that she was burning up. Within an hour she was screaming in agony. They packed her beautiful body in cold sheets moistened with water, but she continued to writhe in torment, and no amount of morphine could dull the pain.

No amount of morphine could dull the shock of witnessing her rapid and incredible disintegration—the way the flesh seemed to literally melt from her face and body. In the end there was only a bubbling, coagulated horror.

It was not a civilized way in which to die, but then Josef was a savage. And although he was never formally indicted for murder, he did suffer some consequences. In fact, that very day, he lost his job as display manager of Port-au-Prince's leading department store.

They could not understand why a man of his experience would insist on making a window dummy of his own to place on display that morning. They could not see why he modeled the face and features to an uncanny resemblance of his former wife. And above all, they could not comprehend why he chose to mold the dummy of soft wax—wax that was bound to melt and run after an hour or so in the hot sun.

Untouchable

Race was bored with India.

"Nothing moves here, you know?" he griped. "Where's all the action?"

He gave everybody a hard time on location, and finally Simon took him on. Simon had always been able to handle him, and maybe that's why he was directing the picture; a lot of people just wouldn't work on a Race Harmon production any more.

"Look, sweetheart," he said. "I know it's been a drag. First the heat, then the rains, and then everybody coming down with the trots. Miller called me last night about the budget figures—the way he screamed, I could have heard him loud and clear from Bel Air without a phone."

"Let him suffer," Race muttered, then took a gulp of his drink. "I should bleed for him, shacked up in that air-conditioned office with the blonde throw-rug and a chick to match? Why doesn't he get off his butt and fly over here? We'll see how he likes being cooped up with a bunch of dumb niggers—"

"Please!" Simon frowned. "That's one of the things I wanted to warn you about. They're not niggers. Why, some of those technical people we hired out of the studios down in Bombay could run rings around any crew in Hollywood. The trouble is, they hear you talking on the set and they resent your attitude. Just remember, you're not home now."

"You can say that again! Where I come from, we call a spade a spade, whether he wears shoes or not. And that's the way it's gonna be, so kindly lay off the jazz, huh?"

Race poured himself another drink.

"Another thing," Simon said. "Aren't you hitting the sauce a little hard lately?"

"Got to get my kicks somewhere, Pops. This is a nothing unit here, you know? When we came out, I thought I had it made with Gladys, only she's got eyes for that Method swish, that Parker. So I gave a little play to this script-girl of yours, Edna what's-her-name—"

"Messy," Simon sighed, "You didn't have to break into her trailer."

"All right, she made a federal case out of it." Race emptied his glass and thumped it down. "What am I supposed to do for some action? I'm hurting bad."

"Control yourself. We'll wrap up our location shots and be out of here in two weeks."

"Two weeks? Look, Dad, this is Race Harmon you're talking to, not Barry Fitzgerald. I may have to make the scene with some of that dark meat. Noticed all these chicks in the sarongs, or saris, whatever you call 'em, parading down by the river. Why I spotted one yesterday, she couldn't be a day over fifteen, but she had a pair of—"

"Race, that's murder!" Simon shook his head. "I saw you talking to that girl, and so did everyone else. You're lucky you left it at that—one false move and there'd have been a riot. I only hope they didn't hear about it up at the palace."

"So what?"

"Can't you understand? These people are not ignorant savages. You've met the Maharajah; he's an intelligent man. If you want me to lay it on the line, I think he's a damned sight more civilized than you are."

"He's a nigger."

"Well, you'd better not make any such statements tonight," Simon said. "Don't forget, we're invited to the palace for dinner."

"I'll eat here."

"You'll come to the palace." Simon's voice was firm. "It's important, Race. We're guests here in the Maharajah's territory. We've rented his land, hired his people. We can’t afford to offend him. I want you to show up sober and on your best behavior. Is that clear?”

“I dig you, Pops.” Race waved his glass. “Okle-dokle, it’s a take. Who knows? Maybe he’ll give us a little of that old Southern hospitality—”

His Highness’ hospitality was lavish and unmistakable. There were twenty at table, including Race, Simon, and the principals of the cast. The only representative of the household was a bearded Sikh introduced as his major-domo.

“Actually, Singh commanded the palace guard,” the ruler explained. “But since I am no longer the official ruler of this territory, he too has been deposed. We have bowed to progress, or at least, to governmental decree.”

“They took away your title, huh?” Race paused and emptied his champagne-glass for the fourth time since starting dinner. “I suppose they got to your harem, too.”

“Harem? But I am not a Moslem, my dear fellow.”

The Maharajah was plump, middle-aged, bespectacled, and he wore a conservative grey tweed suit. But his complexion was unmistakably swarthy, and people with unmistakably swarthy complexions didn’t go around calling Race Harmon “my dear fellow.” Even if they did serve damned good champagne.

“Come off it!” he said, holding out his glass for a re-fill. “Everybody knows you rajahs have a ball. I’ll bet the joint is full of—whaddya call ’em?—concubines. Yeah, concubines. That’s the bit.”

“Sorry. I’m afraid I can’t oblige you, Mr. Harmon.”

“Never mind the double-talk,” Race told him. “Bring on the dancing-girls!”

“Devadasi? But they are confined to their temples.”

“So take me to your temple!” Race laughed, then broke off as he realized none of the others were joining in.

Their host stared at an imaginary spot on the table-linen before him. “Perhaps it would be wise, Mr. Harmon, if I explained the customs of my country. Nonbelievers are not welcomed in our places of worship. There is a certain—prejudice, shall we say? You see, there is still ignorance amongst my people. They even resent the notion of a stranger making approaches to an untouchable such as the water-carriers in the village. It would be most embarrassing if an outsider were to exhibit any—any—”

“So you heard about that, eh?” Race waved his glass. “I get the message. Hands off, is that it? Yankee, go home!”

“Please, Mr. Harmon—”

“Never mind. You heard about old Race, huh? That’s why you locked up the harem.”

“I assure you, I have only one wife. At the moment she happens to be in Chandigarh.”

Race grinned. “Sure, sure! Well let me tell you something. Nobody upstages me. And if I want a little poontang. I’m gonna get it, understand?”

“Poontang?”

“What’s the matter, don’t you niggers understand plain English?” Race stood up, ignoring Simon’s frantic gestures. “Ah, forget it. Where’s the head?”

The Maharajah glanced at his major-domo. Race watched them, fuzzily alert for any indication of anger. That’s what he was waiting for; just let the nigger blow his top and he’d really let him have it.

But there was no anger, merely a quiet exchange of glances and a nod. Then the bearded Sikh rose and gestured politely, and Race followed him out of the room and down a long, dim corridor.

For a moment there was silence in the dining-hall behind; then everybody started talking at the same time.

Covering up, Race thought. The civilized bit. Well, if they wanted to be polite to niggers, that was their business. He knew what he wanted to do. What had that snotty spade said about his wife? She was in Chandigarh, whatever the hell that was. And damned lucky, too, because right now, if he could find her—

“Here we are, sir.” The bearded man bowed and stepped aside. Race entered a modern bathroom.

Three minutes later he stood before the mirror, shaking the cold water out of his eyes and towelling off his face. He’d sobered somewhat, just enough to feel a sneaking distaste about rejoining the others in the banquet hall. Maybe the best idea was to just cut out of here.

He stepped into the deserted hall, moving slowly past a row of closed doors. That is, they had all been closed when he’d followed the major-domo. Now one of them was slightly ajar. As he passed he was aware of a heavy, musky scent drifting into the corridor.

Race halted and peered into a darkened room. Moonlight filtered from barred windows. Beneath the windows was a couch. On the couch was a girl. Her sole garment was a sari and she wore no ornaments, but such artifices were unnecessary. She was young and lovely, and when she rose in wide-eyed wonder the sari’s transparency disclosed an undulating outline in the moonlight.

“Hot damn!” Race muttered, as he stepped inside and closed the door behind him.

“Sir—”

The girl moved back towards the couch.

“Sir—”

Race grinned and reached for her.

“Please, sir—it is not permitted. I am untouchable—”

Her knees pressed against the couch and she fell. Race held her there, his hands ripping the soft silk, feeling the incredible warmth of the body beneath. For a moment she writhed in resistance, until his lips found the fiery crater of her mouth, its tongue erupting like molten lava.

“Untouchable, huh, baby?” Race whispered. “Well, we’ll see about that —”

He left her sobbing, without a word. What the hell was there to say? He knew she wouldn't talk, and neither would he. If anybody back at the banquet hall asked where he'd been so long, he'd tell them he got sick, heaved his cookies. Nobody would ask any questions.

But sometime, just before they pulled out of here for good, he'd find a way of letting the big shot know what happened. That uppity nigger thought he was so damned smart, handing out a line of jazz about keeping his hands off all the chicks. It would be a real gasser to see his face when he found out somebody had scored with his wife.

Well, he'd played it cute, but Race had the last laugh. It was all he could do to keep from busting out right now when he walked back into the banquet scene.

He got a real break because nobody even seemed to notice when he came in. They were all standing around some guy in a white suit at the head of the table.

Then the Maharajah looked up and saw him.

"Feeling better, Mr. Harmon?" he asked.

Race nodded, trying to hold back the grin.

"That is good. But if you felt ill, you could consult with Dr, Ghopura here."

Race blinked. "You called a doctor for me?"

"No—it just so happened that he arrived a few moments ago. I asked him to fly in from Bombay."

"It is useless, of course," the little doctor said. "If what you told me is true, the patient will surely die. All I can hope to do is ease the suffering in the terminal phase. I only pray you have kept her isolated."

"Wait a minute!" Race's throat was dry. "Your wife—she's sick—?"

"My wife is in Chandigarh, Mr. Harmon. We are speaking about a poor untouchable from the village whom I discovered the other day. I brought her here immediately to avoid panic and the spread of contagion, for the disease is invariably fatal."

"What disease?"

“Cholera.”

The other shrugged and turned away. “Doctor, if you will come with me, please? Her room is right down the hall—”

Everything started to whirl. Just before he fell. Race thought he saw the Maharajah exchange a smile with his major-domo, but he could not be sure. All he was sure of was the pain flooding his head and throat. It was a hot pain—hot and throbbing, like the mouth and tongue of the untouchable.

The Professor Plays It Square

BUGSY and me are sitting in the lobby of the Cash Inn when this character crawls out of the woodwork.

"Look," Bugsy says. "A cucumber!"

Sure enough, this is a real green specimen—a little old shriveled-up guy with white hair and rimless cheaters. He is carrying an umbrella and wearing a black suit which he probably bought special for President McKinley's funeral.

"Dig the umbrella," Bugsy whispers. "What do you suppose he's lugging that around for?"

"Maybe he thinks the roof leaks," I tell him.

But I have to admit the old party is kind of conspicuous, because the Cash Inn caters to what you might call an exclusive-type clientèle. Meaning normal citizens like Bugsy and me, who don't go in for whacky outfits. For instance, this evening Bugsy is dressed for dinner in an ordinary black-and-white checked suit with matching spats, and I am sort of casual in orange trousers and a green shirt to match the beret.

Most of the other guests in this pad wear pretty much the same kind of duds, so we are a little surprised when this old geezer wanders up to us and makes with the mouth.

"I beg your pardon," he says, "but would you two gentleman happen to be gamblers, by any chance?"

"Not by chance—on purpose," says Bugsy. "What's with you, Dad?"

“Permit me to introduce myself,” the old character mumbles. “I am Professor Ladislaus Glockenspiel, of Parnell University.”

Bugsy gets up and does the honors. “Lay five on me, Pops,” he tells him. “I am Bugsy Roach from Pasadena, and this here is my business associate, Mr. Knuckle-Nose Mahoney.”

“A pleasure,” the Professor says, flipping me some skin. “And where are you from, Mr. Mahoney?”

“A small island just off San Francisco,” I inform him. “I forget the name.”

“But you gentlemen are gamblers, I hope,” he murmurs. “They told me this was a sporting rendezvous.”

“The best in the West,” I say. “Bugsy and me, we always hole up here when we hit town, on account of the homey atmosphere. For instance, if you’re down on your luck, you can always match the desk clerk double or nothing for your room. And see that weighing machine over in the corner of the lobby? If you guess your weight right, it pays off a jackpot in pennies.”

“All the comforts of home,” Bugsy chimes in. “When a guy suffers from insomnia, like I do, it is a great comfort to have a nice big slot-machine right there in your room, so you can get up and try your luck to pass the time away. Also, it is the only hotel I know of that prints the daily race results on the menus.”

“How fascinating!” says the Professor. “You simply must tell me more. And I hope I might have the pleasure of learning about games of chance from you through actual experience.”

“You mean you’d like to play with us?” Bugsy asks. “You’re looking for some action?”

“Precisely,” the Professor answers. “Looking for action—what a picturesque phrase! How idiomatic!”

“Please,” I say. “No insults.”

“I beg your pardon,” the Professor mutters. “I am merely interested in everything pertaining to gambling. The laws of chance have always absorbed me, and I came out here for the express purpose of studying them. I've saved my money for years just to make this trip."

"How much lettuce you got in the patch?" Bugsy wants to know.

The Professor frowns and looks blank.

"He means cabbage," I explain. "Moola. Loot. You got the scratch?"

"I am wearing my winter underwear, gentlemen," the Professor admits. "But—"

"Dough," I tell him. "You loaded?"

"Oh!" He puts a grin on his chin. "Well, I don't exactly have a fortune in my possession. But I thought that with eleven thousand dollars, perhaps I could learn a little something." And he hauls a roll out of his vest pocket.

I look at Bugsy and Bugsy looks at me. Then we both look at the roll. The manager of the Cash Inn passes by and gives us a dirty look, because I guess he does not like to see us drool all over his nice new carpet.

"Professor, you have a real deal," Bugsy tells him. "For eleven grand I think we can promise you that you'll learn a whole lot. And you sure come to the right teachers."

"Wonderful!" the Professor says. "I was hoping I might start tonight, if you're not too busy—"

"Well, we did have a date with a stiff who runs a prayer meeting," I admit. "But he'd probably try to rip the bricks on us, anyway."

"You were going to church?" the Professor asks.

"No," Bugsy explains. "A prayer meeting is a private crap game. A stiff is a guy who's down on his luck. And to rip the bricks means to switch the dice."

"Cheating?" The Professor shakes his head. "I wouldn't want to have anything to do with dishonest players."

"Then stick with us," I tell him. "We'll get up a nice friendly little game of stud poker." I turn to Bugsy. "Let's use your room," I suggest. "How about inviting Nifty Novotny, and Cold-deck Charlie and old Sticky-fingers?"

“Sorry,” Bugsy answers. “Nifty Novotny is still hiding out after that job he pulled in Las Vegas. Cold-deck Charlie is doing five in San Quentin, according to what I hear around town. And old Sticky-fingers has a regular night job, remember? He’s peddling reefers down at the drive- in restaurant.”

“Well, don’t worry,” I say to the Professor. “I’m sure we can find some other good friends of ours who are just as trustworthy. I’ll get on the phone and you go on up to Bugsy’s room and get started with your education.”

Well, the way it turns out, I have no trouble lining up three finks for the game. I choose some small-time operators on purpose, because there is no sense complicating the details by cutting them in. The Professor is our pupil, and we are going to do all the teaching, so we might as well collect the tuition fee.

When the game gets started, we commence learning him things right off. For example, he finds out that a deck of cards is called a devil, and that he is supposed to sit between Bugsy and me when he plays. This is called a cucumber sandwich, but we do not tell him that. We figure there is plenty for him to learn as it is, without bothering his head with such useless information. And believe me, when anybody sits down to play poker between Bugsy and me, such information is useless.

I must say this for Professor Glockenspiel, though—he is an eager student and he does not seem to worry about paying for his lessons.

Right off the bat he spends two hundred bucks to find out that the pair of kings he holds is called a pair of bulls—but does not beat my three fives.

Then he shells out another hunk of dough to discover that aces are called bullets or dreadnaughts, but do not beat the straight Bugsy has in his hand.

After that “we take six hundred clams to demonstrate that aces and eights are the Dead Man’s Hand, and a grand or so to prove that twos are called deuces, and cannot beat a full house. We also teach him never to draw to an inside straight, and finally we demonstrate that four of a kind is better than a flush.

By the time night-school is over, the Professor is out his eleven grand, but we hope he has the satisfaction of being a finished student.

The funny part is, he does seem to be satisfied. When he gets up to leave he is still smiling. “Thank you for a very rewarding experience, gentlemen,” he says. “It is kind of you to put up with an amateur like myself.”

“The pleasure is ours,” Bugsy assures him. “Too bad you don’t have better luck.”

“On the contrary, it is a rewarding experience,” the Professor says. “I have learned far more than I hoped.”

“If you want to try your luck again, be sure to look us up,” Bugsy tells him, as he eases him out the door.

But Professor Glockenspiel shakes his head and sort of sighs. “I doubt if I shall have the opportunity,” he says. “My losses tonight represent the savings of twenty years.”

“What if you won?” I want to know.

“Odd that you should ask me,” he answers. “I was hoping to increase my capital to endow Parnell University with a special chair.”

“You can buy a mighty fancy chair for eleven grand,” Bugsy says. “Maybe even gold-plated.”

“I am referring to a chair of research,” the Professor tells him. “The University refuses to allow me funds to pursue my hobby, so I thought I might win enough to institute a teaching department of my own. But apparently fortune is not with me.”

“Tough,” I say. “But if you do get hold of any more geedus, we’ll be around. Always glad to show you a little action.”

Then we say good night, and Bugsy and I salute the loot.

“A big score,” he grins. “The kind you hit once in a lifetime. Why the mark does not even give us any grief with a beef. Too bad he is cleaned out.”

“Let’s stick around a few days,” I suggest. “Maybe he will wire home for money.”

"What can we lose?" Bugsy agrees. So we stay over at the Cash Inn, and for the next couple of afternoons we go out to the track to play the bangtails and for the next few nights we watch the wheels go around at the tables.

And sure enough, on the third evening the Professor shows up in the lobby again. He has a friend with him—a tall, skinny kid with a crewcut like a worn-out welcome mat. Regular Joe College type, horn-rimmed glasses and all.

The Professor comes right over and lays on the introduction. "This is Oswald Fing," he says. "One of my star pupils from Parnell University. He is out here on vacation, and I told him how royally you gentlemen entertained me the other evening. He is anxious for a little session."

Bugsy and I stare at the square, and then Bugsy gets the Professor over in a corner. "You know how luck is," he whispers. "Can he afford to lose?"

The Professor winks at him. "The young man is, as you say, loaded. And I was wondering, if I brought him to you gentlemen for a game, if I might venture to claim a share of the—er—profits. I shall not be participating in the session myself, you understand. I am merely—what is the term?—a steerer."

Bugsy shakes his head. "Naughty, naughty!" he says. "But I see you learn fast. And I think we can cut you in. Shall we say one-third?"

"Fair enough," the Professor agrees. "Now, can you find a few other players for the evening? I would suggest you select some rather substantial investors."

Bugsy tips me off and I round up Big Mike Rafferty and Philadelphia Phil, two of the largest operators in these parts. There is no sense telling them what is going to happen—it is going to be a little secret between Bugsy, the Professor and me.

This time we play in my room, which has the advantage of being soundproof. Something tells me this kid Oswald Fing may not be as good a loser as the Professor, and I do not wish to disturb the neighbors with his cries of anguish when we lay it on him.

Right away we explain to him that this game calls for a bit of action, as Big Mike Rafferty and Philadelphia Phil do not indulge for peanuts, and Bugsy and me have eleven grand to work with, plus another four of our own to feed to the kitty.

Oswald Fing looks at the Professor and shakes his head. “You did not tell me the stakes are so high,” he says. “And I know absolutely nothing about poker.”

“Don’t worry about a thing,” the Professor answers. “I can assure you, you’ll learn in a hurry with these able instructors.” Then he smiles at Oswald Fing and winks at me, and the game starts.

That is the last smile anybody sees around the table from then on. Because something funny happens to the game.

Oh, Oswald Fing doesn’t know anything about poker—that is easy enough to see from the start. He cannot even call his hands, but merely lays them down and lets the Professor do the talking.

The trouble is, he lays down nothing but winning hands.

Instead of sticking in every pot, the way the Professor does the other night, he drops out half the time. But whenever he does stay, he has the cards.

If I draw three tens, he sticks on three jacks. If Bugsy holds a straight, Oswald has a flush. If Big Mike Rafferty or Philadelphia Phil catch full houses, there is Oswald with four of a kind.

Either he has a sure thing or he folds. Not once does he call without the top hand, and not once does he bluff. Rafferty and Phil find that out the hard way, and I figure they blow about twenty grand before they have enough. Then they get up and leave.

This suits me fine, because I know now that something is very much haywire, and I tip Bugsy the nod. This means we get down to business with a new deck. This new deck happens to be one of Bugsy’s specials.

We bring it into play, and all at once the kid jumps up.

“Not that deck!” he says.

“What do you mean?” I ask. “Are you incinerating that we’d cheat?”

“Yes, dear boy,” the Professor chimes in. “Don’t you trust these gentlemen?”

“Call it a hunch,” Oswald says. “I want the other deck.”

So there is nothing to do but bring back the old deck and hope for the best. I look at Bugsy’s pile and my own and figure we have maybe six grand left between us—from all the dough we won the other night plus our own. We will have to sweat it out.

And the next hand that comes up brings out the old perspiration in a hurry. I find myself sitting with aces back to back. As the cards go around, I cop a third bullet. I bet it up and Bugsy drops. Oswald stays, showing a straight in the works.

On the seventh card I catch the fourth ace. That’s when I shoot the works.

Oswald sees me—and raises.

I give Bugsy a peek at my hand and he grunts. Then he shoves the rest of his chips over to me. I call.

And Oswald lays down his straight. Only it is a straight flush, king high.

I am busted.

Also, I am pretty angry. In fact, I am just about to get up and reach for a heater which I happen to have laying around in the top drawer under my socks, when the Professor stops me.

“Sit down,” he says. “I think I have what you’re looking for.”

Sure enough, he holds a big equalizer in his hand, but he is not giving it to me—merely pointing.

“Hey, what’s the big idea?” Bugsy wants to know.

“You sit down, too,” the Professor suggests. “I believe I am holding what you call a Harlem hand.” He grins. “You see, I have done a bit of studying on my own, gentlemen.”

We sit there and watch while Oswald Fing counts up his winnings.

“Forty thousand dollars,” he announces. “You were right, Professor.”

“Of course I was,” the Professor tells him. “I have the utmost confidence in my hunches. And in yours.”

“You can’t cheat us—” Bugsy snarls. “This isn’t cheating,” the Professor says. “So let us have no more of that kind of talk. And I suggest you gentlemen remain seated until after we have left, or else I shall be forced to ventilate your ventricles.”

I do not understand this jive, but the gun tells me all I wish to know. So I sit there until they walk out, and Bugsy keeps me company.

Afterwards we are too weak to get up. Besides, being broke, there is no place for us to go.

I guess the Professor and his pupil check out the same night. Anyway, the next day they are gone. Bugsy and I stick around, hoping we can raise the dough to pay our hotel bill.

We are still there a week later, and we are still arguing about what happens. We can’t figure out why Oswald wins that way.

Not until one afternoon when Big Mike Rafferty comes up to us with a New York paper in his hand. “Here,” he says. “Read about your friends.” I sneak a peek at a little item on page 5. It tells me all I want to know:

> PROFESSOR ENDOWS UNIVERSITY CHAIR
>
> Professor Ladislaus Glockenspiel has just endowed Parnell University with a $40,000 Chair of Parapsychology. He will use the money to continue his research in ESP, or extrasensory perception.
>
> Readers may recall his experiments with student subjects; among them, Oswald Fing, who amazes experts by running through a pack of ordinary playing cards and calling them off correctly 52 times out of 52.
>
> When questioned as to the source of his funds, Professor Glockenspial said he had recently received contributions from philanthropists in the West.

That’s what the article says, and I don’t pretend I understand it all. I don’t dig this “Parapsychology” or this “extrasensory perception” bit, either.

Only one thing I’m sure of—“philanthropists.” That’s just another word for a couple of suckers. Meaning Bugsy and me.

Wheel and Deal

HARRIGAN arrived at work around nine o’clock. It was a Monday morning and he was dull-eyed and draggy-tailed, but as usual he brightened considerably when he surveyed his kingdom.

The big showroom was immaculate, and the huge lot next door looked imposing, with its row of used models. But best of all he liked the signs and banners which proclaimed his rule over the domain.

HAPPY HARRIGAN
King of the Auto-Erotics
NEW AND USED FEMALES
ALL MAKES
“WE’RE TRADING WILD!”

Harrigan squared his shoulders proudly and marched into his private office. There was a young punk sitting there, and for a minute Harrigan gave him his customer-smile, until he remembered who the fellow was. Phil Thompson, that was his name; Harrigan had hired him on Saturday as a new salesman.

“Ready to hit the ball, eh?” he said. “That’s good. Suppose the first thing I ought to do is show you around the place.”

The punk stood up. “Gee, that’d be great, Mr. Harrigan.”

“Call me Happy—everybody does,” Harrigan told him, deftly popping an ulcerizor into his mouth. “Most important thing to remember is that we're all friends here, Phil. This is a friendly business. That's something we tell all our customers. We don't just sell females—we sell service."

Phil nodded and trailed him out of the office and across the showroom.

"Which reminds me," Harrigan murmured, over his shoulder. "When I hired you Saturday you said you didn't have much experience with females."

"I was just thinking of the mechanical end," Phil explained. "But like I told you, I've always been crazy about 'em, ever since I was a kid. Used to spend all my time monkeying around with my Dad's—"

Harrigan nodded absently. 'Well, you don't have to worry about that part of it," he said. "Take a look back here—we've got six skilled medics always on the job. We service all types of females ourselves." He led the youngster into the noisy recesses of the big room behind the showroom, where frowning medics and harried grease-monkeys busied themselves with an imposing array of auto-erotics. Some of the models were only partially assembled, and some were undergoing extensive overhauling.

Harrigan gestured at a group clustered around a rack and raised his voice over the clangor which attended their efforts.

"Working on an old 69 model," he shouted. "Complete hysterectomy."

"You're really thorough, aren't you?" Phil commented.

"Have to be. You know our policy. Every female that goes out of here carries a six months' written guarantee."

Harrigan walked back into the showroom and the young man followed.

Brice, the senior salesman, was working on a customer—a dignified old geezer, all haunch, paunch and jowl. They were inspecting one of the new 75s; a stunning, streamlined brunette with a forward look. "Let me open her up for you," Brice was saying. "Here, just take a peek at her chassis. She's really built for performance. Auto-erotic transmission, just push a button to select your speed, all the attachments including a voice-tape and a built-in heater. This baby is loaded! And take a look at that rear end! She's got the biggest bustle on the market today."

“Well, I don’t know,” the old geezer muttered. “Could I get the same thing in a blonde?”

“Anything you like. Platinum, redhead, all the two-tone combinations—”

“Maybe I’d better bring my wife in and let her decide,” the customer said. “She’s kind of got her heart set on a convertible.”

“Convertible, eh?” The salesman winked and nudged him. “We can put an attachment in this baby in no time.”

Harrigan pulled Phil to one side and lowered his voice to a whisper. “Just wanted you to get a load of the way we sell ‘em in here,” he explained. “But you’re a long way from working the floor with new models. I’m gonna start you outside. It takes a special know-how to deal with blue chip customers.”

He grabbed Phil’s arm and ushered him out the rear exit. “Notice how Brice was handling that guy?” he asked. “Giving him the old pride-of-ownership routine. Never even mentioned the price. With those customers, money doesn’t mean a thing. They just buy to show off. You can tell by looking at him that he won’t be using his model more’n once a week, if that often. Probably the kind who just sits in the bedroom and turns over the motor.”

Harrigan blinked in the bright sunlight and popped another ulcerizor into his mouth.

“You won’t be working in there, like I said, but it’s important you get to know something about the kind of customers we deal with. That’s the biggest thing in salesmanship—you’ve got to be able to spot your customer the minute he walks in.

“Now take that character we just saw. He’s the conspicuous-consumption type. All he’s interested in is having the biggest, newest, flashiest, most expensive female in town. What the hell does he care about how much it costs; probably has a deal worked out where all his females are company-owned. He trades in and gets a new model every year, fast as they come out. And don’t think the manufacturers aren’t wise to him—that’s why they keep putting on more and more fancy paint jobs and bigger and wider bustles. You and I know a big bustle is just a damned nuisance; it doesn't add anything to the performance of a model or the pleasure you get out of her, and neither do those big bumpers up front. But that's what these kinds of customers want."

"Are they all like that?" Phil inquired.

"Well, most of them. One in a while we get somebody off the street who's just interested in a strip-job, but we don't make any dough off a naked model. We're out to load 'em good in the new showroom, so we discourage those characters. Let 'em go down the street to the Leering Irishman."

"What about sports models?"

"Floosies? Never touch 'em. We sell one-owner deals only. None of these souped-up specials." Harrigan chewed his lip. "But that's a big business, too. The sports model customer is an odd bird. He's got his own way of showing off. He keeps talking about speed and thrills. With him, it's all a matter of a fast start and a lot of noise. Actually, he usually gets less pleasure out of what he buys than the old codgers. But he talks a good game."

Harrigan prodded the younger man in the chest. "There's a couple of other types you should learn to recognize, too," he said. "The real show-offs. Guys so rich they can't stand owning anything but a foreign model. Real fancy stuff—voice-tapes with accents, yet, and all kinds of special French attachments." He sighed. "But the richest ones of all are worse yet. You know what they go in for? Old models, that's what. Whole fleets of 'em! They're queer for anything with a universal shift—not to use, just to look at. They'll pay a fortune for some antique, give her a face-lift, new paint, rub her up for hours on end. I dunno, some psych told me it was sort of a motor-complex."

He shrugged and dismissed the subject as they strolled over towards the big lot with its glaring banners waving in the wind.

OKAY USED FEMALES

Guaranteed Clean—One-Owner
YOU MUST BE SATISFIED OR IT'S NO DEAL

"Here's where you'll be starting," Harrigan said. "Think you can handle it?"

Young Phil glanced nervously around the lot. Almost sixty models were lined up on display, in neat rows, each chained to a post. Some were old, some were almost brand new, but all were bright and shiny: eye-lights sparkling, teeth gleaming, bodies newly painted.

Harrigan ran his hand appreciatively along the flank of a brownette 74. "Take this baby, for example," he said. "A real creampuff. When we get in a number like this, we call it an executive model. That's the thing to tell the customers—she's just like a new one, except that you don't have to break her in. Here." He reached over and stuck his key into the ignition. "Why don't you see for yourself how she handles."

The model began to purr and vibrate.

"No, I couldn't, not out here—"

"Well, take her into one of the testing booths, then. We always give the customer a trial spin."

Harrigan squinted at Phil. "Hey, you look kind of pale. What's the matter?"

"Nothing. It's just that—"

"Now wait a minute. I thought you told me you had some mechanical experience."

"I did. That is, sort of. I mean, you know how kids are—"

"Don't hand me that. I'll bet you never had a model in your life. Probably your old man wouldn't let you play with anything but an Erector set."

"But he owned—"

"I know what he owned." Harrigan looked grim. "He bought a junker, didn't he? Souped it up, restyled her, like one of those hot-rodder jobs.

Come clean, kid—you've never operated a real model at all."

Phil was blushing. "Guess you're right, Mr. Harrigan," he admitted. "My Dad was kind of old-fashioned, you know. When Mom died, he didn't even want to get us a utility model to do the cooking and housework."

"You got a nerve coming around here and bracing me for a job."

"Well, I just figured—"

"I know what you figured. You thought you could make a fast buck here." Harrigan gripped his arm roughly. "Well, you can. Believe me, kid, you can! Only not unless you change your attitude. What the hell, you'd think we were running some kind of illegal racket or something. Wake up, kid—this is the twenty-first century! The auto-erotic industry is the biggest business in the country.

"Let me tell you something else, son. You're just lucky to be alive today and have such an opportunity. You've read your history-tapes. How'd you like to have been born a hundred years ago, when the bombs were knocking out the country? Or maybe even a few years before that, when there were a hundred and eighty million people around, three times as many as now? Think of it—a hundred and eighty million slobs, jamming all the cities, crowding the streets and highways with their lousy, stinking automobiles?

"The Good Old Days, huh? What a laugh that was! Why, the first model hadn't been invented yet. A young fellow like you wouldn't be able to afford more than one flesh- and-blood female, and you'd work like a dog all your life just trying to support her. No extras, no new models, no trade-in, nothing! I'm not knocking flesh females, now, don't get me wrong—I've had a wife myself for fifteen years and we get along together swell. But think of what kind of a life it would be if that's all I had. Or all you had. Knocking yourself out just to keep body and soul together in some crummy sales job."

Harrigan paused, then spoke solemnly. "Just think about this for a minute, kid. You know what you'd probably be doing if you were alive back in the twentieth century? You'd be selling automobiles, that's what. How'd you like that, huh? Imagine being a car salesman—preying on the vanity of a bunch of old men and rich snobs, or swindling some poor guy out of his last buck with a used clunker.

"Just thank God you've got a chance to get into an honest line of business, where you can give the customer some real service and an honest return for his money."

"I never thought of it that way," Phil murmured.

"Well, you think about it now," Harrigan told him. "I'm going back to my office. You make up your mind what you're going to do. If you want to try the job out, you can start right away. If not, you can shove off. It's up to you."

"I—I think maybe I'll give it a whirl."

"Suit yourself." Harrigan started walking away. "But remember one thing—you have to change your attitude. In this business we wheel and deal, understand?"

He continued on into his office, without looking back. For an hour or so he busied himself at his desk, and it was almost noon when he strolled out onto the Used Model lot again.

There was young Phil, over in the corner, looming over a battered blonde 70 model that Harrigan remembered picking up from a one-day rental service. He had removed the covering from the nylon hair and he was gesturing earnestly to a small, rabbity-looking man who had all the earmarks of a hesitant customer. Harrigan could hear his vibrant voice even at a distance.

"Book value?" Phil was saying. "Never mind about the book value. This one doesn't use any oil at all. I happen to know about this baby, Mister. You see, she belonged to an elderly school teacher, and he only used to take her out on Sundays—"

Mr. Harrigan smiled and quietly tiptoed away.

The Old College Try

When Alfred Hitchcock brought Robert Bloch's bloodfreezing Psycho to the screen a few seasons back the public reaction was fabulous. The film became one of the biggest money-makers in cinema history—and Bloch, the versatile veteran who had been rapping out stories since January of 1935 (when his first pro effort was published in Weird Tales) suddenly found that he was "an overnight success." In 1960 he moved from Weyauwega, Wisconsin to Hollywood, where he has become an extremely busy scripter for most of the leading TV shows (and for various film studios). Bob has always been a clever, prolific purveyor of fantasy, suspense and of sf yarns which now total, "something over 500." Add to this seven mystery novels and 39 radio scripts (for his own show, Stay Tuned for Terror) and one begins to get the overall picture. Bloch won a "Hugo" at the World Science Fiction Convention for one of his stories—but his most famous short remains the oft-anthologized chiller Yours Truly, Jack the Ripper. As a youth, Bob dreamed of becoming a vaudeville comic, and his special gift for verbal comedy has won him a place (alongside Anthony Boucher and Forrest Ackerman) as "most in demand" for toastmaster at regional and world sf conventions. A fanatic student of the silent film era, Bloch can regale you by the hour with anecdotes from Hollywood's Yesterday—and he seems to know, by heart, the cast of every silent ever produced. For years, Bob earned his bread-and-circus money in an advertising agency, but quit to full-time it at the typewriter in 1954. As a dedicated fan of H.P. Lovecraft, Bob imitated the style of the master for many years—then began creating his own unique brand of terror. For

Gamma 2, he introduces the Yorl, a race of aliens who seem to favor fun and games—so long as the rules they play by are definitely their own.

Administrator Raymond's head was a hive of hornets. He could feel them buzzing in his brain, and before opening his eyes he held out his hand.

The Yorl, who had probably been crouching at his bedside for the past hour, thrust a glass of Aspergin into his shaking fingers. Administrator Raymond gulped it down, and gradually his fingers ceased twitching. The buzzing died away inside his skull and he was able to open his eyes.

The blue-skinned little Yorl smiled at him and said, "Goo morning, Minstrata," then bowed as he offered Raymond his undergarments.

Raymond wondered just how much longer the Yorl would continue to bow if he knew that this was the last day. The new Administrator was arriving, and soon Raymond would go home—back to Vega and civilization. It would be good to see a normal world again—a world where grass was an honest pink and the birds snarled sweetly all the day.

Yet he rather regretted leaving Yorla. He even regretted leaving the Yorls. After five years on Yorla, Administrator Raymond was oddly fond of them.

Puffing a trifle, Raymond struggled into his uniform.

"Ship has land!" Another Yorl came scuttling in, as usual, without bothering to knock. He grinned up at Raymond. "Bringa pinky."

"Pinky". That's what the Yorls called humans. He must be referring to the new Administrator.

"You go back, tell him I'll be right down," Raymond instructed. The Yorl messenger withdrew, and the other Yorl gave Raymond a shave, a shoeshine, and another glass of Aspergin, in that order.

Then Raymond waddled downstairs to greet the new Administrator.

He found him standing on his hands in the center of the floor.

"Greetings," he called, from his upside-down position. "You must be Raymond, eh? I'm Philip."

“Pleased to meet you,” Raymond said, wondering if he ought to advance and shake Philip by the foot.

“Excuse the informality,” Philip said. “Just trying to get back a little circulation. Long trip, and the decompression effect is a bother.”

Raymond nodded, staring at the newcomer. Philip upside-down or Philip horizontal was still a remarkably handsome young man with a superabundance of muscles. His smile radiated enthusiastic vitality.

Philip bounded to his feet, healthily flushed, and held out his hand to Raymond. His grip was as hearty as his voice.

“Good to see you,” he said. “By the way, Captain Rand sends regrets. There was a slight mishap when we landed—something went wrong with the auxiliary grav-mech. I don’t understand the technical side, but I’m afraid he and the crew are in for about a week of repairs here before they can take off on a return flight.”

“A week:?”

Philip shrugged. “I know how you feel,” he said. “But speaking selfishly, I’m glad of the delay. In a week you can brief me on this post.”

Raymond turned and beckoned to his waiting Yorl. “Two Aspergins, hup-hup!”

As the Yorl nodded and backed out of the room, Philip shook his head. “Nothing for me, thanks. Never touch the stuff.”

“Better learn,” Raymond advised. “This is a fever-planet.”

“I’ll manage,” Philip said, confidently. “They gave me all the new shots before I left. Besides, I’ve never been sick a day in my life.” He paused, waiting until the Yorl had disappeared, then lowered his voice. “Odd creatures, aren’t they?”

“You get used to them,” Raymond said. “They make wonderful servants. There’s a post staff here of twenty—they’ll bathe you, dress you, brush your teeth for you if you like. And they actually enjoy working for a pinky. That’s what they call us, you know. It’s easier than slaving in the mines. You’ll find them faithful and loyal if you treat them decently. Once you get used to the blue skins and the language, and accept their customs—”

Philip sat down, cracking his knuckles. “Their customs,” he said. “Do you know how they met me when the ship landed? They came running out waving their spears. And on the tip of each spear was a head.”

“They meant to do you honor,” Raymond explained. “I told them a new Administrator would be arriving. So they got up a group to welcome you and brought out their trophies for display.”

“Trophies? You mean they’re actually head-hunters?”

“Of course not. They prize heads, and preserve them, but they don’t go around killing one another just to collect more.

“Then where do the heads come from?”

“Well, as you know, most of the Yorl work in our mines. The labor is hard and they don’t particularly enjoy it, but they like our trade-goods. So much so that when the Yorl chiefs made their agreements with Interplan, they set up a quota. Every Yorl who signs up for mining is obliged to produce a set amount of ore. If a Yorl fails to meet his quota, if he’s caught shirking—his companions merely chop off his head.”

“I should think something would be done about policing them.”

“Meaning I should have done something as Administrator?” Philip flushed but made no effort to deny the words.

Raymond sighed. “Maybe I felt the same way when I arrived here, five years ago. Since then I’ve learned a lot. They have their own laws. Remember, Interplan sent us here to administrate. It is not our duty to superimpose our own concepts or customs on this planet. Besides, the system works. We want what the mines produce. The Yorls see that we get it. They eliminate their own slackers and misfits, weed out their own criminals.”

“But it’s not right! In the name of common humanity—”

Raymond sighed again. “The Yorls are not humans. They are humanoid, That’s the one thing you must never forget.”

A Yorl bowed his way into the room.

“Affanoon, Ministrata,” he said. Philip glanced at Raymond, who nodded briefly. “That’s right, it is afternoon. You’re going to have to accustom yourself to the shorter days here.” He turned and confronted the York “What is it?”

“You come long forgo, this night, we hold koodoo, your honna.”

“He’s inviting us down to the village here for a party,” Raymond explained.

“You come long?”

“We’ll be there.”

“Yaya!” The Yorl grinned happily. “Much fun!”

It may have been much fun according to Yorl standards, and it may have been much fun for Raymond, but Philip didn’t enjoy the koodoo a bit.

He sat there on the dias, sweltering in the heat of the warm night, and watched the dancers with a strained smile on his face. The pounding of the drums made his head ache. Then there had been the banquet, and the nauseous concoctions he had to pretend to sample. Raymond didn’t seem to mind—but then, he kept washing down his food with Aspergin.

Philip didn’t like the setup at all. They were savages, and no amount of talking would change the fact. Dancing in a huge circle of spears set up in the sand—with each spear surmounted by the preserved and grinning head of a Yorl, the grins on the faces of the living dancers seemed even worse.

Now the dancers had separated into two groups; male and female. They formed two lines, facing one another, and the drums beat in a quickening tempo. The lines advanced, converged, and then the drums went frantic. And now the dance was no longer a dance. It was a mass orgy. Why, they were actually—

“Raymond!” Philip whispered. “Look! Aren’t you going to stop them?”

“I told you they have their own customs. This is being done in our honor.”

“Disgusting!” Philip rose abruptly.

“Natural.” Raymond blinked. “Where are you going?”

“Back to my quarters. I’m afraid I’m not up to this sort of thing.” He moved away. The older man didn’t catch up to him until they reached the Administration Building.

“Come back,” Raymond wheezed. “You can’t do this. You’re insulting them by walking out.”

“Insulting them? What did you expect me to do, get down there and wallow with them?”

“You’re angry? Now look, son, let me explain a few things to you about —”

“Never mind. I’ve heard some of your explanations. And I’m afraid the Company reports are right. Interplan gave me specific orders to come out here and clean up the situation—”

“Situation? What situation?” Philip hesitated, then took a deep breath. “I’m sorry I mentioned it, but perhaps it’s better that you know just where you stand. They know about you, Raymond. They know how you’ve been running this operation, and they don’t approve of it any more than I do. Lording it over the natives like one of those colonial governors in prehistoric days back on Earth.

“In five years you’ve made no attempt to educate them, no attempt to institute reforms, no attempt to provide them with decent government, decent standards of living. Instead of setting an example for them, you’ve merely sunk to their level.”

“Now wait a minute—”

“I’m not waiting a minute! Starting tomorrow, I’ll take over. Officially. You’ll stay here until Captain Rand completes his work on the ship, but from now on I’m in charge.”

“It isn’t that simple. I know the Yorls, I understand them. You can’t change them overnight.” Raymond blinked at him with his reddened eyes. “They’re entitled to their own way of life, their liberty.”

“Liberty isn’t license.”

“You don’t understand.”

“Oh, yes I do, only too well. Administration and Aspergin don’t mix. I advise you to go to bed and sleep it off.”

Philip turned on his heel and marched down the corridor to his room.

He wasn’t worried. He’d told off Raymond, and now he’d get to work on the Yorls. Tomorrow was the time to start. And the first and most important thing to do was to put an end to the headchopping. No more heads on pikes.

Tomorrow, then.

Raymond was somewhat agreeably surprised to see Philip join him at the breakfast table. He was even more surprised to note that the young man appeared in a conciliatory mood.

“I don’t want you to misunderstand me,” Philip told him. “I know as well as you do that there is no sense in trying to run roughshod over the feelings of the natives. The answer lies in the psychological approach. It’s all a matter of channelizing their aggressions.”

“Huh?” Raymond blinked.

“You tell me the Yorl only take heads of slackers, wrong-doers, inefficient workers. So I infer that they’re always on the lookout for someone who breaks the rules.”

“That’s right. Every Yorl keeps a close watch on the activities of his fellow-workers. It’s a sort of wholesale espionage system, you might say.”

“In other words, they compete with one another to detect possible victims.”

“You might say that.”

Philip nodded. “Now, if I can provide harmless substitute outlets for their competitive instincts, I’ll soon have them functioning normally.”

“How?” Raymond murmured.

Philip smiled again. “Wait and see,” he said.

Raymond waited, and three days later, he saw.

To be specific, it was three evenings later when Philip came to his office and invited him down to the torga. It was unusually hot, and Raymond chose to be transported in a litter, borne by four Yorls.

He couldn’t imagine where the younger man got his energy from, but there he was, hopping around like one possessed, making last-minute arrangements in the big clearing before the huts. He kept jumping in and out of the ring—

Ring.

“Wait a minute,” Raymond murmured. “Don’t tell me you’re planning a boxing match?”

“Exactly!” Philip beamed happily. “I’ve conferred with the villagers here and they seem quite excited. They donated their services to put up the ring, and I’ve had the females weaving gloves out of ritan. There were no end of volunteers for contestants, after I explained the procedure. I’ve coached the two we finally selected, and I think they’ll put on a great show. See, they’re assembling right now.”

And they were. The blue-skinned little humanoids had gathered on all four sides of the improvised ring, squatting on the ground and staring up expectantly as the Yorl fighters made their way to their respective comers. Philip, clad in a sweat-shirt and shorts, climbed through the strands of the porga serving as ropes. He was obviously serving as referee, and a whistle dangled from a cord around his neck. He conferred briefly with each of the contestants, and the little blue boxers nodded and grinned up at him in turn.

Then there was a roll of drums and Philip came forward to the center of the ring, lifting his hands for silence. He spoke very briefly about the rules of the coming contest, and the virtues of the manly art of self-defense. This, he declared, would be a clean fight, demonstrating the finest principles of sportsmanship. And now, at the drum-signal—

It came.

Philip stepped back.

The Yorls rushed out from their respective comers.

The crowd yelled.

The Yorls exchanged expert blows.

The crowd screamed.

The taller Yorl hit his opponent below the belt.

Philip stepped forward hastily.

The smaller Yorl brought his knee up and kicked the other fighter in the chin.

Philip blew his whistle.

The Yorls paid no attention. Perhaps they couldn’t even hear the whistle above the shrieks of the audience. At any rate, they went into a clinch. Both of them were kicking at one another’s groins. They had shed their gloves.

Philip waved, frantically, then tried to separate them. The Yorls put their heads down and kicked harder. Then, suddenly, they were rolling around on the floor of the ring. The smaller Yorl ended up on top of his opponent. He got his hands around the windwipe and squeezed.

“Stop!” Philip shouted. “You’re killing him!”

The little Yorl on top nodded, grinning happily. He released one hand, then dug Iris fingers into his victim’s eyes.

And then Raymond climbed into the ring. He helped Philip pull the Yorl off the prostrate body of his opponent, and he said something to quiet the crowd and disperse them.

Afterwards he walked Philip back to Administration in tire darkness.

“But I don’t understand,” Philip kept saying, “I don’t understand!

I offered them a logical outlet for sublimation—”

“Maybe they don’t want to sublimate,” Raymond said. “Maybe they can’t.”

“But the principles of psychology—”

“—apply to human beings,” Raymond finished for him. “Not necessarily to Yorls.”

“I’m not licked yet,” Philip declared. “I know the idea is sound. Sport is the best substitute for actual combat. It always works.”

They entered the office. Raymond turned to him. “Can’t you realize the Yorls don’t believe in substitutes? Why should they, when they can have the real thing?”

“The real thing,” Philip murmured. “Of course! That’s the answer! Nobody accepts a substitute when the real thing is available. But if the real thing is not available any longer, then perhaps they will learn to cooperate.”

“If you’ve got any wild ideas,” said Raymond. “I advise you to forget them.”

Philip shook his head. “No wild ideas. Just common sense. You did me a great favor tonight, Raymond. I won’t forget it.”

He turned and headed for his room. Raymond headed for the Aspergin.

It was almost two hours later when Raymond finally sought his own bed. He was pleasantly tired, pleasantly tipsy, and pleasantly unaware of the faint glow and the faint cries from outside his window.

Not until the Yorl came running in did he open his eyes and sit up.

“What’s the matter?” he muttered.

“You come,” the Yorl panted. “Come to torga, fast!”

“Why?”

The Yorl’s blue-veined eyeballs rolled. “Otha Ministrata there. He burn heads!”

“Damn!” Raymond rose, thrusting out his feet as the Yorl brought his shoes. He fumbled in the rear of a drawer, looking for the needier he never carried. It felt cold and heavy in his hand as he followed the Yorl down the path, running in the direction of the torga.

The faint glow had flared into flame now, and the cries rose to a chattering crescendo as Raymond entered the clearing.

The Yorl had told the truth.

Philip had waited until the village was quiet, then crept from hut to hut. He’d gathered the spears, harvested the heads, heaped them like ripe melons in a central pile at the end of the clearing, and ignited them. They were blazing furiously now—but not half as furiously as the Yorls themselves.

Philip stood before the fire, needier in hand, facing them defiantly. The Yorls confronted him in a body, screeching and howling, waving their spears. And they were edging forward—

“Get back!” Philip shouted. “I’m not going to harm you! This is for your own good, don’t you see? It is wrong to take heads. It is wrong to kill.”

Raymond made out the words vaguely through the tumult. He doubted if the Yorls could hear or understand, and even if they did, it meant nothing to them. Because they kept inching forward, closer and closer . . .

A spear whizzed past Philip’s head.

He didn't run. He faced the Yorl who had hurled the spear; faced the weaponless little blue humanoid and pressed the tip of his needier.

There was a faint crackling sound and the silvery flash of the energy-arc. The Yorl fell, shrivelling and blackening before he hit the ground.

A great sigh arose from the crowd, and then a hundred arms were raised, a hundred spears went back.

And halted.

Halted, as the pyre of heads hissed suddenly, then disappeared in a black billow.

Raymond had tossed water on the fire.

Everyone turned as he stepped forward and grasped Philip by the arm. They watched as he took the needier from Philip's hand and hurled it into the center of the dying blaze. They watched as he tossed his own weapon on the ground.

Raymond raised his arms over his head.

"I am truly sorry," he murmured. "A wrong has been done, but it shall never be repeated. We ask to go in peace."

Silently, he led Philip away into the darkness.

It was already afternoon of the following day when Philip reentered the office. Raymond looked up expectantly.

"Started your packing?" he asked, casually.

"I'm not quitting. Why should I?"

"You mortally offended the Yorls. You violated the great taboo. You killed one of their leaders."

Philip shook his head again. "It was self-defense," he said. "As for what I did, it was right."

"According to your standards, yes. But the Yorls—"

"Look at him!"

Philip levelled his finger at the comer. A Yorl servant crouched there, his blue face ashen, his eyes bulging in terror as Philip stared at him.

Philip smiled. "Don't you see? He's afraid of me now. They all are, after last night. I didn't realize it at the time, but I'd done the one thing necessary.

By putting on end to this head fetishism, by destroying their trophies, I proved that a human is stronger than their whole barbaric culture."

"But they hate you now—"

"Nonsense! They hated me last night, and I'm quite sure that after we left they got together and prayed for my destruction. I don't pretend to understand their superstitions, but I'll bet they expected their gods to destroy me with a bolt of flame. So when I went down to the village today, it came as quite a shock to see me alive and healthy."

"You went back to the village again?"

"I've just come from there." Philip glanced carelessly at the Yorl, who cringed. "That's the reaction I got from all of them. Nobody dared to harm me, nobody dared to speak. I summoned them out and laid down the law. From now on, no more taking of heads. The mines will be operated efficiently on the basis of my orders, and on the threat of my punishment."

Raymond scratched his head. "But you were the one who objected to my colonialism, as you called it! I thought you didn't like this business of having servants, or ordering them around."

"I don't," Philip answered. "Not when it's just a matter of selfish personal comfort. But this is different. We're dealing with fundamentals here. In order to bring civilization and sanity one must issue orders and enforce them." Raymond sighed. "What about the sports?" he asked, softly. "I suppose this isn't important any more under the new regime?" Philip smiled. "If you're indulging in sarcasm, spare the effort," he replied. "It so happens that I've no intention of abandoning the program. The natives will need outlets for aggression. And as I said then, once their old outlets are gone, they will embrace the new much more willingly. As they are doing now."

"Now?"

"Yes. I issued instructions to the villagers. They are laying out a football field."

"Football?"

"Of course. I really should have thought of it first, instead of this silly boxing business. Football is the natural sport. Calls for team-participation, allows substitute activity to a much greater number at one time. It's the ideal sublimation—a rough body-contact sport, and it's a great vicarious outlet for the spectators, too. I'll organize their teams and instruct them. They're bright enough, in their way. A few skull-practice sessions, a little actual training, and you'll see. By tomorrow I expect we can raise the goal-posts."

"Please, you're making a mistake. I can't stand by and watch you do this."

"Not necessary." Philip laughed again. "I keep forgetting you won't be around to observe the results. The ship leaves in three days." He turned. "Well, I'll not keep you. I expect you'll want to get on with your packing."

Raymond didn't want to get on with it, but he did. During the next two days he saw nothing of Philip. If he was organizing and coaching his teams, there was no sign. Raymond made no effort to visit the torga or to inspect the playing field behind it. He packed, and he drank incredible amounts of Aspergin.

On the night before the day of departure, Raymond suddenly felt very old, and very tired. He leaned back in his chair, hands folded over his fat paunch.

And it was there that the Yorl found him.

"Goo evening, Ministrata. You come now?"

"Come where?"

"See game."

"Game? You mean you're playing football already?"

"Tha ri'. Foo ball game now. Your honna."

"All right. Just for a little while." Raymond rose, fighting fatigue and the dizzying effects of the Aspergin. He didn't want to go, but it was the last night, and the Yorls would be disappointed. They were like children, really—they always wanted to share their pleasures with him.

Maybe it was a good idea to show up. Give credit where credit was due. If Philip could actually organize a football game in just three days, he deserved some recognition.

The Yorls had heaped fuel oil all about the playing field, and the blazing fires illuminated the scene. The drums pounded in joyous excitement, and the blueskinned audience cavorted in frantic enthusiasm as several minor chieftains danced before them, waving spears in a Yorla version of cheerleading.

The two teams were already on the field, engaged in a furious scrimmage. There was no hint of compulsion about their movements, not the slightest vestige of constraint amongst the spectators.

Raymond sighed. Philip had been right, and he was wrong. The evidence of his own eyes furnished the final proof. Once a game was substituted for reality, the Yorls conformed, just as humans did. And from now on, the rest would be easy. In five years Philip would have them all working in the mines and paying taxes. They'd become a civilized community, with jails and orphanages and asylums.

Somehow, he'd never believed it would work out this way.

A player on one of the teams was getting ready to kick the ball. Raymond tried to locate Philip on the field. He must be acting as referee.

Raymond squinted through the firelight, but he couldn't see him. All he could see was the ball, sailing over the goal-posts. And the crowd roared.

The crowd roared, and Raymond sighed again, and he turned back up the path to the Administration Building. He was tired, but he'd have to unpack. And he'd have to write a report to Interplan, explaining that he was right after all and that Philip was wrong. He'd have to explain that progress was not coming to Yorla. They didn't understand about sublimation, or the necessity of fighting over useless objects. They would play football, yes, but only for a real trophy, like the one he had just seen soaring over the goal-posts.

It was Philip's head . . .

Beezlebub

he knew he had to destroy this buzzing-horror that had trailed its filth into his private hell

HOWARD WAS STILL HALF-ASLEEP when he heard the buzzing. It was a faint, persistent drone, balanced delicately on the very threshold of consciousness. For a moment Howard wasn't sure whether the sound came from the sleeping side or the waking side of his mind. God knows, he'd heard plenty of strange noises in his sleep lately; made them, too. Anita was always complaining about how he'd wake up in the middle of the night, screaming at the top of his lungs. But he had reasons to be upset, the way things were going, and besides, Anita was always complaining, period.

The drone deepened insistently and Howard knew he was awake now. He could feel the stale heat of the bedroom and the response his body was making to it—the loginess of his limbs and the cold pattern of perspiration forming on them.

Bzzzzzzz.

Howard opened his eyes.

The room was dim, but the California sunshine filtering through the smog was also filtering through the interstices of the window blinds. Just enough to transform the bungalow-court apartment into a small oven with its baking heat. Just enough to give Howard a glimpse of what he didn't want to see—the living room filled with a fan-shaped clutter of clothing and furniture radiating from the axis of the roll-away bed, the cubbyhole kitchen through the open archway, with the caked and crusted dishes heaped in the sink. Yes, and the damned portable typewriter on the table in the corner, its carriage accusingly empty and its untouched keys leering up like rows of dusty teeth.

Rows of dusty teeth—Christ, man, what a writer you are! When you're asleep, that is.

But he wasn't asleep. He could hear that buzzing. Louder now, much louder. Goddamned fly. How'd it get in here, with all the windows tight shut? Anita had a thing about opening windows, no matter how hot it was, when she had her curlers in. And she always had the curlers——

Bzzzzzzzzz.

Howard sat up. Tile noise was too loud to be coming from the kitchen, it had to be here in the room. He turned and glanced at the huddle in the bed beside him.

The sun glinted off the curlers. A ray played cruelly across Anita's neck, accentuating the stringy fold.

That's where the fly was sitting. At first he thought it was Anita's mole. But moles don't move. Moles don't buzz.

It was a fly, all right. He stared at Anita, thinking Cod how he hated the thing—noisy, rasping at your nerves, always around when you don't want it, demanding attention, intruding on your privacy. Dirty, messy creature, carrying filth——

Somehow his hand had drawn back and now it was coming forward; he wanted to hit it, not too hard, just swat it and destroy it because it had to be destroyed, he had to get rid of it.

Howard wasn't conscious of die blow or its force. Realization of its impact vanished before the overwhelming explosion of Anita's shrill scream.

"Oh, you bastard!" And then she was sitting up, striking at him; not once, but again and again, harder and harder, and shrieking louder and louder. "You—you—trying to kill me while I'm asleep "

It was crazy, she was crazy, and he was trying to explain about the fly, he was only going to swat the fly, but she wouldn’t listen, she never listened when she got into one of those hysterical rages. She was trying, sobbing, stumbling into the bathroom: of course she locked the door. There was no sense continuing with the same old scene, no sense pounding on the panel and stammering out apologies. All he could do was had his clothes and get dressed, locate his brief case under the jumble of her clothing. Past nine already, and his appointment was at ten. He had to be there on time.

In his haste, Howard forgot all about the fly. What he had to decide now was whether to spend the next 20 minutes catching a cup of coffee at the drugstore on the corner or run into the barbershop for a quick shave. He settled for the shave; it was more important to show up looking presentable.

Luck was with him. He got the car started without any trouble, made it over to the barbershop. There was a vacant chair. Howard settled back in it, grateful for the hot towels that blotted out the sound of the radio and the sight of the autographed photos on the wall. Why was it that every damned barbershop in this town had to keep the radio blaring at full volume, had to disfigure the wall with faded pictures of faded actors?

And why was it that barbers didn’t have enough sense to keep their places clean?

Howard found himself Ringing the sheet aside before the barber had finished applying after-shave lotion. “What’s the matter with you guys—can’t you even keep the lousy flics out of here?”

He hadn’t meant to blow up. and come to think of it, there was only one fly, buzzing around the ceiling in Howard’s range of vision as he lay tilted back in the chair.

But Howard didn’t come to think of it until he was out of the shop, until the damage was done. The way that crummy barber had looked at him—

Oh, well, he wouldn’t be going back there again anyway. There were plenty of other barbers around.

Not so many producers, though. At least not so many who wanted to make a deal with him. Howard reminded himself of that as he wheeled up to the studio gate. He put a big smile on his face for the guard who directed him to parking space, and an even bigger smile for Miss Rogers, secretary in the outer office of Trebor Productions. But he saved the biggest smile for Joe Trebor.

That took a little doing. First of all, there was the damned half hour wait in the outer office. Well, that was Trebor for you—an A-OK ratfink. Of course they were all alike, these producers. They all had the same routine. Set up an appointment, then postpone it. Set up another, give you the pressure; "How soon can you make it? Tomorrow morning? Good—10 o'clock sharp, in my office. I'll leave a pass at the gate for you."

So you showed up promptly at 10, carrying the brief case and taking the best possible care of that extra-big smile so that it wouldn't crack around the edges. And then you sat there like a damned fool in the reception room, crossing and uncrossing your legs in the uncomfortable little chair, trying not to stare at the secretary as she kept putting calls through to the guy you were supposed to be seeing right now. Sometimes you even sat there while the charm boys finger-snapped their way in and out of the sanctum sanctorum; the sharp young agents, hair just a little too long over the back of the buttondown collar, trousers just a little too tight in the seat, always a little bit ahead of you as they made their pitch, set their deal—for somebody else.

Howard got into Joe Trebor's office at 10:32. He stayed six minutes.

Three minutes later he was standing before a pay phone in a glass booth, trying to dial Dr. Blanchard's number with a forefinger that wouldn't stop trembling, then interrupting the incoherency he poured into the mouthpiece to take a wild swipe at the insect that soared and swooped insanely within the confines of the phone booth. "It's following me!" he shouted into the mouthpiece. "The damned thing's following me."

• • •

"Do you want to talk about it now?" asked Dr. Blanchard quietly, as Howard sank back into the big, leather-covered chair. Scarcely another 20 minutes had elapsed, but Howard was now quite calm. And of course he wanted to talk about it.

That's why he'd called Blanchard, even though it wasn't his regular appointment day, that's why he'd come running over here to the nice, quiet office where you could sit back and relax and nobody pressured you.

It wasn't like Joe Trebor's office—he was telling the doctor about that now. About the phony modern paintings on the walls and the big desk with the high executive chair behind it and the low chair in front of it, the one you sat in. When you sat in that chair the producer looked down on you and you had to look up to him. You looked up over that bare desk which told you here was a man too important to waste his time on mere paperwork the way writers did. You looked at the intercom and the phone with the six extension buttons which showed just how busy a producer he was, and at the solid-silver water carafe which showed just how wealthy he was. And you looked at the picture of the wife and kids, which was supposed to show you what a solid citizen he was, if you didn't happen to know the stories about the way he interviewed for feminine leads.

But you didn't look directly at Joe Trebor, because he was staring at you. Staring and waiting for you to come up with the story line. You got the notes out of the brief case and you started to read, till the while conscious that you were just wasting your time with a showboat operator like this, a guy who kept interrupting to make Mickey Mouse suggestions for changes, a guy who didn't understand the values you were aiming for. All he knew was "story line" and "How do you go out. what's the curtain, you need a tag here." and "Why don't you change it and play this scene exterior?"

Typical fly-by-night producer.

And then tilt buzzing.

The buzzing, just when you were trying to build, trying to sell, trying to nail him down. The buzzing, drowning out your voice.

And you looked up and saw the fly, perched on the stopper of the silver carafe. It was just squatting there, rubbing its tiny forelegs together, cleansing them. If you put those-forelegs under a microscope you'd understand the need for cleansing, because they were covered with filth.

Then you looked at foe Trebor who was smiling and shaking his head and saying. "Sorry. I don't quite see it. You haven't licked the story line yet." And as he said it he rubbed his hands together. Because they were covered with filth, he'd walked through filth, he left a trail of filth wherever he went, and what right had he to buzz, at you? And what right did he have to keep flies in his office to bug you when you were telling your story, your story that you'd sweated over for weeks in that lousy one-room apartment. like a furnace, with Anita slopping around in her dirty housecoat and whining why didn't you get up the bread?

And some of this you thought and some of it you must have said because Trebor stood up and he got that look on his face and he was telling you something you couldn't quite hear because of the damned buzzing. So you smiled, holding your lips very tight, not wanting to admit you blew it. but you knew. And you split out and made the phone call to the doctor and there it was—the fly the same fly, the little black thing with a million eyes that ran see everything, everywhere, right in the booth with you now. buzzing and listening. It saw and it heard and it followed you. through all the filth in the world.

Howard knew Dr. Blanchard understood because he was nodding quietly, calm and relaxed, and there was nothing wrong with his eyes. They weren't like Anita's or the barber's or Joe Trebor's eyes, all accusing him of putting them on. And they weren't like the fly's eyes had been, either, watching and waiting. Dr. Blanchard really understood.

Now he was asking Howard all about it. when the fly had first appeared, how long ago he could remember being conscious of flies. He even knew that talking about such things made Howard a little nervous, because he was saying. "Don't be afraid. There are no flies here, just go right ahead and say whatever comes to mind. You won't be interrupted by any buzzing—bttzzzing—bzzzzinnnggg——"

The buzzing. It was in the room. Howard heard it. He couldn't hear the doctor's voice anymore because tilt-buzzing was so loud, lit couldn't even hear his own voice shouting, but he knew he was telling the doctor, "You're wrong! It's here—it followed me! Can't you see?"

But of course Dr. Blanchard couldn't see. how could he see. when the fly. the black, buzzing fly. was sitting there and buzzing on top of his bald head?

And it buzzed and it stared, and the droning drilled through Howard's skull and the eyes lanced his brain, and he had to run. had to get out of there, had to get away, because they didn't believe him. nobody believed him. not even the doctor could help him now.

Howard didn't slop running until he got to the car. He was panting when he climbed in. panting and wringing wet with perspiration. He could feel his heart pounding, but he forced himself to be calm. He had to be calm, very calm now, because he knew there was no one else to depend on. He'd have to do it all himself. The first thing was to check the car very thoroughly, including the back seat. And then, when he was quite sure nothing had gotten in. to lock the doors. Lock the doors and roll up the windows. It was hot inside the car. but he could stand the heat. He could stand anything but the buzzing and the stare.

He started the engine, pulled out. Calm. now. Keep calm. Drive carefully, right up to the freeway access. And edge out slowly. Get into the left lane and open up. Now. Drive fast. The faster you drive, the faster you get away from the buzzing and the staling. Keep it at 70. A fly can't do 70. can it?

That is. if the fly is real.

Howard took a deep breath.

Suppose there was no fly, except in his own imagination? lint it couldn't be: not in his imagination, the one tool, the one weapon, the one area a writer must protect. You can't open up your imagination to a buzzing beast, a creature that crawls through filth. you can't allow the invasion of the insect that incubates in your own insanity, an incarnation of your own personal devil, an evil that torments you incessantly. But if it was that way, then of course there was no escape. He couldn’t drive fast enough, tint fat enough. to “el away. Anil then was no hope for him at all.

Bzzzzzz.

It was there, in the car. At least, lulu art! it. But the sound might he coming from inside his own shattering skull.

And now he saw it. fluttering against the windshield before him, just below the rear-view minor. Or did he see it? Wasn’t it just a fragment of inward vision? How could there be a real fly here in the car, with all the windows closed tight?

But he saw it and he heard it and it crawled, and his sweat poured anti his heart thumped and his breath rasped and he knew it was real, it had to be real. And if it was, then this was his chance, his only chance, locked inside the car with it where it couldn’t get away.

Howard shifted his foot from the gas pedal to the brake. The car was hurtling down an incline but he knew he hail it in control, everything was under control now. All he needed to do was swat the fly.

The creature had paused in its progress across the windshield so that it was poised directly before his line of vision. Howard could see it very clearly now. as his hand moved up. He almost laughed at himself as he stared, laughed at his absurd fantasies. Silly to think of demonic possession by such a tins fragile insect: he could see every delicate veining and tracery of its fluttering wings as he leaned forward, l-or an instant he even stared into its eyes: its multifaceted eyes, mirrors of myriad mysteries.

In that instant he knew.

But his hand was already swooping out, and all he could do was shriek as the car lurched and the culvert wall loomed——

• • •

When the squad car came the fly was resting very quietly on Howard’s eyeball.

Its eyes swiveled slowly as the rednecked patrolman bent over the body, pausing just long enough to sense the frustration, the suppressed anger, the set thing tension behind the stolid fate. Then it rose gracefully and buzzed around the patrolman's shoulders as he straightened. As the patrolman turned away, the fly followed.

The patrolman sighed. "Poor devil." he muttered.

It was. of course. Howard's epitaph.

The Conventional Approach

Success has not spoiled Rock, er, Robert Bloch; he has not lost the common touch—although rumors to the effect that he invented it are, perhaps, exaggerated. In order, therefore, to convert into a triad the duet of articles which he wrote for us about aspects of Science Fiction fandom in times past, it was needful only for us to obtain the services of a comely grisette. She smiled, she plied him with potables, she put the question to him . . . and a mere eight months later the subappended monograph appeared. It is one of three on the subject of that singular microcosm peculiar to our particular literary genre; and will be, we are sure, at least as interesting to the majority of readers who do not form a part of it as to the minority who do. Fart of the phenomena of SF fandom is its conventions—the part Bob Bloch writes about here. It was at one such that we were politely accosted by (as his card revealed) a Corporation Man in hotel uniform of dark suit, white shirt, Sincere tie, who politely inquired of us what was going on. We told him. "Science Fiction . . ." he said, musingly. Then, still not quite clear, but nonetheless impressed, he said, "You don't know how unusual it is to see a group of people who are so obviously interested in and so obviously enjoying what they are doing!" Let Mr. Bloch show you why.

THE FIRST CONVENTION IN THE United States was held in Philadelphia during the month of May, 1787. Contrary to popular rumor, I did not attend (I seldom go anywhere in May) and according to reports I didn't miss much.

There were only 55 people present. I understand they spent most of their time just sitting around and yakking about a Constitution or some such nonsense. Oh, I guess they did have a masquerade ball—I’ve seen pictures of the affair and almost everybody was wearing ridiculous costumes, with wigs and knee-breeches—but the whole thing looks like a drag to me. I mean, with only 55 attendees, how could they possibly break even on the deal? I’m sure they lost money, and the proof of it is that they’ve never held another Constitutional Convention since.

Science Fiction Conventions, on the other hand, are a howling success; 21 of them have been held in the past 24 years, and most of them have made a buck. Which only goes to prove the superiority of free enterprise as opposed to governmental interference, my friends, and if I am elected—

But we’re getting ahead of our story, if any.

Science fiction, as we know it, was a minor snarl in the Roaring Twenties—a decade which witnessed the rise of such notables as Pretty-Boy Floyd, Legs Diamond, Dutch Schultz, Frank Nitti, Alphonse Capone and Hugo Gernsback. It was Gemsback who, in 1926, produced the first “scientifiction” magazine, Amazing Stories. Not only did readers find his publication; they also found its letter-column, and through the letter-column, one another. “Tans^0 of this sort of fiction were soon exchanging views and opinions, collecting artwork and hardcover books in the genre, and reading the other magazines which came into the field during the next halfdozen years.

Without going into morbid details on the subject, which I have covered at length elsewhere in my monumental historical survey (The Decline of the North, South, East and West, pub. by Stealth, 1958) it is sufficient to note that a science fiction fandom came into being. Teen-agers in particular flocked to the field. In some of the larger communities—notably New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Los Angeles—informal “clubs” sprang up, with regular meetings and meeting-places. The coming of the Thirties saw the advent of the “fanzine,” an amateur publication devoted to various aspects of the science fiction field. These efforts multiplied during the Depression Decade, circulating amongst the readers through subscriptions and mailing-lists and spreading interest to an increasing number of fans. The artificial apartheid between professional editors, writers and readers was breached as early as 1933, when a 17-year-old fan magazine publisher graduated to the editorship of the professional science fiction magazine, Wonder Stories. In the following years, many fans, whose first editorial or auctorial efforts appeared in the amateur press, “crossed over” to commercial markets. When teen-age fanzine publishers like Jerry Siegel and Joe Shuster could soar to success on the sturdy back of their creation, Superman, there was incentive for others to pursue fantasy and science fiction with more than the casual interest of the average reader of western or mystery stories.

There were other factors, too, which contributed to the development of fandom as a permanent in-group. The Depression itself (if you wonder why I capitalize it, it’s because you didn’t live through it) was a nightmare for penniless adolescents. In fandom they could achieve almost instant identity and status as publishers, editors, writers, artists, correspondents, critics, club-members and club-leaders. They created their own historical frame of reference, coined neologisms, revelled in running gags and hoaxes, enjoyed acceptance by their peers. Moreover, since many fans had “turned pro,” it was possible for the reader to form an acquaintanceship or even an enduring friendship with some of the professionals whose work he admired. In the major cities these professionals often attended the club meetings. It was heady stuff for a teen-ager to rub elbows with one of the “alltime greats” in the field and be treated as a fellow-fan by an elderly author in his thirties.

In such an atmosphere, the Science Fiction Convention was conceived. After some faltering experimental preliminaries on the local level, the concept of the “World Science Fiction Convention” became a reality, and the infant idea first saw the light of day on July 2nd, 1939, in New York City. Here, in the modest confines of Caravan Hall, a meeting-room in a midtown office building, some 200-odd (plus a few very odd) fans and professionals convened under the chairmanship of one Samuel Moskowitz, a name not altogether unknown to science fiction circles, or even squares.

All was not sweetness and light—there had been bitter feuding between various factions of fandom regarding the staging of the event, and disaffected elements appeared to upset the decorum of the meeting. Nor, judged by contemporary standards, was the Convention itself comparable to such later galas as the Yalta Conference or the historic meeting between Elizabeth Taylor and Richard Burton.

But two hundred people did attend, coming from such vast distances (by teen-age, 1939 standards) as Chicago, Los Angeles and Far Rockaway; though not truly a "world" Convention, the affair attracted many professional publishers, editors, writers and artists in the field. Guest of Honor was artist Frank R. Paul, who spoke in a somewhat dingy room decorated with original cover-paintings for science fiction magazines. There were many special fan publications distributed to attendees, and for the first time fan-correspondents of years' standing had a chance to sit down together. The second day was devoted to a program on the sciences and the highlight of the third was a baseball game and a mass trek to the nearby World's Fair. But several Convention "traditions" had been established.

First and foremost, a portion of the expenses were defrayed by means of an auction—artwork, manuscripts and magazines donated by professional publishers in the field were sold to the highest bidder. Since many fans were, and are, avid collectors, this practise has resulted in a considerable source of revenue to the amateur organizations staging a Convention.

The second tradition centers around the entertainment, which has since followed the general pattern laid down by New York in 1939—an address of welcome, introduction of the famous and infamous, speeches by notables, a scheduled program and a Convention Banquet.

Again, by today's standards, there was nothing earth-croggling about the program. The principal entertainment was a showing of the old silent UFA film, Metropolis, which didn't offer nearly as many weird effects as the fannish baseball game the following day. The Banquet cost the enormous sum of $1 per plate—and the best evidence that this was indeed a Depression affair consists of the fact that only 32 people felt they could afford to attend.

Both Time and The New Yorker published accounts of the affair, and sniggered sophisticatedly over the "Buck Rogers" atmosphere. But their recognition, however disdainful and distasteful, nailed down one thing; science fiction fandom was a national phenomenon, of national interest.

Once established, the World Science Fiction Convention became an annual event. The second was held in Chicago, the third in Denver. There was a hiatus during the war years, but in 1946 the affairs were resumed and have continued on a once-a-year basis.

What are Science Fiction Conventions really like? All I can do is cite a few of my own impressions, based on attendance at eleven of these gatherings from '46 through '62.

The 1946 Convention was held, kicking and screaming, in Los Angeles at a hall called the Park View Manor, so-called because it overlooked MacArthur Park, a spot well worth overlooking under any circumstances. The attendance was small; 125 people and Forrest J. Ackerman, who collapsed before my arrival and took to his bed. The rest of us stayed up to listen to A. E. van Vogt and E. Mayne Hull, to attend a Masquerade Ball which has since become an important feature of every subsequent Convention and to engage in the casual camaradie which is perhaps the most attractive feature of these get-togethers for fans and pros alike. I shared the podium at the Banquet with Ray Bradbury and Leigh Brackett, among others, and for the first time in my own career as a fan and as a professional writer, met a sizeable group of fellow-readers and fellow-chirospastics.

It was all so enjoyable that I needed two years in which to recover, but in 1948 I flew to Toronto as Guest of Honor, along with Bob Tucker. Again attendance was small, the program informal, the setting modest. But we were in Canada; Conventions had already begun to take on Na truly international aspect, and fans in London were beginning their annual gatherings. And a general procedure was being crystallized; each year fan-groups from various cities would attend and make a bid for their community as the following years Convention-site. Conventions were financed by a small membership fee ($1 then, $3 today) plus proceeds from the auctions.

The following two years I devoted to my hobby (raising pedigreed vultures) but in 1951 I was off to New Orleans. By now, Conventions were being held in official hotels, complete with meeting-halls, Banquet-room facilities, bars, smoke-filled rooms and other indispensable adjuncts including non-functioning elevators and unavailable room-service. Also the date had been advanced to Labor Day Weekend, in recognition of the fact that many fans were no longer teen-agers who hitch-hiked to the “Con” but full-grown, responsible (and irresponsible) adults who had to reckon with regular working-schedules. Highlight of the New Orleans program was the introduction of two brand-new science fiction movies, The Day The Earth Stood Still and When Worlds Collide, both of which were specially previewed for the Convention audience alone; in the case of the former, the producers rented the largest theatre in town for the occasion. Science Fiction Conventions were graduating to the Big Time, and the local press-coverage no longer waxed facetious about kids in propeller-beanies waving zap-guns.

As a matter of fact, there was a boom in the field, both in magazines and book-publication, and in Chicago, in 1952, the echoes resounded through the Morrison Hotel, where more than 1,000 attendees assembled for a dazzling affair. Somehow I got trapped into serving as Toastmaster at the Banquet, which allowed me the pleasure of introducing Guest of Honor Hugo Gernsback, the man who—in a large measure—was responsible for it all. I was also privileged to hear science expert Willy Ley assert that he’d never seen a flying saucer, and to remedy that lack by letting fly with a saucer at him.

The turnout of notable fans and professionals was impressive, the program (which included the first science fiction ballet) exciting, and the four-day nonstop schedule of parties beggared description—to say nothing of some of the hosts. From ‘52, World Science Fiction Conventions became truly impressive events, calling for tremendous effort and dedication on the part of the fan-groups sponsoring them, and requiring die services of many people to provide stimulating program-fare. Also inaugurated were a series of annual awards for the year’s “best” in the field—novel, short story, artist, magazine, dramatic presentation, fan-magazine, etc.—affectionately dubbed “Hugos” in honor of Gernsback. I have one of these trophies on my desk; it’s an impressive piece with a gold plaque set in a wooden base, from which rises what is either a silver rocket or an elephant’s suppository, I’m not quite sure which. But I’m proud of it, and the E. E. Evans Memorial Award which has also been bestowed in recent years. Along with the awards has come another annual institution—the Trans-Atlantic Fan Fund which, by popular subscription, alternately brings a British fan to an American Convention or sends an American fan to the British gathering.

In 1953 I went to the Convention in Philadelphia; in ‘54 it was San Francisco, and in ‘55, Cleveland. 1956 brought the Convention back to New York again, and in 1957 it became a true “World” affair in London—with over 50 American fans chartering a plane and flying across to attend. I didn’t make the scene, being busy with my new hobby (necrophilism) but I was in Los Angeles in ‘58 and Detroit in ‘59. During the next two years I was occupied with a small entertainment project (geeking canaries) but 1962 found me in Chicago, and subsequently in an iron lung after the lavish hospitality. Conventions have enabled me to hurl insults as a speaker and Toastmaster, participate in panel discussions and playlets, witness the premiere of the world’s first science fiction opera, see rare films, attend the fabulous art shows which are now a regular annual feature, buy special memorabilia at auctions, ogle the thicks at the Masquerade Balls and “Fashions of the Future” style-shows, hear first-rate talks by first-rate scientists, meet fans and publishers and artists and editors and fellow-writers from all over the world, catch a glimpse of many cities I might not otherwise have visited, and—above all—enjoy the stimulating company of people who share kindred interests in one of the world's most unusual and engrossing hobbies. (No, I'm not talking about sex: I understand that its inventor, Isaac Asimov, plans to cover this subject in a forthcoming issue.)

Thanks to Conventions, I've found lifelong friends; many of them people I only see once every few years, but with whom—when we meet again, three thousand miles away from our last encounter—I can pick up a conversation in mid-sentence and continue as though we had only been momentarily interrupted.

This is not an isolated, subjective reaction; witness the fact that, in addition to the World Conventions, there have been a continuing series of regional gatherings for many years—the ESFA and Philadelphia Conferences and Lunacons in the East, the annual Midwescon in Cincinnati, the Westercons on the Pacific Coast. Some fortunate fans who started attendance in their teens continue to appear in their forties, and such redoubtable professionals as Anthony Boucher and E. E. Smith, Ph.d. have declared and demonstrated that the dream of their lives is to move on from one Convention to another in a continuing euphoria of tape-recording, flashbulb popping, autograph parties, interview sessions, and relaxed conviviality.

Actually, as I've stated before in the past (I only state before in the future when writing a time-traveling story) the Convention is a miniature world of make-believe all its own; a three-ring circus that comes to a different town for a three-day stand just once a year, not for profit but for pleasure and participation. There's nothing comparable to the unique quality of the Science Fiction Conventions, and I guess that's why I like them—they're so unconventional.

Double-Cross

You'll be seeing my name in the newspapers one of these days. What galls me is that you probably won't even recognize it.

But then, chances are you couldn't recite a list of the executive vice-presidents of NBC, CBS, ABC or Mutual, either.

The important thing is that around here, when people hear the name of Willis T. Millaney, they jump. I've always carried a lot of weight in this network, and that's where it counts.

At least it counted where most people in the TV industry were concerned. The only one who didn't seem to give a damn was Buzzie Waters.

Yes, Buzzie Waters. His name you'll know. Because for the past three years I've worked night and day behind the scenes, building it up. Building up his Hooper and his Nielsen ratings, too. That fat ham wouldn't amount to a hill of beans if it wasn't for me. Him and his "Bzzzzzz—Buzzie" tag, and his corny routines out of the Catskills!

Let me tell you something, comics like Buzzie sell on the open market for exactly eight-tenths of one per cent, or just a fraction under a dime a dozen. He'd never have gotten off the Borscht Circuit if it hadn't been for me, and everybody knows it.

Everybody but Buzzie, apparently. The trouble started when he forgot.

I was sitting in my office one hot afternoon when the phone rang. It was Sid Richter, calling from the theater where Buzzin' Around was going into rehearsal for the first show of the fall season. Sid's the kind of producer who likes to keep all the details wrapped up, so the minute my girl gave me his name I could smell that something had gone wrong.

"All right," I said. "Let's have it."

"You really want it?" Sid asked. "This is gonna hurt."

"Don't tell me, let me guess," I answered. "Buzzie doesn't like the script."

"Nope."

"He doesn't like the guest-star format?"

"Try again."

"He showed up drunk."

"Worse than that."

"How much worse?"

I could hear Sid take a deep breath at the other end of the wire. "He didn't show up at all, period."

"Now wait a minute—"

"I've been waiting, for over an hour. And so have a cast of fourteen, plus a full crew, all union, and a twenty-piece orchestra."

"What's the story? You tried locating him?"

"There is no story, and I wouldn't bother calling you if I hadn't tried. He knew about this, of course, and he was around last night. Somebody bumped into him at Lindy's."

"Drunk or sober?"

"Half and half. He threw apiece of cheesecake at the waiter."

"Good old Buzzie, always on."

"Well, he's not on today. We've tried every place in town. He left his hotel this morning and nobody's seen him since. His agent doesn't know, his writers don't know—"

I got a hunch. "Did you call his psychiatrist?"

Sid gave me a tired laugh. "Which one? You know how he's been lately. He changes psychiatrists even faster than he changes writers."

"What about this girl friend of his, this Melody Morgan?"

"Just talked to her. Says he hasn't showed for a week."

“Well,” I stalled for a moment. “You’re shaping up the rest of the show, though, aren’t you? Shooting around him?”

“What else can we do? I can’t even get hold of his stand-in, that double he hired, what’s-his-name.”

“Joe Traskin,” I told him. “And it doesn’t matter, because Buzzie told me last week he was going to fire him.”

“Great! We can’t even line up our shots. And we’re supposed to do a full rehearsal tomorrow, too.”

“Don’t cancel,” I said. “I’ll find Buzzie for you if I have to turn this town upside down.”

“I wouldn’t advise it,” Sid murmured. “Some mighty funny bugs might come crawling out from under.” He paused. “Serious-like, now—you think you can locate him?”

“I damned well have to,” I replied, honestly. “Don’t worry. That’s my job.”

I hung up, shaking my head. That was my job, all right. Worrying about Buzzie Waters. He’d been giving me grief all summer long, playing coy about signing for the fall series and ducking out of appointments with the sponsor, the agency, and the network reps. And there hadn’t been a thing we could do about it, either. Buzzie had come close to copping himself an Emmy this past season, even if the critics didn’t like his brand of mugging. So there was no sense trying to bluff him—he knew he was hot, and could hang his hat over the mike in any network he pleased.

On top of that, some two-bit writer got hold of him and started to work on one of those crummy biographies. You know the pitch; the one about the poor little neglected kid who overcompensates for his childhood by growing up to be a loud-mouthed comic, just because he’s insecure.

For some reason, this was the last straw. I’ve worked with names for twenty years, and let me tell you one thing—this “insecurity” gag is phoney.

Take Benny; he used to think he couldn’t work a live audience without a violin in his hand. So he left vaude and went into broadcasting, and he doesn’t need any benefits. I could use his brand of insecurity, believe me. Ed Wynn made with the funny hats, but he did all right for himself playing straight on Playhouse 90 and in the flicks too. And there are a dozen others.

No, this poor-little-comic routine is something I can’t buy. A lot of people, in and out of show biz, are insecure. But they don’t go around lushing it up, putting solid gold monograms on their garters, and punching columnists at Toots Shors.

Let’s face it, Buzzie was a nogoodnik.

But where was he?

I called a couple of numbers on my private line. A bookie I knew, and an entrepreneur who ran a floating crap-game, and a motherly old dowager named Maggie who could supply you with anything you happened to need at a moment’s notice, including Shetland ponies.

Then, as a last resort, I called Buzzie’s house—not his hotel here in town, but the big house out on the Island. He never went there after Labor Day, but I was running out of numbers and I had to call somebody.

Sure enough, someone picked up the receiver.

“Sherwood Forest,” a voice said. “Robin Hood speaking.”

“Buzzie! This is Millaney. What the hell’s the big idea? Don’t you know you’re supposed to be at rehearsal—”

“We are not amused. The King has declared a holiday, and there’s dancing in the streets.”

He was sauced to the eyeballs.

“Are you coming in, or must I come out there and drag you in?”

“I’m awfully sorry, that is not the correct answer! But thank you for being with us, and as a consolation prize, our sponsor wants you to have this box of suppositories, which you can—”

“Stay where you are,” I told him. “I’m coming right out.”

And out I went. I didn’t call Sid back, and I didn’t even tell my girl I was going—just ducked through my private exit and took my own car from the parking lot across the street.

It wasn't a pleasant drive. I was fighting traffic, fighting the heat, and fighting the aggravation which kept tightening my scalp. There comes a time when even Miltown isn't the answer.

On the face of it, maybe it doesn't sound so bad. Comics have gotten drunk and missed a rehearsal before; you charge it off to the client somehow and forget it. But Buzzie wasn't my only problem this week. Already I'd had a brush with one of those damned little monsters from our quiz show—an eight-year-old freak who knew the batting averages of every player in the major leagues since 1908. He wanted out from the show in order to see the World Series. Then there was a rough session with our new cowboy star, who tried to cut his wrists over an unhappy love affair. I'd told him never to get mixed up with a chorus boy in the first place. Also there was—

But why go on? That's the kind of a job I have; troubleshooter and nursemaid and keeper all rolled into one. I ask myself that "But why go on?" question a dozen times a week, and the answer always comes back in good round numbers. The only thing is, this week I'd asked myself the same question a dozen times a day.

I guess it was the old story; you know the one. Buzzie Waters used to tell it himself, and I always thought it was pretty funny. About the old guy whose car breaks down and wants to borrow a horse and buggy from his stingy neighbor. On the way over to the neighbor's house he keeps thinking how stingy the guy is, and rehearsing in his mind how he'll refuse to loan him anything. Finally he gets all worked up, and when the neighbor answers the doorbell the guy just looks at him and yells, "All right—you know what you can do with your horse and buggy!"

That's the mood I was in when I drove into Buzzie Waters' place, and it was no joke. I'd made up my mind there'd better not be any more trouble, because I just couldn't take it.

I didn't see Buzzie's car out front, and that was a bad sign. Maybe he'd run out on me. When I rang the bell and got no answer, I was sure of it. Then I got mad and started to use the big brass door-knocker, and that was my mistake. The thing was red-hot from the heat of the sun, and I burned two fingers.

That's when I started swearing and kicking at the door. And then I stood there, feeling foolish, when the door swung open.

I went inside, where it was cooler. I wasn't cooler, though. The air-conditioning didn't help a bit. If I shivered a little, it was from rage.

"All right, Buzzie!" I shouted. "You can come out now. I know you're in there."

Some dialogue; I sounded like a ten-year-old kid. Realizing it didn't help me feel any better, either. I ran down the hall and into the library. Or what had been designed as a library until Buzzie bought the place and turned it into a bar.

It was a bar now; there were bottles and glasses all over the place, and as I came in, I stepped in a puddle of liquor on the floor. Buzzie must have been entertaining.

Well, he wasn't entertaining now. He was sprawled across the sofa, and he was out, cold.

He wore a dirty, beat-up sports outfit, and he hadn't shaved for two days, and he stank of liquor when I reached down and shook him.

"Huh?" he mumbled. "Who you? Millaney, huh? Go 'way." I pulled him up to a sitting position.

"Snap out of it," I said. "You're coming with me."

"No. Why sh' I come 'th you?"

"Rehearsal, that's why."

"Don' wanna rehearsal. Don' have t' rehearsal."

"Damn it, I'm not taking any more from you! You're going to get under a shower and sober up, and I want you dressed and ready to go in twenty minutes, hear?"

"Lea'me alone. You're not my boss—"

I slapped him across the face.

He snarled at me. "Why, you—"

Then, all at once, he was on his feet, lunging forward. He swept his hand across the end-table, knocking a glass to the floor, but his fingers closed around the neck of a bottle. He gripped it and swung at me.

There was only one thing to do, and I did it. I brought my fist up hard and connected with his jaw. He went over backward, taking the end-table with him. The glasses flew and shattered on the white marble floor beyond the rug, but all I heard was the nasty sound of his head hitting when he landed.

But everybody knows you can't hurt a drunk. I knew it too, when I bent down and shook him. Then I wasn't so sure. He flopped limply, and it was like shaking a corpse. His eyes were open and rolled back, and I didn't like to look at them.

So I felt his wrist. His skin was whiter than the marble, and it might as well have been marble for all the pulse I could detect.

It was very quiet in the room. I could hear myself breathe, but I couldn't hear him.

And then I knew. . . .

It was even quieter, three hours later, when my visitor arrived. The sunlight was fading fast, but even in the dimness I could see his face. He looked more like Buzzie Waters than Buzzie himself did.

"Joe Traskin," I said, standing up. "You remember me. I'm Willis Millaney."

He gave me a funny grin. "Buzzie's boss," he said.

"I was. Up until this afternoon."

"What goes on h—?"

I didn't let him finish his sentence, just grabbed his arm and pulled him over behind the sofa. He stared down at Buzzie Waters.

"Accident," I said. Then I told him what had happened. It didn't take me very long, and I knew just what I was going to say. I knew everything perfectly, except the one thing I needed to know most—how he'd take it.

“Yeah, sure, I understand,” said Joe Traskin. “But why are you telling me all this? Shouldn’t you be talking to the police?”

I stared at him and slowly shook my head.

“I don’t think so, Joe.”

“But—”

“I could have called the police three hours ago, when this happened. But then what? I’d tell my story and they’d lock me up. Oh, maybe I’d get off with a manslaughter rap. Say, two years and good behavior. When I got out again, I could find myself another job. Not exactly what I’m doing now, but something similar. Like say, lavatory attendant in a downtown hotel.”

“I’m sorry, but I don’t see where I fit into your troubles.”

“Listen, Joe.” I put my hand on his shoulder. “You don’t get the drift yet, do you? I’m not talking about my troubles. Sure, I’ll admit that’s the first thing that ran through my mind when I found out what happened. But it’s not important. This oh-God-what-have-I-done routine doesn’t mean a damned thing. By the time I realized Buzzie Waters was dead, I’d stopped the self-pity and started thinking like an executive vice-president again. Do you know how an executive vice-president thinks, Joe?”

“Do they?”

He snapped it out, just the way Buzzie would have done, and that helped. I squeezed his shoulder.

“Yes, Joe, they do. That’s their job. That’s my job. To think and to worry. Not about myself, but about my people. All my people, on all my shows. For instance, there are about seventy-five of them connected with Buzzin’ Around, in one capacity or another. And they’re the ones I’m thinking about right now. Killing Buzzie Waters is one thing, and that’s bad enough. But murdering their chances, murdering their livelihood is something else again. I made up my mind, Joe. I can’t do it.”

“But what—?”

“Listen, Joe. There’s an easy out. An obvious solution. It’s staring me right in the face.”

“What are you talking about?”

"You, Joe. From now on, you're Buzzie Waters."

"Hey—"

"Don't interrupt, Joe. Let me do the talking. I've got it all figured out. Here, sit down."

He gave me a funny look, but he sat down. And right there is when I knew I had him. I started to pitch.

"Let's see how it adds up," I said. "First of all, nobody knew Buzzie was out here. From the looks of things he must have driven out alone late last night and sat up drinking by himself. Sid says somebody saw him in Lindy's—I'll check that and get all the information; who was with him, what he'd been doing. All you need to do is pick it up from there."

"But—"

"Listen to me." I lit a cigarette and my hands weren't even trembling now. "I've been over the room. There's no blood, and this mess looks like an ordinary drinking bout. Besides, what's to prevent cleaning it up? Nobody is going to be suspicious anyway, because Buzzie Waters is still around."

"That's right," Joe nodded. "There he is. And what will you do about it?"

"We will do something," I told him. "There's a nice deep quarry just across the bluffs, and it's a dark night. A few heavy rocks, and there's no problem."

"No problem. Buzzie Waters goes on as usual." He paused. "But what happens to Joe Traskin?"

I met his stare. "Nothing," I said. "Let's be frank. Whatever did happen to you before you met Buzzie last year? You were just another working stiff, weren't you? Drove a truck or something, no family, no ties."

"You've been reading my mail," he murmured.

"I checked. It's my business. But never mind that, now. Let's get back to facts. Buzzie picked you up because of the resemblance. It's damned close, too, and that was a break for you. You acted as his stand-in. You even showed up for public appearances in his place, and I think once or twice he rang you to pose for publicity shots when he wanted out—is that right?"

Joe didn't answer, but he grinned.

"All right. So you had a year as his stand-in. And then, last week, he fired you. What happened?"

He shrugged. "I checked out of my hotel, took a room uptown. I been there most of the time, since."

"And when you run out of dough, you'd move," I went on. "End up driving a truck somewhere again. Maybe once in a while somebody would tell you you looked like Buzzie Waters, but that's all. I hate to say it, but you're expendable, Joe. Without the stand-in job, you're a small nothing. Nobody around the industry even wondered what became of you when Buzzie let you go. You just disappeared. Why, you don't even have an agent, do you? And no family to worry about."

"You got hold of me in one hell of a hurry, though," he remarked.

"Just luck." I pulled a slip of paper out of my pocket. "I found your name and number written down on this scratchpad on the desk."

Joe nodded. "That's right, I remember calling him when I moved, to give him my new number, just in case. Maybe he was going to give me a jingle today."

"We'll never know," I told him. "And it isn't important. What is important is that you can drop out of the picture without anybody getting suspicious. You just left town, that's all."

"It still sounds risky to me."

"Nonsense. Remember, seven-eight years ago, this guy who worked a lot of shows as a walk-on because he was a double for Harry Truman? How often do you wonder whatever became of him?" I paused. "No, there won't be any danger. I promise you that. And believe me, I have more at stake than you do. But the moment I saw your name and number on that scratchpad, I knew I had the problem licked."

"All right." Joe lit a cigarette of his own. "Maybe I can vanish without trouble. But that doesn't mean I can show up again as Buzzie Waters."

I shrugged. "I'd think about it if I were you, Joe. I'd think about it very strongly. It'd be worth your while.

"How much?"

It was my turn to grin, when I saw his face, heard the note of anticipation in his voice.

"I won't offer you a cent," I said. "Not a cent. All I offer you is the Buzzie Waters name. And his house here, and the place in town, and his cars, and his bank account, and his present weekly income. Plus his contract, his fame, his future. The works, on a silver platter. All you have to do is say 'yes.' "

"That's all, eh?" Joe gripped the arms of his chair. "Aren't you forgetting a few things? Buzzie Waters is—was—a great comic. He has to get up there and do a performance every week; he's supposed to kill the people."

"You know better than that, Joe. We've got four writers who make all the funnies. And the way Buzzie goofed off last season, he didn't even bother to sit in on the script sessions. Didn't really memorize his routines, either; just read the stuff off the teleprompter. With his own mugging and fly-catching, of course. But you can get up on his voice and delivery and technique in a week. I'll see that you get a chance to study kinies of all his old shows. Since he never did any singing or dancing, there's nothing to it. Buzzie is a synthetic product, Joe—just a combination of the proper writers, the right buildup. If I had your resemblance, I could do him myself."

Joe nodded. "You didn't think much of him, did you, Millaney?"

"Who did?" I stood up. "Let's be honest. If his friends knew what happened here today, they'd chip in and buy me a medal. Only they don't, and besides, I doubt if he had any friends."

"Maybe you're prejudiced." Joe hesitated. "But there's one thing that's certain. He knew an awful lot of people. Perhaps I can get away with the Buzzie Waters routine on camera, but what about in private, with everybody who knew him?"

It was time for me to grin again. "You've already had a little experience at that. You stooged for him with the photographers, and nobody knew the difference. The rest is just a matter of boning up on the part; learning the details of his life and his associations. I'll get you every clip on Buzzie that was ever printed; I'll see to it that you have access to everything in our files on the guy, and we've got a pretty complete history. I told you I was thinking like an executive, Joe. I worked all this out from the moment I decided to call you, and I've covered all the angles. Buzzie had no regular business manager, and he wasn't buddy-buddy with anyone except a lot of stooges and drinking companions. Another break for us—I happen to know he was between psychiatrists, too. So there's nobody really intimate with the guy. And as for details, I'm sure I can supply you with the works. In a week you'll be more like Buzzie than Buzzie himself. Except that you won't be drinking so much, you won't be such a goof-off, you won't be such an egotistical, loud-mouthed heel."

"You hated him, didn't you?"

I sighed. "How do you suppose old Doc Frankenstein felt after he saw what kind of a monster he created? That's how I felt about Buzzie. I made him out of nothing."

"And now I'm supposed to be the new monster."

"What have you got to lose?"

Joe stared at me. "All right," he said. "What have I got to lose?"

I held out my hand.

He had to reach in order to shake it, because we were standing on either side of the body. . . .

In TV, you do it with a dissolve or a fade-out. In books, you do it with asterisks or a new chapter heading. But in life, you have to live through the passage of time.

Luckily for me, there were no hitches.

Getting rid of the body in the quarry after dark was no problem. It was no picnic, either, but it had to be done. And once we did it, the worst was over—for me, anyway.

The big burden fell on Joe from then on, and I was happy to see him pitch in and do a job. All the details went through without a hitch; checking out of his room, getting rid of his personal effects, moving into Buzzie's place. I rigged up a story for Sid Richter about finding Buzzie and sobering him up, and the rehearsal went through as scheduled the next day. If Joe made any slips, they were probably attributed to a hangover. And I didn't hear about any slips. I spent a lot of time with him during the next two weeks; giving him the data he needed and coaching him on names, associations, references, friendships—or what passed for friendships in Buzzie's world of beards, hunkers, stooges, mooches, and sycophants. It all seemed remarkably easy, once he got into the swing of it. We even had penmanship lessons; in a few days he had the signature down pat, and the kinescopes gave him all he needed to know about Buzzie the comic.

Of course I sweated a lot, and as the date for the first show approached my forehead was never dry. But somehow, even at the worst, it seemed easier than if the real Buzzie had been around. Whatever headaches came up, I at least knew I had somebody willing to work them out with me; we operated as a team. With Buzzie, I'd have been fighting him all the way.

Joe did a good job for me. He was a quick study, and I kept him busy, protected him from interviewers and from most of the hangers-on. Getting ready for the fall season was a perfect excuse, too. And once he got over the hurdle of the first show, I had a feeling we'd be in business.

So he sweated bullets, and I sweated atomic bombs, and the big night came, and then my forehead was dry again.

He went on and he fractured them.

He was as good as Buzzie had ever been. Hell, he was better than Buzzie! There wasn't a fluff, there wasn't a boo-boo. He cut a fine show.

And after it was over, he went home to his apartment and slept, instead of going out and throwing cheesecake at the waiters.

Truth to tell, I was the one who went out and celebrated. I had a feeling I'd earned it.

In the weeks that followed, everything was copasetic. No problems. It got so that I left Joe pretty much on his own; he seemed able to handle his own life without any more help. Oh, I kept tabs on him, of course, and we got together, but there were no bloopers, no hitches.

“How do you like it?” I asked him.

“Never enjoyed anything so much in my life,” he told me, and I could see he was telling the truth.

So I stopped worrying.

By the time two months had gone by, I’d almost forgotten the way things had happened. I know it sounds crazy, but that’s the truth; the real Buzzie Waters faded out of my memory, and so did that unpleasant afternoon. All water under the dam. Or in the quarry. . . .

Then the cat came back.

It wasn’t a cat, really. It was a canary.

She twittered her way past my secretary one morning and took a perch in my private office.

“Melody Morgan!” I exclaimed, with a delight I did not feel.

But here she was. Melody Morgan—Buzzie’s little playmate.

The minute I saw her, I started sweating again. She had no business in my office. A small-time chirp never gets that far, usually; in fact, she wouldn’t even dream of trying to see me. Let alone saunter in, sit down, and dangle her calves over the side of my best overstuffed chair. But here she was.

“Something I can do for you?” I asked.

“Why, yes, Mr. Millaney. I think there is.” She fluttered her eyelashes and gave me that coy look. “I want a job.”

“A job, eh?”

“I’m a singer, you know.”

“Yes, I know.” I pursed my lips. “But that’s not my department. You want Loomis over in Auditions, or Seagrist, in Casting.”

“No, Mr. Millaney. I’ve talked to them. They don’t have anything to suggest.”

“Things are tight, eh?”

She smiled. “Not exactly. To be perfectly frank, Mr. Millaney, they don’t think I’m a very good singer. That’s why they never hire me.”

“Oh.”

“And since I’m being frank, I might as well admit that I don’t think I’m a very good singer, either.”

“But still, you think I’d hire you.”

“Right, Mr. Millaney.”

“Any reason?”

“Yes. I’m a good friend of Buzzie Waters.”

“I know.”

“I’ve seen quite a lot of him these past few weeks.”

“I—I didn’t know that.” I didn’t, either, and I cursed myself.

“You’re a busy man, Mr. Millaney. You can’t keep track of everything.”

“That’s true.” It was true, but that was one thing I should have kept track of. Joe would naturally have to see Buzzie’s girl friend, sooner or later. But why couldn’t it have been later?

“Anyway, I’d like you to give me a job,” she said.

“You have a particular show in mind?”

She shrugged. “It doesn’t matter, really. You can give me a general contract with the network. I can do guest shots, fill-ins, standby availabilities.” Melody Morgan’s eyelashes stopped fluttering and she gave me a level look. “In fact, since I’m really a lousy singer, I’ll give you a break. I won’t actually insist on appearing at all. Just give me a contract and that’ll be good enough.”

“Well.” I hesitated. “We do have a stock contract deal, yes. The usual minimum, on a six-month option basis—”

“Please.” She stood up. “I’d like a five-year deal. The non-cancellable kind. And I wasn’t thinking of the minimum.”

“What were you thinking of?”

“One thousand a week.”

She sang the words at me, real pear-shaped tones. Her delivery was perfect.

I stood there. I had a lot of answers, and none of them were any good. I could have asked her if she was crazy, if she'd flipped, who did she think she was, who did she think she was talking to? But I knew these lines wouldn't help. Buzzie Waters' four writers couldn't feed me the topper, either.

I cleared my throat and said, "Does Buzzie know you're here?"

She laughed. "Certainly not. We both are aware of that. Buzzie doesn't know anything, any more. Does he, Mr. Millaney?" She saw the look on my face, and she laughed again. "I won't ask you to answer that last question. It might be embarrassing. Just give me your answer on the job."

"And if I don't?"

"Then I'm afraid I'll have to ask the last question again. And a lot of other questions. Such as whatever became of that character Buzzie fired, that Joe Traskin? I haven't seen him around lately—or have I?"

I leaned forward. "How did you—?"

"Please! Now you're embarrassing me! When a girl is as friendly as I was with Buzzie, she notices things, you know? Little changes, differences. And she begins to put two and two together. Then she starts checking up. Until things add up."

"What do they add up to?"

"One thousand a week." She was singing again. And there was only one way to keep her from singing.

"All right," I said. "But I needn't remind you what the deal is. You'll have to keep your mouth closed."

"A pleasure."

It would take a lot of fixing, a lot of squaring. It would take a lot of explaining as to why I'd coughed up a big non-cancellable to a two-bit thrush. In the end, I might have to pay for it out of my own pocket. But there was no other way. Not now. Not until I talked to Joe. . . .

Joe couldn't help me.

“I tell you, I don’t know a damned thing about it,” he said. “I never guessed she suspected anything.”

“But why did you have to hang around?”

“You know the answer to that one. Because she and Buzzie were so close. I couldn’t drop her, or there’d be real trouble, right away. You know he was keeping her in that apartment of hers. She’d stir up a stink—”

“What do you call this?” I asked. “A thousand a week for five years! That smells to high heaven.”

“Tough. But that’s the way the ball bounces.”

“It could stop bouncing.”

“What do you mean?”

I stared at the ceiling. “Suppose you have a pet, Joe. Say, a canary. And you get tired of it. Maybe you don’t want to hear it singing any more. What do you do?”

He wasn’t staring at the ceiling. He was staring at me, and shaking his head. “Get this, chum,” he said. “I’m very fond of pets. And this pet in particular. I like things just the way they are. If I’m going to be Buzzie Waters, I’m going to have everything he had. That was our deal.”

“Yes, but what’s so special about this dame? I mean, you can have anything you want. My friend Maggie would get you—”

“I’m not interested in Shetland ponies. This canary satisfies me. And you want me to be satisfied, don’t you, pal?”

“Yes. Of course I do, Joe.”

“Call me Buzzie. Everybody else does.” He bent over the desk. “And if you want them to keep on calling me Buzzie, you’d better not go rumbling the details. You got away with it once, but you can’t be that lucky twice in a row. Leave well enough alone.”

“All right.”

Only it wasn’t all right, and I knew it. The thousand bucks was bad enough, but Joe’s new attitude was worse. He’d never tried to throw his weight around before, and it was a bad sign.

Before the week was out there was a worse one. He called and asked me to come up to his town apartment for a talk.

"How about tonight, at nine, sharp?"

I agreed.

I'd be there, and I'd be sharp. It was time to clamp down, once and for all.

Joe was waiting for me when I arrived. He looked very much at home, wearing one of Buzzie's monogrammed robes and one of Buzzie's big, phoney smiles. And I could tell he'd been sampling some of Buzzie's favorite after-dinner liqueurs, too. The coffee table was loaded with bottles.

"Welcome to humble abode," he greeted me. "Please to sit down."

"Never mind the routine," I told him. "I've got a few things to say to you, and I want you to listen carefully. It's time I straightened you out. Frankly, I don't like this independent attitude of yours. From now on, I'm issuing orders. Here's how we're going to work in the future."

"Save it," he said. "It won't be necessary."

"Why not?"

"Because we won't be working together in the future." He went around in back of his desk. "I said I had news for you. Look at this."

He flipped a sheaf of papers at me.

I glanced at the heading. "A contract? And with those lousy—"

"Please. You're speaking about my future employers, as of five short weeks from now."

"But you belong to us."

"On thirteen-week options, with cancellation privileges after a month's advance notification."

"You wouldn't leave Buzzin' Around."

"Certainly not. I'll take it with me. Oh, not the name. But most of my people will come."

"Your people? Who do you think you are?"

"Buzzie Waters. And so do they, and so does everyone. You fixed that, didn't you?"

My throat hurt. It was hard to talk. “But you can’t quit—”

“For seven grand more a week I can do anything. You won’t match the figure.”

“Of course, I won’t.” I stared down at the coffee table. “I don’t have to. We’re in this thing together. We’ll stay in. I made you and I can break you.”

“I don’t get it.”

“Then let me spell it out for you.” I smiled at him. It hurt to smile, too, but I made it. “When I called you over to Buzzie’s house that afternoon I told you I was an executive, that I had everything figured. Well, it was the truth. I knew just what I was doing, and why.

“I could have disposed of his body alone and called you in later. But I had a reason for wanting you there, to help me. Not because I needed your physical assistance, but because this made you an accessory to murder. An accessory after the fact, as they say in court. Or will say, anytime you try to cross me.”

“So that’s how it is!”

I nodded. “Maybe you think I’d never confess. But if you walk out on me, I will. Because you know what happens. If Buzzin’ Around goes off, it’s my neck. They’ll crucify me. Letting you get away will wash me up with this network and any other outfit in the business. I’ve put my life into this job. If I lose it, I might as well lose the rest, too. So I’m warning you right now—walk out, and I’ll talk. When they put me in the chair you’ll be sitting in my lap.”

“You won’t stop at anything, will you?”

“That’s right,” I said. “I’m an executive.”

“You’re a murderer,” he murmured. “And that’s the real reason I signed this contract. You see, I hadn’t really figured it out.”

“What do you mean?”

“Think back, now,” he said. “When I went out to the house you told me that what happened there was an accident. I was willing to buy that. And I could see some sense in protecting you, and a lot more sense in protecting all the other people on the show. After all, it wouldn’t help anyone if I turned you in. So I went along with the gag.

“Then I found out you really were a killer. I found it out the other day, when you asked me to help you get rid of Melody. Only a real killer thinks like that, Millaney. That’s when I decided to walk out on you. And that’s what I’m going to do.”

“You’d better not try,” I whispered. “I’ll talk.”

He shook his head. “You forget. I have an alibi.”

I stared at him.

“Yes, an alibi. Melody. She’ll swear I spent that afternoon with her. I’m covered.” He grinned. “Matter of fact, I did spend part of the afternoon with her. And some people saw me go in. None of them saw me come out again, luckily enough.”

I managed to choke out the words. “But how can you be covered? You weren’t at Melody’s place. You didn’t even know Melody then. She never even met you, until after Buzzie died.”

He grinned again.

“I’ve got news for you,” he said. “Buzzie never died.”

“But—”

“You killed Joe Traskin,” he murmured. “I’m Buzzie Waters.”

I just stood there, staring at the coffee table. It whirled.

“Now let’s play the flip side,” he was saying. “I was out at my house when you called, sounding off. I didn’t feel like making rehearsal, and I didn’t feel like putting up with your ravings. You said you were coming right over.

“So I got this great idea for a gag. I called Joe up and told him to get out there on the double, in a cab. When he showed up, I offered him his old job back—on condition that he stand in for me and listen to you blow your top. We had a couple of drinks on it and he said okay. But he was worried the landlady at his rooming house might latch onto his belongings, because he was back on his rent. I told him that was no problem—if he gave me the key I'd stop by and settle with her, then bring his junk out to the house. That was the deal.

"Only on the way I dropped in to see Melody. We had a ball, laughing it up whenever we thought of you screaming at poor Joe. Then I left her and stopped at his place. That's when you called.

"Of course, I didn't figure what had happened. Not until I walked in and found you—and Joe. The poor jerk must have kept right on hitting the bottle after I left him. I don't blame him; he didn't want to face you. Well, the gag backfired on him, didn't it?

"But when you told me about the accident, I decided the gag had to go on. And that's when it got really big—when you made this terrific deal with me to play myself! Funniest damned thing I ever heard of—nobody'd ever believe it, would they? And that's why I'm not in any trouble. Who'd ever think I'd help get rid of my double's body, just so I could play myself? It doesn't make sense, because I have no motive. You're the guy with the motive. Me, I've got Melody and my alibi."

He started to laugh.

I almost moved.

"And Melody! That was the real topper, when I told her to give you the old shakedown routine. She said she thought you'd snap your cap!"

I tried to move, but I couldn't. "You put her up to it?" I whispered. "You weren't content with what you'd done, you had to let her bleed me, too?"

He nodded. "It was a gag, like I said. My best gag. A real weirdie, but then you don't have a sense of humor, do you? You don't understand what makes a comic, because you're just an executive. Or you were." He waved the contract at me. "After I walk out, we'll see. There's no way you can stop me, you and your executive mind—"

"Oh yes there is," I said, and I could talk loudly now and I could move swiftly. I had one of the bottles from the coffee table, and I swung it up, and I swung it down, and I swung it again, and even after the bottle broke I kept on using the jagged piece in my hand.

It was just the scene out at the house, all over again. Except for one difference—now I didn't have any double to call in. And I couldn't think like an executive any more. Buzzie Waters told the truth, there at the end. I'm a murderer.

And what can a murderer do now?

All In the Family

Robert Bloch, author of the best-selling PSYCHO (S&S) and other novels, has become widely known in recent years for his stories and novels about minds in the shadows—tormented minds . . . But here is a vignette about a man who proposed to dispose of his wife—and anticipated as problems . . .

It is sometimes easier for a husband to kill his wife than for a wife to dispose of her husband.

This is particularly true if the husband is fortunate enough to be a mortician by profession.

Carl Somers came to this conclusion one night in May, and by the end of June he was ready to test his theory. He had his plan perfected and all he needed now was an opportunity.

Everything was in his favor. His wife, Celia, was a semiinvalid who had made no friends in the community, and there would be no questions asked when he circulated the news that she had gone to Arizona for her health. In fact, several doctors had already urged her to do just that. He could fake some letters from her if necessary, but there wouldn't be much talk. By the time anyone became suspicious, Carl himself would have disappeared. He planned to sell the funeral home immediately and tell people he was joining Celia in Arizona. Oh, it would work splendidly—and he knew just what he was going to do.

There was only one fly in the ointment; a big fat fly named Elmer. Elmer was Carl's brother, and a sanctimonious prig. He lived in a town about forty miles away, and the two of them met infrequently.

But Elmer knew that Carl had married Celia for her late father's mortuary establishment, and he didn't approve of it. He also knew that Carl liked to step out occasionally, and he didn't approve of that, either. In fact he disapproved of everything not connected with his own preoccupation with the church choir.

When Carl thought about his brother and his possible suspicions, he hesitated. And then Fate stepped in and provided him with an unexpected opportunity. For on the Fourth of July, Elmer's wife died.

It was a sudden heart attack, sustained after a picnic outing, and when Elmer came to Carl with the news he was desolated. Carl pretended to share his brother's grief, but inwardly he was overjoyed. It wasn't likely, under the circumstances, that Elmer would be snooping around or asking questions.

Carl lost no time in telling him there'd be difficulty in getting word to Celia so that she could return for the funeral—she was already en route to Arizona, by train, he said.

Elmer was too distraught to do anything more than nod. He didn't pursue the matter; just broke down completely in the midst of choosing a coffin from Carl's ample stock.

In the end, Carl selected the coffin for Elmer's wife, and that suited him perfectly. He picked a nice large one, then went upstairs and told Celia about it.

"You see, it has to be big,'* he explained. "Because you're going to be buried in it, too."

Celia's only answer was a gurgle, for at that moment Carl thrust the scalpel into her neck.

It was a rather messy death, but Carl didn't mind. He dragged the body down and laid it out on a slab, next to that of his sister-in-law. He made a nice job of it on her—using the best materials and putting in the fancy smilers. He wanted her to look good when the mourners came. With Celia, he didn't do a thing. It wouldn't be at all necessary. Right after the funeral service Carl would take the coffin around in back and load it onto the hearse. But before he did so, he'd just dismiss his assistant for a moment on some pretext or another and pop Celia inside. By the time the pall-bearers were ready to do their token service at the door of the funeral home, Celia would be right where he wanted her. And in another half hour she'd be buried.

That's exactly how it worked out. There wasn't a flaw or a hitch in the entire scheme. Carl gloated as he watched the coffin being lowered into the grave, wondering why his brother carried on so. You'd think Elmer would be happy to get rid of his wife, too, the old horror. Odd that his brother should be so different.

At least Carl thought it was odd, until he returned to the mortuary and found the tall man waiting for him.

"My name's Swenson," the tall man said. "Police. I hate to disturb you at a time like this, but I'm afraid I'll have to ask you a few questions about your brother and his relations with his wife. Do you happen to know if they ever had any serious differences of opinion?"

"My brother? Differences of opinion—?"

"I'll be blunt," Swenson said. "There's talk going around that they quarreled. Your brother got mixed up with some girl in the church choir. We checked with a pharmacist who tells us he sold your brother some arsenic last week, and it sounds bad."

Carl began to tremble violently.

Swenson put his hand on Carl's shoulder and sighed. "Sorry," he said. "I know I shouldn't bother you. All this must come as quite a shock, but sometimes one never knows what's going on, even with one's own brother. Of course there's one sure way of finding out that will spare you any further trouble or embarrassment. I've got the permit right here. We're going to dig up the grave and reopen the coffin."

The Plot Is the Thing

There are certainly worse ways to spend a rainy Saturday than to watch a re-run of, say, The Wolf Man*, starring Lon Chaney, Jr., Bela Lugosi and Maria Ouspenskaya (right! the old gypsy fortune teller). We suspected all along that horror films are best consumed in moderation, but not for the horrible reason suggested in the story below. Mr. Bloch is the author of a contemporary horror classic,* PSYCHO*, and we don't doubt that he knows what he's talking about.*

WHEN THEY BROKE INTO THE apartment, they found her sitting in front of the television set, watching an old movie.

Peggy couldn't understand why they made such a fuss about that. She liked to watch old movies—the Late Show, the Late, Late Show, even the All Night Show. That was really the best, because they generally ran the horror pictures. Peggy tried to explain this to them, but they kept prowling around the apartment, looking at the dust on the furniture and the dirty sheets on the unmade bed. Somebody said there was green mould on the dishes in the sink; it's true she hadn't bothered, to wash them for quite a long time, but then she simply hadn't bothered to eat for several days, either.

It wasn't as though she didn't have any money; she told them about the bank-accounts. But shopping and cooking and housekeeping was just too much trouble, and besides, she really didn't like going outside and seeing all those people. So if she preferred watching TV, that was her business wasn't it?

They just looked at each other and shook their heads and made some phone-calls. And then the ambulance came, and they helped her dress. Helped her? They practically forced her, and by the time she realized where they were taking her it was too late.

At first they were very nice to her at the hospital, but they kept asking those idiotic questions. When she said she had no relatives or friends they wouldn't believe her, and when they checked and found out it was true it only made things worse. Peggy got angry and said she was going home, and it all ended with a hypo in the arm.

There were lots of hypos after that, in in between times this Dr. Crane kept after her. He was one of the heads of staff and at first Peggy liked him, but not when he began to pry.

She tried to explain to him that she'd always been a loner, even before her parents died. And she told him there was no reason for her to work, with all that money. Somehow, he got it out of her about how she used to keep going to the movies, at least one every day, only she liked horror pictures and of course there weren't quite that many, so after while she just watched them on TV. Because it was easier, and you didn't have to go home along dark streets after seeing something frightening. At home she could lock herself in, and as long as she had the television going she didn't feel lonely. Besides, she could watch movies all night, and this helped her insomnia. Sometimes the old pictures were pretty gruesome and this made her nervous, but she felt more nervous when she didn't watch. Because in the movies, no matter how horrible things seemed for the heroine, she was always rescued in the end. And that was better than the way things generally worked out in real life, wasn't it?

Dr. Crane didn't think so. And he wouldn't let her have any television in her room now, either. He kept talking to Peggy about the need to face reality, and the dangers of retreating into a fantasy world and identifying with frightened heroines. The way he made it sound, you'd think she wanted to be menaced, wanted to be killed, or even raped.

And when he started all that nonsense about a "nervous disorder" and told her about his plans for treatment, Peggy knew she had to escape. Only she never got a chance. Before she realized it, they had arranged for the lobotomy.

Peggy knew what a lobotomy was, of course. And she was afraid of it, because it meant tampering with the brain. She remembered some mad doctor—Lionel Atwill, or George Zucco?—saying that by tampering with the secrets of the human brain one can change reality. "There are some things we were not meant to know," he had whispered. But that, of course, was in a movie. And Dr. Crane wasn't mad. She was the mad one. Or was she? He certainly looked insane—she kept trying to break free after they strapped her down and he came after her—she remembered the way everything gleamed. His eyes, and the long needle. The long needle, probing into her brain to change reality—

The funny thing was, when she woke up she felt fine. "I'm like a different person, Doctor."

And it was true. No more jitters; she was perfectly calm. And she wanted to eat, and she didn't have insomnia, and she could dress herself and talk to the nurses, even kid around with them. The big thing was that she didn't worry about watching television any more. She could scarcely remember any of those old movies that had disturbed her. Peggy wasn't a bit disturbed now. And even Dr. Crane knew it.

At the end of the second week he was willing to let her go home. They had a little chat, and he complimented her on how well she was doing, asked her about her plans for the future. When Peggy admitted she hadn't figured anything out yet, Dr. Crane suggested she take a trip. She promised to think it over.

But it wasn't until she got back to the apartment that Peggy made up her mind. The place was a mess. The moment she walked in she knew she couldn't stand it. All that dirt and grime and squalor—it was like a movie set, really, with clothes scattered everywhere and dishes piled in the sink. Peggy decided right then and there she'd take a vacation. Around the world, maybe. Why not? She had the money. And it would be interesting to see all the real things she'd seen represented on the screen all these years.

So Peggy dissolved into a travel agency and montaged into shopping and packing and faded out to London.

Strange, she didn't think of it in that way at the time. But looking back, she began to realize that this is the way things seemed to happen. She'd come to a decision, or go somewhere and do something, and all of a sudden she'd find herself in another setting—just like in a movie, where they cut from scene to scene. When she first became aware of it she was a little worried; perhaps she was having blackouts. After all, her brain had been tampered with. But there was nothing really alarming about the little mental blanks. In a way they were very convenient, just like in the movies; you don't particularly want to waste time watching the heroine brush her teeth or pack her clothing or put on cosmetics. The plot is the thing. That's what's real.

And everything was real, now. No more uncertainty. Peggy could admit to herself that before the operation there had been times when she wasn't quite sure about things; sometimes what she saw on the screen was more convincing than the dull gray fog which seemed to surround her in daily life.

But that was gone, now. Whatever that needle had done, it had managed to pierce the fog. Everything was very clear, very sharp and definite, like good black-and-white camera work. And she herself felt so much more capable and confident. She was well-dressed, well-groomed, attractive again. The extras moved along the streets in an orderly fashion and didn't bother her. And the bit-players spoke their lines crisply, performed their functions, and got out of the scene. Odd that she should think of them that way—they weren't "bit-players" at all; just travel clerks and waiters and stewards and then, at the hotel, bellboys and maids. They seemed to fade in and out of the picture on cue. All smiles, like in the early part of a good horror movie, where at first everything seems bright and cheerful.

Paris was where things started to go wrong. This guide—a sort of Eduardo Cianelli type, in fact he looked to be an almost dead ringer for Cianelli as he was many years ago—was showing her through the Opera House. He happened to mention something about the catacombs, and that rang a bell.

She thought about Erik. That was his name, Erik—The Phantom of the Opera. He had lived in the catacombs underneath the Opera House. Of course, it was only a picture, but she thought perhaps the guide would know about it and she mentioned Erik's name as a sort of joke.

That's when the guide turned pale and began to tremble. And then he ran. Just ran off and left her standing there.

Peggy knew something was wrong, then. The scene just seemed to dissolve—that part didn't worry her, it was just another one of those temporary blackouts she was getting used to—and when Peggy regained awareness, she was in this bookstore asking a clerk about Gaston Leroux.

And this was what frightened her. She remembered distinctly that The Phantom of the Opera had been written by Gaston Leroux, but here was this French bookstore clerk telling her there was no such author.

That's what they said when she called the library. No such author—and no such book. Peggy opened her mouth, but the scene was already dissolving . . .

In Germany she rented a car, and she was enjoying the scenery when she came to this burned mill and the ruins of the castle beyond. She knew where she was, of course, but it couldn't be—not until she got out of the car, moved up to the great door, and in the waning sun of twilight, read the engraved legend on the stone. Frankenstein.

There was a faint sound from behind the door, a sound of muffled, dragging footsteps, moving closer. Peggy screamed, and ran.

Now she knew where she was running to. Perhaps she'd find safety behind the Iron Curtain. Instead there was another castle, and she heard the howling of a wolf in the distance, saw the bat swoop from the shadows as she fled.

And in an English library in Prague, Peggy searched the volumes of literary biography. There was no listing for Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, none for Bram Stoker.

Of course not. There wouldn't be, in a movie world, because when the characters are real, their "authors" do not exist.

Peggy remembered the way Larry Talbot had changed before her eyes, metamorphizing into the howling wolf. She remembered the sly purr of the Count's voice, saying, "I do not drink—wine". And she shuddered, and longed to be far away from the superstitious peasantry who draped wolfbane outside their windows at night.

She needed the reassurance of sanity in an English-speaking country. She'd go to London, see a doctor immediately.

Then she remembered what was in London. Another werewolf. And Mr. Hyde. And the Ripper.

Peggy fled through a fadeout, back to Paris. She found the name of a psychiatrist, made her appointment. She was perfectly prepared to face her problem now, perfectly prepared to face reality.

But she was not prepared to face the baldheaded little man with the sinister accent and the bulging eyes. She knew him—Dr. Gogol, in Mad Love. She also knew Peter Lorre had passed on, knew Mad Love was only a movie, made the year she was born. But that was in another country, and besides, the wench was dead.

The wench was dead, but Peggy was alive. "I am a stranger and afraid, in a world I never made." Or had she made this world? She wasn't sure. All she knew was that she had to escape.

Where? It couldn't be Egypt, because that's where he would be—the wrinkled, hideous image of the Mummy superimposed itself momentarily. The Orient? What about Fu Manchu?

Back to America, then? Home is where the heart is—but there'd be a knife waiting for that heart when the shower-curtains were ripped aside and the creature of Psycho screamed and slashed . . .

Somehow she managed to remember a haven, born in other films. The South Seas—Dorothy Lamour, Jon Hall, the friendly natives in the tropical paradise. There was escape.

Peggy boarded the ship in Marseilles. It was a tramp steamer but the cast—crew, rather—was reassuringly small. At first she spent most of her time below deck, huddled in her berth. Oddly enough, it was getting to be like it had been before. Before the operation, that is, before the needle bit into her brain, twisting it, or distorting the world. Changing reality, as Lionel Atwill had put it. She should have listened to them—Atwill, Zucco, Basil Rathbone, Edward Van Sloan, John Carradine. They may have been a little mad, but they were good doctors, dedicated scientists. They meant well. "There are some things we were not meant to know."

When they reached the tropics, Peggy felt much better. She regained her appetite, prowled the deck, went into the galley and joked with the Chinese cook. The crew seemed aloof, but they all treated her with the greatest respect. She began to realize she'd done the right thing—this was escape. And the warm scent of tropic nights beguiled her. From now on, this would be her life; drifting through nameless, uncharted seas, safe from the role of heroine with all its haunting and horror.

It was hard to believe she'd been so frightened. There were no Phantoms, no Werewolves in this world. Perhaps she didn't need a doctor. She was facing reality, and it was pleasant enough. There were no movies here, no television; her fears were all part of a long-forgotten nightmare.

One evening, after dinner, Peggy returned to her cabin with something nagging at the back of her brain. The Captain had put in one of his infrequent appearances at the table, and he kept looking at her all through the meal. Something about the way he squinted at her was disturbing. Those little pig-eyes of his reminded her of someone. Noah Beery? Stanley Fields?

She kept trying to remember, and at the same time she was dozing off. Dozing off much too quickly. Had her food been drugged?

Peggy tried to sit up. Through the porthole she caught a reeling glimpse of land beyond, but then everything began to whirl and it was too late . . .

When she awoke she was already on the island, and the woolly-headed savages were dragging her through the gate, howling and waving their spears.

They tied her and left her and then Peggy heard the chanting. She looked up and saw the huge shadow. Then she knew where she was and what H was, and she screamed.

Even over her own screams she could hear the natives chanting, just one word, over and over again. It sounded like, “Kong”.

Life In Our Time

Recently we read a definition of “Camp” (Susan Sontag’s?). Something is "Campy” when it’s so “far out” that it’s “in” so “bad” that it’s “good—or put another way, so lacking in culture that it is culture. (Norman Mailer has defined Camp as “the art of the cannibal, the art which evolved out of the bankruptcy of the novel of manners.”)

But is Camp, or even Campiness, truly the most representative symbol of our Twentieth Century civilization? We don’t believe it; perhaps more accurately, we don’t want to believe it . . .

WHEN HARRY’S TIUME CAPSULE arrived, Jill made him put it in the guest house.

All it was, it turned out, was a big long metal box with a cover that could be sealed tight and welded so that the air couldn’t get at what was inside. Jill was really quite disappointed with it.

But then she was quite disappointed with Harry, too. Professor Harrison Cramer, B.A., B.S., M.A., Ph.D. Half the alphabet was wasted on nothing. At those flaky faculty cocktail parties, people were always telling her, “It must be wonderful to be married to a brilliant man like your husband.” Brother, if they only knew!

It wasn’t just that Harry was fifteen years older than she was. After all, look at Rex Harrison and Richard Burton or even Larry Olivier for that matter. But Harry wasn't the movie-star type. Not even the mad-scientist type, like Vinnie Price in those crazy high-camp pictures. He was nothing.

Of course Jill got the message long before she married him. But he did have the big house and all that loot he'd inherited from his mother. She figured on making a few changes, and she actually did manage to redo the house so that it looked halfway presentable, with the help of that fagilleh interior decorator. But she couldn't redo Harry. Maybe he needed a fagilleh interior decorator to work on him, too; she certainly couldn't change him. And outside of what she managed to squeeze out of him for the redecorating, Jill hadn't been able to get her hands on any of the loot, either. Harry wasn't interested in entertaining or going out or taking cruises, and whenever she mentioned sable jackets he mumbled something under his breath about "conspicuous consumption," whatever that was. He didn't like art or the theatre, he didn't drink, he didn't even watch TV. And he wore flannel pajamas in bed. All the time.

After a couple of months Jill was ready to climb the walls. Then she began thinking about Reno, and that's where Rick came in. Rick was her attorney. At least, that's the way it started out to be, but he had other ideas. Particularly for those long afternoons when Harry was lecturing at seminars or whatever he did over there at the University. Pretty soon Jill forgot about Reno; Rick was all for one of those quickie deals you get down in Mexico. He was sure he could make it stick and still see to it that she got her fifty-fifty share under the community property laws, without any waiting. It could all be done in twenty-four hours, no hassle; they'd take off together, just like eloping. Bang, you're divorced, bang, you're remarried, and then, bang, bang, bang—

So all Jill had to worry about was finding the right time. And even that was no problem, after Harry told her about the capsule.

"I'm to be in charge of the project," he said. "Full authority to choose what will be representative of our culture. Quite a responsibility. But I welcome the challenge."

"So what's a time capsule?" Jill wanted to know.

Harry went into a long routine and she didn't really listen, just enough to get the general idea. The thing was, Harry had to pick out all kinds of junk to be sealed up in this gizmo so that sometime—ten thousand years from now, maybe—somebody would come along and dig it up and open it and be able to tell what kind of a civilization we had. Big deal. But from the way Harry went on, you'd think he'd just won the Grand Prix or something.

"We're going to put the capsule in the foundation of the new Humanities Building." he told her.

"What are humanities?" Jill asked, but Harry just gave her one of those Christ-how-can-you-be-so-stupid? looks that always seemed to start their quarrels, and they would have had a fight then and there, too, only he added something about how the dedication ceremonies for the new building would take place on May 1st, and he'd have to hurry to get everything arranged for the big day. Including writing his dedicatory address.

May 1st was all Jill need to hear. That was on a Friday, and if Harry was going to be tied up making a speech at the dedication, it would be an A-OK time to make a little flight across the border. So she managed to call Rick and tell him and he said yeah, sure, perfect.

"It's only ten days from now," Jill reminded him. "We've got a lot to do."

She didn't know it, but it turned out she wasn't kidding. She had more to do than she thought, because all at once Harry was interested in her. Really interested.

"You've got to help me," he said that night at dinner. "I rely on your taste. Of course I've got some choices of my own in mind, but I want you to suggest items to go into the capsule."

At first Jill thought he was putting her on, but he really meant it. "This project is going to be honest. The usual ploy is pure exhibitionism—samples of the 'best' of everything, plus descriptive data which is really just a pat on the back for the status quo. Well, I want to include material that's self-explanatory, not self-congratulatory. Not art and facts—just artifacts."

Harry lost her there, until he said, “Everything preserved will be a clue to our social attitudes. Not what we pretend to admire, but what the majority actually believes in and enjoys. And that’s where you come in, my dear. You’re the majority.”

Jill began to dig it, then. “You mean like TV and records?”

“Exactly. What’s that album you like so well? The one with the four hermaphrodites on the liner?”

“Who?”

“Excuse me—it’s purportedly a singing group, isn’t it?”

“Oh, you’re talking about the Poodles!” Jill went and got the album, which was called The Poodles Bark Again. The sound really turned her on, but she always thought Harry hated it. And now he was coming on smiles.

“Great,” he said. “This definitely goes in.”

“But—”

“Don’t worry, I’ll buy you another.” He took the album and put it on his desk. “Now, you mentioned something about television. What’s your favorite program?”

When she saw he was really serious she began telling him about Anywhere, U.S.A. What it was, it was about life in a small town, just an ordinary suburblike, but the people were great. There was this one couple with the two kids, sort of an average family, you might say, only he was kind of playing around with a divorcée who ran a discothetique or whatever they call them, and she was getting the hots for a psychiatrist—he wasn’t really her psychiatrist, he was analyzing one of the kids, the one who had set fire to the high school gymnasium, not the girl—she was afraid she’d been caught because of that affair she was having with the vice-principal who was really a Commie agent only she didn’t know it yet and her real boyfriend, the one who had the brain operation, had a thing about his mother, so—

It got kind of complicated, but Harry kept asking her to tell him more and pretty soon he was nodding. “Wonderful—we’ll have to see if we can get kinescopes on a week’s episodes.”

"You mean you really want something like that?"

"Of course. Wouldn't you say this show captured the lives of typical American citizens today?"

She had to agree that he was right. Also about some of the things he was going to put into the capsule to show the way people lived nowadays—like tranquilizers and pep pills and income tax forms and a map of the freeway-expressway-turnpike system. He had a lot of numbers, too, for Zip Code and digit-dialing, and Social Security, and the ones the computers punched out on insurance and charge-account and utility bills.

But what he really wanted was ideas for more stuff, and in the next couple of days he kept leaning on her. He got hold of her souvenir from Shady Lawn Cemetery—it was a plastic walnut that opened up, called "Shady Lawn in a Nutshell." Inside were twelve little color prints showing all the tourist attractions of the place, and you could mail the whole thing to your friends back home. Harry put this in the time capsule, wrapping it up in something he told her was an actuarial table on the incidence of coronary occlusion among middle-aged, middle-class males. Like heart attacks, that is.

"What's that you're reading?" he asked. And the next thing you know, he had her copy of the latest Steve Slash paperback—the one where Steve is sent on this top-secret mission to keep peace in Port Said, and right after he kills these five guys with the portable flamethrower concealed in his judo belt, he's getting ready to play beddy-bye with Yasmina, who's really another secret agent with radioactive nipples—

And that's as far as she'd got when he grabbed the book. It was getting so she couldn't keep anything out of his hot little hands.

"What's that you're cooking?" he wanted to know. And there went the TV dinner—frozen crêpes suzettes and all. To say nothing of the Plain Jane Instant Borscht.

"Where's the photo you had of your brother?" It was a real nothing picture of Stud, just him wearing that way-out beard of his and standing by his cycle on the day he passed his initiation into Hell's Angels. But Harry put that in, too. Jill didn't think it was very nice, seeing as how he clipped it to another photo of some guys taking the Ku Klux Klan oath.

But right now the main thing was to keep him happy. That's what Rick said when she clued him in on what was going on.

"Cooperate, baby," he told her. "It's a real kinky kick, but it keeps him out of our hair. We got plans to make, tickets to buy, packing and like that there."

The trouble was, Jill ran out of ideas. She explained this to Rick but he laughed.

"I'll give you some," he said. "And you can feed 'em to him. He's a real s.a., that husband of yours—I know what he wants."

The funny part of it was that Rick did know. He was really kind of a brain himself, but not in a kooky way like Harry. So she listened to what he suggested and told Harry when she got home.

"How about a sample of the Theatre of the Absurd?" she asked. Harry looked at her over the top of his glasses, and for a minute she thought she'd really thrown him, but then he grinned and got excited.

"Perfect!" he said. "Any suggestions?"

"Well, I was reading a review about this new play, Little Irma—it's about this guy who thinks he's having a baby so he goes to an abortionist, only really I guess the abortionist is supposed to be God or somebody, even if he is a black, and it all takes place in a pay toilet—"

"Delightful!" Harry was off and running. "I'll pick up a copy. Anything else?"

Thank God Rick had clued her in. So she said what about a recording of one of these concerts where they used a "prepared" piano that makes noises like screeching brakes, or sometimes no sound at all. And he liked that. He also liked the idea about a sample of Pop Art—maybe a big blowup of a newspaper Piles—Don't Be Cut ad.

The next day she laid it on him about a tape of a "Happening" which was the real thing, because it took place in some private sanatorium for disturbed patients, and he really got hung up on this idea.

And the next day he asked for a suggestion for a movie, so she remembered what Rick coached her on about 7¼, which was a way-out thing by some Yugoslavian director she never heard of, about a man making a movie about a man making a movie, only you never could be quite sure, in the movie, whether the scene was supposed to be a movie of a part of a movie or a movie of a part of what was really happening, if it happened.

He bought this. too.

"You're wonderful," he said. "Truthfully, I never expected this of you."

Jill just gave him the big smile and went on her merry way. It wasn't hard, because he had to go running around town trying to dig up tapes and films and recordings of all the stuff he had on his list. Which was just how Rick had said it would be, leaving everything clear for them to shop and set up their last-minute plans.

"I won't get our tickets until the day before," Rick told her. "We don't want to tip anything. The way I figure it, Harry'll be moving the capsule over to where they're holding the ceremonies the next morning, so you'll get a chance to pack while he's out of the way." Rick was really something else, the way he had it all lined out.

And that's the way it worked. The day before the ceremony, Harry was busy out in the guest house all afternoon long, packing his goodies into the time capsule. Just like a dopey squirrel burying his nuts. Only even dopey squirrels don't put stuff away for somebody to dig up ten thousand years from now.

Harry hadn't even had time to look at her for the past two days, and this didn't bother Jill any. Along about suppertime she went out to call him, but he said he wasn't hungry and besides he had to run over and contact the trucking company to come and haul the capsule over to the foundation site. They'd dug a big hole there for tomorrow morning, and he was going to take the capsule to it and stand guard over it until it was time for the dedication routine.

That was even better news than Jill could hope for, so as soon as Harry left for the trucking company she phoned Rick and gave him the word. He said he'd be right over with the tickets.

So of course Jill had to get dressed. She put on her girdle and the bra with the built-in falsies and her high heels; then she went in the bathroom and used her depilatory and touched up her hair where the rinse was fading, and put on her eyelashes and brushed her teeth, including all the caps, and tried those new fingernails after she got her makeup on and the perfume. When she looked at the results in the mirror she was really proud; for the first time in months she felt like her real self again. And from now on it would always be this way, with Rick—no more pretending, nothing phony.

There was a good moment with Rick there in the bedroom after he came in, but of course Harry would drive up right then—she heard the car out front and broke the clinch just in time, telling Rick to sneak out around the back. Harry'd be busy with the truckers for a couple of minutes at least.

Jill forced herself to wait in the bedroom until she was sure the coast was clear. She kept looking out the window but it was too dark now to see anything. Since there wasn't any noise she figured Harry must have taken the truckers back into the guest house.

And that's where she finally went.

Only the truckers weren't there. Just Harry.

"I told them to wait until first thing in the morning," he said. "Changed my mind when I realized how damp it was—no sense spending the night shivering outside in the cold. Besides, I haven't sealed the capsule yet—remembered a couple of things I wanted to add to the collection."

He took a little bottle out of his pocket and carried it over to the open capsule. "This goes in too. Carefully labeled, of course, so they can analyze it."

"The bottle's empty," Jill said.

Harry shook his head. "Not at all. It contains smog. That's right—smog, from the freeway. I want posterity to know everything about us, right down to the poisonous atmosphere in which our culture breathed its last."

He dropped the bottle into the capsule, then picked something else up from the table next to it. Jill noticed he had a soldering outfit there, ready to plug in when he sealed the lid, after he used a pump to suck the air out. He’d explained all this about the capsule being airtight, soundproof, duralumin-sheathed, but that didn’t interest her now. She kept looking at what he held in his hand.

It was one of those electric knife outfits, with the battery.

“Another artifact,” he said. “Another symbol of our decadence. An electric knife—just the thing for Mom when she carves the fast-frozen, precooked Thanksgiving turkey while she and Dad count all their shiny, synthetic, plastic blessings.” He waved the knife. “They’ll understand,” he told her. “Those people in the future will understand it all. They’ll know what life was like in our times—how we drained Walden Pond and refilled it again with blood, sweat and tears.”

Jill moved a little closer, staring at the knife. “The blade’s rusty,” she said.

Harry shook his head. “That’s not rust,” he said.

Jill kept her cool. She kept it right up until the moment she looked over the edge of the big, oblong box, looked down into the opening and saw Rick lying there. Rick was all sprawled out, and the red was oozing down over the books and records and pictures and tapes.

“I waited for him when he sneaked out of the house,” Harry said.

“Then you knew—all along—”

“For quite a while,” Harry said. “Long enough to figure things out and make my plans.”

“What plans?”

Harry just shrugged. And raised the knife.

A moment later the time capsule received the final specimen of life in the twentieth century.

The Living Dead

All day long he rested, while the guns thundered in the village below. Then, in the slanting shadows of the late afternoon, the rumbling echoes faded into the distance and he knew it was over. The American advance had crossed the river. They were gone at last, and it was safe once more.

Above the village, in the crumbling ruins of the great chateau atop the wooded hillside. Count Barsac emerged from the crypt.

The Count was tall and thin—cadaverously thin, in a manner most hideously appropriate. His face and hands had a waxen pallor; his hair was dark, but not as dark as his eyes and the hollows beneath them. His cloak was black, and the sole touch of color about his person was the vivid redness of his lips when they curled in a smile.

He was smiling now, in the twilight, for it was time to play the game.

The name of the game was Death, and the Count had played it many times.

He had played it in Paris on the stage of the Grand Guignol; his name had been plain Eric Karon then, but still he'd won a certain renown for his interpretation of bizarre roles. Then the war had come and, with it, his opportunity.

Long before the Germans took Paris, he'd joined their Underground, working long and well. As an actor he'd been invaluable.

And this, of course, was his ultimate reward—to play the supreme role, not on the stage, but in real life. To play without the artifice of spotlights, in true darkness; this was the actor's dream come true. He had even helped to fashion the plot.

“Simplicity itself,” he told his German superiors. “Chateau Barsac has been deserted since the Revolution. None of the peasants from the village dare to venture near it, even in daylight, because of the legend. It is said, you see, that the last Count Barsac was a vampire.”

And so it was arranged. The shortwave transmitter had been set up in the large crypt beneath the chateau, with three skilled operators in attendance, working in shifts. And he, “Count Barsac,” in charge of the entire operation, as guardian angel. Rather, as guardian demon.

“There is a graveyard on the hillside below,” he informed them. “A humble resting place for poor and ignorant people. It contains a single imposing crypt—the ancestral tomb of the Barsacs. We shall open that crypt, remove the remains of the last Count, and allow the villagers to discover that the coffin is empty. They will never dare come near the spot or the chateau again, because this will prove that the legend is true—Count Barsac is a vampire, and walks once more.”

The question came then. “What if there are sceptics? What if someone does not believe?”

And he had his answer ready. “They will believe. For at night I shall walk—I, Count Barsac.”

After they saw him in the makeup, wearing the black cloak, there were no more questions. The role was his.

The role was his, and he’d played it well. The Count nodded to himself as he climbed the stairs and entered the roofless foyer of the chateau, where only a configuration of cobwebs veiled the radiance of the rising moon.

Now, of course, the curtain must come down. If the American advance had swept past the village below, it was time to make one’s bow and exit. And that too had been well arranged.

During the German withdrawal another advantageous use had been made of the tomb in the graveyard. A cache of Air Marshal Goering’s art treasures now rested safely and undisturbed within the crypt. A truck had been placed in the chateau. Even now the three wireless operators would be playing new parts—driving the truck down the hillside to the tomb, placing the objets dart in it.

By the time the Count arrived there, everything would be packed. They would then don the stolen American Army uniforms, carry the forged identifications and permits, drive through the lines across the river, and rejoin the German forces at a predesignated spot. Nothing had been left to chance. Someday, when he wrote his memoirs . . .

But there was not time to consider that now. The Count glanced up through the gaping aperture in the ruined roof. The moon was high. It was time to leave.

In a way he hated to go. Where others saw only dust and cobwebs he saw a stage—the setting of his finest performance. Playing a vampire's role had not addicted him to the taste of blood—but as an actor he enjoyed the taste of triumph. And he had triumphed here.

"Parting is such sweet sorrow." Shakespeare's line. Shakespeare, who had written of ghosts and witches, of bloody apparitions. Because Shakespeare knew that his audiences, the stupid masses, believed in such things—just as they still believed today. A great actor could always make them believe.

The Count moved into the shadowy darkness outside the entrance of the chateau. He started down the pathway toward the beckoning trees.

It was here, amid the trees, that he had come upon Raymond, one evening weeks ago. Raymond had been his most appreciative audience—a stern, dignified, white-haired elderly man, mayor of the village of Barsac. But there had been nothing dignified about the old fool when he'd caught sight of the Count looming up before him out of the night. He'd screamed like a woman and run.

Probably Raymond had been prowling around, intent on poaching, but all that had been forgotten after his encounter in the woods. The mayor was the one to thank for spreading the rumors that the Count was again abroad. He and Clodez, the oafish miller, had then led an armed band to the graveyard and entered the Barsac tomb. What a fright they got when they discovered the Count's coffin open and empty!

The coffin had contained only dust that had been scattered to the winds, but they could not know that. Nor could they know about what had happened to Suzanne.

The Count was passing the banks of the small stream now. Here, on another evening, he'd found the girl—Raymond's daughter, as luck would have it—in an embrace with young Antoine LeFevre, her lover.

Antoine's shattered leg had invalided him out of the army, but he ran like a deer when he glimpsed the cloaked and grinning Count. Suzanne had been left behind and that was unfortunate, because it was necessary to dispose of her. Her body had been buried in the woods, beneath great stones, and there was no question of discovery; still, it was a regrettable incident.

In the end, however, everything was for the best. Now silly superstitious Raymond was doubly convinced that the vampire walked. He had seen the creature himself, had seen the empty tomb and the open coffin; his own daughter had disappeared. At his command none dared venture near the graveyard, the woods, or the chateau beyond.

Poor Raymond! He was not even a mayor any more—his village had been destroyed in the bombardment. Just an ignorant, broken old man, mumbling his idiotic nonsense about the "living dead."

The Count smiled and walked on, his cloak fluttering in the breeze, casting a batlike shadow on the pathway before him. He could see the graveyard now, the tilted tombstones rising from the earth like leprous fingers rotting in the moonlight. His smile faded; he did not like such thoughts. Perhaps the greatest tribute to his talent as an actor lay in his actual aversion to death, to darkness and what lurked in the night. He hated the sight of blood, had developed within himself an almost claustrophobic dread of the confinement of the crypt.

Yes, it had been a great role, but he was thankful it was ending. It would be good to play the man once more, and cast off the creature he had created.

As he approached the crypt he saw the truck waiting in the shadows. The entrance to the tomb was open, but no sounds issued from it. That meant his colleagues had completed their task of loading and were ready to go. All that remained now was to change his clothing, remove the makeup and depart.

The Count moved to the darkened truck. And then . . .

Then they were upon him, and he felt the tines of the pitchfork bite into his back, and as the flash of lanterns dazzled his eyes he heard the stern command. “Don’t move!”

He didn’t move. He could only stare as they surrounded him—Antoine, Clodez, Raymond, and the others, a dozen peasants from the village. A dozen armed peasants, glaring at him in mingled rage and fear, holding him at bay.

But how could they dare?

The American corporal stepped forward. That was the answer, of course—the American corporal and another man in uniform, armed with a sniper’s rifle. They were responsible. He didn’t even have to see the riddled corpses of the three shortwave operators piled in the back of the truck to understand what had happened. They’d stumbled on his men while they worked, shot them down, then summoned the villagers.

Now they were jabbering questions at him, in English, of course. He understood English, but he knew better than to reply. “Who are you? Were these men working under your orders? Where were you going with this truck?”

The Count smiled and shook his head. After a while they stopped, as he knew they would.

The corporal turned to his companion. “Okay,” he said. “Let’s go.” The other man nodded and climbed into the cab of the truck as the motor coughed into life. The corporal moved to join him, then turned to Raymond.

“We’re taking this across the river,” he said. “Hang on to our friend here—they’ll be sending a guard detail for him within an hour.”

Raymond nodded.

The truck drove off into the darkness.

And as it was dark now—the moon had vanished behind a cloud. The Count's smile vanished, too, as he glanced around at his captors. A rabble of stupid clods, surly and ignorant. But armed. No chance of escaping. And they kept staring at him, and mumbling.

"Take him into the tomb."

It was Raymond who spoke, and they obeyed, prodding their captive forward with pitchforks. That was when the Count recognized the first faint ray of hope. For they prodded him most gingerly, no man coming close, and when he glared at them their eyes dropped.

They were putting him in the crypt because they were afraid of him. Now the Americans were gone, they feared him once more—feared his presence and his power. After all, in their eyes he was a vampire—he might turn into a bat and vanish entirely. So they wanted him in the tomb for safekeeping.

The Count shrugged, smiled his most sinister smile, and bared his teeth. They shrank back as he entered the doorway. He turned and, on impulse, furled his cape. It was an instinctive final gesture, in keeping with his role—and it provoked the appropriate response. They moaned, and old Raymond crossed himself. It was better, in a way, than any applause.

In the darkness of the crypt the Count permitted himself to relax a trifle. He was offstage now. A pity he'd not been able to make his exit the way he'd planned, but such were the fortunes of war. Soon he'd be taken to the American headquarters and interrogated. Undoubtedly there would be some unpleasant moments, but the worst that could befall him was a few months in a prison camp. And even the Americans must bow to him in appreciation when they heard the story of his masterful deception.

It was dark in the crypt, and musty. The Count moved about restlessly. His knee grazed the edge of the empty coffin set on a trestle in the tomb. He shuddered involuntarily, loosening his cape at the throat. It would be good to remove it, good to be out of here, good to shed the role of vampire forever. He'd played it well, but now he was anxious to be gone.

There was a mumbling audible from outside, mingled with another and less identifiable noise—a scraping sound. The Count moved to the closed door of the crypt and listened intently; but now there was only silence.

What were the fools doing out there? He wished the Americans would hurry back. It was too hot in here. And why the sudden silence?

Perhaps they'd gone.

Yes. That was it. The Americans had told them to wait and guard him, but they were afraid. They really believed he was a vampire—old Raymond had convinced them of that. So they'd run off. They'd run off, and he was free, he could escape now . . .

So the Count opened the door.

And he saw them then, saw them standing and waiting, old Raymond staring sternly for a moment before he moved forward. He was holding something in his hand, and the Count recognized it, remembering the scraping sound that he'd heard.

It was a long wooden stake with a sharp point.

Then he opened his mouth to scream, telling them it was only a trick, he was no vampire, they were a pack of superstitious fools . . .

But all the while they bore him back into the crypt, lifting him up and thrusting him into the open coffin, holding him there as the grimfaced Raymond raised the pointed stake above his heart.

It was only when the stake came down that he realized there's such a thing as playing a role too well.

A Toy For Jullette

Introduction A TOY FOR JULIETTE:

What follows is, in the purest sense, the end-result of literary feedback. Recently the story editor of a prime-time television series, pressed for a script to shoot, sat down and wrote one himself rather than wait for the vagaries of a freelance scenarist’s schedule and dalliance. When he had completed the script, which was to go before the cameras in a matter of days, he sent it as a matter of form to the legal department of the studio. For the clearance of names, etc. Later that day the legal department called him back in a frenzy. Almost scene-for-scene and word-for-word (including the title), the non-s-f story editor had copied a well-known science fiction short story. When it was pointed out to him, the story editor blanched and recalled he had indeed read that story, some fifteen years before. Hurriedly, the story rights were purchased from the well-known fantasy writers who had originally conceived the idea. I hasten to add that I accept the veracity of the story editor when he swears he had no conscious knowledge of imitating the story. I believe him because this sort of unconscious plagiarism is commonplace in the world of the writer. It is inevitable that much of the mass of reading a writer does will stick with him somehow, in vague concepts, snatches of scenes, snippets of characterization, and it will turn up later, in the writer’s own work; altered, transmogrified, but still a direct result of another writer’s work. It is by no means “plagiarism”. It is part of the answer to the question asked by idiots of authors at cocktail parties: “Where do you get your ideas?”

Poul Anderson dropped me a note several months ago explaining that he had just written a story he was about to send out to market when he realized it paralleled the theme of a story he had read at a writers' conference we had both attended, just a month or so before. He added that his story was only vaguely similar to mine, but he wanted to apprise me to the resemblance so there would be no question later. It was a rhetorical letter: I'm arrogant, but not arrogant enough to think Poul Anderson needs to crib from me. Similarly, at the World Science Fiction Convention held last year in Cleveland, the well-known German fan Tom Schlück and I were introduced. (Tom had been brought over by the fans as Fan Guest of Honor, an exchange tradition in fandom perpetuated by the TransAtlantic Fan Fund.) The first thing he did after we shook hands was to hand me a German science fiction paperback. I had some difficulty understanding why he had given me the gift. Tom opened the book—a collection of stories pseudonymously written by top German s-f fan-pro Walter Ernsting. The flyleaf said: "To Harlan Ellison with thanks and compliments." I still didn't understand. Then Tom turned to the first story, which was titled "Die Sonnenbombe". Under the title it said: (Nach einer Idee von Harlan Ellison). I wrinkled my brow. I still didn't understand. I recognized my own name, which looks the same in all languages save Russian, Chinese, Hebrew or Sanskrit, but I don't read German, and I'm afraid I stood there like a clot. Tom explained that the basic idea of a story I had written in 1957—"Run for the Stars"—had inspired Ernsting to write "Die Sonnenbombe". It was the literary feedback, halfway across the world. I was deeply touched, and even more, it was a feeling of justification. Every writer save the meanest hack hopes his words will live after he goes down the hole, that his thoughts will influence people. It isn't the primary purpose of the writing, of course, but it's the sort of secret wish that parallels the Average Man having babies, so his name doesn't die with him. And here, in my hands, was the visible proof that something my mind had conjured up had reached out and ensnared another man's imagination. It was obviously the sincerest form of flattery. And by no means "plagiarism". It was the literary feedback. The instances of this action-reaction among writers are numberless, and some of them are legend. It is the reason for writers' seminars, workshops, conferences and the endless exchange of letters among writers. What has all of this—or any of it—to do with Robert Bloch, the author of the story that follows? Everything.

In 1943 Robert Bloch had published a story titled "Yours Truly, Jack the Ripper". The number of times it has been reprinted, anthologized, translated into radio and TV scripts, and most of all plagiarized, are staggering. I read it in 1953, and the story stuck with me always. When I heard its dramatization on the Molle Mystery Theater, it became a recurring favorite memory. The story idea was simply that Jack the Ripper, by killing at specific times, made his peace with the dark gods and was thus allowed to live forever. Jack was immortal, and Bloch traced with cold methodical logic a trail of similar Ripper-style murders in almost every major city of the world, over a period of fifty or sixty years. The concept of Jack—who was never apprehended—living on, from era to era, caught my imagination. When it came time to put this anthology together, I called Robert Bloch and suggested that if Jack were, in fact, immortal, why then he would have to go on into the future. The image of a creature of Whitechapel fog and filth, the dark figure of Leather Apron, skulking through a sterile and automated city of the future, was an anachronism that fascinated me. Bob agreed, and said he would set to work at once. When his story came in, it was (pardon the word) a delight, and I bought it at once. But the concept of Jack in the future would not release my thoughts. I dwelled on it with almost morbid fascination. Finally I asked Bob if he minded my doing a story for this book that took up where his left off. He said he thought it would be all right. It was, as I've said, in the purest sense, the act of literary feedback. And again, the sincerest form of flattery. Bloch had literally triggered the creative process in another writer.

The story that follows Robert Bloch's story is the product of that feedback. Mr. Bloch has kindly and graciously agreed to write the introduction to my story, in an effort to gain revenge for the introduction to his story. Tied in a knot, the two introductions, the two stories and the two afterword: seem to have melded into a unified whole that demonstrate; more admirably than any million words of literary critique; what it is that one writer obtains from another.

What this particular editor has obtained from that particular writer named Robert Bloch is far more than a story idea. I first saw Bloch—tall, debonair, sharp-featured, bespectacled, smoking through a long cigarette holder reminiscent of Eric von Stroheim—at the Midwest Science Fiction Convention at Beatley's-on-the-Lake Hotel in Belle-fontaine, Ohio, in 1951. I was almost eighteen. I was obnoxious, wide-eyed and hungry to know all there was about science fiction. Bloch was at that time, and had been for many years, a living legend. Even though a recognized professional with many books and stories to his credit, he had always made himself available to even the grubbiest fan anxious to cadge a story or article for some half-legible fan magazines. Gratis, of course. He was the perennial toast-master, his wit a combination of cornball and cutlass-incisive. He knew everyone, and everyone knew him. Up to this pillar of fantasy walked the snot Ellison.

I do not recall what happened on that occasion, the mists of time and the ravages of senility having already reached me at age thirty-three, but it must have been memorable, because someone took our photograph, and I still have a copy: myself looking smug as a potato bug and Bloch staring down on me with a peculiar expression that says benevolence, toleration, amused confusion and stark terror. I have been privileged to call myself a friend of Robert Bloch's since that time.

One more small anecdote, then I'll let Bloch speak for himself on the subjects of his career, his childhood and the nature of violence. When I arrived in Hollywood in 1962, literally without a dollar in my pocket (I had ten cents, a wife, a son, and we had been so broke driving cross-country we had only eaten the contents of a box of pecan pralines for the last three hundred miles), in a battered 1951 Ford, Robert Bloch—who was not all that well off himself—loaned me enough money to get a place to stay and food to eat. He waited three years to be repaid, and never once asked for the considerable sum. He is one of God's Good People, as anyone who has ever come anywhere near him can attest. It is one of the giant dichotomies of our times that a man as gentle, amusing, empathic and peaceful as Bloch can write the gruesome and warped stories he produces with alarming regularity. One can only offer by way of amelioration Sturgeon's lament that after he had written one—and one only—story about homosexuality, everyone accused him of being a fag. Bloch is an entity quite apart and diametrically opposite from the horrors he sets on paper. (I might suggest the reader remember this writer's lament when he comes to the story after Bloch's.)

And now, beaming with memorabilia and bonhomie, here is Bloch:

"As a small child I skipped several grades of grammar school, thus finding myself in the company of older and bigger youngsters who introduced me to the savage jungle of the playground, with its secret pecking order and ceaseless torment of the weak by the strong. Fortunately for myself, I never became a physical victim nor was I an over-compensating bully; in some strange fashion I found that I was able to lead my companions into various intricate imaginative games as a substitute activity. We dug trenches in the back yard and played war; the open front porch became a deck of a pirate ship and captured victims walked the plank (a leaf from the dining-room table) to jump off into the ocean of the front lawn. But I dimly recognized that the shows and circuses I devised didn't hold the interest of my playmates nearly as well as the games which were surrogates for violence. And later on, as they were inevitably lured towards the venerated violences of boxing, wrestling, football and other adult-approved outlets for outrage on the human person, I retreated to reading, sketching, drama and the enjoyment of the theater and motion pictures.

"The silent version of The Phantom of the Opera scared the daylights out of me as an eight-year-old, but a part of me was objective enough to find a fascination in this demonstration of the power of make-believe. I began to read widely in the field of imaginary violence. When, at the age of fifteen, I began corresponding with the fantasy writer. H. P. Lovecraft, he encouraged me to try my own at writing. As a high school comic I'd discovered that I could make audiences laugh: now I began to realize that I could move them emotionally in other directions.

"At seventeen, I sold my first story to Weird Tales magazine and thus found a lifelong vocation. Since then I've made magazine appearances with upwards of four hundred short stories, articles and novelettes. I've conducted magazine columns, seen stories reprinted in close to a hundred anthologies here and abroad; twenty-five books, novels and short-story collections have been published. In addition, I've ghost-written for politicians and spent a term writing almost every conceivable variety of advertising copy. I adapted thirty-nine of my own stories for a radio series, and in recent years have concentrated largely on scripts for television and motion pictures.

"In the beginning my work was almost entirely in the field of fantasy, where the violent element was openly and obviously a product of imagination. The mass violence of World War II caused me to examine violence at its source—on the individual level. Still unwilling or unable to cope with its present reality, I retreated into history and re-created, as a prototype of apparently senseless violence, the infamously famous mass murderer who styled himself 'Yours Truly, Jack the Ripper'. This short story was to see endless reprint and anthologization, plus frequent dramatizing on radio, and finally appeared on television; at latest report it popped up as a dramatic reading in Israel. For some reason the notion of Jack the Ripper's survival in the present day touched a sensitive spot in the audience psyche.

"I myself was far from insensitive to this incarnation of violence in our midst, and I beat a hasty retreat from further consideration. As the war continued and real-life violence came dangerously near, I concentrated for a time upon humor and science fiction. It wasn't until 1945, when my first short-story collection (The Opener of the Way) appeared, that I rounded out its contents with a new effort, 'One Way to Mars,' in which a pseudo-science-fictional form is employed to describe the psychotic fugue of a contemporary man of violence.

“A year later I wrote my first novel, The Scarf—the first-person account of a mass murderer. Since that time, while still employing fantasy and science fiction for satire and social criticism, I’ve devoted many of my subsequent short stories and almost all of my novels (Spiderweb, Shooting Star, The Kidnaper, The Will to Kill, Psycho, The Dead Beat, Firebug, The Couch, Terror) to a direct examination of violence in our society.

“Psycho was inspired by a somewhat guarded newspaper account of a mass murderer in a small town close to the one where I resided; I knew none of the intimate details of the crimes, but I wondered just what sort-of individual could perpetrate them while living as an apparently normal citizen a notoriously gossip-ridden and constrictedly conventional environment. I created my schizophrenic character out of what I thought was whole cloth, only to discover, some years later, that the rationale I evolved for him was frighteningly close to his aberrated reality.

“Some of my other characters have also proved to be a bit too real for comfort. When I wrote The Scarf, for example, the editors insisted on deleting a short section in which the protagonist indulges in a bit of sadistic fantasy. He imagines what it would be like to take a high-powered rifle up to the top of a tall building and start shooting people below at random. Farfetched, said the editors. Today, I have the last laugh—but it’s not necessarily a laugh of amusement.

“The Scarf, incidentally, was just republished in paperback. After twenty years, I naturally went through the book to update a few slang phrases and topical references. But my protagonist didn’t need any changing; the passage of time alone did the job for me. Twenty years ago I wrote him as a villain—today he emerges as an anti-hero.

“For the violence has come into its own now; the violence I examined, and at times projected and predicted, has become today’s commonplace and accepted reality. This, to me, is far more terrifying than anything I could possibly imagine.”

Ellison again. In an attempt to unify the whole, and believing firmly that Bloch's piece loses very little impact for the revelation, this section of the book has been structured to be read all of a piece. I urge you to go from Bloch to his afterword to his introduction to the Ellison to his afterword. It is a case of age before beauty.

Or possibly Beauty before the Beast.

● A TOY FOR JULIETTE

by Robert Bloch

Juliette entered her bedroom, smiling, and a thousand Juliettes smiled back at her. For all the walls were paneled with mirrors, and the ceiling was set with inlaid panes that reflected her image.

Wherever she glanced she could see the blonde curls framing the sensitive features of a face that was a radiant amalgam of both child and angel; a striking contrast to the rich, ripe revelation of her body in the filmy robe.

But Juliette wasn't smiling at herself. She smiled because she knew that Grandfather was back, and he'd brought her another toy. In just a few moments it would be decontaminated and delivered, and she wanted to be ready.

Juliette turned the ring on her finger and the mirrors dimmed. Another turn would darken the room entirely; a twist in the opposite direction would bring them blazing into brilliance. It was all a matter of choice—but then, that was the secret of life. To choose, for pleasure.

And what was her pleasure tonight?

Juliette advanced to one of the mirror panels and passed her hand before it. The glass slid to one side, revealing the niche behind it; the coffin-shaped opening in the solid rock, with the boot and thumb-screws set at the proper heights.

For a moment she hesitated; she hadn't played that game in years. Another time, perhaps. Juliette waved her hand and the mirror moved to cover the opening again.

She wandered along the row of panels, gesturing as she walked, pausing to inspect what was behind each mirror in turn. Here was the rack, there the stocks with the barbed whips resting against the dark-stained wood. And here was the dissecting table, hundreds of years old, with its quaint instruments; behind the next panel, the electrical prods and wires that produced such weird grimaces and contortions of agony, to say nothing of screams. Of course the screams didn't matter in a soundproofed room.

Juliette moved to the side wall and waved her hand again; the obedient glass slid away and she stared at a plaything she'd almost forgotten. It was one of the first things Grandfather had ever given her, and it was very old, almost like a mummy case. What had he called it? The Iron Maiden of Nuremberg, that was it—with the sharpened steel spikes set inside the lid. You chained a man inside, and you turned the little crank that closed the lid, ever so slowly, and the spikes pierced the wrists and the elbows, the ankles and the knees, the groin and the eyes. You had to be careful not to get excited and turn too quickly, or you'd spoil the fun.

Grandfather had shown her how it worked, the first time he brought her a real live toy. But then, Grandfather had shown her everything. He'd taught her all she knew, for he was very wise. He'd even given her her name—Juliette—from one of the old-fashioned printed books he'd discovered by the philosopher De Sade.

Grandfather had brought the books from the Past, just as he'd brought the playthings for her. He was the only one who had access to the Past, because he owned the Traveler.

The Traveler was a very ingenious mechanism, capable of attaining vibrational frequencies which freed it from the time-bind. At rest, it was just a big square boxlike shape, the size of a small room. But when Grandfather took over the controls and the oscillation started, the box would blur and disappear. It was still there, Grandfather said—at least, the matrix remained as a fixed point in space and time—but anything or anyone within the square could move freely into the Past to wherever the controls were programed. Of course they would be invisible when they arrived, but that was actually an advantage, particularly when it came to finding things and bringing them back. Grandfather had brought back some very interesting objects from almost mythical places—the great library of Alexandria, the Pyramid of Cheops, the Kremlin, the Vatican, Fort Knox—all the storehouses of treasure and knowledge which existed thousands of years ago. He liked to go to that part of the Past, the period before the thermonuclear wars and the robotic ages, and collect things. Of course books and jewels and metals were useless, except to an antiquarian, but Grandfather was a romanticist and loved the olden times.

It was strange to think of him owning the Traveler, but of course he hadn't actually created it. Juliette's father was really the one who built it, and Grandfather took possession of it after her father died. Juliette suspected Grandfather had killed her father and mother when she was just a baby, but she could never be sure. Not that it mattered; Grandfather was always very good to her, and besides, soon he would die and she'd own the Traveler herself.

They used to joke about it frequently. "I've made you into a monster," he'd say. "And someday you'll end up by destroying me. After which, of course, you'll go on to destroy the entire world—or what little remains of it."

"Aren't you afraid?" she'd tease.

"Certainly not. That's my dream—the destruction of everything. An end to all this sterile decadence. Do you realize that at one time there were more than three billion inhabitants on this planet? And now, less than three thousand! Less than three thousand, shut up inside these Domes, prisoners of themselves and sealed away forever, thanks to the sins of the fathers who poisoned not only the outside world but outer space by meddling with the atomic order of the universe. Humanity is virtually extinct already; you will merely hasten the finale."

"But couldn't we all go back to another time, in the Traveler?" she asked.

"Back to what time? The continuum is changeless; one event leads inexorably to another, all links in a chain which binds us to the present and its inevitable end in destruction. We'd have temporary individual survival, yes, but to no purpose. And none of us are fitted to survive in a more primitive environment. So let us stay here and take what pleasure we can from the moment. My pleasure is to be the sole user and possessor of the Traveler. And yours, Juliette—"

Grandfather laughed then. They both laughed, because they knew what her pleasure was.

Juliette killed her first toy when she was eleven—a little boy. It had been brought to her as a special gift from Grandfather, from somewhere in the Past, for elementary sex play. But it wouldn't cooperate, and she lost her temper and beat it to death with a steel rod. So Grandfather brought her an older toy, with brown skin, and it co-operated very well, but in the end she tired of it and one day when it was sleeping in her bed she tied it down and found a knife.

Experimenting a little before it died, Juliette discovered new sources of pleasure, and of course Grandfather found out. That's when he'd christened her "Juliette"; he seemed to approve most highly, and from then on he brought her the playthings she kept behind the mirrors in her bedroom. And on his restless rovings into the Past he brought her new toys.

Being invisible, he could find them for her almost anywhere on his travels—all he did was to use a stunner and transport them when he returned. Of course each toy had to be very carefully decontaminated; the Past was teeming with strange micro-organisms. But once the toys were properly antiseptic they were turned over to Juliette for her pleasure, and during the past seven years she had enjoyed herself.

It was always delicious, this moment of anticipation before a new toy arrived. What would it be like? Grandfather was most considerate; mainly, he made sure that the toys he brought her could speak and understand Anglish—or "English," as they used to call it in the Past. Verbal communication was often important, particularly if Juliette wanted to follow the precepts of the philosopher De Sade and enjoy some form of sex relation before going on to keener pleasures.

But there was still the guessing beforehand. Would this toy be young or old, wild or tame, male or female? She'd had all kinds, and every possible combination. Sometimes she kept them alive for days before tiring of them—or before the subtleties of which she was capable caused them to expire. At other times she wanted it to happen quickly; tonight, for example, she knew she could be soothed only by the most primitive and direct action.

Once Juliette realized this, she stopped playing with her mirror panels and went directly to the big bed. She pulled back the coverlet, groped under the pillow until she felt it. Yes, it was still there—the big knife with the long, cruel blade. She knew what she would do now: take the toy to bed with her and then, at precisely the proper moment, combine her pleasures. If she could time her knife thrust—

She shivered with anticipation, then with impatience.

What kind of toy would it be? She remembered the suave, cool one—Benjamin Bathurst was his name, an English diplomat from the time of what Grandfather called the Napoleonic Wars. Oh, he'd been suave and cool enough, until she beguiled him with her body, into the bed. And there'd been that American aviatrix from slightly later on in the Past, and once, as a very special treat, the entire crew of a sailing vessel called the Marie Celeste. They had lasted for weeks!

Strangely enough, she'd even read about some of her toys afterwards. Because when Grandfather approached them with his stunner and brought them here, they disappeared forever from the Past, and if they were in any way known or important in their time, such disappearances were noted. And some of Grandfather's books had accounts of the "mysterious vanishing" which took place and was, of course, never explained. How delicious it all was!

Juliette patted the pillow back into place and slid the knife under it. She couldn’t wait, now; what was delaying things?

She forced herself to move to a vent and depress the sprayer, shedding her robe as the perfumed mist bathed her body. It was the final allurement—but why didn’t her toy arrive?

Suddenly Grandfather’s voice came over the auditor.

“I’m sending you a little surprise, dearest.”

That’s what he always said; it was part of the game.

Juliette depressed the communicator-toggle. “Don’t tease,” she begged. “Tell me what it’s like.”

“An Englishman. Late Victorian Era. Very prim and proper, by the looks of him.”

“Young? Handsome?”

“Passable.” Grandfather chuckled. “Your appetites betray you, dearest.”

“Who is it—someone from the books?”

“I wouldn’t know the name. We found no identification during the decontamination. But from his dress and manner, and the little black bag he carried when I discovered him so early in the morning, I’d judge him to be a physician returning from an emergency call.”

Juliette knew about “physicians” from her reading, of course; just as she knew what “Victorian” meant. Somehow the combination seemed exactly right.

“Prim and proper?” She giggled. “Then I’m afraid it’s due for a shock.”

Grandfather laughed. “You have something in mind, I take it.”

“Yes.”

“Can I watch?”

“Please—not this time.”

“Very well.”

“Don’t be mad, darling. I love you.”

Juliette switched off. Just in time, too, because the door was opening and the toy came in.

She stared at it, realizing that Grandfather had told the truth. The toy was a male of thirty-odd years, attractive but by no means handsome. It couldn't be, in that dark garb and those ridiculous side whiskers. There was something almost depressingly refined and mannered about it, an air of embarrassed repression.

And of course, when it caught sight of Juliette in her revealing robe, and the bed surrounded by mirrors, it actually began to blush.

That reaction won Juliette completely. A blushing Victorian, with the build of a bull—and unaware that this was the slaughterhouse!

It was so amusing she couldn't restrain herself; she moved forward at once and put her arms around it.

"Who—who are you? Where am I?"

The usual questions, voiced in the usual way. Ordinarily, Juliette would have amused herself by parrying with answers designed to tantalize and titillate her victim. But tonight she felt an urgency which only increased as she embraced the toy and pressed it back toward the waiting bed.

The toy began to breathe heavily, responding. But it was still bewildered. "Tell me—I don't understand. Am I alive? Or is this heaven?"

Juliette's robe fell open as she lay back. "You're alive, darling," she murmured. "Wonderfully alive." She laughed as she began to prove the statement. "But closer to heaven than you think."

And to prove that statement, her free hand slid under the pillow and groped for the waiting knife.

But the knife wasn't there any more. Somehow it had already found its way into the toy's hand. And the toy wasn't prim and proper any longer, its face was something glimpsed in nightmare. Just a glimpse, before the blinding blur of the knife blade, as it came down, again and again and again —

The room, of course, was soundproof, and there was plenty of time. They didn't discover what was left of Juliette's body for several days.

Back in London, after the final mysterious murder in the early morning hours, they never did find Jack the Ripper. . . .

Afterword

A number of years have passed since I sat down at the typewriter one gloomy winter day and wrote “Yours Truly, Jack the Ripper” for magazine publication. The magazine in which it appeared gave up its ghost, and interest in ghosts, a long time ago. But somehow my little story seems to have survived. It has since pursued me in reprint, collections, anthologies, foreign translations, radio broadcasts and television.

So when the editor of this anthology proposed that I do a story and suggested, “What about Jack the Ripper in the future?” I was capable of only one response.

You’ve just read it.

Sales of a Deathman

What to do with the population problem? Killing people's so messy—unless they'll help!

January 15, 2047. Big day today. Flying in, I got quite a shock seeing that mushroom cloud over Washington. Looked just like an H-bomb, but of course it's only the population explosion. Smog.

It's everywhere, of course, but this air-conditioned underground living makes you forget. I hate the nuisance of wearing a respirator, but this time I was grateful for it. Even without the smog, the crowd here is so thick that the fumes from their halitosis would probably choke you.

Priority Escort had a zip-car waiting for me when we landed. That was a break—we took the fifth-level freeway right straight in, down what used to be the old Pennsylvania Avenue.

Could do a whole book on the White House. Like stepping into the past; so quiet and empty. Huge rooms. Some of them twenty, thirty, even fifty feet long—you wouldn't believe it. To think people used to live that way; all that space, and not even a high-rise! Gives you a sense of History.

Of course the big thing was meeting the President. Kind of surprising to see he's such a small man. Watching him on TV, in full makeup, you get the impression he's quite tall. But without the gray wig and the beard and the Uncle Sam costume, he's only a little guy. Can't quite remember when Presidents started wearing the outfit—way back, I guess, maybe twenty-thirty years after they started electing actors to public office. It's effective, of course, and I can see the sense, but it's still kind of a letdown when you see a President offscreen. Without a teleprompter and the folksy delivery he sounds quite different.

But he's an exec, no doubt about it. The way he handled the meeting, all the biggies there—Cabinet, Defense, even the top lobbyists. Cut right through protocol and got down to cases.

No sense trying to remember exact quotes. What he said was Security-sealed anyway, and I could get into trouble just paraphrasing it. But then, nobody is going to be playing this diary-tape anyway, and I want to keep it for the record.

He started right out by laying all the cards on the table. The population crisis—988,000,000 people in the United States as of last week's Galiupcomputer census.

"That's the official figure," he said.

"Actually, we're way over a billion. But we can't let that get out, for psychological reasons. There's enough panic as it is. And with a world population of nineteen billion, a projected fifty billion within another generation—"

He stopped and looked around the table; I wish I had a photo of those faces. "I can see your reactions," he said. "But right now I'm more interested in hearing your solutions."

That's how it began. And for the next hour it went on, hot and heavy. All the old arguments and counter-arguments.

Start a war? Too dangerous, and besides it's never worked—if it had, we wouldn't be in this fix today.

What about a sterilization law? Six bills voted down already, too much religious opposition, so that's out.

Metal fatigue in jets and zip-cars? There was one that made me sit up and take notice. Some character from the Department of Transport had it all laid out, a full presentation with a lot of figures on stress-factors and built-in structural defects. He was willing to guarantee that accidents, freeway and airway, would eliminate at least a hundred million over a three-year period.

It made a lot of sense to me, until the President reminded him that (a) such a program would shake confidence in automotive and aviation products, thus disrupting the economy, and (b) the present rate of population increase would soon offset and over take the possible death-rate. He was loudly seconded by the lobbyists, particularly in regard to point (a).

The next joker came up with the moon-colorization bit again and had to be reminded that it would be impossible to manufacture enough space-hardware to transport more than a few million people a year—granted that the economy could support such a program.

Somebody else urged official government backing of homosexuality; not just quiet approval. but a full-fledged open endorsement. The Secretary of Health and Welfare pointed out that even without open sanction, homosexuality was already a widespread popular craze, but largely due to the fact that it wasn't officially blessed. Such approval, he thought, would backfire, robbing the practice of any illicit "kick," and bring the movement to a fag-end.

This remark got a laugh, but didn't solve anything.

The next proposal came from Top Brass—all creased red neck and eyebrows, and no nonsense. At first he sounded way off the track, talking about smog and its lethal effect on the human organism, but then he hit it. "If you really want to reduce the population, quit wasting your breath. Waste theirs. Take away their respirators."

That did it. Everybody started screaming, but the President got the final word in.

"You just can't go ahead and start a mass-murder program—it's un-American!"

And then he looked at me. "You're the expert, Mr. Crothers. What does Psychological Engineering propose?"

I let them have it, then. “Of course it’s un-American to kill our own citizens. Also, it’s bad for business.” That got a nod from everybody, so I went on. “But there’s another solution. I call it planned population-obsolescence.”

The President frowned. “And just what does that mean?”

“Simple. Since we can’t kill our own citizens, and we can’t encourage them to kill each other, there’s only one sensible alternative. We’ve got to get the people to kill themselves.”

Now they really screamed. “Mass suicide? Impossible—they’d never go for it—talk about hurting business, this would really do it—never work out —”

I waited until they wore themselves out, then opened my folder and my mouth.

“Gentlemen, I have prepared a plan. If you’re ready to listen, I think I can demonstrate to you that it can be done.”

I made my pitch. It grabbed them, because it made sense. The President was the only one with reservations.

“I don’t know,” he sighed. “A wiser statesman than myself once said, ‘You can kill some of the people some of the time, but you can’t kill all of the people all of the time’.”

“Maybe so,” I said. “But it’s worth a try.”

February 10, 2047. We’re in business.

Haven’t had time to tape notes—it’s just one meeting after another. Key people in industry, advertising, communication channels. Even with official backing, it’s a big selling job.

At first, of course, everybody comes up with the same objection—“But we need consumers.”

The answer I give them is, “Let the consumers consume themselves.” And then I show them the merchandising possibilities. The whole bit, right from history. How the morticians, a hundred years ago, proved that you could sell caskets with all kinds of fancy gadgets, including innerspring mattresses—even sell coffins for cremations.

Then I give them the real angle, way back to the days of the Egyptians, who used to bury their bodies with a complete wardrobe of new clothing, all kinds of jewelry, household equipment, and furniture.

And I even give them a slogan for their sales-campaigns—“You Can Take It With Yon.”

They can see the sales-potential, but they’re still a little skeptical about whether or not the idea will catch on. So it’s up to me to prove that they’ll make a killing.

September 12, 2047. The last six months have been murder.

Figure of speech, of course. But I’ve been working myself to death.

So much to do. Started with the funeral directors, setting up the campaign. Commercials.

“Tired of high taxes? Troubled about illness, old age? Bills got you down? Time for a vacation—now you can take the BIG Trip!” Lovely shots of cemetery landscapes, soft hymn music in tire background.

The morticians have been helpful, I must say. They pitch the theme hard. “Now you can enjoy Permanent Retirement. Ask about our Layaway Plan.”

It seems to be going over with the Senior Citizens, but we’ve got to get a gut-reaction from the younger set, too. Maybe the cemeteries need jazzing-up. I’m going down to Washington with a real-estate subsidy plan; we’ve got to get a lot of new land developments to prepare for the rush, and it isn’t just a matter of money. The whole concept has to be revitalized.

Statues and benches and souvenir-stands are good enough for the old folks, but I’m targeting at the kiddies. What we need are a few amusement-park touches; what I have in mind is something on the order of Grislyland. . . .

March 1, 2048. Just a little over a year since I started, and it's going over better than I'd ever hoped for.

Even the wildest optimist would never have believed the national death-rate would jump 80% in so short a time. And this is only the beginning!

Right now I'd like to go on record congratulating the medical profession—and, particularly, the psychiatrists and psychologists—for their cooperation and suggestions.

Not only have they supported the new DeadiCare program; they've come up with some ideas I never would have known about.

Almost all the psyches are concentrating now on Thanatos, bringing out and encouraging the Death Wish in patients. Using suggestion and hypnosis, too; not just in the asylums but in private practice. Since most people go for treatment because they're already depressed, sick of crowds and smog and Underground living and synthetic food and taxes and official forms and SALES OF A DEATHMAN regulations, it's easy enough to work them into deep melancholia. Government cooperation doesn't hurt, either—next month the Pure Food and Drug Act amendment goes on the books and then we'll have another assist. Free poison—for Home Use Only.

The tricky bit, of course, is to make sure that people keep turning their aggressions inward; they've got to kill themselves, not murder others. But it seems to be working. Lots of things help.

For example, the new art boom in death masks. Everybody wants one. I understand a lot of people with money are really going the whole Egyptian route—mummy-cases and all, or at least statues of themselves. There's one down in Texas that's fifty feet tall; built over the frame of an old oil derrick.

Of course, as we expected, the biggest opposition came from the churches. We've had to make a big point of the fact that from now on death is strictly non-sectarian. And the insurance companies did a lot of beefing before DeadiCare; now they're all switching over from life insurance to death insurance—the perpetual care angle seems to work.

I'm in Washington permanently now. Full-time job, just one thing after another, but I must say everybody pitches in to help. We've got the posters up—everything from “Join the Marine Corpse” to “Uncle Sam DOESN’T Want You!” And there’s a big publicity campaign for the development of Death Valley National Monument.

October 5, 2051. Where does time go to?

I couldn’t begin to set down what’s happened in the past three years, or so; all I know is that the official death rate for last year was 172,468,327. And. this year started off with such a bang that we’re averaging twenty million a month.

Never saw such prosperity. Half the country seems to be converted to cemeteries—freeways jammed with funeral processions—factories can’t keep up with orders. Strain on natural resources, of course; we’re going to have to do a. complete aboutface and campaign for simple burials, with plastic coffins.

But the big thing is we’ve got the youngsters. Everybody wants to fly to Vegas and play Russian roulette. Even the kiddies get into the act—playing “undertaker” and burying their dolls. Or each other. And skipping rope to, “I-tisket, I-tasket, a green, and yellow casket.”

I think our troubles are over.

May 22, 2052. I was wrong. Didn’t figure on the backlash—Situation Overkill.

Can’t blame it on the psyches. They did their best. But aggression gets out of hand. Sure, the death rate keeps going up, but a lot of it is due to murders now. Not just the free poison, but assault with deadly weapons, etc. Lots of sex crimes, too, mostly necrophilia.

Of course we’re in there pitching. Setting up those Suicide Clubs (“If you don’t like your neighbor, why not urge him to join?”) and doing a big selling job on the sex angle, too, with the new Lovers’ Leaps; free ski-lifts to mountaintops and special high-rise jumps for city dwellers.

But it isn't enough. The churches aren't helping. For a while we got them, off on. this ancestor-worship kick, but now they're going too far. Understand there's a lot of new cults around, based on human sacrifices. Barbaric.

Worst of all, it's affecting business. With all this illegal murder going on, the mortality rate is climbing too high; getting out of control. Understand we're down to 200,000,000 as of this year, and pretty soon there won't be enough working population to keep up with the demands.

I'm setting up a crisis conference for June 1st. We've got to put some new life in our program.

June 4th, 2052. Let's face it—we're in trouble.

The conference was a disaster. Every time I suggested a rollback on our program, some damned psyche or other came up with an argument to prove it wouldn't work—things have gone too far now.

Of course I knew the idea had spread. If it wasn't worldwide, this country would have been invaded long ago. But with other areas even more overpopulated than our own, I knew they'd copy us and our methods. And they have.

The thing is (and this I didn't know, until they filled us in at the conference) that the situation is even worse abroad. Death cults all over the place, religious fanatics, and what one of the psychiatrists called the "lemming urge." Whole cities, whole sections of a country, starting to march to the seashore, throwing themselves off cliffs. Mass hysteria.

"Heaven help us when it starts over here," he said. "Can you imagine what's going to happen when the entire West Coast converges inland to jump off the edge of the Grand Canyon?"

"So what do you suggest?" I asked.

He didn't answer me. He couldn't. Because as soon as he finished speaking, he'd gone over and jumped out of the window. . . .

December l, 2058. 40,000.

Not the mortality rate.

That's the official population figure for the entire country, as of today: 40,000.

Don't ask me how they arrived at the total. Living underground this way, I'm sure all they can do is guess.

But at least, a few of us have survived. When you look at what's happened, it's amazing that there still are that many left.

First the mass suicides, then the murder gangs, then the breakdown in industry and communications—pileups on the freeways, funeral services disrupted, casket industries shut down, cemeteries weeded-over and neglected. When the food factories went and the water desalinization plants stopped working, the end was in sight. Then they began to listen to our campaign again, but it was too late; no rallying point, no way to get people reorganized. We should have acted sooner, declared martial law—but once the famine started and they began to drink that poisoned water from rivers and lakes, it was no use.

Virus and plague, that's what did it in the end. And people running wild—the new Sterilization Cults coming in, nobody having babies any more.

Of course the smog is gone, they tell me, but so is everything else.

Here in the new Pentagon—Dead Center—we're quite comfortable. Plenty of food, plenty of supplies, all the comforts of home and a safe five levels underground. At least we can keep telecasting; we've got the facilities. But with an audience of only 40,000, I don't know.

Still, they say while there's life, there's hope. . . .

April 1, 2067. Running out of tape.

Doesn't really matter, because we're running out of everything else, too.

Eleven people left.

That's all. Eleven.

Best medical care these past eight or nine years, but it doesn’t help. Underground living seems to lead inevitably to underground dying. And the surface is still deadly—virus everywhere.

No more communication. None of us talk about it, but we all know the answer. Everybody’s gone, everywhere. We’re the last survivors.

Six old men, all over seventy. Myself, forty-nine. Three elderly women. One girl, Rena Stafford, pretty blonde thing, about eighteen or so.

Had another conference today, possibly the last one. Faced the facts. In a few years we’ll all be gone. Maybe the surface will clear, the virus will die out—but so will the human race.

The president put it right on the line. (Funny thing, he really looks like Uncle Sam now, even without makeup).

“We’re got to repopulate,” he said. “Start all over again from the beginning.” He looked at me. “You’re our only hope. You and the girl.”

I nodded. So did she.

So tonight they’re setting the two of us up in a living unit of our own. Regular honeymoon suite. From now on, it’s up to me.

Too bad. I just don’t think I’m going to make it. I’ve come to the conclusion Thoreau was right. In times like these, one must seek the peaceful serenity of Walden Pond.

I think I’ll go there tonight. And drown myself.

The Man Who Never Did Anything Right

Wasn't it G.K. Chesterton who asked, "Where hide a leaf?" And answered, "In a forest." Or "Where murder a man?" And answered, "In a battle" . . . Robert Bloch goes further, much further—to the ultimate

HE CAME ON DUTY PROMPTLY AT ten o'clock.

Hanson was already waiting inside the door when he unlocked it, and Hanson was scowling.

"Late again," Hanson said. "I got a heavy date."

"But it's just ten now—here, look at my watch—"

Hanson brushed past him. "You never do anything right," he muttered. "Okay, into the cell, Shorty."

Hanson took the keys, locked him in, and went away.

And then he was alone in the room.

Hanson had called it a cell, and in a way it was. The room was too small, too hot, too bare. It had no windows, and the indirect lighting produced a constant glare. The only furniture was a table and one chair; there was no radio, no TV, nothing to read, not even a cot to rest on. He wasn't supposed to rest, of course: he was supposed to stay alert and Wait for orders from the loudspeaker set high up in the wall.

That's all there was to it—just one hour of guard duty every night, from ten to eleven. All he had to do was wait for orders, and of course there never were any orders. It wasn't a hard assignment at all, but the button made him nervous.

It was just a small button, set in the wall under the loudspeaker. He could sit with his back to it if he liked and pretend it wasn't even there.

But it was there, and it made him nervous. One hour a night was about all he could take: one hour a night, sitting in that locked room with the little button.

The trick was to think about something else.

He sat down and reached for a cigarette, then remembered he didn't have any cigarettes. No smoking—that was one of the rules. No wonder Hanson had made that crack about it being a cell.

Maybe the routine was getting to Hanson too. Maybe he too was ready to flip. But no, Hanson wouldn't flip. He wasn't the flipping kind. Not handsome Hanson—that big ape, always talking about his heavy dates. He'd sure been in one hell of a hurry to get out tonight. And he'd had that nasty grin on his face, just as if he was still seeing Myrna.

But he wasn't, of course. Myrna wasn't Hanson's girl; she was his girl. She'd told him, so last week, swore she was through with Hanson, said she'd given him the gate. From now on there'd be just the two of them, Myrna and himself.

And tonight, in just one hour, when he got out of here—

Then he remembered. Myrna had called and left a message for him. She couldn't see him tonight, she had a headache.

Headache. He had a headache, too. Particularly when he remembered Hanson's grin. Could it be that—?

No, she wouldn't doublecross him.

But Hanson would.

"You never do anything right," Hanson had said. And he'd grinned when he muttered it, grinned as though he had some kind of secret. He couldn't wait to lock him up, here in the cell.

"Okay, into the cell, Shorty."

Shorty. That was the part that really hurt.

Because he was short. He knew it, Hanson knew it, Myrna knew it.

But was it his fault he was a runt? Was that any excuse for being picked on, laughed at, tricked? He couldn't help being short any more than Hanson was responsible for being tall and good-looking. It wasn't fair.

He stood up, feeling the heat and the closeness in the little room. God, why didn't something happen? But there wasn't a sound. And he still had fifty minutes to go. Fifty minutes—that meant only ten minutes had passed. How could he stand it? How could he stand it, knowing that Hanson was out there, free?. Hanson and Myrna, together, laughing at him in the cell, laughing at Shorty who never did anything right.

Think of something else, he told himself.

He found himself staring at the button.

The button, the small button in the wall.

He turned away, telling himself not to be nervous, to forget about the button. In a little less than fifty minutes he'd be out of here, he could phone Myrna, she'd tell him she loved him, and they'd laugh about his fears together.

Or was she laughing now? She and Hanson, together? Why try to fool himself—it was true, he was sure of it. That damned Hanson! He ought to be killed.

Think about that for a moment. Yes. Think about killing Hanson.

The trouble was, he couldn't. Because he was Shorty. And Hanson was big and strong. There would never be a chance; none of them was ever allowed access to weapons, for obvious security reasons. Besides, he had never used a gun or a knife. He'd bungle the job for sure. "You never do anything right."

So Hanson would go on living and laughing and loving, while Shorty stayed here locked in the cell with the little button.

If only there was some way to kill Hanson, some way to commit the perfect crime!

But he wasn't smart enough to figure out anything like that, and he wasn't big enough or brave enough to carry it through.

He paced the tiny room, cursing under his breath. Perfect crime! There was no such thing. No matter how cleverly one planned it, there could always be a slipup somewhere along the line. The only perfect crime is one that nobody can ever possibly know, about.

That’s when he stopped, standing in front of the button, standing and staring.

There was a way. A way in which he could kill Hanson and nobody would ever know. Because nobody would ever be left to know.

He stood there for a moment, staring at the button, seeing it up close for what it really was. A little round world. But that didn’t matter, as long as Hanson died.

He reached out, pressed

The Gods Are Not Mocked

Is there ever a justification for publishing a story in bad taste? The rule is—no, there isn't. But you now the vulnerability of any rule: the exception proves its validity, proves its very existence. And the exception in, this instance is that you can publish a story in bad taste—the story exposes bad taste . . .

HARRY HINCH WAS A FUNNY MAN and he sold funny things. He had a groovy little hole-in-the-wall shop near the Strip with a big burlap sack hanging in the window and a sign reading What's Your Bag? and inside he stocked goodies for everyone.

There were lurid paperbacks and off-brand LPs, of course, and campy photographic blowups of Theda Bara, but Harry's store wasn't just one of those places catering to UCLA drop-outs. Naturally he sold psychedelic prints and Nazi helmets and Iron Crosses and Mellow Yellow and sunflower seeds, but he had some swinging specialties, too. Like dirty Mother's Day cards, for instance. And leather goods—a whole counter of gloves, high-heeled boots, riding crops, and dog whips. For the birds he stocked kinky lingerie; bras in the shape of two clutching, hairy hands; and a G-string designed to look like an open mouth with two rows of sharp-pointed teeth.

But Harry was proudest of the items he dreamed up on his own. Along with the usual bumper stickers and buttons—Virginity Causes Cancer, Dracula Sucks, and Mary Poppins Is a Junky—he pushed a line of originals like It Takes Two to Make a Love-in, Flower-Children Are Pansies, and Keep Incest in the Family.

To look at him, sitting up front behind the cash register, you'd never think he was a mover and shaker. There are a dozen duplicates of Harry in the sidewalk scofferies on the Strip—they're all a little on the short side, dress very tight and Mod, and when their hairlines start to recede they sprout the usual compensation on their chins. They plant grass, they sell tickets for trips you can't book with a travel agency, they'll match you with an ideal partner without using a computer. But most of them aren't really creative, like Harry was.

He was the one who did the I'm a Flaming Heterosexual button and the bumper sticker that says, Caution—This Car Is Driven by Helen Keller. Bumper stickers were a "thing" with old Harry. Every night he sat up turning out jollies like Be Charitable—Contribute to the Delinquency of Minors, and Dr. Fu Manchu Is Alive and Performing Abortions in Pasadena.

Of course not everybody dug Harry. Some cubes said he was hung-up on put-downs. But you've got to expect such flap from the senior citizens; their idea of black comedy ended with Amos 'n Andy. The fuzz did everything they could to nail him for running an illegal letter drop, pushing pot, and a few other sideline scuffles, but Harry just kept on laughing and scratching.

It was always a freak-out scene at Harry's shop, with the hogs and choppers parked outside and the hippies and the teeny-boppers balling it up inside. He kept it cool and quiet, and the only noise was the ringing of the cash register.

When the crunch came, Harry was clean. It wasn't his problem when a juvie named Kim Carmichael wiggled her miniskirt at old Grabber. Sure, they met at his shop, but Harry didn't set up the action. Harry didn't claim he was a chemistry major, and if he sold Grabber a few sugar cubes that didn't prove he knew they were loaded.

Old Grabber had come on strong for Kim Carmichael, but Harry never told him to cut out with her riding tail-gunner on his chopper; Harry never told him to suck the cubes he bought, and Harry definitely didn’t tell him to sail off that sharp curve on top of Mulholland and total the chopper, himself, and Kim Carmichael.

When Harry got the word he knew it was either split out or cop out and he wasn’t about to take any chances of getting busted. So he hung his God Is Dead and I’m Going to the Funeral sign on the front door and faded fast.

’Way past Baldy, up in the National Forest, Harry had a little pad—just a shack, a real nothing scene, but a place where he could get away from the heat.

That’s where Harry headed for, right into the old boondocks, ’way out in the toolies with big trees and the mountains and the high lonesomes all around. He holed up in his cabin and waited; in a week or so the fuzz would cool it and meanwhile he was safe as the pill because nobody knew where he was hanging in.

The only thing was that he was all alone and it gets dark pretty early in the woods and very quiet. Harry never realized how much he was used to hearing the cut-outs blasting and the transistor sets blaring and the rumble of the freeways blending all the sounds together for background music. And he missed the lights and the wiggy crowds that kept him company in the ship, even the sickies that talked to themselves. Harry just wasn’t with the country-and-western bit, and by the time the sun went down that first night he was ready to climb the walls.

When he knew he was uptight, Harry decided to take his mind off things by doing a little occupational therapy with a bottle of juice he’d packed along. A couple of blasts and he felt better, but he still wasn’t comfy-cozy about the dark shadows and the way the wind started to shiver in the tall trees around the cabin.

So he belted another slug and settled down to work. No point just sitting there and thinking about the news report—how the old chopper went sailing off down a sixty-foot drop and landed right on Grabber’s spine, then smashed Kim Carmichael’s arms, legs, and face—

No, it was better to do a little serious constructive work, and Harry had pen and paper and he was creative and with it, and in no time at all he was lining out some new copy for stickers. Kick Your Hobbit, for the Tolkien crowd, and a Zen thing, Big Buddha Is Watching You, and then, Reality Is a Put-on.

But there were shadows moving outside and the wind kept moaning and he didn't like the trees in the first place, to hell with the conservationists, and that gave Harry another inspiration; so he wrote down Smokey the Bear Is a Pyromaniac.

That really broke him up; he'd always hated that damned smart-aleck picture and the slogan about forest fires and for two cents and another belt from the bottle he'd start a fire himself and burn down the whole lousy setup and the Boy Scouts and the mothers and the veterans and the fuzz and the rest of the squares that bugged him, that were always bugging Harry to believe in their stinking superstitions about God and Freud and Law and Order and Love and Happiness. It was all a big yak and Harry had to laugh; he was still laughing when Dr. Carmichael walked in.

Dr. Carmichael or Professor Carmichael—Harry didn't know which it was, and it didn't matter. All he knew when the guy introduced himself was that this Carmichael was Kim Carmichael's father.

He must have tailed Harry up to the cabin all the way from town when he took off, and he'd hung around waiting until it got dark to make his move.

There he was, standing in the doorway, saying nothing except, "I'm Carmichael—Kim's father," and doing nothing but stare at Harry. He was a tall, skinny gray-haired cat—taught sociology or ethics or some such crud out at the U—and Harry could have taken him in one fast chop. Except that the old guy was holding an Astra .25 with the safety off. A very small gun, but the kind that makes a very big hole at close range.

"Sit down," said Carmichael, and Harry sat down. He wasn't exactly loving every minute of it, but one thing he knew for sure. Carmichael wasn't about to kill him, not after telling him to sit. He wouldn't be shooting off anything but his mouth, and this Harry could take.

He took it for about ten minutes, took it with a very straight face—all the usual jazz about, “You murderer, you killed my daughter just as surely as if you drove that motorcycle off the cliff yourself,” and a lot more. Harry couldn’t have cared less until Carmichael started getting to him. Him, personally.

“I’ve seen your store,” Carmichael said. “I’ve seen the sickness you sell—the sickness of our times. Oh, I know all the rationalizations. The fix is in, the dice are loaded, you can’t win for losing, all the world’s a Theatre of the Absurd, life’s just another Happening, and why play anything straight?

“So you and your kind put down heroes in the name of humor, you put down society in the name of satire, you put down culture and call it comedy.

“But you’re not a funny man, Harry. Behind the laughter there’s hatred, and behind the hatred is fear. That’s the real reason for the put-downs, isn’t it? Because you’re afraid of everything and everyone. There’s a name for your disease—paranoid fixation. You’re a carrier, you infect everything you touch.

“You infect the mumbling misfits who come to your shop—the idle, would-be idol-smashers who foist their fears and vent their aggressions on the world of reality. And you infect the healthy ones, too—girls like Kim who mistake your hostility for profundity—”

“Get off my back,” said Harry.

“I’m not on your back,” Carmichael told him. “You’re carrying your own monkey. The simian syndrome—huddling behind the bars of your cage and making faces at the world because it frightens you. Monkey sees, monkey does, and because there are thousands of others just like you, you think you’ve got a grasp on the truth.

“But for every thousand pedestal-topplers and icon-breakers, there are millions who still believe otherwise. And perhaps their belief is stronger than yours.

“Have you ever really thought about this faith you spend your life trying to destroy—the sustaining faith that most of the world maintains in its illusions? Belief sanctifies, you know. Belief makes heroes, creates beauty and honor and decency and all the other phenomena which you laugh at. You paranoid types can't stand heroes, can you, Harry? Not even the make-believe ones in art and literature and the mass media of TV and films. But in terms of belief they do exist, you know. Hamlet is far more real to us than Shakespeare, and though Conan Doyle is dead, Sherlock Holmes still has a life of his own.

"I suspect you do realize this, and that's why you put down the villains, too—with all the snickering about Dracula and King Kong and the little wind-up toy Frankenstein's Monster that loses its trousers when it starts to reach out for you. These things scared you when you were a kid and you're still scared; so you've got to laugh at them and pretend they're not real."

Carmichael looked down at the table and saw what Harry had been writing and he shook his head.

"Smokey the Bear Is a Pyromaniac," he said. "Why, Harry? Why? Is it because you were afraid of the Three Bears when Mommy told you the story? Is it because you secretly believe there is such a creature? Well, if there's any power in faith, then the belief of millions of youngsters constitutes a force you'll never laugh away with a cheap put-down. Maybe you have good reason for your fear, Harry. Belief creates our gods, and the gods are not mocked."

That is what Carmichael told Harry before he went away.

At least he says he told Harry and went away, but we have only his word for it.

We do know, from a guy named Rogers who happened to be bedding down in his camper about a half mile away on the lake, that the lights went out in Harry's cabin around midnight; probably right after Harry finished the last of his whiskey.

A little while later, the growling started. The growling, and the screams.

You could hear them echoing all over the lake, but by the time Rogers stumbled through the pitch-black woods and reached the cabin there was no sound except the whispering of the wind.

Harry was dead by then; nobody could have survived the ripping and the chewing. Perhaps Carmichael was lying, maybe he was the crazy one and came back to descend on Harry in the darkness, to bite and slash and tear. He could even have planted that strange object on the cabin's earthen floor alongside Harry's body—the crushed and crumpled Boy Scout hat, with its rank animal odor.

Maybe so.

But nobody ever explained the pawprints.

How Like A God

His crime was cruelty. His sentence was to spend eternity with the cruelest race in space!

I

To be was sweet.

There was meditation—a turning-in upon one’s self. There was contemplation—a turning-out to regard others, and otherness.

In meditation one remained contained. In contemplation there was a merging, a coalescence with! the rest.

Mok preferred meditation. Here Mok enjoyed identity and was conscious of being he, she or it, endlessly repeated through the memory of millenniums of incarnations. Mok, like the others, had evolved through many life-forms on many worlds. Now Mok was free of the pain and free of the pleasures, too, free of the illusions of the senses which Had served the bodies Housing the beings which finally became Mok.

And yet, Mok was not wholly free. Because Mok still turned to the memories for satisfaction.

The others preferred contemplation. They enjoyed coalescing, mingling their memories, pooling their awareness and sharing their sense of being.

Mok could never share completely. Mok was too conscious of the differences. For even without body, without sex, without physical limitation imposed by substance in time and space, Mok was aware of inequality.

Mok was aware of Ser.

Ser was the mightiest of them all. In coalescence, Ser’s being dominated every pattern of contemplation. Ser’s will imposed Harmony on the others, but only if the others surrendered to it.

To be was sweet. But it was not sweet enough.

Upon this, Mok meditated. And when coalescence came again, Mok did not surrender. Mok fixed firmly upon the concept of freedom—freedom of choice, the final freedom which Ser denied.

There was agitation, amongst 70 the others; Mok sensed If. Some attempted to merge with Mok, for they too shared the concept, and Mok opened to receive them, feeling the strength grow. Mok was as strong as Ser now, stronger, calling upon the will and purpose born of memories of millions of finite existences in which will and purpose were the roots of survival. But that survival had been temporary, and this would be permanent, forever.

Mok held the concept, gathered the strength, firmed the purpose—and then, quite suddenly, the purpose faded. The strength oozed away. The others were gone; nothing was left but Mok and the concept itself. The concept to—

Mok couldn’t grasp the concept now. It had vanished.

All that remained was Mok and Ser. Ser’s will, obliterating concept and purpose and strength, imposing itself upon Mok, invading and inundating Mok’s awareness. Mok’s very being. But without concept there was no purpose, without purpose there was no strength, without strength Mok could not preserve awareness, and without awareness there was no being.

Without being there was no Mok.

When Mok’s identity returned he was in the ship.

Ship?

Only memories of distant incarnations told Mok this was a ship, but it was unmistakably so: a ship, a vessel, a transporter, a physical object, capable of phyysical movement through space and time.

Space and time existed again, and the ship moved through them. The ship was confined in space and time, and Mok was confined in the ship, which was just large enough to House him as lie journeyed.

Yes, he.

Mok was he. Confined now, not only in the prison of space and time, nor in the smaller prison of the ship, but in the prison of a body. A male body.

Male. Mammalian. A spine to support the frame, arms and legs to support and grasp, eyes and ears and nose and other crude sensory receivers. Flesh, blood, skin—yellowish fur covering the latter, even along the lashing tail. Lungs for oxygen intake, which at the moment was supplied by an ingenious transparent Helmet and attached pack mechanism.

Ingenious? But this was clumsy, crude, primitive, a relic of remote barbaric eras Mok could only vaguely recall. He tried to meditate, tried to contemplate, but now He could only see—see through the transparency of the Helmet as the ship settled to rest and its belly opened to catapult him forth upon the frigid surface of a barren planet where a cold moon wheeled against the icy glitter of distant stars.

The ship, too, had a form—a body that was in itself vaguely modeled on mammalian concept, almost like one of those giant robots developed by life-forms in intermediate stages of evolution.

Mok stared at the ship as it rested before him on the sterile, starlit slope. Yes, the ship had a domed cranial protuberance and two metal arms terminating in claws. Claws to open the belly of the ship, claws that had lifted Molds body forth to disgorge him from the belly in a parody of birth.

Now, as Mok watched, the ship’s belly was closing again, sealing tightly while the metallic claws returned to rest at its sides. And flames of force were blasting from the pediment.

The ship was rising, taking off.

Mok had been embodied in the confines of the ship, imprisoned in this, his present form. The ship had carried Kim to this world and now it was leaving Him Here. Which meant that the ship must be—“Set!” he screamed, as the realization came, and the sound of his voice echoing in the Hollow Helmet almost split his skull. But Ser did not answer. The ship continued to rise, the rising accelerated, there was a roar and a glimmer and then an incandescence which faded to nothingness against the black backdrop of emptiness punctured by glittering pinpoints of light flickering down upon the world into which Mok had been born.

The world where Ser had left him to die . . .

II

Mok turned away. His body burned? Burned? Mok searched archaic memories and came up with another concept. He wasn’t burning. He was freezing. This was cold.

The surface of the planet was cold, and his skin—fur?—did not sufficiently protect him. Mok took a deep breath, and that in turn brought consciousness of the inner mechanism: circulation, nervous system, lungs. Lungs for breath, supplying the fuel of life.

The feeder-pack on his back was small. Its content, scarcely enough to fill his needs on the flight here, would soon be exhausted.

Was there oxygen on the surface of this planet? Mok glanced around. The rocky terrain was devoid of vegetation, and that was not a promising sign. But perhaps the entire surface wasn’t like this; in other areas at lower levels, plant-life might flourish. If so, functioning existence could be sustained.

There was only one way to learn. Mok’s prehensile appendages—not exactly claws, not quite fingers—fumbled clumsily with the fastenings of the Helmet and raised it gingerly. He took a shallow breath, then another. Yes, there was oxygen present.

Satisfied, Mok removed helmet and pack, along with the control mechanism strapped to his side. There’d be no further need of this apparatus here.

What lie needed now was warmth, a heated atmosphere.

He glanced towards the bleak, black bulk of crags looming across the barren plain. He moved towards them slowly, under the silent, staring stars, toiling up a slope as a sudden wind tore at his shivering body. It was awkward, this body of his, a clumsy mechanism subject to crude muscular control. Only atavism came to his aid as half-perceived memories of ancient physical existence enabled him to move his legs with proper coordination. Walking—climbing—then crawling and clinging to the rocks—all was demanding, difficult, a challenge to be met and mastered.

But Mok ascended the face of the nearest cliff and found the opening, a crevasse with an inner fissure that became the mouth of a cave. A dark shelter from the wind, but it was warmer here. And the rocky floor sloped into deeper darkness. The pupils of his eyes accommodated, and he could guide Himself in the dim tunnelway, for his vision was that of a feral nyctalops.

Mok crept through caverns like a giant cat, gusts of warm air billowing against His body to beckon him forward. Forward and down, forward and down. And now the Heat rose about him in palpable waves, the air singed with an acrid scent, and there was a glowing from a light source ahead. Forward and down towards the light source, until he heard the hissing and the rumbling, felt the scalding steam, breathed the lung-searing gases, saw the spurting flames in which steam and gas were born.

The inner core of the planet was molten!

Mok went no further. He turned and retreated to a comfortable distance, moving into a side passageway which led to still other offshoots. Here tortuous tunnels branched in all directions, but he was safe in warmth and darkness; safe to rest. His body—this corporeal prison in which He was doomed to dwell—needed rest.

Rest was not sleep. Rest was not hibernation, or estivation, or any of a thousand forms of suspended animation which Mok's memory summoned from myriad incarnations in the past. Rest was merely passivity. Passivity and reflection.

Reflection. . . .

Images mingled with long-discarded verbal concepts. With their aid, while passive, Mok formulated his situation. He was in the body of a beast, but there were subtle differentiations from the true mammal. Oxygen was needed, but not the respite of true sleep. And he felt no visceral stirrings, no pangs of physical hunger. He would not be dependent, he knew, upon the ingestion of alien substance for continued survival. As long as he protected his fleshly envelope from extremes of heat and cold, as long as he avoided excessive demands upon muscles and organs, he would exist. But despite the difference which distinguished him from a true mammal, he was still confined to his feral form. And his existence was bestial.

Sensation surged within him, a flood, of feeling Mok had not experienced in aeons, a quickening, sickening, burning, churning evocation of emotion. He knew it now. It was fear.

Fear.

The true bondage of the beast.

Mok was afraid, because now he understood that this was planned, this part of Ser's purpose. Ser had committed him to this degradation and modified his mammalian aspect so that he could exist eternally.

That was what Mok feared. Eternity in this form!

Passive no longer, Mok flexed and rose. Summoning cognition to utmost capacity, Mok searched within himself for other, inherent powers. The power to merge, to coalesce—that was gone. The power to transmute, to transfer, to transport, to transform—gone. He could not change His physical being, could not alter his physical environment, save by physical means of his own devising within the limitations of his beast's body.

So there was no escape from this existence.

No escape.

The realization brought fresh fear, and Mok turned and ran. Ran blindly through the twisting corridors, fear riding him as he raced, raced mindlessly, endlessly.

Somewhere along the way a tunnel burrowed upwards. Mok toiled through it, panting and gasping for breath'; he willed himself to stop breathing but the foody, the beast-foody, sucked air in greedy gulps, autonomically functioning beyond his conscious control.

Scrambling along slanted spirals, Mok emerged once more upon the outer surface of his planetary prison. This was a low-lying area, distant and different from his point of entry, with vegetation vividly verdant against a dazzling dawn—a valley, capable of supporting life.

And there was life Here! Feathery forms chattering in the trees, furry figures scurrying through undergrowth, scaly slitherers, chitinoidal burrowers buzzing. These were simple shapes, crudely conceived creatures of primitive pursuits, but alive and aware.

Mok sensed them, and they sensed Mok. There was no way of communicating with them except vocally, but even the soft sounds issuing from His throat sent them fleeing frantically. For Mok was a beast now, who feared and was feared.

He crouched amongst the rocks at the mouth of the cavern from which he had come forth and gazed in helpless, hopeless confusion at the panic his presence had provoked, and the soft sounds he uttered gave place to a growling groan of despair.

And it was then that they found him—the hairy bipeds, moved cautiously to encircle him until he was ringed by a shambling band. These were troglodytes, grunting and snuffling and giving off an acrid stench of mingled fear and rage as they cautiously approached.

Mok stared at them, noting How the hunched, swaying figures moved in concert to approach him. They clutched crude clubs, mere branches torn from trees; some carried rocks scooped up from the surface of the slope. But these were weapons, capable of inflicting injury, and the hairy creatures were hunters seeking their prey.

Mok turned to retreat into the cavern, but the way was barred now by shaggy bodies, and there was no escape.

The troglodytes pressed forward now, awe and apprehension giving place to anger. Yellow fangs bared, hairy arms raised. One of the creatures—the leader of the pack—grunted what seemed a signal.

And they hurled their rocks.

Mok raised his arms to protect his head. His vision was blocked, so that he heard the sound of the stones clattering against the slope before he saw them fall. Then, as the growls and shrieks rose to a frenzy. Mok glanced up to see the rocks rebounding upon his attackers.

Raging, they closed in to smash at Mok’s skull and body with their clubs. Mok heard the sounds of impact, but he felt nothing, for the blows never reached their intended target. Instead, title clubs splintered and broke in empty air.

Then Mok whirled, confused, to face his enemies. As fie did so they recoiled, screaming in fright. Breaking the circle, they retreated down the slopes and into the forest, fleeing from this strange thing that could not be Harmed or killed, tills invincible entity—

This invincible entity.

It was Molds concept, and fie understood, now. Ser had granted him that final irony—invincibility. A. field of force, surrounding his body, rendering him immune to injury and death. No doubt it also immunized him from bacterial invasion. He was in a physical form, but one independent of physical needs to sustain survival; one which would exist, indestructibly, forever. He was, in truth, imprisoned, and eternal.

For a moment Mok stood stunned at the comprehension, blankly blinded by the almost tangible intensity of black despair. Here was the ultimate horror—doom without death, exile without end, isolation throughout infinity. Alone forever.

Numbed senses reasserted their sway, and Mok glanced around the empty stillness of the slope.

It wasn't entirely empty. Two of the troglodytic creatures sprawled motionless on the rocks directly below him. One was bleeding from a gash in the side of his head, inflicted by a rebounding club, the other Had been felled by a glancing blow from a stone.

These creatures weren't immortal.

Mok moved toward them, noting chest movement, the soft susurration of breath.

They weren't immortal, but they were still alive. Alive and helpless. Vulnerable, at his mercy.

Mercy. The quality Ser had refused to show Mok. There had been no mercy in condemning him to spend eternity here alone.

Mok halted, peering down at the two unconscious forms. He made a sound in his throat, a sound that was curiously like a chuckle.

Perhaps that was a way out, after all, a way to at least mitigate his sentence here. If he showed mercy now, to these creatures—He might not always fee alone.

Mok reached down, lifting the body of the first creature in his arms. It was heavy in its limpness, but Mok's strength was great. He picked up the second creature carefully, so as not to injure it further.

Then, still chuckling, Mok turned and carried the two unconscious forms back into the cavern.

III

In the warm, firelit shelter of the deeper caverns, Mok tended to the creatures. While they slumbered fitfully, he ascended again to the surface and foraged for their nourishment in the green glades. He brought food and, calling upon distant memories, fashioned crude clay pots in which to carry water to them from a mountainside spring.

After a time they regained consciousness and they were afraid—afraid of the great beast with the bulging eyes and lashing tail, the beast they knew to be deathless.

It was simple enough for Mok to fathom the crude construct of growls and gruntings which served these life-forms as a principal means of communication, simple enough to grasp the limited concepts and references symbolized in their speech. Within these limitations he attempted to tell them who and what he was and Bow he had come to be here, but while they listened they did not comprehend.

And still they feared him, the female specimen more than the male. the male, at least, evinced curiosity concerning the clay pots, and Mok demonstrated the fashioning method until the male was able to imitate it successfully.

But both were wary, and both reacted in terror when confronted with the molten reaches of the planet’s inner core. Nor could they become accustomed to the acrid gases, the darkness enveloping the maze of far-flung fissures Honeycombing the substrata. As they gathered strength over the passage of time, they; Huddled together and murmured, eyeing Mok apprehensively.

Mok was not too surprised when, upon returning from one of His food-gathering expeditions to the surface, He discovered that they were gone.

But Mok was surprised by. the strength of his own reaction—the sudden responsive surge of loneliness.

Loneliness—for those creatures? They couldn’t conceivably serve as companions, even on the lowest level of such a relationship; and yet lie missed their presence. Their mere presence had in itself been some assuagement to his own inner agony of isolation.

Now He realized a growing sympathy for them in the Helplessness of their abysmal ignorance. Even their destructive impulses excited pity, for such impulses indicated their constant fear. Beings such as these lived out their tiny span in utter dread; they trusted neither their environment nor one another, and each new experience or phenomenon was perceived as a potential peril. They had no hope, no abstract image of the future to sustain them.

Mok wondered if his two captives had succeeded in their escape. He prowled the passages searching for them, visioning their weary wanderings, their pathetic plight if they had become lost in the underground fastnesses. But he found nothing.

Once again he was alone in the warm beast-body that knew neither fatigue nor pain—except for this new pang, this lonely longing for contact with life on any level. Ancient concepts came to him, identifying the nuances of his reactions, all likened and linked to finite time-spans. Monotony. Boredom. Restlessness.

These were the emotive elements which forced him up again from the confined comfort of the caves. He prowled the planet, avoiding the bleak, cold wastes and searching out the areas of lush vegetation. For a long period he encountered only the lowest life-forms.

Then one of his diurnal forays to the surface brought him to a stream, and as he crouched behind a clump of vegetation he peered at a group of troglodytes gathered on its far bank.

Vocalizing in their pattern of growls and grunts, He ventured forth, uttering phonic placations. But they screamed at the sight of him, screamed and fled into the forest, and he was left alone.

Left alone, to stoop and pick up what they had abandoned in their flight—two crude clay containers, half-filled with water.

Now He knew the fate of his captives.

They had survived and returned to their own kind, bringing with them their newly acquired skill. What tales they had told of their experience lie could not surmise, but they remembered what he had taught them. They were capable of learning.

Mok had no need of further proof, and the incentive was there; the compound of pity, of concern for these creatures, of his his own need for contact on any level And here was a logical level indeed—there would never be companionship, that he understood and accepted, but this other relationship was possible. The relationship between teacher and pupil, between mentor and supplicant, between the governing power and the governed.

The governing power. . . .

Mok turned the clay containers this way and that, noting the clumsiness with which they had been fashioned, noting the irregularities of their surface. He could so easily correct that clumsiness, He could so surely smooth and reshape that clay. Govern the earth, govern the creatures, impart and instruct that which would shape them anew.

And then the ultimate realization came.

This would be duty and destiny, function and fulfillment. Within the prison of space and time, he would mold the little lives.

Now he know His own fate.

He would be their god.

IV

It was a strange role, but Mok played it well.

There were obstacles, of course. the first to be faced was the fear in which they held him. He was an alien, and to the primitive minds of these creatures, anything alien was. abhorrent. His very appearance provoked reactions which prevented him from approaching them, and for a time Mok despaired of overcoming this communication barrier. Then, slowly he came to the realize that their fear was in itself a tool he could employ to positive ends. With it He could invoke awe, authority, awareness of his powers.

Yes, that was the way. To accept his condition and stay apart from them always, confident that in time their own curiosity would drive them to seek them out.

So Mok kept to the caves, and gradually the contacts were made. Not all of the hominids came to him, of course, only the boldest and most enterprising, but these were the ones he awaited. These were the ones most fitted to learn.

As he expected, the experience of his captives became a legend, and the legend led to worship. It was useless for Mok to discourage this, impossible even to make the attempt in the light of their primitive reasoning, a barter-system must prevail. Offerings and sacrifices were the price they must pay in return for wisdom. Mok scanned his own primordial memories, assigning an order to the learning He imparted: the gift of fire, the secret of cultivation, the firing of clay, the shaping of weapons, the subjugation and domestication of lesser life-forms, the control and eradication of others. Slowly a more sophisticated system of communication evolved, first on the verbal and then on the visual level.

The creatures disseminated his wisdom, absorbing it into their crude culture. They learned the uses of wheel and lever, then reached the gradual abstraction of the numeral concept. Now they were capable of making their own independent discoveries; language and mathematics stimulated selfdevelopment.

But in times of crisis there was still a need for further enlightenment. Natural forces beyond their limited powers of control brought periodic disaster to life-patterns on the surface of the planet, and with every upheaval came a resurgence of the worship and sacrifices Mok secretly abhorred. Yet these creatures seemed to feel the necessity of making recompense for the skills he could grant them and the bonus these skills conferred, and Mok reluctantly accepted this.

It was harder for him to accept the continuation of their fear.

For a time he hoped that as their enlightment increased they would revise their attitudes. Instead, their dreads actually increased. Mok attempted to observe their progress at first hand, but there was no opportunity for open contact and communication, and his mere appearance provoked panic. Even those who sought him in secret, or led the rituals of worship, seemed to be afraid of acknowledging the fact, lest it lessen their own superior status within the group. Acknowledging and acclaiming the existence of their god, they nevertheless avoided his physical presence.

Perhaps it was because sects and schisms had sprung up, each with its own hierarchy, its own dogma regarding the true nature of what they worshipped. Mok remembered, wryly, that in organized religion the actual presence of a god is an embarrassment.

So Mok refrained from further visitations, and as time passed he retreated deeper and deeper into the caverns. Now it was almost unnecessary for him to maintain even token contact, for these creatures had evolved to a stage where they were capable of self development.

But even gods grow lonely, and take nurture in pride. Thus it was that at rare intervals, and in utmost secrecy, Mok ventured forth for a Hasty glimpse of his domain.

One evening He came forth upon a mountaintop. Here the stars still glittered coldly, but there was an even greater glitter emanating from the expanse below—the huge city-complex towering as a testament to the wisdom of these creatures, and his own.

Mok stared down, and the sweet surges of pride coursed through him as he contemplated what he had wrought. These toys, these trifles with which He played, now toyed and trifled with the prime forces of the universe to create their own destiny.

Perhaps He, as their god, was misunderstood, even forgotten now. But did it matter? They had achieved independence, they did not need him any more.

Or did they?

The concept came, and it was more chilling to Mok than the wind of mountain night.

These creatures created, but they also destroyed. And their motivations—their greeds, their hungers, their lusts, their fears—were still those of the beasts they had been. The beasts they could become again, if spiritual awareness did not keep pace with material attainment.

There was still a need Here, a need greater than before. And now Mok felt no pride, only perplexity which pierced more poignantly than pain.

How could he help them?

"You cannot."

The communication came, and Mok whirled.

Absorbed, He Had not sensed the silent streaking of the ship from sky to surface, but it was Here now, remembered and recognized. The ship which Had captured and conveyed Him, the strangely shaped ship which was Ser—

It Hovered incandescently against the Horizon of infinity, and as if communication Had been a signal, Mok found Himself caught up in a long-discarded reaction. He was contemplating Ser.

And in that colloquy, Ser's concepts flowed to Kim.

"Valid, You cannot fulfill their needs. Already you Have done too much."

Despite conscious volition, Mok felt the stubborn resurgence of His pride. But there was no need to formulate the reasons, for Ser's contemplation was complete.

"You are in error. I sensed your rebellion, overcame you, brought you Here—but it was not a punishment. You were placed for a purpose. Because this pride, this urge to invest identity through achievement, could be of use at this time, in this place. Like the others."

"Others?" Confusion colored Mok's contemplation.

"Did you conceive of yourself as the only rebel? Not so. There have been more, many more. And they have served their purposes on other worlds throughout the cosmos. Worlds where the seeds of life needed cultivation and careful nurturing. I chose them for their tasks, just as I chose you. And you Have not failed."

Mok considered, then communicated with an energy which surprised him.

"Then let me continue! Endow me with what is necessary to Help them now!"

Ser's concept came. "It is not possible."

Mok contemplated in final effort. "But it is my right to do so. I am their god."

"No," Ser answered. "You have never been their god. You were chosen for what you were—to be their devil."

Devil . . .

There was no contemplation now, only maddening meditation as Mok scanned through concepts long discarded from incarnations long lost save in immutable memory. Concepts of good, evil, right, wrong—concepts embodied in the primitive religions of a million primitive pasts. God arose from those concepts, and so did the embodiment of an opposing force. And in all the legends in each of the myriad myths, the pattern was the same. A rebel cast down from the skies to tempt with teaching, to furnish forbidden knowledge at a price. A being in the form of a beast, skulking in darkness, in the pit where inner fires flamed forever. And he Had been this being; it was true, he was a devil.

Only pride Had blinded Him to the truth the pride which Had prompted Him to play god.

"A pride of which you Have been purged," Ser's communication continued. "One can sense in you now only mercy and compassion for these creatures and their potential peril. One can sense love."

"It is true," Mok acknowledged. "I feel love for them."

Ser's assent came. "With your aid, these creatures evolved. But you have evolved too—losing pride, gaining love. In so doing, you cannot function for them as their devil any longer. Your usefulness here is ended."

"But what will happen?"

The answer came not as a concept but as an accomplishment.

Suddenly Mok was no longer in the tawny body of the beast. He was in the ship, hovering and gazing down at that body; gazing down at the creature which lashed its tail and stared up at him with bulging eyes. The creature which now contained the essence of Ser.

And Ser communicated. "For a span you shall take my place, as you once desired. You will seed the stars, instill order in chaos, lead the others in contemplation. You will do so in understanding, and in love."

"And you?" Mok asked.

The being in the bestial body formed a final concept. "I take your role and your responsibility. There is that within me which must also be purged, and it may be I will destroy much of what you have created here. But in the end, even as their devil, I may bring them to an ultimate salvation. The cycle changes."

Mok willed the celestial machine in which his essence dwelt, willed it to rise, and like a fiery chariot it ascended to the realms of glory awaiting him in the skies beyond.

As he did so, he caught a fleeting glimpse of Ser.

The beast had turned to descend the mountain. Padding purposefully, the devil was entering his kingdom.

Mok's comprehension faltered. Cycle? Ser had been a god and now he was a devil. Mok had been a devil and now he was a god. But he could never have become a god if Ser hadn't willed the exchange of roles.

Was this Ser's intent all along—to allow Mok to evolve as devil and then usurp his identity?

In that case, Ser was actually a devil from the beginning, and Mok had been right in opposing him, for Mok was truly godlike.

Or were they all—Mok, Ser, the others, even the primitive mammalian creatures on this planet—both gods and devils?

It was a matter, Mok decided, which might require an eternity of contemplation. . . .   END

Groovyland

Drool was alien and green and ugly. And there was no other rock group like him anywhere—in the beginning.

I

I started my writing assignment at the studio on January 2nd. Ten minutes after I checked into my office I got a call from my producer, Effingwell Wright.

Working for him was about as safe as practicing dentistry on an alligator, but I needed the bread. Besides, he did my kind of picture—he'd just finished a spooktacular, The Turn Of The Screw, and was now considering a sequel, The Return Of The Screw. Which was why I'd been hired.

At least that's what I thought until I arrived at Wright's office.

"We're going to do Hamlet," he announced.

"Hamlet?"

Wright nodded through a wreath of cigar-smoke. "That's it, baby. Now we only got one problem. How do we lick the story?"

I stared at him. "I'm afraid I've never had any experience with Shakespeare."

"Don't worry, you won't be working with him." Wright's cigar waved dismissal of the problem. "But there's a ghost in this property, isn't there? And that's where you come in."

That, actually, is where Wright's secretary came in and handed him a letter.

"Here's the censorship report. It just arrived."

"Censorship?" Wright scowled through the smoke.

"From the Anti-Amusement League. They want some changes in the story-treatment."

Wright scanned the letter, shaking his head and muttering as he read.

"Relationship between Hamlet and his mother is unacceptable to this office. Suggest you make him an orphan." Wright frowned, then went on. "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern objectionable for ethnic reasons—no Jewish names. Recommend you make them Negroes." Wright sighed and continued. "Be sure to eliminate violence—no duels, no killings at the end." He began to frown again. "Imperative that you cut the phrase, To be or not to be. It might encourage suicide." Wright's frown darkened. "Remove business with skull in graveyard scene. Better still, drop graveyard scene entirely. Too gruesome for kiddies in audience. Finally, we cannot accept the ghost. There must be no cheap, morbid nonsense about spirits of the dead thirsting for revenge. Sincerely—"

Wright shrugged at me. "Sorry, baby. You can't fight progress." He rose and moved with me to the door. "I'd like to use you on this project, but the Anti-Amusement League carries a lot of clout in the industry. I suggest you go back to your office and clean out your drawers."

I got the message. I was being tossed out on my assignment.

Meanwhile, back at the Unemployment Office—

II

The first thing I did at the Unemployment Office was read the bulletin board to see if there were any openings. It had only one listing today, and I glanced at it.

"Nit-pickers wanted. Must be experienced quibblers."

I shook my head. No government job for me. Better off to apply for compensation. So I bought a paper and got in line to wait for my interview.

From the look of the headlines, the year was starting off with a bang. Wars were escalating abroad, prices were escalating at home and taxes were just plain rising. Eighteen people had been killed in a riot for peace, and there was talk that no such groups would be allowed to demonstrate in the future without a riot-permit. A small box contained a bulletin on 981 traffic fatalities and a large front-page story dealt with the arrest of a local museum guard who had been accused of mummy-molesting.

I sought solace in the sports section, reading the scores of the New Year's football games—the Rose Bowl, the Cotton Bowl, the Sugar Bowl, the Toilet Bowl—

"Pardon me," the soft voice murmured.

Glancing up, I saw this unnatural blonde, the lass with the psyche-delicate air.

"Are you three o'clock?" she asked. It took me a moment to interpret her question; she wanted to know the time of my interview.

"That's right," I nodded.

"Mind if I slip in ahead of you? I'm two-forty-five."

Actually, I'd have guessed her to be 36-24-36, so I gallantly allowed her to precede me and returned to my reading. When I looked up again, she was gone, and I stepped before the window to do the interview bit It wasn't until I went outside that I saw her again.

She was standing on the curb beside the car parked just ahead of mine—a beat-up old heap with a bumper-sticker reading I Want To Be Conspicuous. The car was decorated with the usual floral designs, but from the look on the girl's face I gathered that her Flower Power had wilted. "Trouble?" I inquired.

She glanced up. "Oh, it's you!" There was no point in denying it, so I nodded. "What's the matter—car won't start?"

It was her turn to nod.

I opened the door and got behind the wheel. “Here, let me give you a hand.” I gave her more than a hand; I gave her a foot, on the gas-pedal. The motor coughed, spluttered, then gave an unmistakable death-rattle.

“Don’t bother,” she told me. “It’s totalled.” And she started to walk away.

“Hey, aren’t you going to call the Auto Club?”

“Not unless they’ll give me a lift home.”

I climbed out hastily. “Where’s that?”

“Above the Strip. On Basic Drive. You know where that is?” I opened the door of my own car. “Get in, and I’ll prove it.”

“Thanks.” She slid across the seat, snuggling over on the passenger side. I climbed in after her and we peeled off.

As we turned up Highland, I learned that her name was Sandy Simpson. Making a left on Sunset, I discovered that she was a professional body.

“That’s right,” she said, as I reacted by nearly ramming the car into a lamp-post. “I sell my body for a living. All, or any part of it. You know, like in a TV commercial with a star—sometimes her hands show her age, so when they cut to a tight closeup, it’s my hands in the shot. Or maybe my feet. I do knees and elbows, too, and I’m very good at cleavage.”

“In other words, you’re a double?”

“A dubber, too. I specialize in howls for the laugh-tracks on comedy shows.” And she gave out with an ear-splitting screech.

“Sounds like a good racket.”

“Not lately.” Sandy sighed heavily. “Haven’t had a studio call in three months. I’d have starved to death if it wasn’t for a couple of nose residuals I got from an old sinus-tablet commercial.”

“So that’s why you were down collecting compensation.”

Sandy nodded. “What’s your excuse?”

“I’m a writer. In this business we are constantly starving.”

“TV or movies?”

"I'm versatile. I starve in both." I crossed Crescent Heights and moved on into Sunset Strip. "Couldn't you do like, books?"

"I've done like, books. Three of them, to be exact. How To Drown A Fish, The Romance of Sewage Disposal, and one of those big special gift-books—A Pictorial History of Dandruff."

"Did they sell?"

"Like hot-cakes." I shrugged. "Trouble is, nobody buys hot-cakes in a bookstore."

"But you're really a writer?" Sandy eyed me curiously. "What's your name?"

"Considine. Joe Considine."

"You got a pad around here?" This time I nearly piled up the car against a street sign. Not because of the implications of her question, but due to something I suddenly remembered. Something weighing about 250 pounds of solid, unyielding granite—my landlord.

"I did," I told her. "That is, I do and I don't. I mean, I haven't been getting up the rent for a couple of months and the landlord is leaning on me. I figured on drawing a salary advance today, only my job was shot down. So when I show up tonight without a payment, it's outsville."

"What about your compensation?"

"Two week waiting period before I collect the first check."
